As set forth above, the potential division of loyalty which Congress sought to eliminate was that which a guard might experience when caught in the dilemma of trying to enforce his employer's rules against his fellow union members, either in his employer's plant or, in the case of armored-car guards, during attempted deliveries at another employer's plant. In either event, the entity which Congress sought to protect was the guard's employer or another employer.

There is no evidence that Congress sought to protect a labor organization against potential division of loyalty when one of its members or officers is a member or officer of another labor organization. Yet, this is what the Company's argument amounts to. The Company contends that the Local 555 officers, some of whom were also Local 390 stewards, were caught in "the classic conflict of loyalty" between two unions.

It is obvious that there was a conflict between the two unions. It existed at the Company's Fort Lauderdale facility. It was there that Local 555 President Jordan and his colleagues sought and obtained certification despite the fact that Jordan was a Local 390 steward in another area (West Palm Beach) and other Local 555 officers had similar Local 390 affiliations. And it was at Fort Lauderdale that Local 390 President Lark unsuccesfully sought recognition of Local 390 from the Company despite the recent election result in favor of Local 555.

But this union competition is not the "conflict of loyalty" with which Congress was concerned in enactment of Section 9(b)(3). Neither Local 555 nor Local 390 is an employer employing guards who are members of still another labor organization. Local 555 President Jordan did not experience any divided loyalty between duties (as a guard) owed to his employer (Consolidated Freightways) and those owed to Local 555 or Local 390—Jordan was a truckdriver not a guard.

Nor did Jordan owe any obligation to Abaroa or the Company's employees at its Miami facility, there represented by the Teamsters. Local 555 was not certified as the representative of the Company's Miami employees—it was certified for an entirely different unit, the employees in Fort Lauderdale. There is no evidence that Local 555 in any way wavered from this responsibility. The Company's argument that Local 555 was somehow obligated to rescue other units elsewhere in the country from representation by other labor organizations is without precedent or logic.

As indicated, the Company also argues that divided loyalty exists when a guard union is "controlled" by nonguards or when a guard union is called on to enforce rules against members of an "affiliated" union. This argument depends on the Company's contention that Local 555 is directly or indirectly affiliated with a nonguard union, an argument which I now consider.

D. The Affiliation Issue

1. The Company's position

The Company relies on the fact that Local 555 officers Jordan and Hochhauser (and, apparently, Pluchino), at times, were Local 390 stewards when they were also Local 555 officers, and that other Local 555 officers were Local 390 members.

The Company's principal authority is Brinks, Inc., 274 NLRB 970 (1985). In that case a Teamsters local had previously been recognized by the employer as the representative of a unit of guard and nonguard employees. After the employer withdrew recognition from the Teamsters local, two employee guards composed bylaws using the Teamsters local's bylaws as a model. The first meeting of guard employees was held at the Teamsters local's office, at which two representatives of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and the Teamsters local president were present. Immediately thereafter, at another meeting where only employee guards were present, the previously composed bylaws were adopted and officers were elected.

The guard who was the main force behind the guard union was also an elected trustee of the Teamsters local and participated actively in its policymaking board. He was also an active member of the Teamsters Joint Council, and was paid an officer's fee for each meeting of the board or the council which he attended. This individual was also a Teamsters local steward for the employer's guard employees. The Teamsters and guard union bylaws were similar in most respects, as were the authorization cards of the two unions. The guard union cards were based on the Teamsters cards.

On this evidence the Board found that the guard union was indirectly affiliated with the Teamsters local. It relied principally on the fact that the individual primarily responsible for the existence of the guard union was a "paid officer and policymaker" of the Teamsters local, and that the guard union's only meeting occurred at the Teamsters local's office immediately following a discussion attended by Teamsters officials. The Board concluded (id. at 971 fn. 4):

> [T]he close affiliation of the [guard union] and [the Teamsters local], including a common officer, had existed for at least 10 months at the time of the hearing. We are not convinced that the [guard union] is free to and does in fact set its own policies and courses of action.

The Company relies on other cases in which the Board reached similar conclusions. In Armored Transport, 269 NLRB 683 (1984), a Teamsters local had previously represented the unit, and the petition for the guard union was signed by two full-time representatives of the Teamsters who negotiated and administered collective-bargaining agreements. Further, the Teamsters representatives intended to keep their jobs with the Teamsters if they were certified as representatives of the guards. The Board found that the two petitioners were indirectly affiliated with the Teamsters based on their "employment as full-time Teamsters business agents." Id. at 684.

In Stewart-Warner Corp, 273 NLRB 1736 (1985), a Teamsters local filed and then withdrew a representation petition. Following this a series of conversations and meetings took place: (a) an unknown informant told the individual who ultimately became the guard union president that the Teamsters had "encountered a problem because security guards had to be organized by a union which represents only guards"; (b) a Teamsters business agent and organizer told the future guard union president that the Teamsters wanted him to "take off where they left off," and, after soliciting interest in a guard union, the future president asked the Teamsters business agent for advice on the next steps to take; (c) the future guard union president later met with Teamsters officers who were his longtime friends at a Teamsters office, and was given advice on securing a showing of interest, together with a prepared petition; (d) the future guard union president and others who had agreed to be officers met with the Teamsters business agent, who presented them with a showing-of-interest petition signed by some of the employer's guards; and (e) the Teamsters business agent gave the future guard union president a completed representation petition requiring only his signature and advice on what to do after filing. The Board ruled that these and other factors indicated a lack of freedom on the part of the guard union in formulating its own policies, and thus supported a finding of indirect affiliation.

In Wackenhut Corp., 223 NLRB 1131 (1976), the guard union secretary-treasurer served as salaried assistant to the president of the nonguard union (District 2, MEBA), while the guard union president was himself employed by District 2. A contract negotiated by the guard union stated that it was "affiliated" with the nonguard union. District 2's secretary-treasurer and the secretary to its president were authorized to sign checks on behalf of the guard union, and District 2 promised financial assistance to the guard union if needed. District 2 also provided free office space and business and secretarial services to the guard union. The Board found that the latter did not have "freedom and independence in formulating its own policies and deciding its own course of action" (id. at 1132).

In Willcox Construction Co., 87 NLRB 371 (1949), a guard union affiliated with the International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) was dissolved, and, on the same day, the International Watchman's Association (IWA) was formed. Later, IWA granted a charter to a guard union local. Despite assertions of independence of the IWA and its local from any other labor organization, the IWA president was also president of an ILA affiliate, from whom he received expense allowances in addition to his IWA salary. Three IWA vice presidents served as officers of or delegates to ILA organizations, and participated in formulating IWA's policies. The Board found that these facts evidenced indirect affiliation between the IWA and the ILA.

2. Discussion

With the exception of the Local 390 stewardships of Jordan, Hochhauser, and Pluchino, the foregoing indicia of indirect affiliation are not present in this case. Thus, the evidence is insufficient to establish that Local 390 gave financial or organizational assistance to Local 555. The Board has concluded in another case that the absence of these two factors was sufficient to negate an inference of indirect affiliation despite the fact that the nonguard union allowed the guard union to use its meeting hall and had the same attorney. Philadelphia College of Medicine, 213 NLRB 259 fn. 3 (1974).[33]

In this case, unlike some of those cited by the Company, there was no prior representation of the unit in question by a nonguard union (Local 390), followed by loss of such representative status and subsequent activity suggesting an effort to circumvent Section 9(b)(3) with a captive guard union. Local 390 did not represent the Company's Fort Lauderdale guards, and there is no evidence that it started Local 555 to gain such representation indirectly. The genesis of Local 555 was Jordan's dissatisfaction with the working conditions of his father, a guard.

The first guard union meeting did not take place on nonguard union premises, and Local 390 did not provide office space or secretarial services to Local 555. Local 390 officers did not speak to Local 555 officers about the affairs of the latter union, nor attempt to bargain with the Company on its behalf. Local 555 was governed by the constitution of its own International, not bylaws modeled after those of the Teamsters.

The Company's case thus comes down to the Local 390 stewardships—Local 555 President Jordan at Consolidated Freightways until about 1984, Recording Secretary Hochhauser at that location thereafter, and Secretary-Treasurer Pluchino for about 6 months in 1982 at a Ryder company.

[33] See also New York Hilton, 193 NLRB 313 (1971), Ingersoll-Rand Co., 119 NLRB 601 (1957).

The Company argues that these Local 555 officers were, as Local 390 stewards, also officers of Local 390[34] and that their status as "common officers" establishes direct or indirect affiliation of Local 555 with Local 390.

Because the duties of Local 390 stewards are defined by its bylaws in the section entitled "Officers," it may reasonably be inferred that Local 390 considers them to be officers. However, the issue is whether they are officers with stature sufficient to establish that their concomitant participation in the operation of Local 555 manifests its "affiliation" with Local 390. They are not members of the Local 390 executive board, which decides union policy, nor is there any evidence that they do in fact exert influence on policy decisions. Rather, their function is limited to the settlement of grievances at the plant level. As Local 390 stewards, they are appointed by the Local 390 president, serve at his pleasure, and are not compensated.

None of the "common officer" cases cited by the Respondent involves individuals so limited in responsibility and perquisites in their nonguard positions. All received monetary compensation in one form or another for their nonguard union duties[35] and, unlike the facts here, the records affirmatively show that their nonguard union jobs were continuing in nature. All had responsibilities greater than the stewards' resolution of grievances here, ranging from negotiation and administration of collective-bargaining agreements (in Armored Transport, supra) up to the presidency of a nonguard union affiliate (Willcox Construction Co., supra).[36]

The Company argues that the Teamsters president's removal power over Local 390 stewards evidences Local 390 control over Local 555 because some of the Local 555 officers were Local 390 stewards. However, it is at least questionable that the unpaid Local 390 steward jobs were more important to Jordan and his colleagues than were the factors which motivated them to start a guard union. Further, there is no affirmative evidence of any such attempt at control of Local 555, and the Company's argument is not a substitute for evidence. What the Teamsters president's removal power does emphasize is the disparity between the status of Teamsters stewards and that of the other officers considered by the Board in the "common officer" cases.

Because of these differences, I cannot conclude that the stewardships of Jordan, Hochhauser, and Pluchino are, standing alone, sufficient to warrant a finding that Local 555 is indirectly affiliated with Local 390.

In the "common officer" cases, the Board did not base its findings of affiliation merely on the existence of such [34] The Company cites Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1392 v. NLRB, 786 F.2d 733 (6th Cir. 1986), enfg. 273 NLRB 1540 (1985); and Gould Corp., 237 NLRB 881 (1978), enf. denied 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979). These cases deal generally with the issue of whether an employer may single out a steward for selective discipline because he participated in an unlawful work stoppage.

[35] I infer that the "full-time employment" of the Teamsters representatives in Armored Transport, supra, was not gratuitous.

[36] The fact that Local 555 Vice President Marciaro's father was a Local 390 officer is not significant because he did not attend any guard union meetings, and there is no evidence that he has any influence over its operations.

officers. Rather, as the ultimate fact in each case, such officers and other evidence showed that the guard union in question was not free to formulate its own policies and courses of action.

No such finding is warranted on the facts in this case. Although Jordan and Hochhauser may have been dutiful stewards for the Teamsters in the West Palm Beach area, they were, through Local 555, competitors of the Teamsters for representation of the Company's guards in the Fort Lauderdale facility. Local 555's independence from Local 390 is additionally demonstrated by the fact that Jordan, its president, compelled Pluchino, also a Local 390 steward, to resign from Local 555.

For these reasons I conclude that the Company has not sustained its burden of establishing that Local 555 was directly or indirectly affiliated with a nonguard union.[37]

In accordance with my findings above and on consideration of the entire record,[38] I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Brinks, Incorporated of Florida is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 555, International Union of Police & Protection Employees, I.S.O.P.G.U. is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time guards employed by the Respondent at its 1361 S.W. 20th Terrace, Fort Lauderdale, Florida office, including drivers, messengers, cashiers, assistant cashiers, and money room clerks; excluding all other employees and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. On 16 February 1983 the above-named Union was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the aforesaid unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid certification does not contravene Section 9(b)(3) of the Act.

6. By refusing on or about 24 August 1983, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all its employees in the appropriate unit, the Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

7. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, the Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[39]

ORDER

The Respondent, Brinks, Incorporated of Florida, Fort Lauderdale, Florida, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Local 555, International Union of Police & Protection Employees, I.S.O.P.G.U. as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time guards employed by the Respondent at its 1361 S.W. 20th Terrace, Fort Lauderdale, Florida office, including drivers, messengers, cashiers, assistant cashiers and money room clerks; excluding all other employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its facility in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[40] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 12, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[37] Because of this conclusion, the second half of the Company's "divided loyalty" argument, described above, is also without merit.

[38] The record is corrected by inserting the word "may" between the words "You" and "very" in L. 13 on p. 832 of the transcript.

[39] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[40] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the Company's objections in Case 12–RC–6244 are overruled in their entirety.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the prior Order denying the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment[41] is vacated, and the same is granted as modified here.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that to ensure the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, the initial period of certification shall be construed as beginning on the date the Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit.

Pittsburgh Metro Area Postal Workers Union a/w American Postal Workers Union, AFL–CIO (United States Postal Service) and Vicki Austin. Case 6–CB–6862(P)

24 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 23 September 1986 Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Wallace issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Respondent filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and a brief in reply to the General Counsel's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Pittsburgh Metro Area Postal Workers Union a/w American Postal Workers Union, AFL–CIO, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b).

"(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT attempt to punish anyone for not conforming with the Union's policy on noncooperation with USPS-sponsored drives for contribution to causes such as Combined Federal Campaign, the Blood Drive, and the Savings Bond Drive, and for filing charges against the Union with this Board.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

PITTSBURGH METRO AREA POSTAL WORKERS UNION A/W AMERICAN POSTAL WORKERS UNION, AFL–CIO

Thomas R. Davies, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Anton G. Hajjar, Esq. (O'Connell, Schwartz & Anderson), of Washington, D.C., for the Respondent.

DECISION

ROBERT T. WALLACE, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge filed by Vicky Austin, an individual, on 19 July 1985, a complaint was issued on 30 August 1985. Hearing was held on 14 January 1986.

The complaint,[1] as amended both prior to and at the hearing, alleges that the Pittsburgh Metro Area Postal Workers Union a/w American Postal Workers Union, AFL–CIO (an admitted labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the National Labor Relations Act) violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (b)(2) of the Act by failing fairly to represent and attempting to cause the United States Postal Service (USPS) unlawfully to discriminate against Austin and two other employees (Tina Taylor and Chuck Warren) at the Bulk Mail Center (BMC) in Warrendale, PA.

Based on the entire record, including by observation of the witnesses and after due consideration of briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Union, I make the following findings, conclusions, and recommended order.

Jurisdiction is established by Section 1209 of the Postal Reorganization Act, 39 USC 101 et seq. (1970).

[1] On 2 January 1987 the Respondent filed a motion to dismiss the General Counsel's exceptions on the basis of untimeliness and mootness. On 20 January 1987 the Board granted the Respondent's motion to withdraw that portion of its motion to dismiss that relates to untimeliness. The General Counsel filed an opposition to the Respondent's motion on 27 January 1987. The Board, having duly considered the matter, denies the Respondent's motion to dismiss the General Counsel's exceptions.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by refusing to endorse personal convenience requests submitted by employee Austin, we necessarily also find that there is no violation with respect to the Respondent's refusal to endorse similar requests submitted by employees Taylor and Wurm.

We note that the judge twice inadvertently referred to Wurm as Warren and incorrectly cited Steelworkers Local 1397 (U.S. Steel Corp.), 240 NLRB 848 (1979), as United Steelworkers of America, Local 397.

[1] This proceeding had been consolidated for hearing with a complaint against the United States Postal Service in Case 6–CA–18524(P). In the latter case, I granted the above-named Union's request to withdraw its charges, and the complaint therein was severed and subsequently dismissed.

For many years prior to April 1985,[2] the Union and USPS jointly sponsored a number of charitable and community-oriented activities at the BMC including solicitation of contributions for the Blood Bank, Savings Bond Drive, and for the Federal Government's counterpart of the United Way which is called the Combined Federal Campaign (CFC). As to the latter, USPS typically allowed training of solicitors and solicitation to occur on BMC premises during working hours. For its part the Union, among other things, assisted in distributing promotional literature and pledge cards, nominated volunteer rank and file employees to serve as solicitors, and endorsed their written requests for temporary changes in work schedules to permit attendance at training sessions and solicitation at propitous times. Union endorsement enabled USPS to approve the requests without having to pay time and one-half for work performed "out of schedule."[3] This is so because of an exception[4] in the applicable collective-bargaining agreement releasing USPS from its obligation to pay premium rates when variances are temporary and granted to accommodate written "personal convenience" requests of employees. Such requests, however, must bear the endorsement of a union representative before being presented for supervisory approval.

About 1 April, however, newly appointed management at the BMC began to implement a program perceived by the Union as impinging on long-established local practices and seniority rules in areas such as leave, overtime, and holiday scheduling;[5] and at a general meeting held on 20 April the membership of the Union unanimously approved a resolution opposing the "take-back" effort and adopting a policy of noncooperation with management in regard to the Blood Bank, Savings Bond Drive, CFC, and similar activities. The resolution also instructed union officers to provide and promote union-led counterpart programs; and this was done.

The dispute continued through 31 October. During that period an unprecedented number of seniority based grievances (over 2000) were filed. Management sharply limited the amount of on-duty time which stewards could spend investigating and processing grievances. The approval ratio of union endorsed employee personal convenience requests for changes in schedules to permit attendance at events such as family reunions, sporting meets, picnics, and union meetings went from about 9 out of 10 to about 1 out of 10.

On 6 June, Austin—a clerk and union member with relatively little (6 years) seniority—presented two personal convenience requests to Joseph Miller, the Union's chief grievance officer at the BMC. In one she sought Saturday off in lieu of Wednesday during workweek ending on 5 July in order to serve as a coordinator of the management sponsored Blood Drive. In the other she asked for the same change but during the following week so that she could attend a meeting of safety captains.[6] She avers that her goal was to aid worthwhile programs and at the same time also obtain a day off on weekends.

Both requests were promptly endorsed by Miller and approved by management. He states that requests to attend safety meetings were and continue to be routinely endorsed by the Union because cooperation in matters of plant safety benefits labor as well as management and is provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement.[7] Concerning the request to aid in the Blood Drive he explains that he signed because at the time he was unclear as to whether the Union's policy of noncooperation applied to endorsement of schedule changes sought for that purpose.

On 10 July Austin presented two more requests to Miller. Together the requests, if endorsed by the Union and subsequently approved by management, would have given her weekends off in place of her normal layoff days (Tuesday and Wednesday) during a 4-week period extending from 9 August through 6 September. Her purpose, as stated on the request form, was to receive training and to serve as a canvasser for the management-sponsored CFC.

This time Miller sought instructions from the president of the Union before taking any action on the requests. The latter told him that the policy did indeed apply to requests of the type submitted by Austin. Miller so advised Austin and declined to endorse her requests. His failure to do so constitutes the violation of a duty of fair representation alleged in the complaint.

I find no violation.

In exercising its right under the bargaining agreement not to waive (by endorsement) premium pay for out-of-schedule work that bargaining unit members wish to perform for "personal convenience," the Union's duty of fair representation requires that it not act arbitrarily, or in a discriminatory manner, or with bad faith.[8]

Austin's request to participate in the management-sponsored CFC ran counter to the Union's policy of noncooperation in drives of that type. That policy, unlike the situation in a case involving postal workers in St. Louis, Missouri,[9] was not an ad hoc creation of a

[2] Unless otherwise indicated all dates hereinafter cited are in 1985.

[3] Each permanent position at the BMC consists of a job description together with a schedule of working times and days off (layoff days) applicable thereto. Positions are awarded on the basis of bids with seniority being the determinative factor. Temporary details to same-level jobs also are awarded on the basis of seniority. Positions entailing weekends off are preferred and so are held by employees with the most seniority.

[4] The exception derives from an arbitrator's interpretation (the so-called Gamser Award, issued in 1975–G.C. Exh. 14) now reflected in sec. 233.23 of a time and attendance manual published by USPS (G.C. Exh. 3) which is made part of the agreement (G.C. Exh. 2) by sec. 19 thereof.

[5] The complaint does not allege, nor does the Union contend here, that management breached its duty to bargain in making the changes.

[6] Safety captains' meetings are held only on weekdays; and as to the Blood Drive and other campaigns for voluntary contributions, Austin explains that because of differing mailflow and manning situations weekends vs. weekdays, the latter are more favorable for solicitations. In her words: "It made the job easier and took less man-hours [on weekdays]."

[7] On 11 July Austin sought and received Miller's endorsement on another request to attend a safety meeting by substituting Saturday for Wednesday as her day off, this time during the workweek ending on 9 August.

single union official. Rather, the policy was duly and unanimously adopted at a general meeting of union members; and despite unfortunate potential adverse affect on worthwhile charitable endeavors, the policy itself, as well as its application to the Union's contractual right to waive or not to waive premium pay,[10] have a legitimate union-related object, i.e., to leverage management into abating or rescinding actions perceived as unfair to labor. Accordingly, I find no arbitrary action or abuse of discretion. Further, there is no evidence that in applying the policy the Union discriminated against Austin[11] or otherwise acted in bad faith.[12]

As noted, Austin filed her charge with the Board on 19 July. On 16 August she filled in for the general clerk in the superintendent's office. Temporary assignments to that job normally went to the most senior qualified clerk on a list of volunteers. But in this instance management did not follow that procedure by first offering the assignment to all employees on the list having greater seniority than Austin. One of those (Ethel Daily) asked Miller to investigate and grieve the matter on her behalf; and he did so. Arlyn Parrish, another clerk with more seniority than Austin, claims that Miller approached her on 16 August and asked whether she had been offered the job. After she responded: "Yes," he urged her to bump Austin because "we don't want her in there." She declined. Austin continued to work in the superintendent's office throughout the day. The grievance was settled in Daily's favor when, in a letter to Miller dated 10 October (R. Exh. 5), USPS acknowledged its mistake and agreed to adhere to the practice of choosing temporary clerks from the list on the basis of seniority.

Although I credit Parrish's testimony and find that Miller harbored a personal reason for not wanting Austin "in there" (i.e., he resented her dissident attitude and the fact that she had filed a charge against the Union), I see no reason to conclude that bias played any significant role in his initiation and conduct of the investigation and subsequent filing of the grievance. Miller was acting in his capacity as steward on request of a clerk (Daily) having more seniority than Austin and he had reason to believe that a grievable issue arose from failure to offer her the assignment to the superintendent's office. However, he did not confine his efforts solely to investigating the grievance. He went further and sought to persuade Parrish to change her mind and exercise her seniority to oust Austin from the temporary office job, and I find that in doing so he attempted unlawfully to retaliate against Austin for cooperating with management contrary to union policy[13] and for filing charges under the Act.[14]

[10] The General Counsel contends that the Union erred in not announcing that the policy of noncooperation extended to endorsements of personal convenience requests. I find no fault. The policy clearly contemplated application to actions which involve exercise of discretionary power by the Union.

[11] Indeed, the Union is shown to have declined to endorse subsequently submitted requests for schedule changes to permit Taylor to obtain CFC training, and Warren to participate in CPR classes held under management auspices.

[12] Compare American Postal Workers, 250 NLRB 761 (1980), in which endorsement of a requested schedule change to permit an employee to attend Naval Reserve meetings was found to have been unlawfully conditioned on his joining the Union.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by attempting to punish a member of the bargaining unit for not conforming with union policy of noncooperation with USPS-sponsored campaigns for voluntary contributions and for filing charges against the Union with the Board.

2. It is not shown to have violated the Act in any other respect.

THE REMEDY

Austin incurred no financial detriment as a result of the unlawful conduct of the Union found above. Accordingly, an appropriate remedy here is a cease-and-desist order as well as a requirement for notice posting. There is no need for a special "visitatorial" clause for discovery purposes as requested in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[15]

ORDER

The Respondent, Pittsburgh Metro Area Postal Workers Union a/w American Postal Workers Union, AFL-CIO, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Attempting to retaliate against employees for not conforming with union policy of noncooperation in USPS-sponsored drives for contributions to causes such as the Combined Federal Campaign, the Blood Drive, and the Savings Bond Drive, and for filing charges against the Union under the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its headquarters and at the USPS Pittsburgh Bulk Mail Center in Warrendale, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[16] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent

[13] See Steelworkers Local 397, 240 NLRB 848, 849 (1979); Operating Engineers Local 139 (AGC of Wisconsin), 273 NLRB 992 (1984).

[15] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[16] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not found herein.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 23 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Because we agree with the judge and adopt his finding that the discharge of Pauyo was not unlawful, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's alternative finding that even if the discharge were found to have been unlawful, Pauyo's altercation with employee Mitchell disqualified Pauyo from reinstatement.

Chairman Dotson agrees with the judge's alternative finding.

James Wasserman, Esq., for the General Counsel
Harry N. Turk, Esq. (Epstein, Becker, Borsody & Green, P.C.), for the Respondent.
Roger H. Madon, Esq. (Sturm & Perl), for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL P. BIBLOWITZ, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in New York, New York, on 29 and 30 September 1986.[1] The order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint, and notice of hearing issued on 25 July, and was based on charges filed on 14 April and 4 June and amended charges filed on 16 April and 2 July. The consolidated complaint alleges that Marico Enterprises, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging employee Joseph Pauyo because he joined and assisted Local 1-J, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union), and engaged in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. The consolidated complaint further alleges that certain of Respondent's employees concertedly ceased work and went on strike commencing 2 April in protest of the above-mentioned unfair labor practice and although the employees unconditionally offered to return to work on 21 May (actually 27 May), Respondent refused, and continues to refuse, to reemploy employees, also in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS

There being no dispute, I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE FACTS

In about mid-March, the Union began organizing Respondent's production and maintenance employees, most of whom are Haitian and speak Creole. On 27 March the Union filed a petition with the Board to represent Respondent's production and maintenance employees; the parties stipulated that Respondent received this petition on Monday, 31 March. The events in question occurred on Wednesday, 2 April. On that day, shortly before 3 p.m. an announcement was made over the plant's loudspeaker system informing the employees that representatives of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (Immigration) had arrived at the facility. That announcement triggered a confrontation between Pauyo and Jules Cohen, Respondent's president, which resulted in Pauyo's discharge within the hour. The General Counsel alleges that this discharge resulted from Pauyo's union and protected concerted activities on behalf of the other employees, although Respondent contends that Pauyo was discharged solely because of the dangerous condition he was creating at the plant.

Shortly before 3 p.m. that day, an announcement was made over the loudspeaker stating: "Wedler, your mother is on the phone," or some similar words, which was a signal to alert the employees that Immigration was at the facility. At that time, employees began leaving the plant through all available means. Pauyo testified that his supervisor, Wilfred Guillome, told the employees that Immigration was at the facility, and anyone who did not have their green card should follow one of the employees who would take them out of the plant. About four employees from his department left. Shortly thereafter, after most of the employees returned, two fellow employees spoke to Pauyo in Creole and told him that they felt that Cohen had called Immigration and they wanted him to speak to Cohen because he speaks English well. At that point Pauyo walked to the shipping department;

[1] Unless indicated otherwise, all dates referred to herein relate to the year 1986.

Cohen was already there, not far from where his office is.

Cohen testified that shortly before 3 p.m. that day, he was "advised" that Immigration was at the plant (although he never saw them) and when he walked out of his office he saw employees running out of the door. Martin Fishman, Respondent's controller, testified that the two Immigration agents came into the first entrance of the building; he noticed them and spoke to them before they entered the plant itself. They said that they were from Immigration, and > said they were not here at this time to do anything . . . they would like to come back at another time and they would like to have a list of our payroll and at that time anyone they would ask, they would want to see if they had a green card or not.

> While we were talking, they noticed a lot of people were leaving the building. One of them casually, jokingly remarked, is it a coffeebreak, I have never seen people running so fast in all my life, and I said no again he assured me that they were not here to do anything at that time. Again they wanted a list of payroll at a future date. He would not give me a date, it would be somewhere in the near future. At that time they would ask people for green cards. If people did not have a green card, they would not stop anyone from working, they would not arrest anyone or take anyone out of the building. The only thing they would do, they would ask people to make appointments to go downtown to fill out necessary papers and if need be, to go before a hearing, and that's the only thing, they asked if we would voluntarily comply with that, which I told them we would.

Fishman asked them why they were at the plant and they said that they could not tell him, but that they routinely do investigations in Rockland County because of the large number of Haitians there. They left without entering the plant.

Pauyo testified that on the prior day, for the first time since he had been employed by Respondent (December 1985), the supervisors were asking employees for their green cards and, those that did not have it, were told to bring it in the following day. Cohen testified that there was a "green card check" on 1 April; his son, Howard Cohen was in charge of it. "We do that occasionally" to keep their employment records timely. Howard Cohen did not testify on this subject. Bruce Tucker, Respondent's distribution manager, testified that Howard Cohen was responsible for green-card checks at the facility; although he is not directly involved in them, they take place every 4 or 5 months.

There was testimony from four witnesses (Pauyo, Cohen, Tucker, and Supervisor Pauline Garbelotto) regarding the subsequent confrontation between Pauyo and Cohen. Pauyo testified that he approached Cohen in a large area adjacent to the shipping and receiving department; at the time, approximately 45 employees were milling about nearby. Pauyo told Cohen that he would like to talk to him; Cohen asked what he wanted to talk about and Pauyo said that some of the employees felt that Cohen had something to do with Immigration's presence at the plant. Cohen asked, "You want to have a discussion?" and when Pauyo said that he did, Cohen turned to the large group of employees standing nearby and asked, "Do you want him to be your spokesperson? Do you want him to talk for you?" The employees who understood English answered, "yes" immediately; the others, after having Cohen's question translated, answered "yes" in French and Creole. Cohen then said, "Let's have a discussion right here and now."

Pauyo said that the employees were wondering about the coincidence of Respondent being notified on Monday of the Union's petition, Tuesday the supervisors were checking green cards and telling those employees without one to bring it to work the following day, and on Wednesday the Immigration agents appeared at the plant. "I told him that seemed too much like a coincidence, and the people think that you had something to do with it." Cohen said that he had nothing to do with Immigration's presence at the plant that day; he had orders to get out, and their presence messed up his production. Pauyo said that the employees were unhappy about other things as well; Cohen asked what they could be unhappy about, "They got a job and they're getting paid." Pauyo said that the employees were fearful that if they speak to him about a grievance they could be fired and that if they want a raise they have to speak to a supervisor about it; on occasion, instead of a raise, the employees' pay has been decreased. He said that the employees need somebody to represent them, someone who could speak for them and get things accomplished. Cohen then accused Pauyo of being one of the employees who brought the Union in; Pauyo denied it and repeated that the employees needed somebody to speak for them. Cohen then said, "You must be one of the ones who started this whole shit about the Union." Pauyo said that he did not say anything about a union, he was talking about "somebody" representing the employees, but "maybe a union may be the best thing for them." Cohen then made an obscence gesture with his middle finger in front of Pauyo's face. Pauyo told him it was "very childish" to make such a gesture and he could see why the employees would want a union and he made the same gesture to Cohen. Cohen then said: "I want you out of my place, get out of here, you're fired." Pauyo said that he had done nothing wrong and was not going any place; they could punch his timecard, but he was not leaving the plant. Cohen then told the employees to either return to work or go home. Pauyo returned to his department and saw Cohen walk to where the timecards were located.

Shortly thereafter some fellow employees told Pauyo that Cohen took his timecard. Pauyo went to the office and saw that his card was not with the others; he approached Cohen and asked him, "Why did you fire me, why did you punch out my card." Cohen said that he did it because Pauyo was creating a riot and disturbance. Pauyo said, "You asked for a discussion and I gave you a discussion and now you want to fire me" Cohen called Pauyo "a wise ass" who talked about things that did not need to be talked about and "there's not going to be a union in my place." He said, "I want you out." Pauyo said that he would not leave; Cohen could call the police if he wished to do so. Some fellow employees took him by the arm and walked out of the plant with him.

Cohen testified that prior to Pauyo stepping forward and speaking to him, approximately 45 employees were standing around near the shipping area of the plant; he asked them to leave and return the following morning. Someone asked if he had called Immigration; he said that he did not.

> Well, Mr. Pauyo had started chiming in [at] that point, and he all of a sudden became their spokesman and he went to the opening in front of these people and started going into a harangue about how we had been treating the people like slaves.

Pauyo said that Cohen was a tyrant who was taking advantage of the employees because they were poor, and accused Cohen of calling Immigration, which Cohen denied. "I told him that I am very surprised that you are telling me you want a union representative, I always had an open door, I always help the people out." He also said that his wage rate is comparable to union rates and to answer allegations of wage cuts, when new and faster machinery is installed, he is entitled to cut the piece-rate for that machine. Pauyo kept repeating the same arguments and, at one point, "the argument started to get heated." Pauyo then moved his body back and forth as though he were engaging in sexual intercourse. The employees began laughing and Pauyo "got louder and louder, and carried on more and more and the people became more and more excited with all of this."

> It was as if he was on stage and he was having a ball for himself. I was trying to get the people out of there because of the fact that there could be some damage, people are liable to get hurt congregating like that. They are in an area where it's a shipping area, there are rolls of goods around, there's boxes around, there's things around there and they weren't standing in any clear aisle, they were standing wherever they could stand, and I felt that it was really an inflammatory situation and I wanted the people to go home and come back tomorrow morning.

Cohen testified that he had two safety-related fears, one for the employees and one for himself. A large number of people close together, getting agitated could fall over each other or cartons if they tried to leave the area at the same time. "Who knew what was going to happen? . . . My valiant guess at that time, for whatever it's worth, was that there could be a problem as far as people getting hurt." As to the perceived danger to himself, he testified that with the recent overthrow of Duvalier in Haiti, "the people had a very strong nationalistic feeling and it looked terrifying enough . . . I really didn't know what could happen, but it seemed to my educated guess that there was a potential there." Cohen then asked Pauyo to please leave and return the following morning; Pauyo said that he would not leave unless Cohen punched his card out. Cohen told him to stop being foolish and to leave. Pauyo repeated four or five times that he would not leave until Cohen punched him out. "At that point I had enough." He instructed his personnel director to punch his card out and he terminated Pauyo. "He asked to be fired five different times, and the fifth time as the situation was getting hotter and hotter, that's when I did it." Pauyo still refused to leave, but shortly thereafter, some fellow employees lead him out of the plant. The other employees left calmly.

Cohen testified that during this confrontation with Pauyo he never made an obscene gesture at Pauyo; "to accent a point" during a very heated conversation, "from Mr. Pauyo's point," he pointed his second finger toward Pauyo. "I may have said shit. What kind of bullshit is this or something like that." Other than that, he did not raise his voice and used no obscenity and he was "very calm and collected" during this discussion; he was not getting upset.

Tucker testified that he was working on the dock about 40 feet away from the incident when he heard "loud noises"—"people screaming." He walked toward the area where the noise was coming from and saw Pauyo standing in front of Cohen with about 40 to 50 employees surrounding them. Pauyo was "screaming loudly" that Cohen had called Immigration and had cut Pauyo's piece-rate wage on his machine. "Mr. Cohen was trying to calm him down"; he told Pauyo that he did not call Immigration as it would not be in his interest to do so. Pauyo continued to scream at Cohen with his arms flailing; he said that Cohen was an oppressor who was taking advantage of his people. Pauyo then made a sexual gesture of back and forth movements of his hips and made an obscene gesture with his middle finger to Cohen; Cohen returned the gesture. After Pauyo made the gesture with his hips the employees began laughing. They became "very agitated, egging Joe on," although they were speaking Creole, Tucker did not know what they were saying. Cohen then asked the crowd "if this is the type of person that they would like representing them, representing the people as a union member." Cohen then asked Pauyo to leave because everyone was upset; Pauyo said that he would not leave unless Cohen fired him. Cohen again asked him to leave so that everyone would calm down. "Joe still acting as wild as during the whole time said that he would not leave, that Mr. Cohen would have to fire him before he would leave." Cohen asked him, "Do you want me to fire you?" Pauyo said, "yes," and Cohen said, "Okay, you're fired." Tucker did not observe anything subsequent to that.

Garbelotto testified that while she was working she heard the code words for Immigration over the plant's loudspeaker system and observed employees running out of the plant. She then saw Pauyo approach Cohen as he was coming out of his office, and yell at him, "You called Immigration because you do not want the union in the shop." Cohen attempted to answer, but Pauyo "never gave Mr. Cohen a chance to explain. He just kept yelling and making gestures." Pauyo then yelled that Cohen was cutting their wages and they needed more money "and Mr. Cohen was just standing there, and every time he would try to talk to him, he would just yell right back at him." Pauyo made an obscene gesture to Cohen with his middle finger; she did not observe Cohen return the gesture. She never heard Pauyo ask Cohen to fire him, but "he just said something what are you going to do, fire me?" She did not hear Cohen tell Pauyo that he was fired. During this period, "Mr. Cohen was very calm and talking very nonchalant to him." About 15 to 20 employees were standing in the area. "As he was talking and yelling to Mr. Cohen they were all clapping and telling him, go ahead give it to him, give it to him . . . I mean, it was such a thing, I never saw this in all my life in factories that I've worked, Never."

About 3:30 p.m. as Pauyo was leaving the plant a large number of employees followed him out of the plant; at the time, employees told him, "We're not putting up with this and if he is going to fire you and he's going to do things this way, we all leaving." He testified that "just about everybody that was in the crowd walked out"; only the supervisors remained. Someone called the Union and made an appointment to meet with a union representative on the following morning. On the morning of 3 April, about 7 a.m., Sonia Corujo, organizer for the Union, arrived at her office; about 15 of Respondent's employees were already there. Because the employees spoke Creole, they chose one of their group to act as an interpreter; he told Corujo of the events of the prior day and that they walked out because Respondent fired Pauyo. Another employee complained about Respondent's lowering the employee's piecework rate while another employee complained that Respondent did not respect them. Corujo then went to the plant with these employees; when they arrived she saw a large number of employees in the parking lot; she spoke to a number of them; "the basic thing that they were yelling about. They had fired Joe because Joe spoke for us." She then passed out picket signs to the employees; the picket signs said union recognition.

On 27 May, the following letters, on union stationery individually signed by 35 striking individuals, were delivered by the Union to Respondent, "The undersigned requests to return to work unconditionally and immediately." By letter dated 28 May, Respondent, by Cohen, wrote to these individuals:

> We received your letter on May 27, 1986 in which you requested to return to work unconditionally and immediately.
> This is to advise you that your job has been filled by a permanent replacement and that there is no other job opening at the present time. However, your name will be place [sic] on a preferential hiring list and you will be offered employment when there is a job opening which you are qualified to perform.

Carlos Mitchell was hired by Respondent about 7 April as a strike replacement; about 10 April there was an altercation between him and Pauyo that Respondent alleges disqualifies Pauyo for reinstatement even if his discharge violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[2] Mitchell (whose employment with Respondent ceased in July) testified that he was employed on the dock at the plant and Pauyo yelled from the picket line that he would get him if he started working for the Respondent. On 19 April, Mitchell went on his 10 a.m. break; as he reached the end of Respondent's parking lot and was about to cross the road, to get to a deli Pauyo drove up in his car and said, "Carlos, I'm going to kick your ass later." Mitchell crossed the road and as he got to the store, Pauyo came behind him and pushed him from behind; Mitchell turned around and grabbed Pauyo with his arms around his waist. At that point, a number of other people joined Pauyo in hitting and kicking Mitchell. Shortly thereafter, a van carrying employees arrived, followed shortly thereafter by Howard Cohen. At that time the hitting ceased. Mitchell testified that he hurt his wrist, suffered cuts and bruises, and was treated at a local medical center. Howard Cohen testified that on the day in question he observed Mitchell cross the picket line and saw Pauyo lean out of the window of his car and say something to Mitchell. Because it was about 100 feet from the dock to the street he could not hear what was said. He then observed Pauyo park his car, get out, run across the street, and push Mitchell from behind. Mitchell grabbed Pauyo, who began to punch him. A number of other strikers also began to punch Mitchell, while Corujo attempted to stop them. Two dock employees then drove across the street in one of Respondent's vans and broke up the fight. Howard Cohen then ran across the street and Mitchell "was a little shaken, but he was pretty good. He was cursing, he was very angry."

Pauyo testified that on the day in question, as he was driving his car into Respondent's parking lot, he saw Mitchell getting ready to cross the street to go to the deli across the street from the plant. He told Mitchell that what he was doing was wrong; by working, he was taking money out of the strikers' pockets. Mitchell used some obscenities and made an obscene gesture to Pauyo. Pauyo then parked his car and crossed the street to where Mitchell was standing and told Mitchell that what he was doing was wrong; Mitchell said that he had to make a living too. Pauyo said that he had informed Mitchell of the situation before he began working there and Mitchell said that he did not care. Pauyo said, "Why are you coming off like that? You want to fight me or something?" Mitchell said that he did, and when Pauyo began to remove his jacket, Mitchell took his sweater off and swung at Pauyo while his jacket was halfway down. Pauyo then grabbed Mitchell around the waist (from the front) and pushed him onto the trunk of a car where he held him while Mitchell kept punching him or attempting to punch him. Shortly thereafter, some of the pickets and Howard Cohen came and broke up the altercation.

As stated, supra, the 35 employees unconditionally applied to return to work on 27 May; on the following day,

[2] Shortly prior to the commencement of the instant hearing, Region 2 and the Union entered into a unilateral settlement agreement of a complaint that alleged, inter alia, that "Respondent's pickets, including striking employee Joseph Pauyo, physically assaulted an employee."

Respondent informed them that their jobs had been filled by permanent replacements. Respondent defends that it failed to reinstate these employees because its business had substantially decreased shortly prior to this time.

Respondent's payroll states that for the workweek ending 4 April, it employed 113 unit employees. For the workweek ending 11 April, 45 employees were employed. For the workweek ending 30 May, 88 unit employees were employed by Respondent. For the workweek ending 19 September, Respondent employed 48 unit employees. Received into evidence were Statements of Income of Respondent for the 6-month period ending 31 July 1985 and for the year ending 31 January; these statements were prepared by an accounting firm with the following caveat:

> All information included in these financial statements is the representation of the management of Marico Enterprises, Inc. A review consists principally of inquiries of company personnel and analytical procedures applied to financial data. It is substantially less in scope than an examination in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, the objective of which is the expression of an opinion regarding the financial statements taken as a whole. Accordingly, we do not express such an opinion.

The sales for the above 6-month period were approximately $6,800,000, with income before taxes and officers salary of $372,000; the same figures for the year were $13,800,000 and $463,000. Also received into evidence were monthly cumulative statements of income for May, June, and July and monthly sales of Respondent from February through July; these were prepared by Respondent's controller Martin Fishman, from Respondent's ledgers and journals. The sales and preofficer salary loss for the 4 months through 31 May were $3,414,000 and $230,000; through 30 June, $3,840,000 and $344,000, and through 31 July, $4,200,000 and $510,000 Sales by month (as compiled by Fishman) were:

February	$963,000
March	$1,100,000
April	$660,000
May	$679,000
June	$425,000
July	$388,000

Fishman testified that prior to April, Respondent's monthly sales figures ranged from $900,000 to $1,200,000.

Howard Cohen testified that after the strike commenced, Respondent placed an advertisement in the newspaper for employees and he immediately began interviewing and hiring employees. When he hired people, he informed them that he was hiring them for a permanent position with Respondent. The last employee was hired about the end of May. He also testified that because business was "horrendously slow" (unlike anything Respondent had previously experienced) Respondent laid off 4 to 6 employees in mid-May and 8 to 10 employees in July.

Prior to the commencement of the strike, Respondent manufactured sheets and comforters (for waterbeds) at its Nanuet facility and mattress pads at its Muncey facility until about May. Since about 1 September, Respondent has sublet the Muncey facility to Benny's Fashions, which makes all the mattress pads and about 5 percent of the sheets for Respondent at this facility. Prior to the strike, Benny's Fashions only made sheets for Respondent.

III. DISCUSSION AND ANALYSIS

The substantial conflicts between the witnesses' testimony regarding the 2 April confrontation between Pauyo and Cohen necessitates credibility findings in that regard. Careful observation of the witnesses, and readings of the transcript, convince me that both Pauyo and Cohen were less than credible in their testimony regarding the incident. They each had good reasons to fabricate their testimony and portions of their testimony is simply not believable. My observation of Garbelotto and Tucker convince me that their testimony of the incident (although not faultless) is a much more reliable recitation of the facts; they appeared to be testifying to the facts as best as they could remember them and had less reason to lie than Cohen and Pauyo. That is not to say that I totally discredit Pauyo and Cohen's version of the incident; however, where there are major conflicts in their testimony, I credit the testimony of Garbelotto and Tucker.

Initially I discredit Pauyo's testimony that when Pauyo first told Cohen he would like to talk to him Cohen turned to the other employees and asked them if they wanted Pauyo to be their spokesperson. My observation of Cohen (and the fact that a large number of the employees do not speak English) convince me that this is highly unlikely. Rather, I find that (as testified to by Tucker) this occurred near the conclusion of the confrontation when Cohen asked the employees if Pauyo was the type of person they wanted to represent them. I find that Pauyo began the incident by saying that the employees felt that Cohen had called Immigration, which Cohen denied. Pauyo told Cohen that it seemed like more than a coincidence that Respondent received notice of the Union's petition on Monday, there was a green card check on Tuesday, and Immigration appeared at the facility on Wednesday. Pauyo then said that the employees were unhappy about other things as well, their inability to speak to him and having their piecework rate cut by Respondent, and that was why they felt that they needed a union. Cohen said that he always had an open-door policy for the employees, and he only cut the piecework rate when he installed new and faster machinery. He said that he was surprised that they wanted a union.

Crediting Garbelotto, Tucker, and (to a lesser degree) Cohen, I find that Pauyo kept yelling and making gestures (Garbelotto), was screaming loudly with his arms flailing (Tucker), or went into a harangue (Cohen). Pauyo said that Cohen was an oppressor (or tyrant) taking advantage of his Haitian employees. Pauyo then made the back and forth gesture with his hips imitating sexual intercourse; these gestures caused the other employees to laugh and become agitated, clapping and giving encouragement to Pauyo. Pauyo then made an obscene gesture to Cohen with his middle finger, a gesture Cohen returned. Pauyo kept screaming at Cohen without giving him a chance to answer. Cohen asked the other employees if this was the type of person they wanted to represent them. Cohen then asked Pauyo to leave because everyone was agitated and upset; Pauyo refused to leave unless he was fired. Cohen repeated the request to Pauyo ("still acting as wild") who said that Cohen would have to fire him before he would leave. Cohen asked, "Do you want me to fire you?" Pauyo said he did and Cohen said, "You're fired." The issue is, simply stated, was Pauyo discharged because he stood up to represent his fellow employees regarding their grievances and recent union organization, or was he discharged because of the way he did it (i.e., the obscenities and insults he used), and does that deprive him of the protection of the Act.

In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), the Board set forth the rule it will henceforth apply in discrimination cases such as the instant matter: "First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct." Initially it should be noted that the appearance of Immigration representatives at the facility 2 days after Respondent received notification of the Union's petition, and 1 day after an unusual green card-check at the facility, although highly suspicious, is not relevant to the ultimate conclusion herein as it did not precipitate Pauyo's discharge. What began the process that culminated in Pauyo's discharge was his decision (protected, of course) to discuss that fact, and others, with Cohen.

It requires no citation that Pauyo's initial action of speaking to Cohen, after being encouraged to do so by fellow employees, constituted protected concerted activities; in fact, Respondent, in his brief, agrees, "although Pauyo's activity may initially have been protected by Section 7, any such protection was lost because of his insubordinate conduct."

Both the General Counsel and Respondent cite numerous cases in their briefs regarding how far an employee may go in his protected concerted activities before losing the protection of the Act. This issue generally arises in two areas: the prosecution of grievances, bargaining, or other union business by shop stewards or others who are both union officials and employees of the company and general (often spontaneous) concerted activity by an employee outside the realm of union business.

As to the former, Hawaiian Hauling Service., 219 NLRB 765 (1975), principally a deferral case, quoted approvingly from Bettcher Mfg. Corp., 76 NLRB 526 (1948):

> A frank, and not always complimentary, exchange of views must be expected and permitted the negotiators if collective bargaining is to be natural rather than stilted. The negotiators must be free not only to put forth demands and counterdemands, but also to debate and challenge the statements of one another without censorship, even if, in the course of debate, the veracity of one of the participants occasionally is brought into question. If an employer were free to discharge an individual employee because he resented a statement made by that employee during a bargaining conference, either one of two undesirable results would follow: collective bargaining would cease to be between equals (an employee having no parallel method of retaliation), or employees would hestitate ever to participate personally in bargaining negotiations, leaving such matters entirely to their representatives.

In Thor Power Tool Co., 148 NLRB 1379, 1380 (1964), enfd. 351 F.2d 584 (7th Cir. 1965), a union committeeman was discharged because he called the plant superintendent a "horse's ass" during a discussion of an employee's grievance. The Board found the discharge unlawful because the characterization "was protected activity because it was part of the res gestae of the grievance discussion." In Calmos Combining Co., 184 NLRB 914 (1970), after a grievance discussion had been completed, and those participating had, apparently, returned to work, the plant manager heard the shop steward shouting. He asked him to stop shouting and was told: "You can't shut me up, I'll shout all I want to." He again asked him to be quiet, but the steward said, "I don't give a damn what you say, I'll shout all I want to, and if you don't like it, tell me to leave." The Board found that the steward's > continued intrasigence was not a part of the res gestae of the grievance discussion [citing Thor, supra]. Rather, the order to stop shouting was a reasonable and lawful order that should have been obeyed, and his refusal to do so was not related to Harts' protected processing of the grievance.

In American Telephone Co., 211 NLRB 782, 783 (1974), the Board stated:

> However, we have long recognized that the disagreements which arise in the collective-bargaining setting sometimes tend to provoke commentary which may be less than mannerly, and that the use of strong language in the course of protected activities supplies no legal justification for disciplining or threatening to discipline an employee acting in a representative capacity, except in the most flagrant or egregious of cases.

In Southern Bell Telephone Co., 260 NLRB 237, 240 (1982), the administrative law judge (as affirmed by the Board) stated:

> Recognizing that it is generally the employees of the employer who have been elected or designated by the union as officers of the union to represent it in the administration of the contract and the resolution of grievances, the Board has held that employees, when engaged in such activity, are protected > by Section 7 of the Act for conduct, attitudes, and statements which might not otherwise be protected. However, as noted by the Employer in its brief in which it largely ignores the fact that Leuckan was acting in his capacity as chief steward in the confrontation here at issue, an employee so engaged may lose the protection of the Act if his conduct becomes so flagrant that it threatens the employer's ability to maintain order and respect in the conduct of its business or threats to "foul up" the employer's operations.

As to employee obscenities, or other strong language, during general concerted activities (rather than union activities), the Board stated in Atlantic Steel Co., 245 NLRB 814, 816 (1979):

> The Administrative Law Judge cited no decisions, however, and we know of none, where the Board has held that an employee's use of obscenity to a supervisor on the production floor, following a question concerning working conditions, is protected as would be a spontaneous outburst during the heat of a formal grievance proceeding or in contract negotiations. To the contrary, the Board and the courts have recognized (as did the Administrative Law Judge in passing) that even an employee who is engaged in concerted protected activity can, by opprobrious conduct, lose the protection of the Act.
> The decision as to whether the employee has crossed that line depends on several factors: (1) the place of the discussion; (2) the subject matter of the discussion; (3) the nature of the employee's outburst; and (4) whether the outburst was, in any way provoked by an employer's unfair labor practice.

Likewise, Chrysler Corp., 249 NLRB 1102, 1109 (1980), which stated: "The employees' right to engage in concerted activity may permit some lee-way for impulsive behavior, which must be balanced against the employer's right to maintain order and respect." In Firch Baking Co., 232 NLRB 772 (1977), the employee was asked by management what was bothering him. His answer blamed his difficulties on the lack of competence of the production supervisor and personnel manager, and did so in a loud and excited manner. This resulted in a suspension. The Board found this violated the Act as his comments were not so egregious or outrageous to deprive him of the Act's protection. The Board stressed two factors for finding no loss of the Act's protection: that the employee was invited by the company to state his views, and "the exchange of remarks occurred in a private office meeting and not on the plant floor where it could have had a negative effect on these supervisors' status in the eyes of other employees".

In Webster Men's Wear, 222 NLRB 1262, 1267 (1976), a 16-year-old employee was fired for profanities and name calling directed at his store manager. However, the Board found that the circumstances there, especially the fact that the store manager ". . .freely resorted to the use of provocative statements and profanity in resisting the employee's complaint," warrant finding that the discharge violated the Act:

> While the namecalling and profanity participated in by Schmidt are certainly not to be condoned, nevertheless, such conduct must be evaluated in this context. And, I am persuaded that, on balance, 16-year-old employee Schmidt who was attempting to present an employee grievance was caught up in this "moment of animal exhuberance."

In the situation herein, the credited evidence establishes that Pauyo's actions were unprovoked; other than returning Pauyo's obscene gesture with his middle finger, Cohen attempted to answer Pauyo's allegations and have him leave the area. In addition his outbursts (not excused by youth as in Webster Mens Wear supra) were extreme and on the plant floor in the presence of a large number of employees. I also find insufficient evidence to establish that Cohen fired him because he stood up to represent the employees, and the Union. The only evidence in this regard is Cohen's statement to the employees, near the end of Pauyo's presentation: "Is this the type of person you want to represent you?" However, this, apparently, refers to Pauyo's obscene and abusive actions rather than his union or concerted activities. In addition, Pauyo continually refused to leave unless he was fired; it was not until Cohen made three requests for Pauyo to leave (all refused) that he fired him. In Pacific Intermountain Express Co., 264 NLRB 388 (1982), an employee refused to obey his supervisors repeated order, even when warned that his failure to do so would result in termination. The Board found the discharge lawful as the employee "brazenly flouted" his supervisors direction, which constituted "the ultimate challenge to Respondent's authority." I find the instant situation analogous.

On the basis of the above, I find that although the General Counsel sustained its burden under Wright Line, supra, Respondent also met its burden of proving that Pauyo would have been discharged even absent the union or concerted activity. Having found that this discharge did not constitute an unfair labor practice, it follows that the strike that followed was not an unfair labor practice strike. Therefore, Respondent's refusal to reinstate the strikers did not violate the Act. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the complaint be dismissed.[3]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[3] It should be noted that even if I had found that his discharge violated the Act, I would have found that his altercation with Mitchell disqualified him from reinstatement. I found Mitchell to be a more credible witness as his testimony seemed more reasonable; as Mitchell was about to cross the street to go to the deli, Pauyo stopped his car and made a comment to Mitchell. Pauyo could have left it at that; instead, he parked his car and crossed the street to get to Mitchell, making it more likely that Pauyo instigated the altercation. In addition, Mitchell was by himself although Pauyo had his supporters nearby across the street, making it less likely that Mitchell would start the fight. I therefore find that Pauyo began swinging at Mitchell and for this reason, he should be denied reinstatement. Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984).

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not engaged in any conduct in violation of the Act as alleged herein.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

It is ordered that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

---

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 10 June 1985 Administrative Law Judge Winifred D. Morio issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the General Counsel filed a brief in answer to the Respondents' exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondents, International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 478, Hamden, Connecticut, and International Union of Operating Engineers, Washington, D.C., their officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete paragraph (A),2(g), and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

2. Substitute the following for paragraphs (B),1(a) and (B),1(b).

"(a) Ratifying the discipline imposed by Respondent Local 478 on Carl Mattocks for performing supervisory duties.

"(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing Stone & Webster in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances."

3. Substitute the attached notices for those of the administrative law judge.

[1] Respondent Local 478 has excepted, inter alia, to the judge's finding that discriminatee Carl Mattocks is an employer-representative within the meaning of Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act, arguing that the Supreme Court, in Florida Power Co. v. IBEW, 417 U.S. 790 (1974), rejected the "reservoir doctrine," which the judge relies on to support her finding. We find no merit to Local 478's exception for, like the judge, we find nothing in the Florida Power decision to suggest that the Supreme Court disapproves of the doctrine. In any event, the facts in this case clearly establish, and the judge found, that Mattocks "possessed and exercised the authority to resolve [employee] grievances," so that even without regard to the "reservoir doctrine" it is patently clear that Mattocks is an employer-representative within the intent of Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) by virtue of his authority to adjust grievances.

Chairman Dotson, although adhering to the reservoir doctrine, notes the Second Circuit's disagreement therewith (see fn. 2 below); consequently, he relies solely on Mattock's actual authority to process and resolve grievances in affirming the judge's finding of a violation in this case.

Member Stephens expresses no view concerning the validity of the reservoir doctrine; he relies on the evidence that Mattocks possessed grievance adjustment authority and was thus clearly a representative within the meaning of Sec. 8(b)(1)(B). NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 323, 703 F.2d 501, 505 (11th Cir. 1983), cert. denied 464 U.S. 950 (1983).

We also find, in agreement with the judge, that the $1000 fine imposed by Local 478 on Mattocks resulted from the latter's performance of his supervisory duties and not from any alleged disparaging remark about the Union Mattocks may have made to employee Fiorello. In this regard we note that despite Fiorello's assertion in his grievance to the Union that Mattocks had made certain disparaging remarks about Local 478, during the hearing on his grievance Fiorello asserted only that he had been improperly discharged by Mattocks, and did not present evidence or raise the question of the alleged disparaging remarks.

Respondent Local 478 has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Contrary to the judge, we do not find the Respondents' defense to the 8(b)(1)(B) complaint allegation to be "patently frivolous." The judge, as noted, relied on the "reservoir doctrine" to find an 8(b)(1)(B) violation. The Respondents, however, argued that the "reservoir doctrine" had been overruled by the Supreme Court's Florida Power decision and cited the Second Circuit's decision in NLRB v. Rochester Musicians Assn. Local 66, 514 F.2d 988 (2d Cir. 1978), which held, inter alia, that the Supreme Court in Florida Power, supra, had "effectively undermined [the] conceptual basis" of the "reservoir doctrine." While, as noted, we do not agree that the "reservoir doctrine" was overruled in Florida Power, nevertheless, the Respondents' defense that it had been overruled and that the judge erred in relying on it cannot, in light of the Second Circuit's decision in Rochester Musicians Assn., be viewed as frivolous. Moreover, we note that the judge's finding that Mattocks was a Sec. 2(11) supervisor and an employer-representative within the meaning of Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) was, for the most part, based on her decision to accept as true the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses concerning Mattocks' duties. In light of the above, we shall not order Respondent Local 478 to reimburse the Board and Mattocks for litigation costs and other expenses incurred by them in this proceeding.

[3] Respondent International Union of Operating Engineers excepts to the judge's inclusion of certain broad remedial language in the recommended Order and notice, noting that the judge found that a narrow order was appropriate in the case of Respondent International. We find merit to Respondent International's exception and shall, accordingly, delete such broad language from the Order and notice.

APPENDIX A

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

TO ALL MEMBERS OF LOCAL 478, INTERNATIONAL UNION OF OPERATING ENGINEERS

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce Stone & Webster Engineering Corporation in the selection of representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by requiring a response to charges, fining and suspending from membership, or otherwise disciplining Carl Mattocks, or any other supervisor-member, for performing supervisory duties for Stone & Webster or any other employer.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner engage in conduct that is violative of the Act or that restrains or coerces Stone & Webster, or any other employer, in the selection of its representative for the purpose of collective bargaining or grievance adjustment.

WE WILL rescind the fine levied against Carl Mattocks and remove from our records all reference to the charges against him and the imposition of the fine.

WE WILL restore Carl Mattocks to his status as a member in good standing with all attendant rights and will remove from his record all reference to his suspension.

WE WILL notify Carl Mattocks, in writing, that the fine and suspension have been rescinded, that all records of the charge, fine, and suspension have been removed and that he will be restored to full membership.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

TO ALL MEMBERS OF LOCAL 478, INTERNATIONAL UNION OF OPERATING ENGINEERS

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce Stone & Webster Engineering Corporation in the selection of its representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by ratifying the discipline imposed on Carl Mattocks by Local 478 because he performed supervisory duties.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce Stone & Webster in the selection of its representatives for purpose of collective bargaining or adjustment of grievances.

WE WILL remove from our records the denial of the appeal filed by Carl Mattocks about the disciplinary action imposed by Local 478 against him for the performance of his supervisory duties and remove all references to the charge, fine, and suspension imposed on Carl Mattocks by Local 478 and we will advise him, in writing, that we have done so.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WINIFRED D. MORIO, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried on 25 February 1985 at Hartford, Connecticut. On 11 October 1984 the Officer-in-Charge for Subregion 39 issued an order in which he consolidated cases and issued a consolidated complaint in Case 39–CB–597(1–2) against the International Union of Operating Engineers (Respondent International) and the International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 478 (Respondent Local 478). The consolidated complaint alleged, in substance, that Respondent Local 478 violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) by suspending Carl Mattocks because he exercised his supervisory authority and that Respondent International violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) by its denial of Mattocks' appeal of this suspension.

The Officer-in-Charge for Subregion 39 on 23 November 1984, issued a second order, in which he consolidated cases and issued a second amended consolidated complaint in Case 39-CB-597(1-3). This second amended consolidated complaint reiterated the violations set forth above and added an allegation that Respondent Local 478 had violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) when it imposed a fine on Carl Mattocks because he exercised his supervisory authority.

An amendment was made to this second amended consolidated complaint on 29 January 1985 in which it was alleged that the above-described conduct by Respondent International and Respondent Local 478 also violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) because Mattocks was an employee within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act who had the responsibility to effectuate the layoff and discharge of employees of Stone & Webster Engineering Corporation (Stone & Webster/Company).

Respondent International and Respondent Local 478 filed answers to these amended consolidated complaints in which they denied the commission of the unfair labor practices, although Respondent Local 478 admitted that it had suspended Mattocks and Respondent International admitted that it had denied the appeal of that suspension.

All parties were afforded the opportunity to be heard, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs were filed by all parties. Based on the entire record, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Stone & Webster Engineering Corporation (Stone & Webster/Company), a Massachusetts corporation with an office and place of business in Boston, Massachusetts, is and has been engaged, as a general contractor, in the building and construction industry building a nuclear power plant in Waterford, Connecticut. Annually, Stone & Webster in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchases and receives at its jobsites materials and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Connecticut. The parties admit and I find that Stone & Webster is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

The parties admit and I find that Respondent Local 478 and Respondent International are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Mattocks' Duties and Responsibilities

Respondent Local 478 admitted that it had suspended Carl Mattocks, and Respondent International admitted that it had denied his appeal of that suspension.[1]

The record reveals that Mattocks has been a member of Respondent Local 478 since 1953 and that during the past 14 years Mattocks has been employed by Stone & Webster, as a master mechanic, in connection with the construction of a nuclear power facility at Millstone Point, in Waterford, Connecticut. At the present time, and for the last 10 years, Mattocks has been working on Unit III at the Millstone site. According to Edwin Browning, senior labor relations supervisor for Stone & Webster, the cost of construction for Unit III will be in excess of $3 billion. At the present time there are 1600 employees at the site, although in the past there have been as many as 3500 employees at the site. The general superintendent of construction at the site is C. B. Sprouse, and the chief construction supervisor is Robert Nickerson, who also has the title of equipment supervisor. Nickerson has overall responsibility for the work performed by the various crafts at the site, including the work of the boilermakers, millwrights, teamsters, and operating engineers.[2] Browning testified that the chain of command for the boilermakers and millwrights includes a foreman, a general foreman, and a construction supervisor who is the individual who reports directly to Nickerson. According to Browning, the chain of command for the operating engineers does not include a foreman, general foreman, or construction supervisor. Rather, the operating engineers on the site report to Mattocks, who, as master mechanic, is on the same level as the general foreman for the other crafts. Mattocks reports directly to Nickerson.

The record reveals that in February 1982 there were 75 operating engineers, 57 boilermakers and boilermakers/welders, 23 millwrights, and 40 teamsters at the site. In February 1983, there were 107 operating engineers, 44 boilermakers and boilermaker welders, 35 millwrights, and 60 teamsters; in February 1984, there were 64 operating engineers, 34 boilermakers and boilermakers/welders, 52 millwrights, and 67 teamsters; in February 1985, there were 27 operating engineers, 3 boilermakers, 36 millwrights, and 37 teamsters.[3]

It does not appear that Mattocks has the authority, directly, to hire or discharge employees. However, according to Browning, the Company considers that it is Mattocks' responsibility to "carry out" the Company's policies with respect to the hire or discharge of employees. Browning did not elaborate on what he meant by that statement. Mattocks, however, did testify that his recommendations with respect to the hire or discharge of employees are accepted. Further, according to uncontradicted testimony by Mattocks, although his supervisors decide whether there is a need for additional operating engineers, he decides whether there is a need for additional mechanics. His recommendations as to which particular employee should be hired for either category are followed by Nickerson. Mattocks claimed that until about 13 months before the hearing in the instant case he called the Respondent Local 478 hall to secure operating engineers and the individuals he requested always were referred to the site.[4] Patrick Milardo, an employee, testified that he had been unable to secure a job at the site, although he had tried repeatedly to be referred through Respondent Local 478. However, he was referred by the

[1] The Respondents did not present witnesses during the hearing.

[2] There are several other crafts at the site including carpenters, electricians, ironworkers, pipefitters, etc. It is unclear whether Nickerson has overall responsibility for all these crafts.

[3] These figures include employees who were present at the site and does not include foremen.

[4] There was only one instance when an employee recommended by Mattocks was not referred. This incident involved an employee, Ralph Gigliotti and the Respondent Local 478's refusal to refer Gigliotti was found to be a violation of the Act in Operating Engineers Local 478 (Stone & Webster), 274 NLRB 567 (1985).

local after he spoke with Mattocks about a job at the site.

Mattocks is advised by Nickerson or other management representatives when it is necessary to lay off employees, but it is Mattocks who decides which specific employee is to be laid off. In some instances, when the qualifications of the employees are equal, Mattocks will recommend that the employee with the least amount of service be laid off. On the other hand, if in Mattocks' opinion the qualifications are not equivalent, he will decide which employee is the most qualified and he will recommend that that employee be retained. In both situations, Mattocks' recommendations are followed.

Nickerson determines whether overtime work is necessary with respect to the construction work. However, it is Mattocks who decides whether maintenance overtime work is necessary and his recommendations with respect to such work are accepted by Nickerson. It is Mattocks who assigns overtime work and while much of this assignment is routine, it is Mattocks who makes the final decision about who will receive such work. It appears that employees can refuse overtime work without being subject to discipline.

On a daily basis Mattocks receives from Nickerson a list of the equipment to be used for that day. Mattocks then meets with all the operating engineers before the start of work and he assigns the particular employee to the particular equipment to be used on that day. It is Mattocks who decides which employee is best qualified to operate the equipment and his decision is based on his independent evaluation of the employee's capabilities. In some instances, the assignment is routine in nature, however, if there is a question about an employee's qualifications it is Mattocks' sole responsibility to make the decision as to which employee should be used. Mattocks, Patrick Milardo, and Gregory Nicholas, two operating engineers on the job, all testified that Mattocks regularly moves employees from one machine to another and these moves, also, are based on a decision made solely by Mattocks.[5]

The proper maintenance of equipment on the job is also part of Mattocks' duties. In the course of fulfilling this duty, Mattocks ascertains the cost for the repair to the equipment and he discusses with Nickerson both the need and cost for the repair of the equipment. However, it is Mattocks who decides which employee will repair the particular piece of equipment, again based on his independent evaluation of the capabilities of the employee. Although Mattocks does not have the direct authority to hire employees, he does decide, based on his examination of the employee's background, whether the new employee can perform independently or needs to be assigned to a more experienced employee and he will choose which of the older employees will train the new one.

In addition to the above duties, Mattocks also maintains the timecards for the operating engineers. Mattocks fills in the employee's name and badge number and the time worked by the employee and he signs the card in the section marked, "Approved General Foreman."[6] This card is then submitted to Nickerson for his signature. This card is used by the time department to determine the employee's pay. The record indicates that it is Mattocks who checks the operating engineers in each morning when he assigns them their work. The record fails to reveal that Nickerson is aware, on a daily basis, of the hours worked by each operating engineer.

Browning testified that Mattocks has the authority to resolve employee complaints and to grant permission to employees to leave work early, although he was unaware of any specific situation where Mattocks exercised this authority. Although Browning claimed that Mattocks could recommend that employees be disciplined, he also was unaware of any instance when Mattocks did recommend such discipline. Browning further claimed that the Company relied on Mattocks to report matters of a disciplinary nature, but he could not recall an occasion when Mattocks made such a report. According to Browning, the Company expects that all employees will report a breach of the Company's rules.

According to Mattocks, he frequently resolves the complaints that the operating engineers have with other crafts and he does this in discussions with the supervisors of the other crafts. He also testified that he has discussed an employee's personal problems and he regularly permits employees to leave work early, if there is a family problem, without discussing the matter with management representatives. Milardo and Nicholas both testified that they have discussed both their personal problems and problems that they have had with other crafts and Mattocks has resolved the problems. Further, according to both employees, they have asked and received permission from Mattocks to leave work early and Mattocks has granted this permission directly to them without any discussion of the matter with management representatives. It appears that operating engineers call Mattocks, rather than the personnel department, if they cannot work due to illness or if they will be late for work. Nicholas also testified that Mattocks has criticized his work and that all orders for operating engineers are received from Mattocks.

Mattocks has his own office, which is located in the maintenance area about 250 feet away from Nickerson's office. Nickerson visits Mattocks at his office several times a day, but the visits are of a short duration. It does not appear that any other operating engineer has an office or is in frequent contact with Nickerson. The position of master mechanic is covered by the collective-bargaining agreement in existence between the Company and Respondent Local 478. Mattocks is paid 25 percent above the highest rate paid to other bargaining unit employees. The parties stipulated that the contractual basis on which Mattocks received the additional moneys was "the maintenance of standards clause provided for in the agreement pursuant to a past practice of the parties that payment of a master mechanic would be 25 percent above the highest rate."

[5] The parties stipulated that employees Frank Bonita, James Leonard, and Houston Vaughn, if called, would testify in accordance with the testimony of Milardo and Nicholas about Mattocks' duties.

[6] There is another section on this card that is marked, "Signed-Foreman."

B. Prior Events

As noted, Mattocks has been a member of Respondent Local 478 since 1953 and, according to Mattocks, he did not have problems with the Local until 1983. In that year, Mattocks openly supported Ralph Gigliotti, who was also a member of the Local and an employee of Stone & Webster, for the position of business manager against the incumbent, Elwood Metz. Mattocks also testified at an unfair labor practice hearing on a charge filed by Gigliotti in which Gigliotti claimed that representatives of the Local had interfered with his job because of his opposition to Metz. The Board in that case found that Respondent Local 478 had violated Section 8(b)(1)(A).[7] There was also a factual finding that Respondent Local 478 had sent a telegram to Stone & Webster in which it stated that the Local did not recognize Mattocks as the master mechanic on the job. It does not appear that there was any change in Mattocks' duties because of this telegram. A further charge was filed by Gigliotti against the Local alleging a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) because representatives of the Local refused to refer Gigliotti for employment because of his opposition to Metz. The Board found that the Local had violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) as alleged.[8]

C. The Charge by Michael Civitillo

Michael Civitillo was hired by Stone & Webster about 17 December 1982 as a mechanical heater mechanic and he continued in that position until early 1983 at which time he was scheduled to be laid off because of a lack of the type of work he performed. However, Mattocks learned that a mechanic who had been employed to check liquid levels on the equipment was scheduled to leave and he recommended to Nickerson that Civitillo be hired and Civitillo was hired. At the time that Mattocks spoke to Nickerson about Civitillo, Nickerson told him that job would last only until the fall. At some point in August 1984, Civitillo approached Mattocks about the possibility of being retained in the same position for a longer period of time because he needed an additional 1-1/2 years of employment. In the course of this conversation, Civitillo indicated to Mattocks that Mattocks had an obligation to keep him because Civitillo had supported the Gigliotti slate in the election. Mattocks became angry at this statement by Civitillo and stated that he had not made promises to anyone for their support.

On 14 September 1983 Civitillo filed a charge against Mattocks in which he contended that Mattocks had violated certain articles of the constitution of Respondent International and the bylaws of Respondent Local 478. Civitillo claimed that Mattocks had erroneously accused him of not putting oil in a truck, but when he checked the truck it was at least three quarts overfull and, therefore, the incident was being fabricated to get rid of him after the election was over. Mattocks submitted a signed statement to representatives of the local in which he explained that a teamster had reported an oil shortage on a truck that had been examined by Civitillo, and wh Mattocks had the truck checked by Michand, anoth mechanic, they found that there was an oil shorta Mattocks reported the incident to Nickerson but wh Mattocks determined that the engine had not been da aged he did not pursue the matter. In this statemer Mattocks claimed that Civitillo had not been dischar because of the oil incident, he had been laid off wh Stone & Webster decided that the position held by Ci tillo was unnecessary.

On 10 November 1983 a pretrial hearing was he before Respondent Local 478's executive board to co sider the charge filed by Civitillo.[9] The board includ Elwood Metz, the business manager; James McParlar the recording secretary; and business agents Joseph D laney, James Keyes, Michael Rapuano, and Way Genyes. Both Mattocks and Civitillo appeared before t board. During this proceeding, Mattocks submitted other statement in which he claimed that Civitill charge was false, that Civitillo's layoff was due to a duction in force and not dereliction of duty, that the cision to reduce the work force was made by the Co pany and not by him, and that the power to hire or f was limited to the management of Stone & Webst Mattocks also submitted statements from Nickerso Clarence Michaud, a mechanic, and Monroe Beebe, acting master mechanic. Nickerson claimed, in his sta ment, that he had eliminated certain positions, includi the position of oil checker.[10] In his statement, Micha claimed that he checked the oil level on a truck afte driver complained and he found the oil level to be lo Beebe, in his statement, claimed that the practice using a maintenance engineer to check oil levels was d continued on 14 September 1983.[11] There were oth documents submitted by Mattocks to support his cla that he had not been at work during the period when vitillo was laid off. According to Mattocks, Civitillo a presented evidence to the board, although not in form of affidavits. At some point during the proceedi Metz stated that Mattocks had laid off Civitillo for pol cal reasons, which Mattocks denied. Metz then ask Mattocks why he had kept Patrick Milardo[12] and l off Civitillo and Mattocks explained that Milardo h qualifications that were needed on the job and it was the best interests of the Company to retain Milar Thereafter, the board met in closed session and decid unanimously, to send the charge to trial before the membership. In the proceedings involving Mattoc appeal to the Respondent International, the members the executive board claimed that they had decided present the issue to the full membership because th viewed the matter as a no-win situation for the executive board due to the fact that the case involved allegations of political motivation between two supporting the slate, which had run in opposition to the executive board. Mattocks was informed, subsequent to the hearing, that a trial would be held on the charge during a union meeting on 13 January 1984.

However, before that date, Mattocks was summoned to appear before the executive board on 19 December 1983. Mattocks was the only witness who testified concerning this meeting. Present at this meeting were representatives of Respondent Local 478, including Metz, the business manager, Joseph Mallozzi, the Local's president, McParland, the recording secretary, business agents Keyes, Rapuano, Genyes, Robert Gates, the union steward, and Edward Moffet and Robert Giacia.[13] Mattocks testified that Metz started the meeting by reading a statement, allegedly signed by Anthony Fiorella, a former employee of Stone & Webster. In this statement, Fiorella claimed that Mattocks had caused Fiorella to be terminated by Stone & Webster. Metz requested Mattocks to sign the statement, which Mattocks refused to do because he said it was not correct. When Mattocks refused to sign the statement, Metz began to question him about the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster and he insisted that Mattocks was instrumental in that process. Mattocks replied that he did not set up the process, he followed it. At this point, Metz became angry and he began to use foul language and make obscene gestures. Metz also said, "We're going to try you next month and we're going to straighten you out." At this point, Mattocks asked what the Company would do if he agreed to make changes in the hire and discharge procedures and Mallozzi stated that he would take care of Stone & Webster. During this meeting, Metz accused Mattocks of being the campaign manager for Ralph Gigliotti, which Mattocks denied. Metz then stated that Mattocks' daughter had been treasurer of Gigliotti's committee, which Mattocks admitted.

Subsequent to this meeting, Mattocks attempted to file internal union charges against Metz, but he was unsuccessful. Mattocks requested forms in order to file these internal charges, but he was told by McParland that he did not have the forms, he could file his charge on any paper he had. Mattocks then filed a detailed statement, on 3 January 1984, concerning the events of 19 December 1983. In this statement, Mattocks noted that he had been called to an executive board meeting on the evening of 19 December and that during this meeting Metz had interrogated him about the hiring process at Stone & Webster, had accused him of being instrumental in that process, had demanded that he sign a statement to that effect and had become abusive to him when he refused to do so. Mattocks concluded his statement with the comment that this conduct by Metz was in violation of article XXIV of the International constitution. Notwithstanding the detailed nature of this statement, it was returned to Mattocks by Mallozzi, allegedly because it was not addressed to the recording secretary and was not specific with respect to the time, place, or details of the alleged offense. Mattocks did not attempt to file another charge.

The trial on the charge filed by Civitillo was held on 13 January 1984, during the course of a regular union meeting and Mallozzi, president of Respondent Local 478, presided at the meeting. Civitillo presented his case but Mattocks was represented by Patrick Milardo. There were approximately 300 members present at this proceeding. The trial commenced with Civitillo's charge being read to the membership and Civitillo then gave some of his work background with the Company. According to Civitillo, in April 1983 Gigliotti advised him that there was a job available on the second shift as an oil checker and Civitillo got the job. About a month later, Civitillo was informed by the union steward that he was to be laid off. Civitillo, however, was not laid off due, he claimed, to Mattocks' intervention on his behalf. Civitillo indicated that Mattocks had intervened because they were both actively involved in the Gigliotti campaign at the time. Civitillo also indicated that it was Mattocks who specifically assigned him to his oil-checking duties. Civitillo's statements at this proceeding were not entirely clear but he did make two points. The first point was that Mattocks had the authority to have him discharged and he exercised that authority and caused his discharge. The second point was that the "oil incident" was created so that Mattocks could have him discharged because he no longer needed him after the union election. With respect to the first point Civitillo stated the following:

> Nickerson may have made the lay-off but the only way he can evaluate the job is from what Mattocks tells him.

Civitillo also claimed that Nickerson did not know him and could not evaluate him. Thus, he stated:

> So how can this man make any judgment about any engineer when he doesn't know them and doesn't know what the qualifications of the engineers are, so Mattocks had to know.

Civitillo repeatedly made the point that Mattocks could do what he wanted at Stone & Webster and when Mattocks decided he no longer needed Civitillo he got rid of him.

With respect to the second point, Civitillo was asked whether he thought he was laid off after the election because he was no longer needed. In response, Civitillo stated:

> That is definitely the opinion that I got. As a matter of fact I saw it coming right after the election. That's why I smelled a rat when they were trying to fabricate all of these incidents for the departure of Civitillo.

Civitillo called two witnesses, Donald Pettengill and Robert Gates, in support of his position. According to both individuals, Civitillo was scheduled to be laid off on [13] Mattocks was not sure of the positions held by the last two individuals but he did state that not everyone present was a member of the executive board.

21 October 1984 but after the oil incident Mattocks told them that Civitillo was a "troublemaker" and he would not be there until 21 October 1984.

Milardo cross-examined Civitillo on behalf of Mattocks. Mattocks then read the statement he had filed in response to the charge wherein he denied that the oil incident was the reason for Civitillo's layoff. Mattocks also read statements by Nickerson and Michand. Nickerson, in his statement, explained that he had decided on the reduction in force and this had caused Civitillo's layoff. Michand's statement supported the version of the oil incident given by Mattocks. At the conclusion of the hearing, Milardo stated that Mattocks was not responsible for Civitillo's layoff. He also said that the leadership of Respondent Local 478 was using Civitillo to get at Mattocks because Mattocks had supported Gigliotti in the election against Metz. At the conclusion of the hearing the membership then voted, and the tally was guilty, 191; not guilty, 109, with 3 void ballots. On 19 January 1984, by letter, Mattocks was advised that he was suspended for 3 years from the rights of membership, including attendance at union meetings, but he was still obligated to pay dues.

On 26 January 1984 Mattocks filed an appeal of his suspension with Frank Hanley, general secretary-treasurer of the Respondent International. Mattocks filed copies of all the exhibits produced during the trial, together with the Civitillo charge and the decision rendered by Respondent Local 478. The thrust of Civitillo's charge was that Mattocks had caused Civitillo to be laid off. Mattocks also advised the International that he had not been provided with a copy of the transcript of the hearing, although he had asked and paid for it. Mattocks reiterated his position that he had not been responsible for Civitillo's layoff. On 22 June 1984 Mattocks filed an additional statement in support of his appeal. In this statement, he noted that he had supported the party opposing the incumbent leadership of the Local and, thereafter, he had suffered several incidents, including slashed tires, demolition of his car, physical injury, obscene phone calls, physical threats by Metz and the processing of frivolous charges against him with approval by Metz. Mattocks stated, again, that he was being harassed because of his support for those who had opposed Metz.

On 27 June 1984 Mattocks' appeal was heard by a panel of vice presidents of the Respondent International. Respondent Local 478 was represented by Joseph Mallozzi, president, Michael Rapuano, vice president, James McParland, recording secretary, Wayne Geynes, financial secretary. Mattocks was not present and was not represented. On 13 July 1984 the panel issued its report to the general executive board. In this report, the panel stated that Civitillo accused Mattocks of manipulating the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster to keep Civitillo on the payroll when Civitillo supported Gigliotti against Metz and later had manipulated the hire and discharge process to have Civitillo's position abolished after the election was over and Civitillo no longer was needed. In this report, the panel stated that Mattocks had denied that he had control over the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster and further denied that he had caused Civitillo's layoff. During the proceeding, before the panel, McParland stated that while Mattocks did not have final say over the hire and discharge process, he, effectively, controlled it by his recommendations to management. The panel, unanimously, agreed that Mattocks' appeal should be denied.

On 6 August 1984 Frank Hanley, general secretary-treasurer of Respondent International, advised Mattocks, by letter, that his appeal had been denied. In this letter, Hanley stated that at a meeting held on 13 July 1983 the general executive board of the Respondent International had denied Mattocks' appeal based on the evidence considered by the panel designated by it. The evidence considered by the panel, as noted above, included the assertion by Civitillo that Mattocks had the authority to hire and discharge at will at Stone & Webster and McParland's assertion, as a representative of Respondent Local 478, that Mattocks effectively controlled the hiring and discharging of operating engineers at Stone & Webster.

D. The Charge by Anthony Fiorello

On 11 January 1984 Mattocks was notified that a second charge was filed against him by Anthony Fiorello, a former employee of Stone & Webster. In this charge, Fiorello claimed that Mattocks had caused Fiorello, Ralph Capello, Bart Miranda, and others to lose their employment. Fiorello also claimed that Mattocks had said the Company should sue Respondent Local 478 because an earlier strike by the surveyors was illegal. Finally, Fiorello stated that Mattocks had caused his loss of employment. The charge alleged that these actions by Mattocks violated the International constitution and the bylaws of the Respondent Local 478.

On 26 January 1984 Mattocks forwarded a statement to McParland with respect to the charge filed by Fiorello. Mattocks stated, in this document, that Fiorello was laid off on orders by management because of a defective machine; that Ralph Capello was laid off by management when the rental on the machine he operated expired; Bart Miranda also was laid off on management orders to permit repairs to be made on the machine that he operated. On 5 June 1984 Mattocks was advised, by letter, that a pretrial hearing would be held 14 June 1984 on the charge filed by Fiorello. Mattocks did not attend this pretrial hearing and, on 18 June 1984, he was advised, by letter, that on the recommendation of the executive board that the matter would be presented to the full membership on 14 September 1984. Mattocks did not attend this meeting. Patrick Milardo testified that he was present at this membership meeting and attempted to represent Mattocks, but was denied the right to do so. According to Milardo, Fiorello, Capello, and Miranda stated only that they were unjustly terminated and they considered that Mattocks was responsible for their terminations. They did not offer any details concerning their terminations and did not call witnesses in support of their charges. On 5 October 1984 Mattocks was advised by letter from McParland that he had been found guilty of the charge brought by Fiorello by a vote of the membership and that a fine of $1000 had been imposed by the president of the local.

E. Mattocks' Testimony Re Civitillo, Fiorello, Capella, and Miranda

Basically, Mattocks' testimony concerning the oil incident followed the statements he made before the executive board and during the trial on Civitillo's charge. According to Mattocks, the incident arose when he was approached by a teamster who complained that the oil in the engine of his truck was low, it was showing on the pressure gauge. Mattocks had Michand, another mechanic, check the oil and Michand told Mattocks that the oil was a gallon low. At that point, Mattocks asked someone to locate the union steward because he thought the engine had been damaged. He also reported to Nickerson that the engine had been damaged and that Civitillo had given him a false report about the amount of oil in the truck. The steward could not be located and the truck was needed, so Mattocks directed someone to add the required amount of oil. The truck was able to be used because the engine had not been damaged and Mattocks took no further action about the incident. Mattocks denied that the incident caused Civitillo's layoff. The layoff was due solely to a reduction in force and it was effectuated by Nickerson when Mattocks was on leave.

According to Mattocks, Fiorello had been operating his machine for about 5-1/2 years. During this period of time, the jib on the main boom had become bent due to the normal operation of the machine. The machine was inspected on a routine basis and after one such inspection Mattocks determined that the jib had a 9-1/2 degree bend and he considered this to be a dangerous condition. He reported the condition to the safety section and they put a "do not use" tag on the machine. He also reported the situation to Nickerson who directed Mattocks to shut the rig down and lay off the operator. Mattocks shut the rig down and asked to see the union steward to discuss Fiorello's layoff. However, the two men did not come to discuss the matter with Mattocks, rather, they discussed it with representatives of the labor relations section. Fiorello was not called to testify in this hearing.

Mattocks also testified that Capello operated equipment that had been rented. When the rental period expired, Nickerson advised Mattocks to lay off the operator, which he did. Capello also was not called to testify. Mattocks also advised Nickerson that the machine operated by Miranda should be shut down for repairs. Nickerson agreed and directed Mattocks to lay off the operator, which Mattocks did. Miranda did not testify in this hearing.

IV. ANALYSIS

A. The Status of Mattocks

The General Counsel contends that at the time of the events involved herein Mattocks was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. The Respondents deny that assertion. Section 2(11) of the Act states the following:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or to effectively recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

It is well established that the possession of any one of these criteria is sufficient to establish that an employee is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.[14] As noted, Respondents did not present witnesses to testify concerning Mattocks' status. Rather, they relied on the testimony adduced from the witnesses presented by the General Counsel and they contend that the testimony of those witnesses establishes that Mattocks' duties were similar to those of the master machine in Operating Engineers Local 673 (Westinghouse Electric Corp.), 229 NLRB 726 (1977). In that case, the Board found the master mechanic was not a supervisor but merely a conduit through which certain company officials were able to execute their decisions. However, there are several differences between the two cases. In Westinghouse, the Board found that the bulk of the testimony was conclusionary in nature. This is not the situation in the instant case. Moreover, the master mechanic in Westinghouse testified that all decisions to hire or discharge employees were made by management. In this case, however, Mattocks testified, without contradiction, that he made the decisions concerning whether additional mechanics were needed and his recommendations were always followed by Nickerson. He also testified that his recommendations concerning the hire or discharge of other employees also were accepted without question by Nickerson. That testimony was unrefuted. In fact, statements made by Civitillo at the membership meeting and testimony by Milardo support Mattock's testimony. It was Civitillo's position that Mattocks controlled the hire and discharge of employees at Stone & Webster and that he used that authority to have Civitillo discharged. Milardo testified that he had been unable to secure work at Stone & Webster until he spoke to Mattocks. In addition, the evidence discloses that Metz insisted at the 19 December 1983 meeting that Mattocks had control over the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster and McParland told the panel of the general executive board that Mattocks effectively controlled the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster.

In Westinghouse, the Board also considered the extent of the master mechanic's authority to assign work and found that the master mechanic merely executed management decisions about which employees should be assigned to a particular piece of equipment or job. In this case, Mattocks testified that Nickerson gave him a list of the equipment to be used each day but he decided which employee was to be assigned to the equipment or job based on an evaluation, made solely by him, of the employee's abilities. This testimony was supported by Milardo and Nelson. It was also supported by Civitillo's statements at the membership meeting. According to those statements, Nickerson did not know the employees and did not know their qualifications and it was Mattocks who knew the employees' qualifications and decided what work they should perform.

Browning, the Company's representative, Milardo and Nelson, who worked directly for Mattocks, all testified that Mattocks effectively recommended most actions that affected the operating engineers at the Millstone site. Based on my observation of these witnesses and of Mattocks, I credit that testimony. Thus, I find that Mattocks effectively recommended the hire and discharge of employees; assigned work to employees, based on an evaluation of their abilities made solely by him; rotated employees on machines according to his determination of what was needed; determined which employee was entitled to perform overtime work; decided whether new employees required additional supervision; allowed employees to leave work early or arrive late to work; approved employee timecards and resolved employees' complaints. Accordingly, I find that Mattocks was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. Electrical Workers Local 340 (Nutter, Inc.), 271 NLRB 995 (1984).

Respondents contend that even if Mattocks did possess supervisory authority, as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act, they were unaware of that fact at the time the disciplinary actions were taken against Mattocks. In support of this assertion, Respondents note that Mattocks consistently denied his supervisory status. That statement does not reflect accurately Mattocks' position. Rather, Mattocks denied that he had the authority, independently, to hire or discharge any employee at Stone & Webster. He also denied that he had discharged Civitillo or caused his discharge. That testimony is consistent with his testimony in this proceeding. However, as stated, supervisory authority is not determined solely by the authority to independently hire or discharge employees. The power to recommend, effectively, such action, to evaluate employees based on an independent judgment, to resolve grievances, and to control the work conditions of employees on a daily basis also establishes supervisory authority. Respondents were well aware that Mattocks possessed this type of authority. In fact, as noted, Metz accused Mattocks of controlling the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster and McParland told the general executive board that Mattocks effectively controlled the process. Both Respondents had full knowledge of Civitillo's assertion that Mattocks could do whatever he wanted at Stone & Webster, that he was Stone & Webster. It was the basis of his charge and of the charge filed by Fiorello. It is difficult, in these circumstances, to find that Respondents were unaware of Mattocks' status.[15] However, if they were not aware a cursory examination of the statements made by Civitillo should have alerted them to the possibility of his supervisory status. Moreover, assuming that Respondents were unaware of Mattocks' supervisory status such a lack of knowledge would not constitute a defense to a finding of a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. There is nothing in the language of that section that suggests that scienter is an element of that violation. Sheet Metal Workers Local 85 (Suburban Sheet Metal), 273 NLRB 523 (1984). Nor is the issue Respondents' good faith or lack thereof. Wisconsin River Valley District Council of Carpenters (Skippy Enterprises), 211 NLRB 222, 227 (1974).

[15] Further, it is difficult to accept that Metz was unaware of Mattocks' status at one of the major projects in the area, a project that was the source of employment for many operating engineers.

B. Mattocks' Status—Section 8(b)(1)(B)

The pertinent part of Section 8(b)(1)(B) states:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents (1) to restrain or coerce . . . an employer in the selection of his representative for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

Respondents contend that under the language of the statute a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) cannot be found in the discipline imposed on Mattocks unless it can be shown that he possessed the authority to act as a collective-bargaining representative or had the authority to adjust grievances for the Company. This record, they argue, fails to disclose evidence of such authority.

It is the position of the General Counsel that under the Board's "reservoir doctrine" all individuals who possess supervisory status within the meaning of Section 2(11) are employer representatives within the intent of Section 8(b)(1)(B), although the individuals in question may not be vested with the specific authority to act as collective-bargaining representatives or to adjust grievances.

The concept of the reservoir doctrine was stated in Toledo Lithographers Local 15-P and 272 (Toledo Blade Co.), 175 NLRB 1072, 1079 (1969), as follows:

> For Section 8(b)(1)(B) forbids a union's restraining and coercing "an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances" and this protection of the employer's right to "selection" must be construed as protection not only the employer's continuing reliance upon supervisors already selected, but his right at any time to make and rely upon a selection of representatives from an uncoerced group of such supervisors whose loyalty to him has not been prejudiced and who he believes would be peculiarly qualified to represent him in the handling of grievances.

It is Respondents' position, however, that the concept of "reservoir doctrine" was overruled by the Supreme Court's decision in Florida Power & Light Co. v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 641, 417 U.S. 790 (1974), and in support of that position Respondents cite the following language from that case:

> The conclusion is inescapable that a union's discipline of one of its members who is a supervisory employee can constitute a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) only when that discipline may adversely affect the supervisor's conduct in performing the duties of and acting in his capacity as grievance adjustor or collective bargainer on behalf of the employer.

Respondents further argue that the Second Circuit in NLRB v. Musicians Local 66 (Civic Music Assn.), 514 F.2d 988, 992–993 (2d Cir. 1975), held that Florida Power Light effectively undermined the conceptual basis of the "reservoir doctrine." I do not argee that the "reservoir doctrine" was overruled by the Supreme Court's decision in Florida Power & Light, with all due respect to the Second Circuit. In fact, the Supreme Court referred to the Toledo Blade case in its decision. Moreover, an examination of the decision in Florida Power & Light discloses that the Court, in that case, was concerned with the issue of whether a union's discipline of a supervisor can violate Section 8(b)(1)(B) unless it adversely affects "the supervisor's conduct in his capacity as a grievance adjustor or collective-bargaining representative." On the other hand, the "reservoir doctrine" deals with the issue of whether a supervisor must possess actual authority to act as a collective-bargaining representative or to adjust grievances or whether it is sufficient that the supervisor be part of the group from which the employer chooses such a representative. These are not the same issues. Further, it should be noted that subsequent to the Rochester decision the Board stated that it would adhere to the "reservoir doctrine." Teamsters Local 296 (Northwest Publications), 263 NLRB 778 fn. 6 (1982). It has continued to do so to date. Sheet Metal Workers Local 85 (Suburban Sheet Metal), supra; Electrical Workers IBEW Local 340 (Nutter, Inc.), 271 NLRB 995 (1984); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 11 (Bergelectric Corp.), 271 NLRB 25 (1984). Accordingly, I find that Mattocks was an employer representative within the intent of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. Moreover, based on this record I also find that Mattocks possessed and exercised the authority to resolve grievances. Browning testified that Mattocks had such authority and Milardo and Nelson both testified that he frequently resolved grievances that they had with other crafts. Respondents contend that when Mattocks resolved these grievances he did so as the representative of Respondents. There is no evidence in this record to support such an assertion. Rather, it is evident that Milardo and Nelson brought their complaints to Mattocks in his supervisory capacity and that he resolved those grievances in that capacity. The Board has interpreted the term grievances to include both personal and contractual grievances, Electrical Workers IBEW Local 340, supra; Norwalk Typographical Union 529 (Hour Publishing Co.), 241 NLRB 310 (1979); Newark Newspaper Pressmen's Union 8 (Newark Star Ledger), 194 NLRB 566, 570 (1971). In the instant case, both Milardo and Nelson testified that they also brought their personal difficulties to Mattocks and he assisted them with their difficulties. The fact that some of these grievances were of a minor nature does not diminish Mattocks' role as an adjustor of those grievances, Columbia Typographical Union 101 (Washington Post Co.), 207 NLRB 841, 847 (1973).

C. Reasons Advanced by Respondents for the Discipline of Mattocks

Respondents contend that not every discipline of a supervisor-member violates Section 8(b)(1)(B). It is true that the Supreme Court has stated that a union does not violate Section 8(b)(1)(B) when it disciplines supervisor-members who perform rank-and-file work during a strike. However, that is not the situation present in the instant case. Civitillo, Fiorella, Capella, and Miranda did not accuse Mattocks of performing their work, they accused him of causing their discharge. Although, in reality, Mattocks was not responsible for the discharge of Civitillo or Capella, and only indirectly responsible for the discharge of Fiorella and Miranda, that is not the issue. The issue is why was Mattocks, a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) and the intent of Section 8(b)(1)(B), called to appear before the executive board of Respondent Local 478, why was he suspended, and why was he fined. The entire thrust of the charges and statements made by Civitillo and others was that Mattocks had total control over the hire and discharge of the operating engineers at the Millstone project and he used that authority to cause their discharge. Mattocks was disciplined by Respondent Local 478 because of the manner in which the Local believed he exercised his supervisory duties. The discipline was a clear attempt to gain control over Mattocks and to make him a representative of the Union, rather than a representative of management. Section 8(b)(1)(B) was enacted by Congress to prevent this type of conduct. As the Board stated in San Francisco-Oakland Mailers Union 18 (Northwest Publications), 172 NLRB 2173 (1968). "In enacting Section 8(b)(1)(B) Congress sought to prevent the very evil involved herein—union interference with an employer's control over its own representative." The Board, also, has stated that a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act when it subjects a supervisor-member to internal union discipline because he exercises his supervisory authority contrary to the wishes of the Union. Teamsters Local 839 (Bechtel Corp.), 271 NLRB 1209 (1984); Longshoremen ILA Local 10 (Pacific Maritime), 254 NLRB 540 (1981).

However, Respondent Local 478 contends that it was not responsible for the discipline of Mattocks, that the charges were filed by members, not officers of the Union, and that it was the members who decided whether Mattocks was guilty of the charges. Further, Respondent Local 478 contends that when it fined and suspended Mattocks its "sole purpose was to enforce the traditional kinds of rules that every union relies upon to maintain its organization and solidarity." These arguments are not persuasive. Although the charges were filed by members, the decision to present the matter to the full membership was made by the executive board. The executive board had the discretion, by the terms of the International constitution, to proceed or not proceed with the charges. At the time that the executive board decided to proceed with the charges, they were fully aware that the charging parties claimed that Mattocks had total control over the hire and discharge process. However, the executive board claimed that they had to process Civitillo's charge because they did not want to become involved in a dispute between two members of the Gigliotti slate who had opposed the Metz slate. I am not persuaded by that explanation. Rather, I find that the board proceeded with the charges because Mattocks refused to accede to a demand made by Metz at the meeting on 19 December 1983. According to unrefuted testimony by Mattocks, at this meeting Metz demanded that Mattocks make changes in the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster to comply with the wishes of the Union and when Mattocks refused, Metz responded, "We are going to try you next month and we are going to straighten you out." Based on the evidence in this record, I am convinced that the executive board proceeded with these charges because Mattocks refused to change the hire and discharge process of Stone & Webster to conform to the wishes of the executive board. The record also establishes that the president of Respondent Local 478 presided at the membership meetings where, again, he heard the accusation by the four individuals that Mattocks controlled the hire and discharge process. Moreover, the evidence in the record establishes that both Metz and McParland knew that Mattocks, effectively, controlled the hiring process at Stone & Webster. In these circumstances, it was incumbent on the officers of Respondent Local 478 to exercise their discretion not to proceed with the processing of the charges. The failure by these officers to do so establishes that if they did not initiate the process, they condoned and ratified the actions of the membership and, thus, are responsible for violations of the Act. Accordingly, I find that Respondent Local 478 violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

Respondent Local 478's second argument relates to the proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A). However, it is well established that the proviso does not involve alleged violations of Section 8(b)(1)(B). As the Board stated in San Francisco-Oakland, the provisio, which refers to the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules, is limited to Section 8(b)(1)(A) and protects only legitimate internal union affairs.

D. Respondent International's Contention That Its Affirmance of the Respondent Local 478's Action Does Not Constitute Conduct Violative of the Act

Respondent International contends that under the holding in Electrical Workers IBEW Local 134 (Illinois Bell), 192 NLRB 85 (1971), an international can only be held liable if a local's action "on its face" violated the Act and if the disciplined member raised, on appeal, the question of whether the discipline violated the Act. However, Respondent International does note that in recent cases the Board has focused only on whether a local's action, as presented to an international on appeal, "on its face" constituted a violation.

It is the position of the General Counsel that Respondent International violated the Act when it provided its stamp of approval to actions of Respondent Local 478, which were violative of the Act.

In Bricklayers (McCleskey Construction), 241 NLRB 898 (1979), a local union requested its international to enforce a fine which it had imposed against an employee, who was a job superintendent, because he refused to sign the Local's contract which had been negotiated with a multiemployer association. The individual who was fined did not file an appeal with the international and the international placed him on the delinquent list and expelled him. The Board held that the international had a duty to investigate the action and had it done so even the "slightest review" would have disclosed the nature of the individual's job. In Electrical Workers IBEW Local 11 (Bergelectric Corp.), the international did not merely "rubber stamp" the findings of the local as had been the case in McCleskey, it conducted an investigation and reviewed the record. Nevertheless, the Board found that the international violated the Act because it had the opportunity, after its investigation, to reverse the action of the local but it had failed to do so. The Board held that international had violated the Act because it had approved the local's conduct and it, therefore, shared its liability.

In the instant case, Respondent International argues that it was unaware of Mattocks' status, that he not only failed to bring his supervisory status to the attention of the representatives of Respondent International, but that throughout the proceedings before Respondent Local 478, he consistently denied that he had caused the discharges of the four members. However, even a cursory review of the proceedings before Respondent Local 478 would have made Mattocks' status evident and Respondent International concedes that during its investigation of Mattocks' appeal it had the transcript of those proceedings. In those proceedings, Civitillo accused Mattocks of causing his discharge because he had the authority to do so. Civitillo also claimed that Mattocks controlled the hire and discharge of employees at Stone & Webster. Thus, the issue of Mattocks' status was clearly before Respondent International. The fact that Mattocks denied that he was responsible for those particular discharges did not relieve Respondent International of its obligation, particularly where it was fully aware of Civitillo's statements and the reasons advanced for the discipline. Moreover, Respondent International was aware of Mattocks' status from the report of its own panel. In that report, the panel noted that Civitillo claimed that Mattocks had "manipulated" the hiring process to cause his discharge. The panel also advised the general executive board that during its investigation of the appeal, Mc Parland, Respondent Local 478's representative told them that "while as Master Mechanic Mattocks did not have final say over hiring and firing, he effectively controlled the process through his recommendations to management." Notwithstanding Respondent International's protestations that it was unaware of Mattocks' supervisory status, it is evident from the record that Respondent International was well aware of Mattocks' status when it denied Mattocks' appeal. Accordingly, I find that Respondent International, both from the proceedings conducted by Respondent Local 478 and the investigation of its own panel, was aware of Mattocks' supervisory status at the time it denied his appeal. Therefore, I find that Respondent International violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

E. The Alleged 8(b)(1)(A) Violation

The General Counsel argues that if Mattocks is not found to be a supervisor Respondent Local 478 and Respondent International, nevertheless, can be found to have violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act because Mattocks was disciplined for performing his assigned work duties which included the reporting of infractions of company rules.

Respondent Local 478 contends that there was no company rule that required Mattocks to report that Civitillo had failed to maintain the oil level on a truck, or to discriminatorily recommend that Fiorello be laid off or suggest to the Company that it sue the Union for breach of a no-strike clause. Respondent International contends that Mattocks never advised the International that he had a duty to report infractions of company rules and, therefore, it was unaware of that fact. These contentions are not persuasive.

Assuming that I had not found that Mattocks was a supervisor, I would, nevertheless, find that there was a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A). In Carpenters (Hopeman Bros.), 272 NLRB 584 (1984), and Chemical Workers Local 604 (Essex International), 233 NLRB 1239 (1977), the Board found that a union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act when it fined an employee who was required to report infractions of company rules, after the employee reported such an infraction by another employee. In the instant case, Browning testified that it was part of Mattocks' duties to report violations of company rules. Both Browning and Mattocks testified, without contradiction, that it was Mattocks' responsibility to ensure that equipment was properly maintained. In the course of the performance of his assigned duties, Mattocks reported Civitillo's failure to properly maintain his truck, which was an infraction of company rules. Mattocks was suspended by Respondent Local 478 because Civitillo contended that this action by Mattocks caused his discharge. This suspension by Respondent Local 478 was upheld by Respondent International. Accordingly, if I had not found that Mattocks was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, I would have found that Respondents' action against him, as a result of the Civitillo charge, would have constituted a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[16]

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent Local 478 and Respondent International have engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B), I shall recommend that they be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent Local 478 having unlawfully disciplined Carl Mattocks and Respondent International having ratified that unlawful discipline, I shall recommend that they be required to remove from their files all references to these unlawful disciplinary actions and notify Carl Mattocks that they have done so and advise him that the unlawful discipline will not be used against him in any way. In addition, I shall recommend that Respondent Local 478 be required to restore Carl Mattocks to membership in good standing and make him whole for any losses he may have suffered as a result of his suspension from membership and rescind the unlawful fine and make him whole for any moneys he may have paid for the fine with interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

In addition to these standard remedies, the General Counsel has requested that a broad cease-and-desist order issue, that reimbursement for expenses incurred in investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of the case be allowed, that copies of the notice be forwarded to all members, and that a copy of the notice be read by Elwood Metz at Respondent Local 478's membership meeting.

The officers and representatives of Respondent Local 478, including Elwood Metz, its business manager, have demonstrated a total disregard for their responsibilities under the National Labor Relations Act. As noted, in two recent cases the Board found that Respondent Local 478 and its officers and representatives violated the Act by interfering with the job of Ralph Gigliotti, a member of the Local, because of his opposition to Elwood Metz, its business manager. In the instant case, the executive board of Respondent Local 478 permitted charges to be processed against Carl Mattocks, a known supporter of Gigliotti, although they were well aware of Mattocks' supervisory status. It is evident that Respondent Local 478 is a repeat offender and has demonstrated a proclivity to violate the Act. Accordingly, I shall recommend that a broad remedial order issue against it.

The record in this case does not establish that Respondent International had knowledge prior to the events herein of the prior violations of the Act by Respondent Local 478 or was party to those violations. I, therefore, shall not recommend that a broad cease-and-desist order issue against Respondent International. However, I do note that Respondent International is now on notice of the disregard for the law demonstrated by officers of Respondent Local 478, including Edward Metz, its business manager.

The Board, in Tiidee Products, 194 NLRB 1234 (1977), held that it had the authority to award litigation costs in situations where a respondent engaged in frivolous litigation. In Hecks, Inc., 215 NLRB 765 (1974), the Board distinguished situations where the issues raised by a respondent were debatable from those situations where the issues raised were patently frivolous. In a subsequent case, Fetzer Broadcasting Co., 227 NLRB 1377 (1977), litigation costs were awarded by the administrative law judge when he found that the offending party had intentionally used defenses that were meritless on their face in [16] The record does not disclose that Mattocks reported any infraction of company rules by Fiorelia, Capella, and Miranda. Rather, Mattocks reported that the equipment operated by them required repairs or that the lease on the equipment had expired. Although Mattocks made these reports as part of his assigned duties and these reports did lead to the layoff of these individuals for which Mattocks was disciplined by Respondents, I am not convinced that this is the type of situation contemplated by Carpenters (Hopeman Bros.), supra, or Chemical Workers (Essex International), supra.

a clear attempt to burden the process of the Board.[17] And in J. P. Stevens & Co., 239 NLRB 738, 772 (1978), the administrative law judge, with Board approval, awarded litigation costs when he found there were no significant factual controversies and when it was established that the respondent had displayed a willful and persistent defiance of the law. The record in the instant case also establishes that there were no factual controversies. Metz and McParland knew that Mattocks was a supervisor and he was disciplined because representatives of Respondent Local 478 believed that he had exercised that supervisory authority to cause the four discharges. Respondents did not present witnesses because it recognized that there were no debatable or credibility issues. Respondent Local 478 relied on statements of its counsel to advance its defense (i.e., that the Local was forced to process the charges because the members filed the charges). That statement is patently frivolous. The executive board had total discretion not to proceed with the charges but they chose to proceed, notwithstanding that both Metz and McParland were fully aware of Mattocks' supervisory status. Moreover, Mallozzi, the Local's president, suspended Mattocks although he presided over the trial and heard Civitillo's statements that it was Mattocks who controlled the hire and discharge process at Stone & Webster. Accordingly, because I find that there were no debatable or credibility issues presented by Respondent Local 478, because the defense advanced by it was patently frivolous, and because it has demonstrated a persistent and willful defiance of the law, I shall recommend that it be required to reimburse the Board and Carl Mattocks for all expenses incurred in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of this case, including reasonable counsel fees, salaries, witness fees, transcript costs, printing costs, travel expenses, per diem, and other reasonable expenses. Tiidee, supra.

Although, I have found that Respondent International was aware of Mattocks' supervisory status at the time it denied his appeal, I do not find, in all the circumstances, including a lack of evidence of a persistent defiance of the law, that the Respondent International should be held jointly or severally liable for the payment of the monetary costs awarded against Respondent Local 478 and I shall not make such a recommendation.

I shall recommend also that Respondent Local 478 be required to mail to the home of each of its members a copy of the notice marked "Appendix A" signed by Elwood Metz Jr., its business manager. For reasons stated before, I shall not recommend that the Respondent International be required to forward to its membership a copy of the notice marked "Appendix B."

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Local 478 and Respondent International are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Stone & Webster is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. Carl Mattocks is, and has been at all times material herein, a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, selected by Stone & Webster for the purpose, among other things, of the adjustment of grievances and collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

4. Respondent Local 478, by requiring Carl Mattocks to plead on charges and by fining and suspending him from membership in Respondent Local 478 for performing supervisory work, has restrained and coerced Stone & Webster in the selection and retention of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining and adjustment of grievances, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

5. Respondent International, by ratifying the discipline imposed by Respondent Local 478 on Carl Mattocks because he performed supervisory duties, has engaged and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[18]

ORDER

(A) Respondent Local 478, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Restraining and coercing Stone & Webster in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by trying, suspending from membership, fining, or otherwise disciplining Carl Mattocks, or any other supervisor-member, for the performance of supervisory duties.

(b) In any other manner engage in conduct that is violative of the Act, or that restrains or coerces Stone & Webster, or any other employer, in the selection of its representatives for purposes of collective bargaining or grievance adjustment.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind and remove from its records the fine and membership suspension imposed on Carl Mattocks because of his employment with Stone & Webster.

(b) Restore Carl Mattocks to his status as a member in good standing in Respondent Local 478 with attendant rights.

(c) Notify Carl Mattocks, in writing, that the fine has been rescinded, that records of the charges and fine against him have been expunged, and that he will be restored to his status as a member in good standing with all attendant rights.

[17] Although the parties did settle this case prior to the issuance of an Order by the Board, the Board stated that it adopted the findings and conclusions of the administrative law judge. This case was cited in Admiral Merchant Motor Freight, 265 NLRB 134 (1982).

[18] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Post in conspicuous places at the meeting halls, offices, and hiring halls of Respondent Local 478, where notices are customarily posted, for 60 consecutive days, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[19] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the officer in charge for Subregion 39, shall be signed on behalf of Respondent Local 478 by Elwood Metz Jr., its business manager. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent Local 478 to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Reproduce and mail to the home of each of its members a facsimile of the aforesaid notice signed by Elwood Metz Jr.

(f) Sign and return to the officer in charge sufficient copies of the notice for posting by Stone & Webster, if willing, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(g) Pay to the Board and Carl Mattocks the reasonable costs and expenses incurred by them in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of this proceeding before the Board.

(h) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination all records necessary to disclose whether the disciplinary actions taken against Carl Mattocks were expunged from his record.

(i) Notify the officer in charge in writing within 20 days of the date of this Order what steps Respondent Local 478 has taken to comply.

[19] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(B) Respondent International, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Ratifying the discipline imposed by Respondent Local 478 on Carl Mattocks, or any other supervisor-member, for performing supervisory duties.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing Stone & Webster, or any other employer, in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the denial of the appeal filed by Carl Mattocks for the discipline imposed on him by Respondent Local 478 because of his performance of his supervisory duties at Stone & Webster.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the denial of the appeal filed by Carl Mattocks and any reference to the disciplinary action imposed by Respondent Local 478 on Carl Mattocks and notify Mattocks in writing that it has done so.

(c) Post in conspicuous places at its offices and hiring halls, where notices are customarily posted, for 60 days, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B." Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the officer in charge for Subregion 39, shall be signed on behalf of Respondent International by an officer of Respondent International.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination all records necessary to disclose whether the denial of the appeal and the disciplinary action taken against Carl Mattocks were expunged from his record.

(e) Notify the officer in charge in writing within 20 days of the date of this Order what steps Respondent International has taken to comply.

28 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

Upon a charge filed by the Union 22 August 1986, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 29 October 1986 against the Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Although the Respondent was properly served copies of the charge and complaint, it has failed to file a proper answer. Subsequent to the issuance of the complaint and pursuant to the Respondent's request, the Regional Attorney for Region 32 extended the date for submission of an answer to the complaint to the close of business on 24 November 1986. On 25 November 1986 the Regional Office received from the Respondent a one-paragraph "mailgram" that had been sent the previous day at 6:03 p.m. and which purported to deny "all charges set forth in the above-referenced case." The document failed to specifically admit, deny, or explain each of the facts alleged in the complaint, and there was no indication that copies of the document had been served on the other parties to the proceeding. On 31 December 1986 the Regional Office sent the Respondent a certified letter advising that its answer was procedurally defective since it did not meet the specificity and service requirements of Sections 102.20 and 102.21 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The letter further stated that unless an answer in compliance with the Rules was received by 9 January 1987, the Regional Office would file a Motion for Summary Judgment with the Board. Additionally it is undisputed that the Regional Office, inter alia, advised the Respondent by telephone that its mailgram answer was procedurally defective and that summary judgment would be sought unless a satisfactory answer was received by the end of the week. Notwithstanding such notification, the Respondent has failed to submit a timely and proper answer to the complaint.

On 28 January 1987 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment, with exhibits attached. On 30 January 1987 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent filed a response to the Notice to Show Cause. Thereafter the General Counsel filed both a response to the Respondent's response to the Notice to Show Cause and a motion to accept the General Counsel's response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all of the allegations in the Complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and may be so found by the Board." Further, the allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment disclose that the Regional Office, by letter dated 31 December 1986, and by telephone conversation on 6 January 1987, notified the Respondent's counsel that the mailgram did not comply with the Board's Rules and that unless an answer which conformed to the Rules was forthcoming, a Motion for Summary Judgment would be filed. No such answer has been filed.

In its response to the Notice to Show Cause, the Respondent contends that from 27 October until 24 November 1986 its principal owner Charles Koffler was not present in the State and was therefore unavailable to meet with counsel to prepare an answer to the complaint. The Respondent maintains, however, that during this time its counsel M. Franklin Nichols III had several discussions with the Regional Office regarding his intent generally and specifically to deny each allegation of the complaint on behalf of his client. The Respondent also contends that after its 24 November request for additional time to file an answer was denied by the Regional Attorney, Nichols prepared the mailgram based on facts obtained from representatives of the Respondent, including some of the named parties. Finally, the Respondent contends that under all these circumstances the mailgram answer constitutes sufficient compliance with the Board's Rules and Regulations.

The Respondent also submitted the declarations of Koffler and Nichols in response to the Notice to Show Cause. Koffler stated that from 15 October through 30 November 1986 he was outside the State of California and unable to meet with his attorney and that, to the best of his knowledge, none of the other named Respondents or principals of the Company had knowledge of any matters mentioned in the complaint. Nichols essentially reiterated the contentions made in the Respondent's response and further stated that, except for the complaint, no notices or documents sent by the Board by certified mail regarding this case had been received by his office. In this regard, Nichols' declaration requested that the General Counsel produce "any such alleged registered notices."[1]

The Respondent's mailgram answer does not meet the specificity and service requirements of Sections 102.20 and 102.21 of the Board's Rules. Moreover, the Respondent's assertion that it sufficiently complied with the Board's Rules in view of the fact that its principal owner was not available in November 1986 fails to explain why the Respondent failed to file an adequate answer by 9 January 1987 and therefore does not constitute good cause within the meaning of Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules. See Electro-Mechanical Industries, 261 NLRB 467, 468 (1982).

Accordingly, in view of the Respondent's failure to file an answer that comports with the Board's Rules, and in the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely and proper answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a California partnership with an office and place of business in San Leandro, California, has been engaged in the sale and repair of electrical motors and pumps. During the year preceding the issuance of the complaint, a representative period, the Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All Working Foremen, Shop Journeymen "AA," Trouble Shooters, Shop Journeymen "A," Shop Journeymen "B," Tool Storeroom Keeper, Shop Coil Winder and Fractional Horsepower Motor Repairmen, Shop Laborers, Shop Helpers, Apprentices, M & F Journeymen "A," M & F Journeymen "B," M & F Journeymen "C," M & F Coil Winder "A," M & F Coil Winder "B," M & F Coil Winder "C," M & F Laborers "A," M & F Laborers "B," and M & F Laborers "C" employed by Respondent at its San Leandro, California facility; excluding all other employees, including clerical employees, supervisors, and guards, as defined in the Act.

Since at least 1978 and at all times material herein the Union has been the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the unit described above, and the Union has been recognized as such representative by the Respondent. Such recognition has been embodied in successive collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which was effective for the period 1 May 1984 to 30 April 1986.

Since at least 22 February 1986 and continuing to date the Respondent has failed and refused to make monthly contributions to various trust funds on behalf of unit employees, as required by the collective-bargaining agreement. The Respondent has engaged in such conduct during the term of the agreement and without prior notice to the Union, without having afforded the Union an opportunity to bargain as the exclusive representative of unit employees with respect to the conduct and its effects, and without the consent of the Union. Additionally, about 28 February 1986 the Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees.

Based on the above, we find that the Respondent has, since 22 February 1986, refused to bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of the unit employees in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[1] In the General Counsel's response to the Respondent's response to the Notice to Show Cause, the General Counsel submitted a photocopy of an envelope sent by certified mail from the Regional Office to the Respondent's counsel Nichols on 31 December 1986. The envelope indicates that on at least two occasions—2 and 7 January 1987—the Postal Service notified Nichols that a certified letter had been sent to him, and that the letter was subsequently returned to the Regional Office as unclaimed. In light of the Respondent's request for production of the Board documents sent by certified mail, we grant the General Counsel's unopposed motion to accept the response to the Respondent's response only to the extent of this submission. In any event, we note that the Respondent in its response to the Notice to Show Cause does not dispute the occurrence or substance of the 6 January 1987 telephone conversation with the Regional Office.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By unilaterally failing and refusing to make monthly contributions to various trust funds, as required by the collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

2. By withdrawing recognition from the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of employees in the unit, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

3. By the aforesaid conduct, the Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced the unit employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act and has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order the Respondent to make whole the unit employees by paying contributions to the trust funds, as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement, which have not been paid,[2] and by reimbursing unit employees for any expenses ensuing from the Respondent's failure to make such required payments as set forth in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981). All payments to employees shall be made with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). We also shall order the Respondent to bargain on request with the Union as the exclusive representative of the unit employees on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Charles Koffler, Lari Koffler, Steve Ferriea, Wilbert Boepple, Ben Gantt and Frank Wong, A Partnership, d/b/a Benkiser Electric, San Leandro, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Unilaterally failing and refusing to make monthly contributions to various trust funds on behalf of unit employees as required by the collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) Withdrawing recognition from International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 595 as the collective-bargaining representative of employees in the unit.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make its employees whole by paying all trust fund contributions, as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement, which have not been paid, and by reimbursing unit employees for any expenses ensuing from the Respondent's unlawful failure to make such payments, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) On request, recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All Working Foremen, Shop Journeymen "AA," Trouble Shooters, Shop Journeymen "A," Shop Journeymen "B," Tool Storeroom Keeper, Shop Coil Winder and Fractional Horsepower Motor Repairmen, Shop Laborers, Shop Helpers, Apprentices, M & F Journeymen "A," M & F Journeymen "B," M & F Journeymen "C," M & F Coil Winder "A," M & F Coil Winder "B," M & F Coil Winder "C," M & F Laborers "A," M & F Laborers "B," and M & F Laborers "C" employed by Respondent at its San Leandro, California facility; excluding all other employees, including clerical employees, supervisors, and guards, as defined in the Act.

[2] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for interest at a fixed rate on fund payments due as part of a "make-whole" remedy. We therefore leave to further proceedings the question of any additional amount the Respondent must pay into the benefit fund in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending upon the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the fund at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[3] The General Counsel has requested the inclusion of a visitatorial clause in the Order. A visitatorial clause authorizes the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Board's Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

(c) Post at its facility in San Leandro, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally fail and refuse to make monthly contributions to various trust funds on behalf of unit employees as required by our collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT withdraw recognition from International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 595 as the collective-bargaining representative of employees in the unit.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make our employees whole by paying all trust fund contributions, as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement effective 1 May 1984 through 30 April 1986, which have not been paid, and by reimbursing our unit employees, plus interest, for any expenses ensuing from our unlawful failure to make such required payments.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the bargaining unit:

> All Working Foremen, Shop Journeymen "AA," Trouble Shooters, Shop Journeymen "A," Shop Journeymen "B," Tool Storeroom Keeper, Shop Coil Winder and Fractional Horsepower Motor Repairmen, Shop Laborers, Shop Helpers, Apprentices, M & F Journeymen "A," M & F Journeymen "B," M & F Journeymen "C," M & F Coil Winder "A," M & F Coil Winder "B," M & F Coil Winder "C," M & F Laborers "A," M & F Laborers "B," and M & F Laborers "C" employed by us at our San Leandro, California facility; excluding all other employees, including clerical employees, supervisors, and guards, as defined in the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 27 October 1986 Administrative Law Judge Claude R. Wolfe issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[1] and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Frank Chervan, Inc., Bedford, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to provide to the Charging Party the requested information, we rely solely on his finding that the information was relevant and necessary to the Charging Party's duties as the collective-bargaining representative in grievance proceedings and that the Union's request was not burdensome. We find it unnecessary to reach the first and second issues noted by the judge; specifically, whether the matter in dispute was settled and, if settled, whether the contractual "conference" requirements were complied with. The parties have agreed on a method for dispute resolution that is embodied in the collective-bargaining agreement. We note that the parties have waived contractual time limitations for arbitration. An arbitrator can better decide these issues thereby avoiding any bifurcation of the arbitration hearing, should the Union decide to pursue the grievance after receiving the information.

Steven E. Nail, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Edward G. Kemp, Esq., for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

CLAUDE R. WOLFE, Administrative Law Judge. This case was litigated before me at Lynchburg, Virginia, on 12 August 1986 pursuant to charges filed by Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO, CLC (the Union) on 4 November 1985 and complaint issued 31 December 1985. The complaint, as amended at hearing, alleges that Frank Chervan, Inc. (Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by refusing to furnish the Union with information necessary and relevant to its performance as employee representative.

Respondent denies the commission of an unfair labor practice and contends the grievance was disposed of by binding settlement between the parties during a second step meeting; the information requested is not necessary and relevant; and it would be overly burdensome to supply the information. Respondent agrees in its posttrial brief, and I find, that the refusal-to-furnish information allegation should not be deferred to contractual grievance-arbitration procedures, United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 504 (1985).

On the record before me, and after considering the able posttrial briefs of the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail distribution of wooden furniture and related products at its Bedford, Virginia facility. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent sold and shipped more than $50,000 worth of its products, goods, and materials directly from its Bedford, Virginia facility to points located outside the State of Virginia. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Relevant Facts

There is little dispute about the relevant facts. It is the conclusions to be drawn therefrom that are at issue. Respondent and the Union have had an amicable bargaining relationship for some 25 years. The latest collective-bargaining agreement between them is effective from 1 April 1985 to 1 April 1988, and contains a grievance procedure reading, in pertinent part, as follows:

> Section 2. An alleged grievance, in order to receive consideration, must be based on some claimed violation of the rights of employees as established by this Agreement and must be presented within five (5) working days of the occurrence of the act which gives rise thereto.
> Section 3. Should grievance arise, an earnest effort shall be made to settle them immediately by the following procedure, each enumerated method to be exhausted before resorting to the next enumerated method.

pervisor shall give a definite answer within twenty-four (24) hours. In the event the agreement is not reached, the aggrieved employee shall then notify the Chairman of the Union Committee, and if the Chairman deems the complaint justified, the employee shall reduce it to writing and it shall be presented to the Company within five (5) working days after the occurrence giving rise to the grievance; it being understood that if the written grievance is not submitted to the Company within said five (5) day period, the grievance will be barred and will be deemed completely disposed of from the standpoint of the Company, the Union, and the employee involved.

(b) Within three (3) working days after the written grievance is submitted, by conference between the employee involved, the Chairman of the Committee, the Plant Superintendent, steward and foreman.

(c) Within ten (10) working days thereafter (or such time as shall be mutually acceptable, by conference between the Grievance Committee, a representative of the International Union, the Plant Manager, steward, foreman and the employee involved.

(d) If any grievance cannot be settled by the parties as set forth above, it may be referred to arbitration at the request of the Union, and in this event, the Union, within fifteen (15) days after the final decision of the Company upon the grievance has been made known, shall notify the Company in writing of its desire to have the matter arbitrated. If the grievance is not appealed to arbitration within such fifteen day period, it shall be deemed to have been satisfactorily settled. If the grievance is appealed to arbitration . . . . [t]he decision of the arbitrator shall be final and binding on both parties. . . .

Respondent assigned Chester Hickman to perform some rush work on Louis XV chair legs on 19 September 1985,[1] asserting that Hickman was superior to others at performing that work. Gerald Saunders had more seniority than Hickman, but was placed on laid-off status for 19 September because there was no work available for him. Saunders filed a grievance on 23 September protesting that Hickman was allowed to work in his place even though Hickman had less seniority and skill. Both employees are members of the bargaining unit covered by the collective-bargaining agreement.[2] The provision of the agreement relevant to the grievance reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

ARTICLE VII

Seniority

Section 1. Seniority on a departmental basis shall prevail at all times.

Section 5.

(a) In effecting promotions, transfers, demotions, layoffs and recalls, the following factors will be given full consideration:

(i) Knowledge, skill and efficiency.
(ii) Physical fitness for the job.
(iii) Length of service.

When factors (i) and (ii) are relatively equal, factor (iii) shall govern. The Company shall determine the qualifications under factors (i) and (ii), but any employee who considers himself aggrieved as a result of the Company's determination shall have the right to file a grievance.

Robert McKinney, plant superintendent, and Lester Miller, supervisor of Hickman and Saunders, met with Saunders and union steward Charles Cooper on 30 September to discuss the grievance. The meeting was requested by Cooper. McKinney is the only one of the four who testified. His uncontroverted recitation of what occurred at the meeting is credited. He explained Respondent's reasons for selecting Hickman rather than Saunders to do the work. Cooper remarked that he had surmised that was the case and that was what he had told Saunders. Saunders stated that was good enough for him and, as far as he was concerned, that ended the matter. No one mentioned that Vernon Craig, the Union's local president and chairman of the grievance committee was not present. Craig is normally notified by management of conferences to be held at the second step of the grievance procedure.[3] He was not notified of the 30 September meeting by the Company or Charles Cooper.

Subsequent to the 30 September meeting, Philip Pope, the Union's international representative, requested a third-step grievance meeting with Respondent on the written grievance of 23 September that he had received in the mail. When Pope received the grievance, he called Craig and asked if the grievance had been settled. Craig told him there had been no meeting with him at the second step of the grievance procedure and the grievance had not been settled. Pope credibly testified that it is the practice to take up the grievance at the third step when there is no second-step meeting because a failure to meet at the second step is construed as an automatic denial of the grievance. A meeting with Pope was scheduled and held on 16 October.

The 16 October meeting was attended by Pope, Craig, Cooper, Saunders, Hickman, McKinney, Miller, and G. Dennis Snell, Respondent's general manager. The meeting opened. Snell said that he did not know why they were meeting because the Company thought the grievance was settled. Pope took the position that it had not been settled, and testified before me that Craig and Saunders did not agree at the meeting that it had been settled. According to McKinney, there was no statement from Saunders or Cooper that the grievance had not been settled. Noting that Pope also testified that the company representatives were the only ones at the meeting who said anything about the grievance being settled, I conclude that Saunders and Cooper neither agreed nor disagreed at this meeting that the grievance had been settled. In the course of the meeting, Pope requested certain information from Respondent, which he deemed relevant to the grievance. Snell told him to put his request in writing.

All production and maintenance employees, but excluding salaried and clerical employees, guards, watchmen, assistant foremen, foremen and supervisors.

[3] There is no evidence the grievance was first discussed with the employees' immediate supervisor as the first step provides.

The following day, 17 October, Pope submitted the following written request to Snell:

> A discussion was held on the above mentioned grievance on October 16, 1985. During our discussion the Company stated Chester Hickman was more qualified to do the work but did not deny the grievants ability was relatively equal.
> The Company claimed it needed Chester to run a special order, 15857 Spindle and Wheel. During our discussion I asked how many rejects Chester and the grievant each had accumulated while running the 15857 job. I also asked what other work Chester performed on September 19, 1985. The Company could not immediately answer these questions, apparently because records were not readily accessible. Therefore, the Union requests the following information which is relevant to the Union investigation of this grievance.
> 1. Copies of Company records indicating the number of pieces run on the 15857 Spindle and Wheel job for each employee in the Sanding Department for the preceding twelve months, the performance level of each employee running this job and the total number of rejects for each employee on this job.
> 2. Copies of Chester Hickman's production sheets or any other records indicating the jobs which Chester Hickman performed on September 18, 1985.

On 22 October, Snell replied by letter reading:

> This will respond to your letter of 10–17–85 and comments relating to your conclusion of our 10–16–85 meeting on the above mentioned grievance.
> You were informed that the grievant, Mr. Saunders did not work on a specific job on the day in question as he did not possess the skill level required to do the job without having to have the job "reworked" or deemed not useable.
> The company's position and reasons for taking the action it did was fully explained to the grievant, Mr. Saunders, and the steward, Mr. Cooper in a meeting held with our Area Manager, Mr. McKinney on 9–30–85. All parties agreed at this meeting that the matter was understood and closed.
> The company still considers the matter closed and sees no need to forward information as requested in your letter of 10–17–85.

Pope wrote Snell another letter on 5 November reading as follows:

> Upon further investigation of the above mentioned grievance the Union has found that this grievance was "not closed" by the Union at any meeting between the parties. The fact that the grievant understood management's position and reasoning on September 30, 1985, in no way closed the grievance.
> Further, after a grievance is put in writing, it becomes the property of the Union and a meeting is supposed to be held which includes the chairman of the grievance committee. In the Gerald Saunders grievance, the chairman was not included in any meeting until I discussed this grievance with the Company on October 10, 1985. Accordingly, Mr. McKinney's meeting was not a formal step of the grievance and should be disregarded as a formal hearing.
> Previously the Union requested certain information from the Company pertaining to this grievance (letter dated 10–17–85). I am renewing the request and further intend to ask the National Labor Relations Board [for] enforcement of the Union's request.
> The Union requests an extention of time to file for arbitration on this grievance pending the National Labor Relations Board's investigation of this alleged violation of Section 8-A-5.
> If the Company denies an extension of time, please consider this a notice of intent to arbitrate this grievance.

Respondent has not furnished the requested information, and the parties have agreed to an extension of time to file for arbitration until such time as the instant case is resolved.

B. Contentions and Conclusions

The complaint, as amended by the General Counsel's motion to strike a portion thereof at hearing, which was granted, alleges Respondent has improperly refused to furnish the following information:

> (1) Copies of Company records indicating the number of pieces run on the 15857 Spindle and Wheel job for each employee in the Sanding Department for the preceding twelve months, the performance level of each employee running this job and the total number of rejects for each employee on this job.
> (2) Copies of Chester Hickman's production sheets or any other records indicating the jobs which Chester Hickman performed on September 19, 1985.

The issues are (1) whether the grievance was settled at the meeting of Cooper and Saunders with McKinney, (2) whether that settlement is binding on the Union, and, therefore, excuses Respondent from furnishing information relevant to the grievance, (3) whether the information requested is relevant to the Union's performance as exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees, and (4) whether it is overly burdensome on Respondent to furnish the information sought.

I am persuaded the participants in the 30 September meeting believed the grievance was settled and finally disposed of. This is not, however, dispositive of the issue. Article V, section 3 provides that an earnest effort shall be made to settle grievances at each step of the grievance procedure, but also specifically provides that a complaint shall be reduced to writing by the aggrieved employee if the "Chairman of the Union Committee" deems the complaint justified, and further provides that settlement efforts after a written grievance is submitted shall be made at a "conference between the employee involved, the Chairman of the Committee, the Plant Superintendent, steward and foreman." This is a mandatory provision. Vernon Craig was the "Chairman of the Committee." He received no notification of the grievance or the meeting and was not present at the 30 September meeting. The meeting was therefore not a "conference between the employee involved, the Chairman of the Committee, the Plant Superintendent, steward and foreman" as article V, section 3(b) of the contract requires. There is no evidence the Union waived the necessity of the "Chairman of the Committee['s]" presence at such a conference, nor is there any contractual provision providing for such a waiver, or any showing Cooper was acting as the "Chairman." Indeed, if he was there would then have been no steward present. For these reasons I conclude that the 30 September meeting was not a "conference" as contemplated by article V, section 3(b) of the collective-bargaining agreement, and the 30 September "settlement" is not binding on the Union. Accordingly, I further find that, notwithstanding the agreement of Cooper and Saunders that the matter was settled, Pope acted properly in pursuing the matter at the next step of the procedure described in article V, section 3(c).

It is well settled that the employer is required to furnish the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees with information relevant and necessary to the Union's performance of its duties in discharging its role as employee representative in grievance proceedings.[4] The contract plainly provides at article VII, section 5 that "Knowledge, skill and efficiency" is a controlling factor in determining layoffs, and an employee who considers himself aggrieved by the Respondent's determination of that factor has the right to file a grievance. Saunders was the senior employee, and he was laid off on 19 September while Hickman performed work that Saunders claims he is capable of performing. The Union is entitled to information in Respondent's control that is relevant to the grievance. Without the relevant information the Union is severely disabled in its efforts to evaluate and process Saunders' grievance. The information must be produced if there is only a probability it is relevant and useful to the Union in processing and assessing the merit of the grievance.[5] The question is "whether the information . . . is helpful in evaluating the merits of the grievance and the propriety of pursuing the grievance to arbitration."[6] The answer, I believe, is that it is. Pope persuasively explained that the information sought regarding all employee performance on work of the type in question was necessary for an evaluation of the relative qualifications of Saunders and Hickman with respect to each and with respect to all employees performing that work. That the relative past performance of Saunders and Hickman is relevant to the issue of relative qualifications to do the same work on 19 September is obvious. Moreover, I agree with Pope that inasmuch as the contract refers to "relatively equal" knowledge, skill, and efficiency, the average performance of all employees working on the particular job provides a measuring point from which to ascertain whether, and by how much, the performance of Saunders and Hickman deviated from that norm. If there be but a slight variance from the average by both, it might be argued that their performance and this knowledge, skill, and efficiency, is relatively equal. On the other hand, a much better than average performance by one would overshadow an average or less than average performance by the other and tend to show differences in knowledge, skill, and efficiency, as would a barely average performance contrasted against a far below average one. There are other possible variations, but it suffices to note that these examples illustrate the usefulness of the information sought to the grievance evaluation process. The Union is therefore entitled to the records showing the information regarding the 15857 Spindle and Wheel job that it requested in its 17 October letter. There is some indication in the record that reject records are not kept and therefore cannot be produced. Whether or not reject records exist is, however, a matter best left to the compliance stage of these proceedings. As to paragraph 2 of the Union's request letter, what Hickman produced on 19 September is relevant to the question of whether his allegedly special abilities were really needed and for how long on that date. Hickman's special qualifications are the primary asserted reason given for Saunders layoff on 19 September. If Hickman did not in fact perform the work denied Saunders on a relative qualifications basis, the information is probably dispositive of the grievance. If Hickman did perform the work, but only for a few minutes or hours, the layoff of Saunders for the entire day is placed in question. There are, as always in these situations, other variations that may be conjured up to support or defeat the grievance, but, whatever the ultimate determination of the grievance on its merits, the records reflecting Hickman's performance on 19 September are clearly relevant.

Respondent's affirmative defense that it is overly burdensome to require the production of the above records is not impressive. Respondent maintains weekly computer printouts of individual employee production according to Pope, who is credited in the absence of persuasive countervailing evidence, and the production of the 19 September work record of Hickman would seem to require little effort by Respondent. Apart from its bare contention, Respondent adduced no reasonable modicum of supporting evidence for any theory of excessive burden, and therefore has not met its burden of proving it was faced with an unreasonable burden if it complied

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing to furnish the Union with information requested in connection with the grievance of Gerald Saunders, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

The Respondent, Frank Chervan, Inc., Bedford, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the following bargaining unit by refusing to furnish it with information it requests that is relevant and reasonably necessary to the processing of employee grievances:

> All production and maintenance employees, but excluding salaried and clerical employees, guards, watchmen, assistant foremen, foremen and supervisors.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Immediately furnish the Union with the information it requested by letter of 17 October 1985 in connection with the grievance of Gerald Saunders.

(b) Post at its facility in Bedford, Virginia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.[9]

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[9] The circumstances of this case do not warrant the inclusion of a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of any United States court of appeals enforcing this Order.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in an appropriate unit, by refusing, on request, to furnish it with information relevant and reasonably necessary to the processing of unit employee grievances.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL immediately furnish the Union with the information it requested by letter of 17 October 1985 in connection with the grievance of Gerald Saunders.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

Upon a petition filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held on 2, 16, and 19 June 1980, before Hearing Officer Kenneth Henley. Following the hearing and pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Regional Director for Region 5 transferred this case to the Board for decision. The Employer and the Petitioner filed briefs.

The Board affirms the Hearing Officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

The Union seeks to represent a unit of teachers[1] at the Jewish Day School (the Employer). The Jewish Day School is a private, nonprofit corporation established in 1972 pursuant to the recommendation of a study prepared by the American Association for Jewish Education. The study examined Jewish education in the Washington, D.C. area, and recommended the establishment of a broadly based community day school extending from kindergarten through high school. That recommendation was adopted by the United Jewish Appeal Federation of Greater Washington, Inc. (UJAF).[2] At the request of UJAF, a new facility for the school was constructed in Rockville, Maryland, with funds from the Greater Washington Jewish Community Foundation.[3] Under the terms of a 99-year lease, the Employer rents the facility from the Foundation for $1 per year, plus utilities and maintenance costs.

The Employer's bylaws provide for a 25-member board of governors and a 33-member board of directors. Fifteen members of the board of governors are elected by the board of directors, and the remaining 10, who are elected by the board of governors in office at the time of the election, must be "active in community affairs, including the United Jewish Appeal and the Board of Jewish Education." The responsibilities of the board of governors include maintaining a liaison with a UJAF, the Board of Jewish Education, and other Jewish community organizations.

The board of directors consists of 33 voting members[4] as well as the president and the executive vice president of the UJAF. At the time of the hearing all members of the board of directors were Jewish and three were rabbis. The board of directors determines the Employer's policies, and manages and is ultimately responsible for the affairs of the Employer.[5]

The bylaws also establish an education committee ranging from 8 to 35 members. Subject to the ratification of the board of directors, the education committee is responsible for determining the school's educational policies, recommending an annual educational operating budget, determining admission requirements, and establishing, reviewing, and revising the curriculum. The bylaws provide that the education committee "generally shall include religious and secular educators who are professionally trained, and other individuals experienced in education." At the time of the hearing there were three rabbis on the education committee.

The Employer's budget at the time of the hearing was $1.5 million, and it had projected a budget of $1.8 million for the following year. Although predominantly funded by tuition, the Employer receives approximately 20 percent of its funds from the UJAF,[6] and it has also received annual individual contributions in excess of $100,000.

[1] The unit description is as follows:

All full time and part time teachers, including physical education teachers, athletic director, art teachers, music teachers, special education teachers, and teachers aides, guidance counselors and professional librarians employed by the employer at its Rockville, Maryland facility, but excluding administrators, nonprofessional librarians, the consulting psychologist, clerical employees, maintenance employees, volunteers, guards and supervisors, as defined in the Act.

The record establishes that the librarian is also an English teacher, and that the athletic director is also a science teacher. Teacher aides provide individual remedial instruction to students and administrative assistance to teachers. Guidance counselors administer standardized testing and work with teachers to deal with the students' psychological adjustment problems.

[2] Bernard White, the president of the Jewish Day School, indicated that the UJAF's primary purpose is to raise funds for the general welfare of Jewish people in the United States and abroad. White also testified that on the local level the UJAF is involved in the details of planning for the Jewish community.

[3] The Greater Washington Jewish Community Foundation was formed in 1965 for the purpose of buying land and constructing new buildings for Jewish social welfare agencies such as the Jewish Community Center, the Jewish Social Service Agency, and the Hebrew Home of Greater Washington.

[4] The board of directors consists of 16 members elected by the members in office at the time of the election, 12 members elected by the parents of the school's students, the chairman of the board of governors, the president of the PTA, and the school's 3 immediate past presidents.

[5] Responsibility for all decisions and programs of the board of directors rests with two of the Employer's officers, the chairman of the board of governors, and the president. The other officers are a vice president and one or more secretaries and treasurers.

[6] The UJAF requires the Employer to submit its budget for review, and the school is prohibited from engaging in new programs, or cancelling existing ones, without the UJAF's permission. White testified that the UJAF does not control the hiring of staff, administrators, or teachers, and does not comment on the curriculum unless the Employer seeks to implement a completely new project.

The Employer's articles of incorporation state that its purposes are, inter alia:

> (b) To establish, operate and maintain a synagogue or synagogues for religious worship and to provide for and conduct religious services in the Jewish faith in said synagogue or synagogues.
> (c) To establish, operate and maintain an institution or institutions of learning in both religious and secular subjects, which institution or institutions shall be subject to the following provisions and limitations:
> (i) Religious subjects shall be taught in accordance with the principles of the Jewish faith with the purpose of giving each student a thorough Jewish education;
> (ii) Secular subjects shall meet the requirements of the local school system for comparable grades . . . .

The Jewish Day School has also prepared a recruitment manual for parents of prospective students, which states that:

> . . . the school seeks to create an atmosphere to satisfy the needs of all its students. The children are exposed to a wide spectrum of religious thought and interpretation. Each child, regardless of religious background, is encouraged to enrich his or her understanding of Judaism and to identify with the Jewish people. There is no attempt to impose any particular religious philosophy.

According to the Employer's president, White, the manual's statement that there is "no attempt to impose any particular religious philosophy" means that students are exposed to the conservative, orthodox, reform, and reconstruction branches of Judaism, and that there is no attempt to favor the teachings of one over another. Although the admission policy of Jewish Day School permits students who are not of the Jewish faith to attend, the Employer's assistant principal for Judaic studies, Dr. Richard Wagner, testified that all students at Jewish Day School are Jewish.

The chairman of the education committee, Baruch Fellner, testified that the committee's philosophy is to promote "an intense Jewish religious education."[7] According to Fellner, the Employer's policy is to "inculcate Jewish ideas" within the children and "to inculcate . . . the performance of commandments which are derived directly from the five books of Moses." Fellner also testified that the school is designed to make the spectrum of Jewish religious observance appealing so that when the children become adults "they will choose an intense Judaic identity."

The Jewish Day School offers religious subjects in its Judaic studies program and secular subjects in its general studies program. Religious instruction is mandatory in both the lower school, which extends from kindergarten through grade 6, and in the upper school, which encompasses grades 7 through 12. A child spends 40 percent of his school day in Judaic studies courses and 60 percent in general studies courses.

According to Assistant Principal Wagner, Judaic studies teachers in the lower school are responsible for teaching basic Hebrew language and literature, elementary Bible instruction, elementary instruction in basic elements of Jewish history, and elementary instruction in the basic skills of Jewish life and law. Religious instruction is departmentalized in the upper school, and individual Judaic studies teachers specialize in, for example, the Bible, Rabbinic literature, Hebrew language, or Jewish history. The Employer attempts to teach all Judaic studies courses in Hebrew, depending on the qualifications of the teacher and the skill level of the students.

The record further establishes that the Employer seeks to integrate the Judaic studies and general studies programs. Fellner testified that there is no "line of demarcation" between the two, and that "the teaching of Judaism in all its elements is inextricably woven" into the secular courses. Wagner testified that the integration of the program is a "central feature" of the school,[8] and that teachers from each program sometimes teach courses in conjunction.[9]

The Employer also conducts separate orthodox, conservative, and reform prayer services in Hebrew each morning. Students are required to attend one of the services, and 1-day suspensions and other forms of discipline have been imposed on students who do not attend.[10] Full-time teachers

[7] We note that Jeralyn Epstein, a teacher, generally denied perceiving an "intense" religious atmosphere at the school.

[8] To illustrate the integration of the programs, Wagner noted that third-grade teachers in both programs worked together to teach archaeology, with the Judaic studies teacher focusing on an archaeological site in Israel and the general studies teacher focusing on a site in Colorado. Wagner also noted that a general studies music teacher will frequently use examples of Jewish music to teach basic elements of music, and that a general studies history teacher discussed the progressive era in American history with an emphasis on Jewish immigration to America occurring at the same time.

[9] One teacher at the school, Jeralyn Epstein, denied that her foreign language classes were integrated with religious studies, but she conceded that other language teachers seek to promote such integration. Another teacher, Carole Powers, conceded that to some extent she integrates Judaic studies into her general studies history class.

[10] Fellner testified that the services are "well attended," but a teacher asserted that they were poorly attended. The teacher also testified that attendance was not well enforced but she did not deny that discipline had been imposed on some occasions. Wagner testified that more than 10, 1-day suspensions have been imposed.

who are present at school during the first period of the day are also required to attend, and Wagner testified that the Employer "remind[s] them of their responsibilities" if they fail to do so.[11] The meals for students in the upper school begin and conclude with a benediction.

The school also requires that teachers, staff, and students observe Jewish dietary restrictions. Students who bring nonkosher food to school have been penalized, and the school has contacted the parents of such students to remind them of its dietary policies. The parents' manual notifies parents that the school observes "strict standards" with respect to dietary laws, and it outlines the types of food which parents may bring to school for classroom parties or holiday celebrations.

Students also study various Jewish holidays and festivals. Prior to a holiday, students learn to perform the rituals and practices appropriate to the holiday. Wagner noted, for example, that the school conducts a "model Seder" before Passover. In addition, Wagner testified that the school seeks to enforce rules of modesty in dress, and he noted specifically that boys are required to wear a cap.[12]

The Employer contends that the Board is precluded from exercising its jurisdiction by the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979). The Union contends that Catholic Bishop is not controlling. For the reasons below we agree with the Employer.

In Catholic Bishop, the Board had certified a labor organization to represent a unit of lay teachers in each of two groups of precollege educational institutions. One group of schools was operated by the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, a corporation sole. Those schools offered special religious instruction as well as the same college-preparatory curriculum offered in public secondary schools. The other group of schools was operated by the Diocese of Ft. Wayne-South Bend, Inc., and also provided a secular education accompanied by mandatory religious training.

The central issue confronting the Supreme Court was "[w]hether teachers in schools operated by a church to teach both religious and secular subjects are within the jurisdiction granted by the National Labor Relations Act."[13] The Court stated that if it were to construe the Act to grant jurisdiction, it would then be required to decide whether that grant of jurisdiction was constitutionally permissible under the religion clauses of the first amendment to the United States Constitution.[14] Consequently, the Court first considered "whether Congress intended the Board to have jurisdiction" over such teachers,[15] and it in turn approached that inquiry in two steps. The Court found it necessary first to determine whether the Board's exercise of jurisdiction "would give rise to serious constitutional questions."[16] If such questions were raised, in the Court's view, it would then have to identify "the affirmative intention of the Congress clearly expressed" before concluding that the Act granted the Board jurisdiction over teachers in church-operated schools.[17]

The Court reviewed its decisions in cases involving aid to parochial schools to determine whether "serious constitutional questions" were raised.[18] It noted that in those cases it had recognized "the critical and unique role of the teachers in fulfilling the mission of a church-operated school."[19] The teacher's key role, the Court observed, had been "the predicate" for its conclusion in those cases that "governmental aid channeled through teachers creates an impermissible risk of excessive governmental entanglement in the affairs of the church-operated schools."[20] Relying on one such decision, Lemon v. Kurtzman,[21] the Court noted that a teacher in such a school potentially could incorporate "some aspect of faith or morals in secular subjects."[22] The Court emphasized "the danger that a teacher under religious control and discipline poses to the separation of the religious from the purely secular aspects of pre-college education," and it recognized that such a "conflict of functions" is in-

[11] One teacher acknowledged that the attendance of teachers is required, but she asserted that "very few" actually attend.

[12] Two teachers, Epstein and Powers, testified that modesty restrictions are not enforced. However, the parents' manual states that students "should dress in a way that shows respect for the academic and religious environment of the school," and that "[b]oys are required to wear kippot at all times except for gym."

It stated that "at this stage of our consideration we are not compelled to determine whether the entanglement is excessive as we would were we considering the constitutional issue." Id. at 502. On the contrary, the Court indicated that it was making "a narrow inquiry whether the exercise of the Board's jurisdiction presents a significant risk that the First Amendment will be infringed." herent in the teacher's situation.[23] In the Court's view, the Government's "[g]ood intentions" could not avoid entanglement with the "religious mission" of the school.[24]

The Court then noted two ways in which Board processes may run afoul of the first amendment. When a school argues that its alleged unfair labor practices were actually motivated by its religious creed, the Court observed that the Board may impinge on constitutional guarantees by inquiring whether the school's position was asserted in "good faith," and by examining the relationship of the school's position to its "religious mission."[25] In addition, in the Court's view, the Board's responsibility to determine mandatory subjects of bargaining would impact on church-operated schools. The Court stated that in a school "nearly everything" affects teachers, and therefore arguably would be a term and condition of employment,[26] and concluded that the Board's inquiry into these matters would inevitably "implicate sensitive issues."[27]

The Court quoted its statement in Lemon that parochial schools involve "substantial religious activity and purpose," and that the "substantial religious character of those church-related schools gives rise to entangling church-state relationships of the kind the Religion Clauses sought to avoid."[28] The Court also noted the observation of Justice Douglas in his concurring opinion in Lemon that "the raison d'etre of parochial schools is the propagation of a religious faith."[29] Recognizing a distinction between the "church-teacher relationship" and the "employment relationship in a public or other nonreligious school," the Court concluded that the Board's exercise of jurisdiction over teachers in parochial schools would raise serious constitutional questions.[30]

Having reached this conclusion, the Court then found "no clear expression of an affirmative intention of Congress that teachers in church-operated schools should be covered by the Act."[31] The Court stated that in the absence of such an intention, it would "decline to construe the Act in a manner that could in turn call upon the Court to resolve difficult and sensitive" constitutional questions.[32]

The Board interpreted Catholic Bishop in Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School, 243 NLRB 49 (1979), enf. denied 623 F.2d 818 (2d Cir. 1980). In that case, where a union represented a unit of lay faculty members, the Board exercised its jurisdiction after concluding that Bishop Ford Central was not a "church-operated" school within the meaning of Catholic Bishop. The Board noted that the schools in Catholic Bishop were operated either by the Archbishop of Chicago or the Diocese of Ft. Wayne-South Bend. In contrast, the Board emphasized, the operation of Bishop Ford Central had been transferred from a corporation organized by the Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn to an independent lay board of trustees. The Board noted that the Diocese did not control the operation of the school, did not exercise influence over hiring and policymaking decisions, and had no representatives on the board of trustees. The Board concluded that the school was "an entity separate and distinct from the church," that there would be no danger of entanglement by asserting jurisdiction, and that there was "no special church-teacher employment relationship" which the Supreme Court had identified in Catholic Bishop as giving rise to first amendment questions.[33]

The Board found in essence that the school was not "church-operated" because it was not directly operated by a religious organization. The Board therefore concluded that its assertion of jurisdiction would not raise "serious constitutional questions" within the meaning of Catholic Bishop. After a careful review of this issue, we have decided to overrule Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School because we have concluded that it places an overly restrictive interpretation on Catholic Bishop.

Although the Court in Catholic Bishop often used the term "church-operated schools," its analysis did not focus on the schools' direct affiliation with religious organizations. On the contrary, the Court's conclusion that "serious constitutional questions" would be raised was grounded in its analysis of the purpose of the school, the role of the teacher in effectuating that purpose, and the potential effects of the Board's exercise of jurisdiction.

We first note that the Court's analysis repeatedly emphasized a school's religious purpose rather than its affiliation with religious organizations. The Court observed that parochial schools involve

[23] Id. at 501, quoting 403 U.S. at 617. The Court also quoted its observation in Meek v. Pittenger, 412 U.S. 349, 370 (1975), that regardless of the subject matter being taught, "a teacher remains a teacher, and the danger that religious doctrine will become intertwined with secular instruction persists."

"substantial religious activity and purpose,"[34] that church-related schools have a "substantial religious character,"[35] and that "the raison d'etre of parochial schools is the propagation of a religious faith."[36] The Court also referred to the "religious mission" of a school in discussing both the impact of the Board's unfair labor practice proceedings[37] and the inability of Government to avoid entanglement even when motivated by "good intentions."[38] In light of this discussion, we think it reasonable to infer that the Court simply intended the term "church-operated schools" to be a shorthand description of schools whose purpose and function in substantial part are to propagate a religious faith. We note in this connection that a school's affiliation with a religious organization may be one factor to consider in determining its purpose, but nowhere did the Court indicate that a school's religious purpose ends with the severance of that affiliation.[39]

The Court's analysis also focused on the teacher's role in effectuating a school's religious purpose. We note the Court's emphasis on "the critical and unique role of the teacher in fulfilling the mission of a church-operated school,"[40] and its recognition that the teacher's "key role" was "the predicate" for its holdings in cases involving aid to parochial schools.[41] The Court also reaffirmed its statement that a teacher in such a school poses a danger to "the separation of the religious from the purely secular aspects of pre-college education."[42] The Court further stated that a teacher's "conflict of functions inheres in the situation,"[43] thereby suggesting that its observations are applicable in virtually all cases involving teachers in schools whose purpose and function in substantial part is the propagation of a religious faith.

As we read Catholic Bishop, the Court further concluded that the source of the significant risk of constitutional infringement is the potential impact of the Board's processes on the relationship between school and teacher. In this connection, the Court specifically observed that the Board would inject itself into disputes concerning the motive behind a school's conduct and the subjects affecting teachers about which a school must bargain.[44] It also emphasized that the "church-teacher relationship in a church-operated school differs from the employment relationship in a public or other nonreligious school."[45] In view of the foregoing considerations, we overrule Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School, and we conclude that Catholic Bishop precludes the Board from exercising its jurisdiction where a union seeks to represent[46] a unit of teachers in a school whose purpose and function in substantial[47] part are to propagate a religious faith.[48]

Applying our interpretation of Catholic Bishop to the instant case, we find abundant evidence that the Employer's purpose and function in substantial part is the propagation of a religious faith. As noted above, its articles of incorporation state that among its central aims are to teach religious subjects "in accordance with the principles of the Jewish faith with the purpose of giving each student a thorough Jewish education," and to establish a synagogue "for religious services in the Jewish faith." The Employer's recruitment manual indicates that each child is encouraged "to identify with the Jewish people," a statement corroborated by Fellner's testimony that the school is designed to encourage a child to "choose an intense Judaic identity" upon reaching adulthood. Fellner also testified that the education committee seeks to promote "an intense Jewish religious education."

We especially emphasize that these principles are effectuated by the substantial suffusion of religion into the curriculum.[49] Religious instruction is mandatory at all grade levels, and the Judaic studies program encompasses an array of courses, including instruction in the Hebrew language, the Bible, Rabbinic literature, and Jewish history, life, and

[46] Although this case has arisen in a representation context, we think it clear that Catholic Bishop would also apply in cases where teachers are alleged to be the object of unfair labor practices.

[47] We have utilized the word "substantial" in light of the Supreme Court's recognition that parochial schools involve "substantial" religious activity and purpose and "substantial" religious character. 440 U.S. at 503, quoting 403 U.S. at 616. In this connection we are mindful of the Second Circuit's statement that "there may be an issue in some cases as to how much religious orientation is required to characterize a school as religious." 623 F.2d at 823.

[48] Our decision is limited to teachers in educational institutions whose purpose and function in substantial part is the propagation of a religious faith. We need not consider here whether the Board's exercise of jurisdiction with respect to other employee classifications in such institutions would raise serious constitutional questions.

[49] We note in NLRB v. Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School, 623 F.2d at 823, the Second Circuit stressed the importance of the religious nature of the curriculum:

> It is the suffusion of religion into the curriculum and the mandate of the faculty to infuse the students with the religious values of a religious creed which create the conflict with the Religion Clauses . . . .

law. A child devotes 40 percent of his school day to religious study, and there is evidence that the Employer as a policy matter promotes the integration of the Judaic studies and general studies programs. The Employer's religious purpose is also highlighted by its mandatory morning prayer services, its adherence to Jewish dietary laws, and its attempt to observe at least some traditional Jewish dress restrictions.[50]

In light of all of the above, we find that our assertion of jurisdiction here would create the same significant risk of constitutional infringement that the Supreme Court foresaw in Catholic Bishop. Consequently, we find that we are precluded from asserting jurisdiction, and we shall dismiss the petition.

ORDER

The petition is dismissed.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting.

I do not agree with my colleagues' extension of Catholic Bishop, 440 U.S. 490 (1979), to a school operated by a predominantly lay board of directors and a lay administration. The Jewish Day School is a nonprofit corporation founded under the auspices of the United Jewish Appeal to respond to the needs of the Jewish community in Washington, D.C. Eligibility for service on the board of directors is limited only by the requirement that 10 members of the board of governors must be "active in community affairs, including the United Jewish Appeal and the Board of Jewish Education." Eligibility for service on the curriculum committee is circumscribed only by the guideline in the corporate bylaws that members "generally shall include religious and secular educators who are professionally trained, and other individuals experienced in education." A very small minority of the board of directors and the curriculum committee are rabbis, and there are no clergy-administrators.

Contrary to my colleagues, I am unable to conclude that the reliance of the Court in Catholic Bishop on the critical role of teachers, and its emphasis on the importance of the religious mission of the school, can be divorced from the Court's awareness that the schools at issue were operated by a religious institution. The Court posed the issue before it as whether teachers "in schools operated by a church" are subject to Board jurisdiction. Id. at 491. It found the danger of constitutional infringement in the possibility of Board inquiry into the good faith of "clergy-administrators." Id. at 502. Finally, the Court summarized the factual underpinning of its conclusion that serious first amendment questions could arise from Board jurisdiction by stressing that the "church-teacher" relationship in a church-operated school differs from the employment relationship in public or other nonreligious schools. Id. at 504.

In my view, the extreme sensitivity the Court exhibited to first amendment concerns in Catholic Bishop sprang from the essential fact that the schools were operated by the church itself. Here, the record does not support a finding that Jewish Day School is operated by a religious institution. Accordingly, I would not find Catholic Bishop controlling, and would assert jurisdiction in this case.

[50] In view of the abundant evidence of the Employer's religious purpose, we find it unnecessary to consider the Employer's ties to the UJAF and other Jewish community organizations.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 21 May 1985 Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief to the Board.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge concluded that because the Respondent is operated by an independent, predominantly lay board of trustees, over which the Diocese of Brooklyn has virtually no control, the Board should assert jurisdiction over the Respondent based on the Board's decision in Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 243 NLRB 49 (1979), enf. denied sub nom. Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School, 623 F.2d 818 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied 450 U.S. 996 (1981). We disagree with the judge for the following reasons.

The facts, as set out more fully by the judge, include the following. The Respondent's predecessor, Nazareth High School, was one of nine high schools operated by the Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn until about 1971.[1] In 1972, because of rising costs, the Brooklyn Diocese organized the Henry M. Hald High School Association as an educational corporation for the purpose of operating the diocesan high schools. The diocese continued to own and control the schools, and the Bishop of Brooklyn and other churchmen of the diocese were trustees of the Hald Association.

On 16 August 1974 title to the Nazareth High School property was transferred to a newly formed independent educational corporation, Nazareth Regional High School (the Respondent), which was to operate Nazareth as a regional high school. The Respondent was granted the property to have and to hold so long as it "continues the operation of a Roman Catholic high school . . . upon the cessation of which, title and interest . . . shall revert to the [diocese]."

The Respondent derives most of its operating funds from tuition; it receives no funds from the diocese. The Respondent's policies are set by a 15-member board of trustees, the majority of whom are lay persons whose children attend or have attended the school. At the time of the hearing, two board members were members of Catholic religious orders: the Respondent's principal, who is a Xaverian brother, and a Franciscan brother. Generally, new board members are nominated and voted on by current board members. The Bishop of Brooklyn, however, can appoint one or two board members as his observers. The Respondent's principal reports to the board.

The Respondent does not require its students to be Catholic, although the Respondent's principal "guessed" that 75 percent of the students are Catholic. The Respondent's principal also "guessed" that over 90 percent of the faculty are Catholic.[2] Only 4 of the approximately 65 faculty members are members of religious orders, including the principal and an assistant principal. The Respondent's principal has the responsibility for hiring and firing the faculty, and he does so without consulting with the Bishop, except when hiring a priest. When hiring faculty, the principal asks candidates if they are willing to teach Catholic doctrine.

Students are required to take a religion course in each of their 4 school years. Students study the Old Testament in their first year; the New Testament in their second year; morality in their third year; and marriage in their fourth year, all with an emphasis on traditional Catholic views. Although the Respondent's religion department is composed entirely of lay teachers, the Respondent's principal testified that he depends on the lay teachers to transmit the values of the Catholic Church to the students. Moreover, the principal testified that teachers who teach courses other than religion also have a responsibility to impart and develop Catholic moral values; for example, when sex is taught in a biology class or a health class, the teacher should also discuss the moral aspects of sex.

The Respondent's faculty handbook states that it is "a private Catholic preparatory school [which, in] emphasizing the traditional study of arts and sciences, defines itself in the attempt to transmit the teachings of Jesus Christ and His Church." The

[1] The full-time permanent lay teachers at the nine schools have been represented by the Union since 1966. In Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 222 NLRB 1052 (1976), enfd. 535 F.2d 1387 (2d Cir. 1976), the Board found that the respondent's predecessor violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to bargain with the union and violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) by refusing to hire an individual for discriminatory reasons.

[2] The judge incorrectly stated that the Respondent estimated that 70 percent of the faculty are Catholic.

Respondent's student handbook states that the students "belong to a Christian community and . . . are expected to be a sign of the values which Jesus taught."

The outward indicia that the Respondent is a Catholic school include the fact that there is a crucifix in each classroom; mass is celebrated daily in the school's third-floor chapel; each day one of the religion classes is assigned to attend and participate in the mass; meat is not served on Fridays during Lent; and a prayer is read over the public address system each morning. Secondary indicia that the Respondent is a Catholic school include its participation in an athletic league composed of diocesan high schools; its being listed in various publications of the Diocese of Brooklyn as a Catholic high school; and its voluntary membership in the National Catholic Educational Association.

The Respondent uses the services of the superintendent of schools of the Diocese of Brooklyn, who is appointed by the Bishop, to keep abreast of various secular educational requirements and developments. The principals of the area Catholic high schools, including the Respondent, meet with the superintendent regularly, and they receive communications from him approximately once a week. The Respondent also refers the curriculum of the religion department to a representative of the Bishop for review after the start of the school year, although there is no formal requirement that it must do so. Rather, the Respondent appears to be continuing a practice used by its predecessor, the diocesan Nazareth High School.

The Respondent employs a chaplain who is appointed by the diocese. The diocese directs the Respondent concerning what the chaplain is to be paid. The chaplain is part of the Respondent's guidance department and is available to the students for consultation on religious matters.

The amended complaint in the instant case alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging two employees because of their strike activity and violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by having established the position of debating coach and having set the salary and other terms of that position without having bargained with the Union. The Respondent's answer, as amended at the hearing, admitted virtually all the allegations of the amended complaint except for the issue of whether the Board could assert jurisdiction over the Respondent.

In Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 243 NLRB 49 (1979), enf. denied sub nom. Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School, 623 F.2d 818 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied 450 U.S. 996 (1981), the Board asserted jurisdiction over the respondent, finding that it was not "church operated" within the meaning of NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979).[3] In contrast to the schools in Catholic Bishop, which were operated by either the Archbishop of Chicago or the Diocese of Ft. Wayne-South Bend, the school in Bishop Ford was operated by an independent lay board of trustees over which the diocese had no control. The diocese in Bishop Ford had no representatives on the board of trustees, did not control the school's operation, and did not exercise any influence over hiring and policymaking decisions. The Board concluded that the school was an entity separate and distinct from the Church, and that therefore jurisdiction should be asserted over the school.

The judge in the instant case noted that the prehearing stipulation signed by the parties, as well as the overall record, established that the facts and issues presented here were virtually identical to those in Bishop Ford, above. Following the Board's decision in Bishop Ford, the judge concluded that there was no impediment to the Board's assertion of jurisdiction in the instant case. The judge then expressed his views about the positions of the parties in this case. He found, in sum, that jurisdiction could be asserted because the Diocese of Brooklyn did not fund or control the Respondent, and because there was no evidence that the alleged unfair labor practices affected the rights guaranteed by the religion clausess of the U.S. Constitution.

The Board's decision, issued this day, in Jewish Day School of Greater Washington, 283 NLRB 757 (1987), involved a school that, like the schools in Bishop Ford and the instant case, was operated by a predominantly lay board of directors. In Jewish Day School, the Board overruled its decision in Bishop Ford, finding that Bishop Ford interpreted Catholic Bishop in an overly restrictive manner by holding that a school that was not directly operated by a religious organization was not "church operated." The Board in Jewish Day School explained that the analysis in Catholic Bishop did not focus on a school's direct affiliation with religious organizations, but rather focused on a school's religious purpose, the teacher's role in effectuating that purpose, and the potential effects of the Board's exercise of jurisdiction. The Board concluded that

[3] In Catholic Bishop, the Supreme Court held that teachers in church-operated schools were not within the Board's jurisdiction because the Board's exercise of jurisdiction in such a situation "would give rise to serious constitutional questions," 440 U.S. at 501, by potentially interfering with the school's religious mission and character. The Court found that church-operated schools involved "substantial religious activity and purpose" and that the "substantial religious character of these church-related schools gives rise to the entangling church-state relationships of the kind the Religion clauses sought to avoid." Id. at 503, quoting Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971).

Catholic Bishop precludes the Board from exercising jurisdiction when a union seeks to represent a unit of teachers in a school whose "purpose and function in substantial part are to propagate a religious faith." Jewish Day School, supra at 761. Applying this standard, the Board held that it was precluded from asserting jurisdiction over the Jewish Day School, and it accordingly dismissed the election petition filed by the Union.

We find that Jewish Day School, which overruled the Board's decision in Bishop Ford and thereby eliminated the underpinnings of the judge's decision in the instant case,[4] controls our decision here. As in Jewish Day School, we find that the Respondent's purpose and function in substantial part are to propagate a religious faith. As noted above, the Respondent defines itself in its faculty handbook by its "attempt to transmit the teachings of Jesus Christ and His Church," and in its student handbook states that students are "expected to be a sign of the values which Jesus taught." The Respondent's principal asks applicants for teaching positions if they are willing to teach Catholic doctrine. Teachers of both religion and nonreligion courses are expected to impart the values of the Catholic Church to the students. Furthermore, religion classes are mandatory at all grade levels. The Respondent's religious purpose is also highlighted by the fact that mass is celebrated daily in the school's third-floor chapel, that each day a religion class is assigned to attend and participate in that mass, and that a prayer is read over the public address system each morning. Thus, we find applicable here the following statement by the Second Circuit in Bishop Ford:

> It is the suffusion of religion into the curriculum and the mandate of the faculty to infuse the students with the religious values of a religious creed which create the conflict with the Religion clauses and not the vesting of legal title or the responsibility of operation. [623 F.2d at 823.]

Moreover, the physical plant of the Respondent is subject to a right of reverter to the diocese, conditioned on the Respondent's continued operation as a Catholic school.[5]

In view of the foregoing, we find that our assertion of jurisdiction here would create the same significant risk of constitutional infringement that the Supreme Court foresaw in Catholic Bishop. Accordingly, we conclude that the Board is precluded from asserting jurisdiction, and we shall dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

Elliot J. Mandel, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Kevin J. McGill, Esq. (Clifton, Budd, Burke & DeMaria), of New York, New York, for Nazareth Regional High School.
Robert M. Gordon, Esq. (Gordon & Librie), of New York, New York, for Lay Faculty Association, Local 1261, American Federation of Teachers, AFL–CIO.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

James F. Morton, Administrative Law Judge. The only issues raised by the pleadings, as amended at the hearing, are whether or not Nazareth Regional High School (Respondent) is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Board (the Act), and whether assertion of the Board's jurisdiction over Respondent would violate the religion clauses of the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The consolidated complaint in these cases, as amended at the hearing, alleges that Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. In particular, Respondent is alleged to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by discharging two employees (and not reinstating them until the next day) because they had been on strike and to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by having established the position of debating coach and set the salary and other terms of employment therefor without having bargained collectively thereon with Lay Faculty Association, Local 1261, American Federation of Teachers, AFL–CIO (the Union).[1]

Respondent's answer, as amended at the hearing, admitted virtually all allegations of the amended complaint but framed the jurisdictional issues set out above.

The hearing was held before me on September 24 and 25, 1984.

On the entire record,[2] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after full consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

[4] As noted above, the parties stipulated that the facts and issues in the instant case were virtually identical to those in Bishop Ford.

[5] This right of reverter is the same as that used by the diocese in Bishop Ford, which prompted the Second Circuit to state that the school was "only conditionally separated from the Diocese and the condition imposed is its continuing allegiance and loyalty to the Church." 623 F.2d at 824.

[1] Other unfair labor practice allegations were withdrawn at the hearing.

[2] After the hearing closed, Respondent filed a motion to supplement the record to receive in evidence an affidavit of one of its witnesses. The Union objected. Respondent's motion is denied. I note that Jt. Exh. 1 already contains some of the data referred to in the affidavit annexed to Respondent's motion. The other matters in that affidavit cannot be considered newly discovered evidence and, in any event, would constitute cumulative evidence that would not warrant a re opening of the hearing.

JURISDICTION

The facts set out below are contained in reported Board decisions and in the transcript, including exhibits, of the hearing before me.

A. Background

The Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn encompasses the boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens in New York. Up until about 1971, it operated nine diocesan high schools. One of these was Nazareth High School.

Since 1966, the full-time permanent lay teachers at those nine schools have been represented by the Union for purposes of collective bargaining.

In 1971, the Bishop of Brooklyn, because of rising costs, appointed a task force to make recommendations concerning the future of those schools. The task force recommended that "the Diocese withdraw completely from the sponsorship of high schools by closing four of them outright . . . others . . . to be offered to Religious Communities who would assume full responsibility for operating them and still other schools were to be turned over to regional boards who would assume full fiscal responsibility." The Bishop adopted certain of those recommendations. As to Nazareth High School, he determined that it will continue as a diocesan high school as its principal "agreed to [operate] the school without asking for any diocesan subsidy [and that he would] explore the feasibility of establishing a board to assume full responsibility."

In 1972, the Brooklyn Diocese organized the Henry M. Hald High School Association as an educational corporation, under the laws of the State of New York, for the purpose of operating the diocesan high schools. The Bishop and other churchmen of the Brooklyn Diocese were the trustees of the Hald Association. The Diocese owned the schools and retained control over them.

The Hald Association entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union covering "all full time, permanent lay teachers employed in the member schools of the Association."

One of the school members of the Hald Association was Bishop Kearney High School. On September 13, 1973, proprietorship of that school was transferred to a religious community, the Sisters of St. Joseph. That religious organization was held to be the successor to the Hald Association and to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by having failed and refused to recognize the Union as bargaining agent for its lay faculty. The General Counsel had contended that the Diocese, the Hald Association, and the Sisters of St. Joseph were all alter egos of each other. The Board held that, while the Diocese and the Hald Association were alter egos, the Sisters of St. Joseph exercised sufficient independence in operating the school to obviate the operation of the alter ego doctrine as to them but they were found to be Hald's successor, as noted above. The complaint was dismissed as to the Hald Association. Incidentally, the Board noted that, in the absence of exceptions, it adopted pro forma the finding that the school's operations affected commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and the conclusion that the Board should assert jurisdiction. See Henry M. Hald High School Assn., 213 NLRB 415 (1974).

B. Respondent as Successor

By letter dated December 10, 1973, the Union was informed that, effective August 31, 1974, operation and control over Nazareth High School would be transferred from the Hald Association "to a neighborhood community group which would operate Nazareth as a regional high school."

On August 16, 1974, title to the school property operated as Nazareth High School was transferred to a newly formed educational corporation, Nazareth Regional High School, for it to have and to hold so long as it "continues the operation of a Roman Catholic high school . . . upon the cessation of which, title and interest . . . shall revert to the [Diocese]."

The Union sought information concerning the planned change. The Board found that the Hald Association and also Respondent, as Hald's successor, had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by having refused to furnish the requested data, Respondent also had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. See Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 222 NLRB 1052 (1976).

C. The Bishop Ford Case

Another of the nine schools that were members of the Hald Association was severed therefrom and was operated thereafter under an independent board of trustees. Respecting that school, the Board found that the new entity was a successor to Hald as to lay faculty employed at the school and that the separate refusals to bargain by the Hald Association and by the school itself were each violative of the Act. See Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 236 NLRB 1 (1978). The cited case and a supplemental decision thereon, discussed further below, are referred to herein as the Bishop Ford case.

D. How the Jurisdictional Issue Was Raised

No issue had been raised in any of the foregoing cases concerning the Board's jurisdiction over high schools operated by the Brooklyn Diocese.

On March 21, 1979, the U.S. Supreme Court decided NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490. It affirmed the holding of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit reported at 559 F.2d 1112 (1977). The Seventh Circuit had determined that the Board's order (requiring diocesan high schools to bargain collectively with a certified labor organization) infringed on the authority of the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church to maintain those parochial institutions in accordance with ecclesiastical concern and the Board thereby had improperly curtailed the rights of the bishops under the religion clauses of the first amendment. The Seventh Circuit stated that the very hearing on which the Board predicated its findings was itself insensitive to the principles of the religion clauses. The Court also touched on the "parochaid" issue, always a factor in first amendment cases in this area and it considered other factors. The Seventh Circuit observed finally that a church that chose to educate its people without financial aid from the Government should be equally free from the inhibitions of the Act. The Supreme Court, in reviewing the Seventh Circuit's opinion, consciously sought to avoid the constitutional issues and stated that it would make a narrow inquiry as to whether the exercise of the Board's jurisdiction over church-operated high schools presents a significant risk that the religion clauses of the first amendment will be infringed. The high schools involved in that case were operated by the Roman Catholic Dioceses in Chicago and in Fort Wayne-South Bend. The court stated that it would first consider whether the exercise of the Board's jurisdiction posed a significant risk of such an infringement. It discussed various aspects of the case and noted, among other things, that the Board's very process of inquiry into the religious concerns of those schools may impinge on rights protected by the religion clauses. The Court then determined that serious first amendment questions would follow the Board's assertion of jurisdiction over church-operated schools. The Court next observed that precedent required it to seek to avoid the constitutional issue. On that premise, it proceeded to focus its attention on whether Congress had intended that the Board assert jurisdiction over church-operated schools. After noting that Congress had not clearly expressed an affirmative intention that the Board assert such jurisdiction, the Court concluded that it could avoid the constitutional issue by affirming the lower court's conclusion that church-operated schools were exempt from the Act's coverage.

The Board's order in the Bishop Ford case, discussed above, was brought before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, which remanded the case for the purpose, inter alia, of reconsidering the Board's jurisdiction over Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School. The Board reviewed the record in that case and determined that Bishop Ford was being operated as a separate institution, was governed by an independent lay board of trustees over which the Brooklyn Diocese had no control, and that Bishop Ford High School "was clearly beyond the definition of a 'church-operated' school." The Board held further that as Bishop Ford High School "was an entity separate and distinct from the church, [t]here would be no danger, in asserting jurisdiction, of entanglement of the Government with the church." The Board thus concluded that there was no impediment to its asserting jurisdiction over Bishop Ford High School and reaffirmed its original Decision and Order regarding that respondent. See Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 243 NLRB 49 (1979).

The Board applied to the U.S. Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, for enforcement of its supplemental decision in Bishop Ford. The court denied enforcement, holding that the Board lacked jurisdiction. The court there reasoned that, if the Board were correct, then Bishop Ford would be entitled to financial aid from the Government. It observed that the commitment of the school's faculty to religious values and their obligation to propagate those values provide the risk of entanglement sufficient to deprive the Board of jurisdiction. See NLRB v. Bishop Ford Catholic High School, 623 F.2d 818 (2d Cir. 1980). The Union's petition for a writ of certiorari was denied.[3]

E. The Instant Case

After the initial pleadings in this case were filed, Respondent moved for summary judgment concerning jurisdiction. The parties entered into a factual stipulation and joined in a request that the Board transfer the case directly to itself for consideration. On January 5, 1984, the case was transferred to the Board. On April 26, 1984, the Board denied Respondent's motion and remanded the matter for a hearing; the Board noted that the stipulation of facts presented to it did not specifically address Respondent's funding or the relationship and control, if any, over Respondent's board of trustees by the Diocese of Brooklyn.

In the late 1960s, 34 members of the Brothers of St. Francis Xavier (Xaverian brothers) were teaching at Respondent's predecessor diocesan school, Nazareth High School. At the time of the hearing in this case, there was only one left, Respondent's principal.

Respondent operates a 4-year school. It has 1080 students and 65 faculty. Tuition is $1940 annually including expenses. Respondent derives virtually all of its operating moneys from tuition. The Diocese of Brooklyn does not subsidize it with any monetary contribution. Respondent's policies are set by a 15-member board of trustees, most of whom are laypersons whose children attend school there. Another board member is a non-Catholic clergyman, several others are honorary members, and the remaining are members of Roman Catholic religious orders (i.e., Respondent's principal and a Franciscan brother). The Bishop of Brooklyn appoints two board members as his observers.

Respondent's president has sole responsibility for hiring all faculty and he reports to the independent board of trustees. Respondent's brief notes that the president can be removed by the Bishop of Brooklyn inasmuch as he is a member of a religious order. I do not view this as an element of direct control of Respondent by the Bishop inasmuch as the independent board of trustees could designate a lay replacement. Realistically, as Respondent's president testified, the emphasis in recent years has been towards placing more and more responsibility and, correspondingly, authority, in the hands of the laity whereas in the past, the clergy dominated.

Respondent does not require its students to be Catholic nor are they asked if they are. Its president "guesses" that 75 percent of the students are Catholic. The same observation applies to faculty except that Respondent estimates that 70 percent of the faculty are Catholic.

The outward indicia that Respondent is a Catholic school include the fact that a crucifix is in each of the classrooms, that mass is celebrated at the school daily, that one of the religion classes is assigned each day to attend and participate in the daily mass, and that a prayer, excerpted from the daily mass, is read over the public address system at the start of each schoolday.

Religion courses are required for all students on a 5-day-a-week basis for each of the 4 school years. first year students study the Old Testament; second year students study the New Testament; third year students are given courses in morality; and fourth year students study marriage, all with emphasis on traditional Catholic views, including those on abortion.

Respondent uses the services of the superintendent of schools of the Diocese of Brooklyn to keep abreast of various secular requirements and developments and refers its religion department curriculum to the superintendent's office for review. There does not appear to be any formal requirement that Respondent must consult with the Diocese office in that regard. Rather, Respondent seems to be continuing a practice used by its predecessor, the diocesan Nazareth High School. In Respondent's brief, there is the statement that the Diocese "oversees the religious curriculum at [Respondent]" and Respondent premises that statement in part on the testimony of Respondent's principal that "he is under obligation to participate with the Superintendent [of Schools for the Diocese of Brooklyn]." Concerning those assertions, I again note that there is no independent evidence that Respondent is obligated to clear its curriculum in its religion department with the Diocesan office. Rather that "obligation" is based on continuing a prior practice and on the personal sense of responsibility that guides Respondent's president as a member of a Catholic religious order. That is not to suggest that the obligation is less. Indeed, as it would spring from conviction rather than a written rule, the commitment may well be greater.

Secondary indicia as to Respondent's being a "Catholic" school include its participation in athletic activities in a league comprised of diocesan high schools, its being listed in various publications of the Diocese of Brooklyn as a Catholic high school, and its voluntary membership in the National Catholic Educational Association.

Respondent has published a faculty handbook that states that it is "a private Catholic preparatory school [which, in] emphasizing the traditional study of the arts and sciences, defines itself in the attempt to transmit the teachings of Jesus Christ and His Church."

The handbook issued to Respondent's students informs them that they "belong to a Christian community and . . . are expected to be a sign of the values which Jesus taught."

Respondent employs a chaplain whose services are obtained from the Diocese. The chaplain is available to the students for consultation in religious matters. The brief submitted by Respondent states that "[u]ndoubtedly, this chaplain would report to the Bishop [unsatisfactory events]." That comment is based on speculation and I give it no weight.

Finally, I note that the parties joined in a stipulation that the jurisdictional facts in Bishop Ford Catholic High School, supra, are substantially similar to those in the instant case.

F. Recent Case Law Development

The General Counsel and Respondent had filed briefs that carefully analyzed the opinions in the cases discussed above and also in the cases cited and discussed in those opinions. Subsequent to the filing of these briefs, two cases were decided that bear on the jurisdictional issues before me. These parties were given leave to, and did, file supplemental briefs concerning those recent cases.

In Universidad Central de Bayamon, 273 NLRB 1110 (1984), the Board rejected a contention that the university was a religious institution exempt from the coverage of the Act under the rationale of Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra. The Board, in rejecting that contention, noted that the university is not owned, financed, or controlled by the Roman Catholic Church or the Dominican Order and that the university's academic mission is secular. The Board, however, did revise the scope of its order to relieve the university from bargaining concerning the terms and conditions of employment of its instructors in its CEDOC program as that program's primary objective remained the training of priests for the ministry.

In a non-Board case decided this year by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, the court held that the N.Y. State Labor Relations Board had jurisdiction over diocesan high schools operated by the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of New York. See Catholic High School Assn. of the Archdiocese of New York v. Edward R. Culbert, 753 F.2d 1161 (2d Cir. 1985). The court noted that delicate constitutional issues were presented in addressing the difficult and sensitive question left open by the Supreme Court in Catholic Bishop, supra. The same constitutional questions considered by the Seventh Circuit in Catholic Bishop were analyzed. The Second Circuit "decline[d] to follow the Seventh Circuit down [the] slippery slope" whereby the Seventh Circuit had found that collective bargaining inevitably would enmesh the State with the rights guaranteed under the religion clauses of the first amendment. The Second Circuit quoted the Fifth Circuit's statement, "that faculty members are expected to serve as exemplars of practicing Christians does not serve to make the terms and conditions of their employment matters of church administration and thus purely of ecclesiatical concern." The court then weighed other factors. Ultimately, it concluded that the State of New York had a compelling interest to protect and that the exercise of the state board's jurisdiction is justified as it would have indirect and incidental effect on decisions on parochial schools involving religious issues. The court also noted that the National Labor Relations Board did not have jurisdiction of the diocesan schools involved, in view of the holding in Catholic Bishop.

G. Analysis

The stipulation signed by the parties prior to the opening of the hearing and the overall record in this case establish that the essential facts and issues are virtually identical with those considered by the Board in its supplemental decision in Bishop Ford, supra (243 NLRB 49). As I am obligated to follow Board precedent unless and until it is reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court, I find, as did the Board in the second Bishop Ford case, that there is no impediment to the Board's assertion of jurisdiction over Respondent in the case before me. That determination effectively decides the issues in this case, at least for my purposes. Still, I may well have the obligation to submit to the Board my views as to the respective positions of the parties, each of whom candidly acknowledges that the merits of their respective claims will be pressed on appeal. Further, the Board's remand order of April 26, 1984, permits the parties to renew their contentions before me and, presumably, I am to make recommendations thereon. I turn then to the consideration of those matters.

There is no evidence that Respondent's board of trustees has acted under the direction of the Diocese of Brooklyn, nor is there evidence that the Diocese has ever sought to influence the board of trustees by indirection. Further, Respondent has voluntarily availed itself of the various services offered by the diocesan superintendent of schools. In all matters involving labor relations policies, Respondent has sole control. In financial matters, Respondent bears sole responsibility.

The evidence bearing directly on religious considerations in this case are to some extent equivocal. Thus, although school begins with a prayer and while classes are regularly scheduled to attend religious services with attendance compulsory, Respondent consciously hires faculty and enrolls on a nonreligious basis. Its president is of the opinion that the great majority of its faculty and its students profess to be Roman Catholics.

I do not view it as my function to determine how "religious" or how "Catholic" Respondent's curriculum is, especially as "there is some question whether the Board has the authority to rule on the constitutionality of the Act itself." See Mid American Health Services, 247 NLRB 752 (1980). Rather, my responsibility is discharged by weighing the evidence as to the extent, if any, the Brooklyn Diocese controls or funds Respondent and by ascertaining obvious problem areas that have developed or could develop by reason of the impact of labor relations policies on religious endeavors. On this last point, I note that the labor relations history of Respondent and its predecessors discloses no obvious problems that impacted adversely on the rights guaranteed by the religion clauses. The unfair labor practice allegations in this case and in prior cases, insofar as they affected first amendment rights, could just as easily have involved any commercial enterprise and could just as routinely be resolved by the Board. I do not mean to minimize Respondent's contention by making that observation. Rather, I do so in order to underline what appears to be the crucial aspect of this case insofar as the issue of the Board's jurisdiction ultimately is concerned.

The sole concern of the Board should be whether or not its assertion of jurisdiction could adversely impact on any rights Respondent may have under the religion clauses. The answer, dictated by practical experience in past cases involving Respondent and by the absence of any evidential basis demonstrating an actual conflict, is simply that there is no demonstrable impediment to the assertion of jurisdiction. As a corollary, it may be fairly said that, if any such impediment exists, it could readily be removed simply by Respondent's surrendering its independence from the Diocese and then enveloping itself with the protection accorded diocesan schools under Catholic Bishop of Chicago.

I have alluded to matters that are the real areas of concern in cases involving the religion clauses. From my reading of those cases, it seems obvious that decisions of the Courts, bearing on issues involving the Board's jurisdiction and rights guaranteed by those clauses, disclose that the relevant and significant factors they take into account are much broader in scope than those considered by the Board. This appears to be because the Courts address a broader spectrum of policy issues than does the Board, in evaluating the merits of a claim of undue governmental interference with rights guaranteed by the religion clauses. Thus, as is obvious from a reading of the cases discussed above, the Courts have (a) posed and considered hypothetical conflicts, (b) expressed in various ways no little concern that "parochaid" as it is termed may be fostered by permitting the Board to assert its jurisdiction, and (c) weighed matters outside the Board's area of expertise.[4] The Court decisions make it clear that the Board's function is relatively limited. In fact the Courts have observed that the Board's inquiry is to be restricted to so limited an area that the very inquiry into the jurisdictional issues does not unduly impinge on the rights protected by the religion clauses. Obviously, some inquiry is to be made. The proper scope of the Board's inquiry should be limited to three areas: that is, funding, control of labor relations policies, and whether the Board's inquiry itself would probably (not hypothetically) impinge on the rights protected by the religion clauses. The test used by the Board in the second Bishop Ford case properly limits the scope of the inquiry for the Board purposes.

In short, jurisdiction should be asserted over Respondent as the Diocese of Brooklyn does not fund or control Respondent and as there is no evidence that the unfair labor practice issues herein improperly impacted on the rights guaranteed by the religion clauses.[5] As I read Universidad Central de Bayamon, supra, the Board's holding "that the University's academic mission is secular" is, in context, a finding that the assertion of jurisdiction would not impinge on the rights protected by the religion clauses. I am hesitant about making an overall evaluation as to Respondent's mission in the instant case, especially as the Supreme Court in Catholic Bishop cautioned against the prospect that such an inquiry might itself be impermissible by reason of the first amendment. The courts of appeals themselves do not hesitate to make such evaluations but, for the reasons set forth above, the [4] Thus, in Archdiocese of New York, supra, the Second Circuit took into account the contents of papal encyclicals; the Seventh Circuit in Chicago Bishops, supra, quoted secondary authority having to do with the "true scripture . . . Americanism . . . and [the making of] loyal Roman Catholics"; the Second Circuit in Bishop Ford II observed that "the tenets of Roman Catholicism do not emanate from the Bishop of Brooklyn with all deference to that prelate." The Board's area of inquiry, in my view, is not so expansive as to authorize it to weigh considerations such as those.

[5] The opinion of the Second Circuit in Archdiocese of New York, supra, contains, in my view, an exemplary approach in evaluating whether the unfair labor practices in the instant case unduly impinged on first amendment rights.

Courts seem to fulfill a broader role than that allocated to the Board.

Respondent separately contends that the assertion of jurisdiction by the Board in this case would violate the equal protection component of the Fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Respondent argues that it would be denied the protection accorded diocesan schools, although it is pervasively religious in character, solely because it is not owned by the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church. The difficulty I have with this argument is that it begs the very question to be answered. If the U.S. Supreme Court were to have held that an independent school (operated by a lay board of trustees to teach, inter alia, certain religious beliefs) is not subject to the Board's jurisdiction, Respondent may well have a valid point. The precedent controlling my decision, however, does not support Respondent's equal protection view.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction.

2. The Union is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By having discharged Steven Monroe and Arthur Weyranch and by not reinstating them to full employment until the next day, because of their activities on behalf of the Union, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. By having failed and refused to bargain collectively with the Union as to the duties, salary, and other employment terms and conditions of its debating coach, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

5. The violations described above in paragraphs 3 and 4 constitute unfair labor practices that affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent shall be ordered to make whole Steven Monroe and Arthur Weyranch for all moneys they lost, with interest as a result of their unlawful discharge; the amounts to be calculated in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

DECISION AND ORDER REMANDING

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 9 June 1986 Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to reinstate employees Lionel Myles and Steve Martinez following their participation in a strike protected by Section 7 of the Act. The sole issue before the judge was whether Myles and Martinez had engaged in misconduct during the strike sufficiently egregious to deprive them of their right to recall as economic strikers who had made unconditional offers to return to work. We find merit in the Respondent's exceptions to the judge's findings concerning Myles. Additionally, we shall remand this proceeding to the judge for credibility determinations regarding the conduct of Martinez and further analysis of the complaint allegations concerning him.

The judge recognized the authority of Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984), in which the Board "reject[ed] the per se rule that words alone can never warrant a denial of reinstatement in the absence of physical acts," and adopted an objective test: "whether the misconduct is such that, under circumstances existing, it may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act." Id. at 1046; see also Id. at 1048.

With respect to Myles, the judge examined separately his alleged misconduct on five different occasions. First, the judge found that Myles, while on picket duty, spoke for about 2 minutes to nonstriking employee Guy Akana, who was driving his truck from the Respondent's premises. During this incident, Myles told Akana to tell "Don A" that Myles was going to "break his legs." Since Myles held no weapon and "Don A" was not present or even known to Akana, the judge concluded, without condoning Myles' language, that the threat was "remote" and thus insufficient to warrant denial of reinstatement.

A second series of incidents involving Myles took place when he picketed a worksite to which nonstriking employee John Sales had been dispatched. The judge found that Myles, in addition to making taunting comments about Sales' competence, threatened to "kick [Sales'] fucking ass," "break [his] bones," and "break [him] up." Myles further told Sales that his threats were not a "union scare tactic but between you and I [sic], pal." Myles also joined several other picketers in pounding on Sales' truck and shouting, "I'm going to get you" as Sales drove from the worksite following his completion of the job.

The judge characterized Myles' conduct toward Sales as "simply a vociferous and boisterous needling of a non-striker" by stressing his findings that Myles never displayed a weapon, that Sales did not consider the verbal threats to be very serious because he did not seek help, and that the truck pounding incident was not a physical threat because Myles refrained from any direct assault during the times Sales was working outside his truck. The judge concluded that these acts did not rise to a level of misconduct entitling the Respondent to deny reinstatement to Myles.[2]

On yet another occasion during the strike, Myles parked his personal truck across the Respondent's driveway, thus blocking that access to its facility. The Respondent's president testified that he asked Myles to move the truck and that Myles refused. Myles testified that it was the Respondent's general manager who asked him to move his truck and he thereupon did so. The judge found no evidence regarding the length of time the truck remained in the driveway and no evidence to contradict Myles' testimony that he promptly moved it when requested. The judge further relied on evidence that an adjacent driveway belonging to a neighboring business, one regularly used by the Respondent's employees, did at all times provide access to the Respondent's property. He concluded that this incident by itself did not warrant denying reinstatement to Myles.

[2] The judge also considered Sales' testimony that on a separate occasion about a week before the strike ended in late November 1984, Myles told him that he would return in a week and "take care" of Sales at that time. However, the judge credited Myles' denial that this encounter took place.

Finally, in addition to the encounters involving employees Akana and Sales, Myles was involved in another incident with a nonstriking employee. Myles followed employee Scott Johnson as he left the Respondent's facility in a company truck. Myles intended to picket at Johnson's worksite. However, Johnson did not go to work but instead went home for lunch. After Johnson arrived at his home, Myles stood about 60 feet from Johnson's home and, without entering onto his property, called Johnson a "fucking scab" and threatened to follow him "until he died." The judge found the latter alleged threat to be ambiguous and susceptible to the interpretation that Myles only intended to adhere tenaciously to the strike by continuing his practice of lawfully picketing the Respondent's worksites. The judge concluded that the remark was not intended to be taken literally and was therefore not a threat of bodily harm. The judge once again evaluated this incident in isolation from Myles' other activities and concluded that it did not entitle the Respondent to deny reinstatement to Myles.

Our first disagreement with the judge's analysis concerns his reliance, in part, on a subjective test rather than the objective standard mandated by Clear Pine Mouldings. With respect to the import of Myles' encounters with nonstriking employees Akana, Sales, and Johnson, the judge, rather than evaluating any reasonable tendency to coerce or intimidate, chose to analyze what he understood to be Myles' intentions and the employees' reactions. The judge found that when Myles told Akana to deliver personally to a third employee a threat to "break his legs," Akana "was not particularly concerned" because he did not know the named employee and because Myles had no weapon or immediate opportunity to effectuate the threat. Concerning Sales, the judge inferred that Sales did not take Myles' threats of bodily harm "seriously" because Sales did not seek help from others. The judge further inferred that Myles himself did not intend the threats to be taken seriously because, though he had the opportunity, he did not follow through on them. With respect to Myles' following of Johnson to his home, the judge found Johnson's fear to be "beyond reasonableness" because the alleged threat was ambiguous and the Union was entitled to engage in ambulatory picketing.

In addition to his departures from the Clear Pine Mouldings test, the judge failed to consider the totality of Myles' behavior, choosing instead to evaluate each incident in isolation from the others. Concerning one of these incidents, we agree with the judge that there is insufficient evidence to show that Myles' parking of his truck on the Respondent's driveway constituted any significant interference with the conduct of the Respondent's business. And, as indicated above, we also adopt the judge's credibility finding that the alleged encounter between Myles and Sales in late November did not take place. However, with respect to the remaining three incidents, we find that Myles did engage in a pattern of behavior by threatening Sales directly with bodily harm and shortly thereafter pounding on his truck, by telling Akana to deliver an even more explicit threat to another nonstriking employee, and by following Johnson to his home and threatening to follow him "until he died."[3]

Contrary to the judge, we find that, taken as a whole, Myles' encounters with three employees in which they and a fourth employee were threatened either directly or indirectly with serious bodily harm or with picketing away from their worksites because they exercised their Section 7 right to refrain from striking, reasonably tended to coerce or intimidate them. Regardless of the striking employees' subjective reaction to these series of threatening remarks, the reasonable, indeed the clear, tendency of such repeated threats is to coerce or intimidate employees. In reaching this conclusion, we emphasize that Myles' misconduct was neither an isolated outburst nor were his remarks, in most instances, amenable to a noncoercive interpretation. Under these circumstances, we find that the Respondent's failure to reinstate Myles did not violate the Act and we will dismiss that portion of the complaint.

However, a different result is required concerning employee Steve Martinez. In determining whether Martinez engaged in misconduct during the strike sufficiently serious to deprive him of his right to recall, the judge considered both his testimony and that of employee Steve Penney. Penney testified that while driving a company van he stopped at a stoplight on a busy highway. Martinez, in his own truck and accompanied by a friend, was in the adjacent lane to the right. According to [3] We agree with the judge that the circumstances surrrounding Myles' conduct at Johnson's home are less coercive than those in Georgia Kraft Co., 275 NLRB 636 (1985), given that here there is no evidence that other members of Johnson's family overheard the shouted threat. However, in our view, Myles crossed any permissible line.

Because the Union had a right to engage in ambulatory picketing that reasonably required following nonstriking employees, Member Johansen does not regard Myles' following Johnson home in itself to be an element of Myles' misconduct.

Penney, Martinez tried to cut in front of him as the light changed while shouting that he was going to "kick his ass." Penney also testified that Martinez spat at his van and threw ice from a paper cup. Martinez, on the other hand, denied the alleged attempt to interfere with the path of Penney's van and the alleged threat, spitting, and ice throwing. He stated that he had merely pulled up alongside the Respondent's van and then proceeded on his way in a normal fashion when the light changed.

The judge in crediting Penney's testimony, "for the sake of analysis" concluded that Penney was neither in any actual danger nor did he reasonably believe he was in danger. The judge found that the incident lasted only a few moments, the vehicles were moving, at most, about 5 miles per hour, and Penney was at all times protected from Martinez' alleged nonverbal abuse by the van itself. The judge concluded that it seemed "unlikely" to him that Penney was "actually intimidated." On this basis he found that the Respondent's refusal to reinstate Martinez was not justified and therefore violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

We find, however, that the judge undercut his own analysis in two ways. First he utilized, as he did with the behavior of Myles, the same subjective test rejected in Clear Pine Mouldings. Secondly, the judge employed a most equivocal procedure for resolving the conflicting testimony regarding what actually happened at the highway stoplight. For while he credited Penney "for the sake of analysis," he also found Martinez' version to be more credible "in some respects." The judge found it "unlikely" that Martinez would have involved his friend by instigating a "near violent" situation in the middle of traffic. The judge's avoidance of a clear credibility resolution deprives us of the necessary factual basis to determine whether any misconduct occurred and, if it did, whether it was sufficiently serious to deprive Martinez of the protection of the Act. In addition, the judge failed to apply the Clear Pine Mouldings test in an appropriate manner. We will therefore remand this portion of the proceeding to the judge to make definite credibility findings on the alleged strike misconduct and to apply the Clear Pine Mouldings objective test.

ORDER

The complaint allegation that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to reinstate employee Lionel Myles is dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this proceeding is remanded to Judge Kennedy for the purpose of making credibility resolutions on all testimony concerning the alleged strike misconduct of employee Steve Martinez and for recommendations whether his conduct justified, under the standard of Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984), the denial of his right as an economic striker to return to work.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a supplemental decision setting forth the resolution of such credibility issues and findings and conclusions with respect thereto. Copies of the supplemental decision shall be served on all parties, after which the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules shall be applicable.

Raoul Thorbourne, for the General Counsel.
Harry Finkle and Neil M. Gerstner (Finkle & Stroup), Walnut Creek, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

JAMES M. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Oakland, California, on January 22, 1986. It is based on a consolidated complaint issued by the Acting Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board on January 31, 1985. The complaint is based on charges filed by Warehouse, Mail Order and Retail Employees and Wholesale Liquor Salespersons, Local 853, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union) on November 1 and December 4, 1984.[1] Prior to the hearing, the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Charging Party reached a partial settlement in which paragraphs 7, 8, 9, and 10 were resolved. In addition, the General Counsel moved to dismiss those portions of paragraphs 13 and 14 respecting an individual named Lister. The motion was granted. The complaint now alleges that F. E. Wray, Inc. d/b/a Roto Rooter (Respondent) has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act).

Issue

As modified, the complaint leaves for resolution only the question of whether Respondent unlawfully refused to recall two individuals after the cessation of a strike. The parties have stipulated that the two individuals in question, Lionel Myles and Steve Martinez, were participants in a strike that commenced on November 1 and ended about December 3. The only question for resolution is whether Myles and Martinez engaged in misconduct sufficient to deprive them of their right to reinstatement. Respondent contends that they did; the General Counsel contends they did not.

Based on the stipulation of facts and the entire record of the case, as well as my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

[1] All dates are 1984 unless otherwise noted.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

Respondent admits, and I find, that it has been at all material times a California corporation with an office and place of business in San Leandro where it is engaged in the business of providing sewer and drain cleaning services as well as plumbing services, on both retail and nonretail bases to residential and commercial customers. It further admits that during the past 12 months its gross revenues exceeded $500,000 and that it purchased and received goods and services valued in excess of $5,000, which originated outside California. Accordingly, it admits and I find that it has been at all material times an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is and has been at all material times a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The parties stipulated that on November 1, 1984, certain of Respondent's San Leandro employees went on strike, that its employees Lionel Myles and Steve Martinez were among the strikers, and that the strike was an activity protected by Section 7 of the Act. The parties further stipulated that on December 3, 1984, both Myles and Martinez made unconditional offers to return to work but reinstatement was denied them because Respondent believed they had engaged in certain strike misconduct. Finally, the parties have stipulated that had Respondent not held that belief, it would have reinstated both of them to their former jobs.

A. Lionel Myles

Respondent points to approximately five "incidents" to support its decision not to reinstate Myles. The first occurred in early November, approximately a week after the strike began. Myles and two other stikers, Mark Forbes and John Greer, were picketing Respondent's San Leandro yard, which is located on Washington Boulevard, a major thoroughfare in San Leandro. The three pickets were patrolling the sidewalk across the driveway. A nonstriker, Guy Akana, began to exit the parking lot via the driveway. Myles stood momentarily in front of Akana's company truck and brought it to a stop at the sidewalk. Akana agrees that he would have had to stop at that point anyway in order to abide by the traffic laws and in order to await a traffic opening. While he was stopped, Greer and Forbes engaged Akana in a short, friendly conversation lasting no more than 2 minutes. Akana testified that he could have left at any time the traffic permitted him to do so, but that he chose to listen to what the pickets had to say. After hearing them out, he entered Washington Boulevard and proceeded to his job.

With respect to the conversation itself, Akana testified that Forbes asked him to turn in his company keys, but he replied that he could not. He said that Myles then came over and told him: "Tell Don A that I am going to break his legs." Akana did not know who Don A was although he later learned it was an individual named Don Atkins.

Myles denied that he ever blocked Akana's truck from leaving the facility. In addition, he specifically denied making any remark about "Don A" and generally denied threatening anyone during the strike.

In both early and late November, Myles had confrontations with nonstriker John Sales. During the strike many of the strikers followed nonstrikers to worksites and picketed near those workmen. Late one morning in early November Myles observed Sales leave Respondent's yard on Washington Boulevard for a clean-out job located at the Eden Lodge residential complex also located on Washington Boulevard and only a few hundred feet from Respondent's yard. Myles and another striker, Tim Shantin, followed Sales there and began to picket. Sales had some difficulty with his winch, which apparently had broken, and he was unable to remove his equipment from the truck. Taking advantage of the incident, the pickets taunted Sales by shouting in the presence of the complex's manager that Sales was inexperienced and incompetent. Myles testified that except for telling Sales he was incompetent he said nothing else to Sales. Sales disagrees, asserting that Myles told him he was going to "kick [Sales'] fucking ass and break his bones." Later, Sales says, Myles said he would "bust [Sales] up," amplifying that it was not a union scare tactic but "between you and i, pal."

Unable to unload his equipment with the broken winch, Sales returned to Respondent's yard where he repaired it. The pickets followed him to the yard. When he returned to Eden Lodge they followed him again. Myles testified he said nothing to Sales when he returned to the Lodge. Sales testified, however, that when he returned Myles told him he was going to "bust him up" and "kick his ass." Sales then testified that after he had finished the job, the pickets surrounded his van as he began to leave and Myles and others began to pound on it. He says Myles was shouting angrily, "I'm going to get you." Myles denied pounding on the van or making any of the remarks. During this incident it appears that Sales' van suffered two flat tires. It is unclear whether the tires were punctures or were simply deflated. Either way there is no evidence connecting Myles to the tire incident. Respondent concedes that it cannot prove that Myles had anything to do with the flat tires but points to the incident as part of the atmosphere of the strike. When Sales realized his tires were flat, he got out of the vehicle to inspect them. Neither Myles nor any other picket made any move to carry out the alleged threats.

In late November, according to Sales, Myles remarked to him in the presence of two other pickets in front of the San Leandro yard that he was going to be coming back to work the following week. Sales said Myles told him, "I'm going to get you then. I'm going to get your ass then." Sales says he asked Myles to repeat what he had said and Myles obliged saying, "I'll be back next week and I'll get your ass." Sales responded by saying that if Myles attempted to do so he would file assault charges against him.

Respondent also alleges that Myles at one point parked his car in such a manner as to block the driveway into the yard. According to the testimony there are two driveway entrances, one on Respondent's property and another on the U-Haul establishment's property next door. Respondent's employees regularly used the U-Haul driveway as well as their own. Myles remembers that on one occasion he was going to use the telephone booth located approximately 10 feet inside Respondent's driveway and that he parked his small truck nearby to do so. He says that when Guy Davenport, Respondent's general manager, asked him to move it he did. Davenport could not remember the incident, but Rodney Wray, Respondent's president, asserts that it was he who had asked Myles to move his car. He says when he did Myles replied. "No way," and refused. Wray asserts that Myles' vehicle was parked horizontally across the driveway, thereby blocking it. Neither he nor anyone testified that any other vehicle actually attempted to use the driveway while Myles was parked there. Indeed, Wray has no idea when the vehicle was actually moved, for he simply walked away and did not pursue the matter further. In any event, there continued to be access to the yard through the U-Haul driveway only a few feet away.

The last episode involving Myles occurred about November 20. Nonstriker Scott Johnson, shortly before lunchtime, left the yard in a company truck. Myles and striker Will Lister, believing that Johnson was going out on a call, decided to follow him for the purpose of picketing the jobsite. Johnson took evasive action and attempted to lose them in traffic, adding credence to their belief that he was on his way to a call. Instead of going to a job, however, Johnson went to his home in Fremont to get his lunch. Johnson testified that as he was entering his house Myles and Lister pulled up. He was about 60 feet away from them when they began calling him a "fucking scab." Lister told Johnson that he had no right working for the Company and would never have any rights if he continued to work for it. Johnson says additional words were exchanged and at that point he heard Myles say he was going to harass and follow Johnson "until he died." As a result of that remark Johnson decided to call the police.

Myles testified that when he and Lister arrived in front of Johnson's house, Johnson got out of his vehicle and began "hollering" at them. Johnson shouted at the strikers that they did not want to have a job and did not want to work, but could have a job at Roto Rooter if they wanted to work. Myles referred to a court order, of which he had a copy, which had refused to prohibit strikers from following nonstrikers to jobs and picketing them there. When the police arrived Myles showed the court order to the policeman. Apparently the only thing the policeman did was to detain Myles and Lister long enough to permit Johnson to leave without being followed.

B. Steve Martinez

Respondent asserts that striker Steve Martinez engaged in misconduct 1 day on Hesperian Boulevard in San Leandro. The street is a busy six-lane divided thoroughfare.

About November 13, Martinez was driving his own truck down Hesperian Boulevard when he encountered a Roto Rooter van driven by Steve Penney, which was stopped at a stoplight. Penney had previously worked at Roto Rooter but had been brought back during the strike. Both vehicles were stopped in adjacent traffic lanes, about 15 car lenghts from the intersection. Penney says Martinez attempted to force his way in front of his van and that while Martinez was doing so he yelled at Penney saying he was going to "kick his ass." Penney says Martinez then spit at the van and threw ice at it from a fast-food chain's paper cup. Penney concedes, however, that his van was never in any real danger and that Martinez did not actually block him from proceeding. The entire incident occurred while the stoplight was changing from red to green as the traffic slowly began to move forward. At no time did Penney's vehicle ever exceed 5 miles per hour nor was Martinez driving any differently from that of an individual attempting to change lanes in a traffic jam.

Martinez denies the entire matter. He says he noticed the van, remarked on it to a friend who was driving with him, and then proceeded on his way. He specifically denies saying anything to the driver (whom he did not seek to identify), denies throwing ice or spitting, and denies attempting to cut the van off by changing lanes.

IV. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

In its decision in Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044, 1046 (1984), the Board reconsidered its traditional rule with respect to the reinstatement of strikers accused of misconduct. Prior to this decision the Board had held that a striker's verbal threats that were unaccompanied by any physical act or gesture would not constitute serious strike misconduct justifying an employer's denial of reinstatement. It had also held that verbal threats that were accompanied by physical movements or contacts, such as hitting cars, did constitute serious misconduct. Its rule, as set forth in Coronet Casuals, 207 NLRB 304 (1973), was that absent violence a striker was not to be disqualified for reinstatement despite having made abusive threats against nonstrikers.

However, in Clear Pine Mouldings, a Board plurality disagreed with the standard because it was inconsistent with other sections of the Act. It looked to the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in NLRB v. W. C. McQuaide, Inc., 552 F.2d 519 (1977) and to the decision of the First Circuit in Associated Grocers of New England v. NLRB, 562 F.2d 1333 (1977). Those courts had disagreed with the Coronet Casuals approach. In Clear Pine Moulding, the Board adopted these courts' analysis stating that it rejected that per se rule that words alone can never warrant a denial of reinstatement in the absence of physical acts. Instead, the Board said, it now agreed with those courts that a serious threat may draw credibility from the surrounding circumstances and not from the physical gestures of the speaker, moreover, an employer need not countenance conduct that amounts to intimidation and threats of bodily harm. Specifically, the Board adopted the McQuaide test, which it characterized as an "objective" test, that the Board should look to "whether the misconduct is such that, under the circumstances existing, it may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act." Clear Pine Mouldings, supra at 1046, quoting McQuaide, supra at 528.

Accordingly, it is now the obligation of the Board to look at all the surrounding circumstances to determine whether or not the strikers' acts may reasonably be seen to have a coercive or intimidating effect on the employees who are also exercising a Section 7 right, the right not to engage in a strike.

Since its decision in Clear Pine Mouldings, the Board has decided a number of cases applying that rule. A certain amount of name-calling and posturing conduct has passed muster. See, for example, MGM Grand Hotel, 275 NLRB 1015 (1985) in which strikers called nonstrikers "scabs." Similarly, in Shalom Nursing Home, 276 NLRB 1123, 1135–1136 (1985), even racist name-calling and taunting were deemed to be insufficient to warrant the denial of reinstatement. Yet, in Georgia Kraft Co., 275 NLRB 636 (1985), when strikers visited a nonstriker's home and threatened to "take care of" the nonstriker in the presence of his pregnant wife and young child, the Board deemed that verbal threat sufficient to warrant the denial of reinstatement. In Clear Pine Mouldings itself, the Board found that a striker who swung a 2-foot club at a nonstriking motorcyclist and used the club to beat on the vehicles of other nonstrikers was properly denied reinstatement. The surrounding circumstances included other strikers carrying other weapons, such as tire irons, baseball bats, and ax handles, as well as being accompanied by dogs. Also unprotected was a verbal threat to kill a nonstriker when the individual making the threat was equipped with a weapon that he had been using, as was a statement to a nonstriker while crossing the picket line that she was taking her life in her hands by crossing the line and would live to regret it. Likewise unprotected was a threat to burn down the residence of a nonstriker.

As I view the cases, it seems to me that a striker's possession of a weapon while simultaneously making the threat will clearly warrant the refusal to reinstate. Also, justifying the denial of reinstatement would be a threat to burn a nonstriker's home. This sort of threat seems to fall in the same category as the threat accompanied by a weapon because the act is so horrible that fire itself becomes a weapon.

However, a threat made while at an individual's home, unaccompanied by any weapon, seems to fall into a less clear category. In Georgia Kraft, supra, the threat was made in the presence of the nonstriker's pregnant wife and child. That circumstance seems to have made the threat more immediate and real. Would the result be different if the threat was more vague, was shouted from some distance while simultaneously respecting the property line, and in the absence of any especially vulnerable family member?

Similarly, if no weapon is present when a nonstriker's car crosses the picket line, but the strikers nonetheless pound on the vehicle with their hands without damaging the vehicle, can it be said that the conduct is intimidating? After all the persons inside the vehicle are not likely to be harmed for they are physically shielded by the auto itself. This is not to say that the din created might not cause apprehension in reasonable individuals. Yet can it be said that the strikers by such boisterous conduct have done anything so serious as to warrant loss of employment? Hopefully, the surrounding circumstances test will be helpful here.

A. Lionel Myles

Turning to the facts before me, I should observe that for the most part all of the witnesses seem reasonably credible in the presentation of their perception of what happened. It is true that Lionel Myles exhibited some areas of inconsistency, but on the other side it seemed to me that John Sales had some problems as well, including a failure to fully observe what was happening around him. Nonetheless, assuming what Sales had to say was true, it appears that Myles said that he was going to kick Sales' fucking ass and break his bones, followed later by a similar threat that Myles was going to bust Sales up and that it was not simply a union scare tactic, but "between you and I, pal." Even so, at no time did Myles approach Sales while Sales was out of his vehicle and at no time did Myles ever display a weapon. Sales was not even sufficiently concerned to complain to the apartment manager or to return to the company office. It seems to me that Sales' own conduct here demonstrates that he did not consider the verbal threats to be very serious. I reach this conclusion despite Sales' testimony that Myles was shouting and gritting his teeth and Sales' assertion that he had taken the threats seriously. Had he done so, he would have sought immediate help for he was outnumbered by the pickets. Despite his current testimony, he was so unconcerned when he went back to the yard to fix his winch that he said nothing about it, and then returned to the job.

Similarly, when he entered the vehicle to return to the yard after the job was completed, Sales accused Myles of repeating the threats and of pounding on the company truck with his hands. He agrees that other pickets were making similar remarks and also pounding on the vehicle. He was so unafraid he got out to check the tires. When he did so nothing happened to him. It was not until he discovered that the truck had suffered the flat tires that he even bothered to report the incident to the Company.

I am of the view that this incident is not so serious as to warrant denying Myles reinstatement. While the incident is not to be condoned, nonetheless it appears that the entire incident, except for the flat tires (to which Myles is not in any way connected) was simply a vociferous and boisterous needling of a nonstriker. Sales did not take the threats seriously because they were not made in a serious vein. Similarly, the pounding on the truck did not actually amount to a physical threat to him. Had the pickets or Myles wished to actually strike

Sales, they could easily have done so when he exited his vehicle to discover flat tires. Yet they refrained from any physical contact whatsoever. I conclude, therefore, that the incident at the Eden Lodge is not sufficient to warrant denying reinstatement to Myles.

Similarly, Sales testified that in late November, about a week before the strike ended, Myles said that he was going to return in a week and would "take care of" Sales then. Myles denies this incident in its entirety. Adding credence to his denial is his statement that he did not know when the strike was to end so he wouldn't have said that he was going to return in a week. In any event this is a threat that was unaccompanied by any gesture or deeds suggesting that it had credence. Here I accept Myles's denial.

With respect to Myles allegedly blocking Akana, it seems to me that the incident speaks for itself. Akana had to stop at the sidewalk for traffic anyway, chose to listen to the pickets, and then proceeded without further delay. He testified that he could have left at any time and that the pickets did not block his exit. Accordingly, I conclude that neither Myles nor anyone else actually blocked Akana's egress. Connected to that incident, however, is Akana's testimony that Myles told him to tell "Don A" that Myles intended to break his legs. Akana didn't even know who Don A was at the time. Even so, Myles had no weapon and no immediate apparent ability to carry out the threat. Don A was not to be seen. Again, while I do not condone his language, Akana was not particularly concerned with it and proceeded on his way. The threat appears remote and not sufficient to warrant denying reinstatement.

Similarly, I am unimpressed with the evidence tending to show that Myles blocked the driveway with his vehicle. Even accepting Wray's version that Myles parked his pickup truck horizontally across the driveway, it appears that there was still sufficient space for another vehicle to have passed; in any event the second driveway was not blocked. Furthermore, even though Myles may have told Wray that he wasn't going to move his car, Myles testified that he did so and Respondent has presented no evidence to the contrary. Aside from Myles' testimony that the truck was parked there only briefly, there is no evidence regarding the length of time the truck remained in the driveway. Finally, there is no evidence that anyone actually attempted to enter the driveway during that period. This incident certainly would not warrant denying Myles reinstatement.

Finally, Respondent points to the incident involving Myles and nonstriker Scott Johnson. The fact that Myles and another striker followed Johnson to his home is of little significance. Certainly Myles intended to picket Johnson at a repair site. He did not know that Johnson was going home to get his lunch. There is no evidence that Myles entered Johnson's property or did anything other than to shout at him from the street. Johnson, however, was understandably upset that he had been followed to his home. Undoubtedly Johnson believed, as do most people, that his home was safe from the labor dispute. Yet Johnson inadvertently carried the labor dispute to his house when he drove the company truck there. The Union did have the right to engage in ambulatory picketing and was merely attempting to exercise that right. Johnson's fear, because he was followed, is magnified beyond reasonableness. Respondent, however, points to Myles' alleged remark that he would follow Johnson "until he died." Frankly, I find the language to be ambiguous. It may simply have been hyperbole on Myles' part, asserting that he intended to engage in ambulatory picketing until Johnson was tired of it. On the other hand it could mean that Myles literally intended to dog Johnson's trail until he became physically exhausted and died. The latter version seems to be most unlikely given the Union's desire to engage in lawful ambulatory picketing. Accordingly, I conclude that Myles' alleged threat here was not a threat at all, but simply a statement made to advise Johnson that he and the Union were tenaciously adhering to the strike. Moreover, the statement was made to Johnson who was a party to the labor dispute, not to his family as in Georgia Kraft Co., supra. I conclude that this incident does not justify denying Myles reinstatement.

B. Steve Martinez

The last incident involves Steve Penney's version of what Steve Martinez allegedly did and said at the stoplight on Hesperian Boulevard. Frankly, even crediting Penney's version, it seems to me that nothing untoward happened. Assuming that Martinez edged his vehicle in front of Penney's, spit at the van, threw ice at it, and threatened to "kick Penney's ass," nothing really significant happened. Penney was never in any danger and did not reasonably believe himself to be in any danger. At the most, his vehicle was moving only 5 miles an hour and he was well protected by the vehicle itself. Martinez never left his vehicle and he did not even attempt to harm Penney's person. The incident lasted only a few moments and it seems unlikely to me that Penney was in any way actually intimidated.

I should say here that although I have credited Penney's version for the sake of analysis, in some respects I find Martinez to be the more credible of the two. Martinez was driving his own personal vehicle, was not following Penney but happened on him by chance, and it seems unlikely he would have drawn his passenger friend into a near-violent situation in the middle of traffic. Moreover, as the light changed Martinez did nothing to continue the encounter, but proceeded on his way. In any event, I find that the incident did not reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate Penney in any manner. Accordingly, I would not deny Martinez reinstatement based on this incident.

In conclusion, I find that Respondent has not sustained its burden of proof that either Myles or Martinez engaged in a serious act of misconduct such as to disqualify either of them from reinstatement. Accordingly, I conclude that when Respondent denied reinstatement to Myles and Martinez at the end of the strike, it did so on the basis that they engaged in the strike, conduct clearly protected by the Act. The denial of reinstatement constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. In this regard, Respondent shall be ordered immediately to reinstate Lionel Myles and Steve Martinez to their former jobs, dismissing if necessary any replacements, or if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges and to make them whole with interest for loss of earnings as described by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950) and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). In addition, Respondent shall be required to remove from its records any reference to the unlawful discharges and shall provide each of them with written notice of such removal and to inform each that the discharges will not be used as a basis for further personnel actions concerning him.

On the foregoing findings of fact and the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent F. E. Wray, Inc. d/b/a Roto Rooter is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Warehouse, Mail Order and Retail Employees and Wholesale Liquor Salespersons, Local 853, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act on December 3, 1984 by refusing to reinstate strikers Lionel Myles and Steve Martinez to their former positions of employment because they had engaged in a protected strike.

29 April 1987

ORDER DENYING MOTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 20 March 1985 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding.[1]

On 18 September 1986 the Respondent filed with the Board a motion to reconsider and a brief in support of the motion. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed replies.

The Board has considered the Respondent's motion and brief and the General Counsel's and the Charging Party's replies and has decided to deny the Respondent's motion to reconsider for the following reasons.

In the decision reported at 274 NLRB 1053, the Board adopted the judge's findings that the Respondent had violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) in operating its hiring hall in a discriminatory manner. The Board ordered the Respondent to make whole the named Charging Party, Kenneth Quinnell Sr., as well as "all other job applicants similarly situated for any loss of earnings they may have suffered . . . by reason of the discrimination practiced against them." The Respondent, in its motion to reconsider, requests the Board to reconsider its decision in this case and to delete from its Decision and Order the make-whole relief for "all other job applicants similarly situated." In support of its motion, the Respondent relies on recent Board decisions in Laborers Local 426 (Building Contractors), 280 NLRB 610 (1986), and Laborers Local 158 (Contractors of Pennsylvania), 280 NLRB 1100 (1986). In their replies to the Respondent's motion, the General Counsel and the Charging Party agree with the Respondent that the language of the Board's Order should be narrowed and they request that the Board grant the Respondent's motion.

The judge in his decision in the underlying case initially rejected the Respondent's argument that the make-whole remedy should be limited only to the named Charging Party. In so doing, the judge found that the broad language of the complaint had placed the Respondent on notice concerning an allegation of unlawful discrimination against the Charging Party and other employees; that the matter had been fully and fairly litigated at the hearing; and that the evidence showed the Respondent had engaged in discrimination against the Charging Party and other applicants for referral because of the length of their union membership, or because of other arbitrary reasons not based on objective criteria and standards, and that the Respondent had failed to use objective consistent criteria not based on union membership in the referral of applicants. On these facts and findings, the judge thus found that an order, as sought by the General Counsel extending make-whole relief to the Charging Party and other similarly situated employees, was appropriate in light of Board precedent, including Plumbers Local 198 (Jacobs/Wiese), 268 NLRB 1312 (1984). He also found this case, on these same findings and facts, distinguishable from cases where the Board had granted a limited make-whole remedy. See, e.g., Longshoremen ILA Local 851 (West Gulf Maritime Assn.), 194 NLRB 1027 (1972).

In Building Contractors, the Board, relying on West Gulf Maritime Assn., found that a broad remedy providing make-whole relief to "applicants who were similarly discriminated against," in addition to the charging party, was inappropriate, in the absence of evidence that any employee other than the charging party had applied for work through the hiring hall and was denied referral, or was otherwise discriminated against in such a way as to have suffered a loss of earnings. The Board thus limited the remedy there to the charging party. The instant case is distinguishable from West Gulf Maritime Assn., and thus distinguishable from Building Contractors, because here the Board, in the underlying proceeding, adopted the judge's conclusion that there is evidence that other employees sought referrals and "were subjected by the Respondent to an evaluation of an arbitrary and unlawful criteria." 274 NLRB at 1060.

In Contractors of Pennsylvania, the Board adopted the judge's recommendation that certain individuals named in the complaint and found to have been discriminated against because of their intraunion political and protected concerted activities be granted a make-whole remedy. However, the Board found the judge's inclusion in the make-whole order of unnamed individuals who "may have been discriminated against" to be overly broad and deleted that portion of the remedy. In so doing, the Board noted that it has ordered remedial relief to unnamed individuals similarly situated to named discriminatees in situations where there is evidence of discrimination against a defined and easily identified class. Noting the difficulties of establishing what constitutes a political dissident within a union, the Board found that the discriminatees in Contractors of Pennsylvania did not establish a class of individuals or that discrimination on a classwide basis had occurred. The Board thus found there that it was necessary to establish evidence of discrimination against each individual and that, in the absence of such evidence, a broad make-whole order was inappropriate.

By contrast, in the instant case, the judge found there was evidence that a number of individuals had applied to the hiring hall and were subjected to discriminatory criteria regarding referral. Thus, unlike Contractors of Pennsylvania, the judge's findings showed discrimination, together with the existence of identifiable employees who were discriminatorily treated. Thus, this case is distinguishable from Contractors of Pennsylvania. As there is no basis for deleting the language regarding similarly situated employees from the Board's original Decision and Order, the Respondent's motion to reconsider is denied.[2] Accordingly,

IT IS ORDERED that the Respondent's motion to reconsider is denied.

[2] The concerns raised by the General Counsel in she reply are properly a matter for compliance. Thus, if the General Counsel is unable to identify any particular individuals other than the Charging Party who have suffered a loss of earnings as a result of discrimination by the Respondent, she may close the case once the Charging Party has been made whole and the requirements of subpars. 2(b) through (f) of the Order have been satisfied.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by the Union 12 March 1984 and an amended charge filed 11 April 1984, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 21 October 1986 against the Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charges and complaint, the Company has failed to file an answer.[1]

On 26 February 1987 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 2 March 1987 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Company filed no response. The allegations in the motion are therefore undisputed.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed "all the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." Further, the undisputed allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment disclose that the Regional Office, by letters dated 10 November 1986 and 28 January 1987 and sent by certified mail, notified the Company that unless an answer was received immediately, a Motion for Summary Judgment would be filed.[2]

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a Maryland nonprofit corporation, operates a residential facility for teenaged boys in Frostburg, Maryland, where it annually derives gross revenues in excess of $250,000. We take official notice of the Board's previous assertion of jurisdiction with respect to the Company.[3] We find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

At all times material, William Platter has been the Respondent's excutive director. As such, Platter is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and an agent of the Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(13) of the Act.

About 6 November 1983 Platter attempted to discourage employees' activities on behalf of the Union by suggesting they resign, threatening them with discharge, telling them they were to blame for the poor financial condition of the Respondent, and telling them they were irreligious because of their union activities. About 10 November 1983 Platter threatened employees with reduction of their benefits and services for clients and possible furloughs because of their union activities. About 27 October 1983 the Respondent discharged employee Terry Galica and about 1 December 1983 discharged employee John Footen because they joined, supported, or assisted the Union, and engaged in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Based on the above, we find that Platter's statements to employees relating to their union activities violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. We further find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging employees Galica and Footen for their union and protected concerted activities.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By coercively suggesting to employees that they resign, threatening employees with discharge, telling employees they were to blame for the Respondent's poor financial condition, telling employ-

[1] On 30 October 1986 the complaint, which was served by certified mail, was returned to the Regional Office by the Postal Service. The unopened envelope containing the complaint indicated that delivery had been refused.

[2] The Respondent refused delivery of these letters. In addition, a Board agent visited the residence of the Respondent's executive director, William Platter, and, receiving no response at the door, affixed to the door a copy of the Regional Office's 28 January 1987 letter to the Respondent. The Regional Office received no response to this service.

[3] 280 NLRB 678 (1986) (Chairman Dotson dissenting).

The Respondent's refusal to accept delivery of certified mail should not serve to defeat the purposes of the Act. Michigan Expediting Service, 282 NLRB 210 (1986).

ees they were irreligious because of their union activities, and threatening employees with reduction of their benefits and services for clients and possible furloughs, the Company has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discriminatorily discharging employees Terry Galica about 27 October 1983 and John Footen about 1 December 1983, the Company violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1).

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent, having discriminatorily discharged two employees, must offer them reinstatement and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of discharge to the date of a proper offer of reinstatement, less any net earnings as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). We deny as unnecessary the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial provision.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Long Stretch Youth Home, Inc., Frostburg, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against any employee for engaging in union activity or concerted activity for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

(b) Coercively suggesting to employees that they resign, threatening employees with discharge, telling employees they are to blame for the Company's poor financial condition, telling employees they are irreligious because of their union activities, and threatening employees with reduction of their benefits and services for clients and possible furloughs.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Terry Galica and John Footen immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Frostburg, Maryland, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

In accord with my dissent in Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986), I would not exercise the Board's jurisdiction over the Respondent.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against any of you for your activities on behalf of Maryland State Employees Council 92, AFSCME, AFL–CIO, or any other union, or for your concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

WE WILL NOT coercively suggest that you resign, threaten you with discharge, tell you that you are to blame for the Company's poor financial condition, tell you that you are irreligious because of your union activities, or threaten you with reduction of your benefits and services for clients and possible furloughs.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Terry Galica and John Footen immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to their discharge and that the discharge will not be used against them in any way.

Commercial Contracting Company of San Antonio, Inc. and Alfred Atkins. Case 10–CA–21930

29 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 2 February 1987 Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Commercial Contracting Company of San Antonio, Inc., Maryville, Tennessee, its officers agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

E. Walter Bowman III, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Courtney N. Pearre, Esq. (Heiskell, Donelson, Bearman, Adams, Williams & Kirsch), of Knoxville, Tennessee, for the Respondent.
Alfred Atkins, pro se.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Knoxville, Tennessee, on 3 December 1986.[1] The charge was filed by Alfred Atkins (Atkins) 11 August, and the complaint was issued 15 October alleging that Commercial Contracting Company of San Antonio, Inc. (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by laying off and thereafter failing and refusing to reinstate Atkins allegedly because of his union or protected concerted activity. The primary issue presented is whether Respondent selected Atkins for layoff in order to avoid his appointment to the position of union steward. I find that it did.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Texas corporation with an office and place of business located at Maryville, Tennessee, where it is engaged in business as a construction contractor. Respondent, during the calendar year preceding issuance of the complaint, purchased and received at its Maryville, Tennessee facility materials and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Tennessee. The complaint alleges, Respondent in its answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint further alleges, Respondent also admits, and I further find that the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 519 (the Union) is, and has been at all material times, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Material Facts

Respondent at the time of the hearing performed construction work at the Aluminum Company of America plant at Alcoa, Tennessee. Respondent has maintained a work presence at this particular site since about 1977 except for 9 months during 1983. The various craft employees utilized by Respondent on its jobs are represented by local craft unions affiliated with the Knoxville Building and Construction Trades Council and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 519 (Local 519).

Respondent is signatory to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Trades Council and Local 519 effective from 3 July 1984 through 30 June 1989. The agreement provides for an exclusive hiring hall requiring that Respondent secure new employees from the respective craft unions and only when the unions are unable to supply qualified applicants within 48 hours of Respondent's request may Respondent then secure employees from any other source. Further, the agreement specifically provides at article 18.12 that seniority shall not be recognized or applied to employees working on projects under the agreement. A final provision pertinent to the case sub judice is found at article 16 relating to union representation. Thus, article 16.2 provides for the appointment of union stewards on the job as the unions' representatives while article 16.5 provides that, "when employees are laid off, the job steward will be the last man laid off provided he is capable of satisfactorily performing the work remaining."

Atkins is, and has been since May 1973, a member of Local 519. From Respondent's records, it appears that Atkins was initially employed by Respondent 2 weeks in 1978. He was subsequently employed by Respondent on three separate occasions with the last period of employment beginning on 1 November 1985.[2] During his last period of employment, Atkins worked as a truckdriver hauling construction materials and personnel around the jobsite. For most of this period, he was one of only two such drivers, the other being Carl Johnson, the designated steward for Local 519.

Atkins testified that he was told by Johnson in December 1985 that Johnson was contemplating retiring in February. Atkins looking toward his own retirement and pension eligibility some 9 years down the road, and seeking to enhance his job security by the privileges extended stewards under the bargaining agreement to be laid off last from a job, expressed his interest in the steward's position to Ted Porter, Local 519's business agent, in February. According to Atkins, Porter agreed to designating Atkins as the steward on Johnson's retirement.

Johnson continued to work past his contemplated February retirement, however, and Atkins likewise continued to work. In the meantime, in late April Atkins complained to Johnson about some of the other crafts doing some of the truckdriving, and asserted that Johnson was not able to perform his share of the work so that Respondent needed to hire an additional driver. Johnson, according to Atkins, agreed to take the matter up with Project Manager Moore. A few hours later, Moore approached Atkins on the jobsite and stated that he had heard Atkins had been "bitching and complaining." Atkins related what he had told Johnson and added that Johnson was about "75 percent dead" in performing his duties. Further, Atkins testified he told Moore that he had been offered the steward's job "as quick as Johnson retired" and when he became steward he "would look after those type of things more than Carl did." Atkins testified that although Moore made no response to Atkins' assertion about becoming a steward, he had a "very unpleasant look on his face."

Respondent did hire an additional driver, Melvin R. Owens, on 13 May contemporaneous with Respondent's startup of a second shift. However, Atkins was assigned to that second shift. Atkins complained that his assignment interfered with certain of his nonjob-related commitments, and after a few days he was restored to the day shift with Owens taking the second shift.

On 9 July, Atkins was the only driver laid off in a reduction in force. Shocked over his selection and Owens' retention, Atkins telephoned Moore and asked to leave work early so that he could consult with Local 519 about his layoff. Moore granted him permission to leave. The record does not reflect what, if any, complaints Atkins made to the Union after leaving work early. In any event, however, Atkins telephoned Moore at Moore's home on Saturday, 12 July. Atkins testified that he asked Moore why he was laid off and Moore complained about Atkins' attitude saying Atkins would have to change it. However, still according to Atkins, Moore never explained the attitude complaint, and instead stated that when "you didn't want somebody to become steward you laid them off before they made steward." Further, Moore added twice that he knew it was dirty the way "we done you."

Following Atkins' layoff Respondent on 19 August hired two new employees through the Union, Randall Stooksbury and Jess O'Dell. Respondent also requested the referral by name of an additional employee, Thomas Vanosdale. The General Counsel relies on Business Agent Porter's testimony to argue that the July layoff was unnecessary and therefore pretextual because Respondent requested Vanosdale's referral within a week of Atkins' layoff. However, I view Porter's testimony as too vague to establish exactly when Respondent asked that Vanosdale be referred. It is clear that when Vanosdale was initially referred, the referral was withdrawn when Porter learned of it and insisted that a referral could not be made by name request. However, Vanosdale was subsequently employed by Respondent later on 22 August after it appeared that there were no other qualified drivers on the referral list ahead of him. Respondent's records reflect that Johnson retired on 29 August. Owens became the steward. Based on Moore's testimony, at least two additional drivers, Calloway and Zachery, were referred to Respondent by the Union at some point in time after Atkins' layoff. The record does not reflect, however, exactly when they were hired.

B. Respondent's Position

Respondent's position on Atkins' layoff was related primarily through Moore who was supported by the testimony of Respondent's project superintendent Darryl Humpke and Ironworker General Foreman Herbert Minton. Moore testified that most of Respondent's major contract work had been completed on the job by early July, and alleged additional work on the job was being acquired sporadically, Respondent's need for drivers was reduced at the time of Atkin's layoff. Moreover, Moore related that around 9 July he noticed on various occasions a driver or two sitting around idle. Moore discussed what he observed with Humpke, Minton, and Bill Bert, another superintendent on the job, who recommended that they lay off one teamster. Respondent was not bound by seniority so Moore elected to lay off Atkins rather than Owens. Atkins was selected, Moore testified, because he had gotten somewhat "cranky." Moore explained that when asked to do something, Atkins would ask where Owens was or if Johnson could not do the job. Atkins would also complain that Johnson was not carrying his share of the load. Minton testified that he recommended Atkins be laid off because he felt Owens was better qualified and because Atkins, when told to do something, would inquire where the other driver was. Further, Atkins would question ironworkers under Minton about who issued the order when they would ask him to do something. Humpke's testimony was generally in accord with that of Moore and Minton.

Minton and Humpke specifically denied the union activity of Atkins was a consideration in their respective recommendation of his selection for layoff. Humpke testified further that Atkins had never complained to him about a violation of work rules or bias on the part of Respondent against the Union. No evidence was presented to reflect that Atkins was a chronic grievance filer or that he had filed any grievances in the past.

Moore acknowledged that he had a lengthy telephone conversation initiated by Atkins on 12 July. Moore testified, however, that in that conversation he only told Atkins he had been selected for layoff because he had become cranky and ornery and was not doing the work as well as Owens. Moore could not recall any reference to the steward's position in the conversation. Moore conceded on cross-examination that he did not particularly want Atkins back. He further conceded that during one referral request, he asked the union representative, whose name was not specified, what Atkin's status was and he was told that Atkins was far enough down the list that he would not be referred at that time.

C. Conclusions

The General Counsel argues that the 9 July layoff was pretextual and not economicaly motivated. I find the record does not suggest that Respondent's decision to have a layoff of a driver was based on any consideration unlawful under the Act. The testimony of Moore on the status of Respondent's work at the time of the layoff was not contradicted. And I have already found the evidence insufficient to establish a request by Respondent for Vanosdale's referral was made anytime near the layoff. That Respondent did not need three drivers at the time of the layoff is supported circumstantially by the fact that it apparently operated between 9 July and 19 August with only two drivers. Accordingly, I conclude the decision for a layoff was not pretextual and only Respondent's selection of Atkins for the layoff is in issue, and only if this selection was based on reasons prohibited by the Act can it be said that Respondent violated the Act.

It is undisputed that Respondent had the right under the collective-bargaining agreement to ignore seniority in making its layoff selection. It was therefore entitled to make a selection on the basis of any lawful criteria such as job qualifications or past job performance. It could not under the Act, however, make a selection based on any anticipation that Atkins would be designated a union steward, for the occupation of the position of union steward and the proper performance of stewards' duties is protected under the Act as a legitimate union activity. Discrimination based on designation as a steward is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. See John P. Bell & Sons, Inc., 266 NLRB 607 (1983). Union animus is inherent in such discrimination.

In cases such as the instant one turning on employer motivation in actions adversely affecting employees, it is incumbent on the General Counsel to establish a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's action. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). Once a prima facie case is established, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the same actions would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct. In the instant case, evidence of Respondent's unlawful motivation is found in Atkins' testimony of Moore's telephone remarks on 12 July. If Atkins is credited, the General Counsel's prima facie case is established.

As a witness, Atkins appeared smug and almost arrogant. His responses to questions were frequently expansive and sometimes indirect, particularly on cross-examination. However, his testimony regarding the remarks attributed to Moore was deliberate, emphatic, and consistent with his written statement given the Board during the investigation of the case. I could detect no insincerity in him. Moore's testimony was delivered in a calm manner and he displayed no outward manifestations of prevarication. His recollection, however, of the remarks in the conversation with Atkins on 12 July was abbreviated although he admitted the conversation was a lengthy one. What is most significant, however, is that Moore did not specifically deny the remarks Atkins attributed to him and only generally testified that he could not recall anything in reference to the steward's position.[3] In view of this absence of specific denial, I find the testimony of Atkins fully credible on Moore's 12 July remarks.

The accuracy of Atkins' testimony and the absence of a legitimate basis for his layoff selection is circumstantially supported by the failure or inability of Respondent's witnesses to detail specific deficiencies in Atkins' job performance or identify specific instances of Atkins' attempts to avoid work assignments. For the most part, the testimony of Moore, Humpke, and Minton on Atkins' performance was vague, generalized, and conclusionary. Moreover, there is no evidence that any warnings or reprimands were ever issued to Atkins or any other disciplinary action taken against him in connection with any of the work deficiencies or attitude problems now claimed by Respondent. Humpke did specify one instance in 1985 when he talked to Atkins for 45 minutes in the cab of his truck due to Atkins not wanting to take the "semi" to get a trailer in the absence of a direct order from Humpke. The incident fails to be convincing as a consideration in Atkins' layoff selection because it occurred more than 7 months prior to the layoff without any evidence of a repetition of the incident. Moreover, and in any event, Atkins on rebuttal emphatically and, I find, credibly denied Humpke's testimony on this matter.

Crediting Atkins' testimony establishes the General Counsel's prima facie case that Respondent selected Atkins for layoff because of his anticipated future designation as a job steward for Local 519. In view of Respondent's failure to establish Atkins' claimed job deficiencies and in light of Owens' comparative inexperience

[3] Moore had expressed this lack of recall earlier in a letter of position to the Board investigator dated 10 September in which he stated, "Furthermore, I do not recall making a statement to that effect that [Atkins] was let go before he became a union steward."

as a truckdriver in the construction industry,[4] it cannot be said that Respondent has proved that Atkins would have been selected for layoff even in the absence of his anticipated designation as union steward. Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act as alleged in the selection of Atkins for layoff on 9 July.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Commercial Contracting Company of San Antonio, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 519 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By laying off its employee Alfred Atkins on 9 July 1986 because of his anticipated future designation as the union steward for Local 519, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. The unfair labor practice set forth in paragraph 3 above affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having discriminatorily laid off Alfred Atkins, it must offer him reinstatement and make whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from the date of layoff to the date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[5] Consistent with the Board's decision in Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982), it will also be recommended that Respondent be required to remove from its records and files any reference to the unlawful layoff of Atkins and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful layoff will not be used in connection with future personnel action against him.[6]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

The Respondent, Commercial Contracting Company of San Antonio, Inc., Maryville, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Laying off or otherwise discriminating against any employee due to his or her anticipated designation as union steward by Intenational Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 519, or any other labor organization.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Alfred Atkins immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful layoff of Atkins and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the layoff will not be used against him in future personnel actions.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facilities in Maryville, Tennesse, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[4] Porter testified that Owens had only a few weeks of construction site driving experience prior to his referral by the Union to Respondent. Porter stated the difference between an over-the-road freight driver and a construction driver was equivalent to the "difference in day and night." However, although Porter conceded that he could not say that Owens was not qualified for Respondent's driving work, he related that he could not be more qualified than Atkins or any other driver employed by Respondent.

[5] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[6] The General Counsel's brief contains a request for a visitatorial provision in the remedy. However, no specific circumstances warranting the inclusion of such a provision on the facts of this case were cited. Accordingly, and because the Board does not include such provisions in the absence of specific justification (see, e.g., O. L. Willis, Inc., 278 NLRB 203 (1986)), I shall not recommend the inclusion of such a provision here.

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT layoff or otherwise discriminate against any of you in anticipation of your selection or designation as a union steward by International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 519, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Alfred Atkins immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify him that we have removed from our files any reference to his discharge and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

COMMERCIAL CONTRACTING COMPANY OF SAN ANTONIO, INC.

Greenwood Trucking, Inc. and George C. Hartsell.
Case 17–CA–12976

29 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 13 January 1987 Administrative Law Judge Bernard Ries issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Greenwood Trucking, Inc., Greenwood, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Member Johansen, who did not participate in Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882 (1986), agrees with the result.

Lyn R. Buckley, Esq., for the General Counsel
William C. Martucci, Esq. (Spencer, Fane, Britt & Browne), of Kansas City, Missouri, for the Respondent.

DECISION

BERNARD RIES, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried in Kansas City, Kansas, on 8 September 1986,[1] on a charge filed on 16 May and a complaint issued on 27 June. The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act about 28 April by refusing to continue the employment of Charging Party George C. Hartsell and his wife Dorothy. The answer denies material allegations of the complaint.

Briefs have been filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent. Having carefully considered the transcript of proceedings, the exhibits, the briefs, and my recollection of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations.

I. THE FACTS

Greenwood Trucking, Inc. is located in Greenwood, Missouri, where its trucks and drivers haul loads of materials for other businesses. The firm was formed in February 1984 by David E. Pemberton, who also runs a truck repair business and has other employment, and Herbert L. Wagner. In the spring of 1986, the two decided to terminate their relationship, which at that time nominally owned 10 trucks (1 of which was not operational).

Two of Greenwood's drivers at the time were George C. Hartsell, the senior employee of the concern, and his wife Dorothy, who began driving as a team with George around the end of February. The record shows that some runs were driven by teams and others by single drivers, but does not show precisely how many drivers were teamed and how many not. We know, for example, that the Peterbilt truck was driven by the Hartsells, who were succeeded by the Jordans, also a married couple; and Respondent Exhibit 4 shows that, like the Hartsells and the Jordans, drivers Paddock and Alsup together made the run from Lenexa, Kansas, to Reno, Nevada, and back. On the other hand, the two trucks used to fulfill the Bones Transportation contract were driven by single drivers.

The Hartsells drove a regular weekly run from Lenexa to Reno, carrying J.C. Penney goods under contract with National Transportation and Delivery Service (NTDS), a Georgia firm; four other Greenwood trucks, presumably driven by two drivers each, made the same 3200-mile run every week.

The first oral divorce agreement between Pemberton and Wagner provided for a 50–50 division of the equipment (and the drivers), and the agreement was so announced to most of the employees in March or early April, along with an invitation to the drivers to go to work for whichever ex-partner "you want to work with." When Hartsell was informed of this on the following day, having just returned from a trip, he told Pemberton and Wagner, in the words of the former, that "him and Herb had built a good friendship and he hoped there was no hard feelings and he wanted to go with Herb." Pemberton responded, "Fine, no problem whatsoever."[2]

When Wagner and Pemberton delved into the financial realities, however, they ultimately agreed, on 20 April, to what the record refers to as a 70–30 split, with Pemberton on the long end. Actually, Wagner got only two operable trucks and one truck "too old to put out on the road," and he took the two drivers who, having been qualified by the Bones Company to drive dump trucks, had been operating those trucks under the Bones contract. Because Wagner did not need the Hartsells' services, accordingly, and because Pemberton required a driver team to operate the run that the Hartsells had been driving, the obviously logical arrangement would have been for the Hartsells to continue driving the Peterbilt from Lenexa to Reno and back, working for Pemberton instead of the preferred Wagner. Matters did not so eventuate; on 28 April, the Hartsells were denied further employment by Pemberton, who continued operating as Greenwood Trucking, Inc.

This case puts in issue the motivation for that denial. The General Counsel contends that it was provoked by the Hartsells' engagement in concerted activity protected by Section 7 of the Act. Respondent argues that Pemberton simply believed that Hartsell did not care to work for him, and was not told otherwise by Hartsell until he had already hired replacement drivers for the Hartsells.

The relevant background follows. In the early part of 1986, some of the salary checks paid to drivers by Greenwood were returned for insufficient funds. The dissatisfied drivers, Hartsell testified, discussed the problem with one another. On 11 April, Hartsell deposited four salary checks for him and his wife and, while in Reno, received a call from his daughter in Missouri that three of the checks had again bounced. He talked the problem over with his wife and then called Pemberton's wife, who served as the Company's payroll clerk; she told him that Greenwood was not receiving payments on time from NTDS, which accounted for the insufficient funds. After further discussion with Dorothy, Hartsell called his attorney in Kansas, who offered little immediate relief. Then the Hartsells decided that he should call Lamar Jones, the NTDS traffic manager in Atlanta, a man he often contacted while on the road about routine problems. He repeated to Jones what Pemberton's wife had asserted, and Jones denied that NTDS was behind in its payments to Greenwood. Hartsell also told Jones that there were "some other problems" at Greenwood as well,[3] and when Jones said that NTDS was considering changing contractors, Hartsell made a pitch to shift NTDS' business to Wagner.

This call was made on 18 April; the Hartsells returned to Kansas on Sunday, 20 April. He testified that he did not visit or contact the dispatching office before he left again for Reno on 22 April, because he was "pre-dispatched," as usual, to leave Lenexa at 3 p.m. on that date from the J. C. Penney warehouse, and it was not uncommon, unless the driver needed to pick up a paycheck or anything else, to simply keep the truck with him. Pemberton challenged this testimony, saying that the Hartsells reported in as usual to present their bills prior to leaving again for Reno.[4]

According to Hartsell, it was approximately 19 April (probably 20 or 21 April) that he learned from other drivers that the split was to be 70–30, and not 50–50, but he admittedly made no effort to ask Pemberton while in Kansas between 20–22 April if the latter intended to employ him, he simply assumed that there "would be a reevaluation and people would be reassigned to a truck," with him, the senior driver, and his wife presumably continuing to drive the Peterbilt for Pemberton. The Hartsells loaded the truck on Tuesday, 22 April, drove to Reno, and did not return to Kansas until the evening of Sunday, 27 April, having stayed over a day in Reno. The following morning, Hartsell received a call at home to bring the truck into the shop to get an oil sample analyzed before they left town again.

When Hartsell arrived, however, Pemberton told him to remove his equipment from the truck. Hartsell quotes himself as saying that, the split not having gone 50–50, "I still need a job." Pemberton allegedly replied that he did not have a "damn thing" for the Hartsells, and went on to say, "I am not happy with the events of the last few days and you calling Lamar at NTDS and telling them that my checks were no good." Pemberton then handed Hartsell a cashier's check payable to both Hartsells in the full amount he owed them, including the trip they had just finished.

The record shows that on 17 April, a married couple named Jordan filed applications with Pemberton as a driving team. They were not, however, hired on that date. Pemberton testified that he often received applications for positions and that he kept these applications on file; the evidence suggests that Respondent experiences a good deal of turnover, in that three drivers who worked for Greenwood no longer were employed at the time they testified. The record also shows that in his direct testimony, Pemberton stated that on the morning of 21 April, he received a call from one Chuck Davis of NTDS, who said that "the drivers had been calling and saying that our checks were bouncing and wanted to know what the problem was"; he could not recall for sure that Davis had named any particular driver; rather, "he said all of them had been calling." On cross-examination, however, Pemberton conceded that he "knew that George Hartsell had called NTDS regarding back [sic] checks," and, expanding on his testimony on direct,[5] he agreed that, on 28 April, he had referred to the fact that Hartsell had "called NTDS about loads for Chris and about the insufficient funds checks." As one of the two affidavits in evidence given by Pemberton show, he had learned of this call from speaking to Lamar Jones, not Chuck Davis.

The basic thrust of the affidavits is that Pemberton had just assumed, after the 70–30 split came about, that Hartsell would not be working for him because "George did not like me and did not want to drive for me." Despite Hartsell's testimony at the hearing that he had thought of Pemberton as a "friend," one senses that this was not so, and that Hartsell, like most of the other drivers, would have preferred employment with Wagner.[6] Nonetheless, Pemberton's affidavit of 9 June states, "the call to Lamar on the checks made no difference, it just put the icing on the cake" (and subsequently again states that "the call on the checks just put the icing on the cake").

[4] This conflict is potentially material. I was not particularly impressed by either Hartsell or Pemberton at the hearing. Hartsell testified that it was not unusual for a driver to take the truck home and not check in with the office if he was predispatched. Pemberton did not quite absolutely refute this: "Well, usually he always, brought the truck to the house and picked up their check—or, you know, brought the truck by and said they [sic] was nothing to do to it, we'd tell them to take it on home if there was nothing to do to it." Sound business practice would seem to suggest that the drivers would turn in their bills weekly, instead of waiting until they felt like it. On the other hand, as we shall see, after the following weekend, Pemberton called Hartsell at home to have him bring the truck in before it "leaves town again," which indicates that Hartsell might have been anticipated to do so without making contact with the office. Giving Respondent the benefit of the doubt, because it bases an argument on the issue, I would credit Pemberton.

[5] There, Pemberton had simply said that when Hartsell stated that he would like to work for Pemberton, the reply was that Pemberton had "thought you wasn't going to work for me, you've indicated to the other drivers and me and everybody that you absolutely didn't want to work for me," and that he had, consequently, hired replacements for the Hartsells. He had not referred on direct, as he did on cross, to any conversation with Hartsell on 28 April about his talk with Lamar Jones.

Other witnesses for the General Counsel indicated that Pemberton considered the call to weigh even more heavily. Former co-owner Wagner quoted Pemberton as having said, on 25 April, that "NTDS had called and said that George called them and said they had been getting some bad payroll checks. And as far as he was concerned he didn't need George any more. Asked me if I wanted to get rid of him. I told Dave that I no longer had any decision over what his trucks done."[7]

Wagner also testified to another conversation, of uncertain date but after the corporate breakup, in which Pemberton had said, "[I]f George had kept his mouth shut, he'd probably still have his job." Hartsell denied only by implication, but not directly, that these two conversations had occurred.

Daniel Paddock, who left Respondent's employment prior to the hearing, testified in like vein. He said that soon after the Hartsells were let go, Pemberton told him that "he just could not see keeping [Hartsell] after what they had done, calling Atlanta and telling them about the loads and bad checks."[8] About 2 weeks later, Pemberton raised the issue with Paddock again, saying that "he couldn't keep [Hartsell], just couldn't see keeping him after what they had done . . . [c]alling to Atlanta and talking to Lamar about the hot loads and bad checks." Paddock further testified that he and others who had received worthless checks had also called Lamar Jones or possibly Chuck Davis at NTDS, a procedure that was not at all unusual for the drivers.

Robert Alsup had more along this line to contribute. A driver who had quit employment with Pemberton 2 months prior to the hearing because he did not like Pemberton "as an employer," Alsup said that he was present in the shop on Hartsell's last day when Pemberton told Hartsell "that he just didn't want George there anymore, couldn't use him, he was untrustworthy and he shouldn't have called Atlanta about the checks and gave him his last paycheck." Thereafter, in a conversation with Alsup (and in the presence of Alsup's wife), Pemberton stated that Hartsell "didn't do the right thing in calling Atlanta about the bad checks and he couldn't use George because of that reason, he was untrustworthy."

Finally, a fourth witness no longer in Greenwood's employ testified as to two conversations with Pemberton about a day apart, and while the Hartsells were still working there. In the first, according to Orlando Stroud, while he, Pemberton, and an auto mechanic were working in the shop, Pemberton said that "he was going to have to let George go because he felt like George had stabbed him in the back by calling Atlanta and telling Atlanta what he did, about the bad checks and all." A day or so later, he overheard Pemberton tell Wagner that "he was going to let George and Dorothy—let George go because of what he had done by calling Atlanta, talking to Atlanta about the checks."

With regard to the issue of the role played in Pemberton's dismissal of the Hartsells by the complaint to Atlanta about bad checks, the foregoing evidence is pretty potent stuff. The theme of Pemberton's defense is that he did not retain the Hartsells because he was sure that George Hartsell did not want to work for him.

His awareness of this attitude first arose after the announcement of the 50–50 split in March, when Hartsell gave up the opportunity to continue driving Respondent's "newest and finest piece of equipment" (Hartsell's words) in opting to work for Wagner. Further evidence of this dislike of Pemberton was, the latter asserts, disclosed in March when, disregarding Pemberton's standing orders, Hartsell had his truck washed on the road at a cost of $25.[9] The compensation of Hartsell for his $25 expense at least implies that Pemberton was not enraged by this expenditure, and for him to classify it as another expression by Hartsell of the latter's disdain for Pemberton seems to be stretching things quite a bit.

Pemberton also testified that after Hartsell had, in March, signified his preference for working for Wagner, he heard from drivers "that he wasn't going to work for me." Pemberton, after giving this testimony, specified only one such instance, in a less positive exposition of Hartsell's sentiments: "[L]ike Charla and Pat, they come and told me what he said out there, you know, that he didn't want to work for me, that he wasn't taking no off me [sic], and that he wanted to work with Herb." Charla Farmer, who with her husband drove one of the trucks, [6] Orlando Stroud, a witness for the General Counsel, testified on cross-examination that Hartsell "wasn't fond of working for Mr. Pemberton . . . because he started getting the bad checks, none of us were," but I suspect that the dislike arose earlier.

[7] Pemberton testified that sometime around 24–26 April, he asked Wagner "if it was alright to go ahead and put the [Jordans] in the truck whenever they got back in" (the Jordans were, evidently, temporarily not in town) and that Wagner said it made no difference to him. On recall, Wagner denied that Pemberton had ever talked to him about the Jordans. I doubt that Pemberton spoke to Wagner about the Jordans because the division of the corporation, if not already consummated by then, was on the brink of happening.

[8] The "loads" referred to by Paddock, also later characterized by him as "hot loads," is basically an "unauthorized load by NTDS," although Paddock "couldn't tell you what those loads were, because I never hauled any of them."

[9] This is a rather complicated matter. Hartsell testified that he and Pemberton had agreed that if he drove "illegal" through Wyoming—that is, purchased only a one-way license—he could use the saving of $23.59 to have the truck washed, and that he did so. Respondent, however, put in evidence documents that appear to show that the Hartsells paid for Wyoming permits both ways on a 3/19–24/86 (R. Exh. R-1A) trip to Reno, and that they also had the truck washed on that trip.

There is, however, room for contention that the documents are patched together, the Wyoming-to-Utah permit being dated perhaps "3/10/86" instead of 3/20 (as Respondent claims) coupled with a return voucher dated 3/22 from the trip on which the truck was washed. It is true that a "Travel Expense Report" for this trip shows that the Hartsells paid for Wyoming licenses both ways, but that was probably such a standard entry that it would have seemed strange to deviate from it, especially if this report was submitted to NTDS. Moreover, Respondent in fact reimbursed Hartsell for the $25 for the wash job despite the claim that he violated instructions by having it done. It would seem surprising that he would be reimbursed had he so defiantly violated Pemberton's instructions.

testified that she and her husband had a discussion with Hartsell soon after the announcement of the original split in which he said that he "didn't like working with Dave" and "they were going to go with Herb." The Farmers thereafter talked to Pemberton about the split, but, with respect to Hartsell, she merely testified that Pemberton had "told us that George had also told him that he was going with Herb." Thus, Farmer failed to support any claim that drivers told Pemberton bluntly that the Hartsells were not "going to work for me."

The Jordans, who applied for work on 17 April, had been referred by the Farmers. Pemberton testified that he told them that he "could not let them know anything until I knew for sure what was going to go on in the split." This explanation seems vulnerable. At the time, if Pemberton believed that the Hartsells would not work for him under any circumstances, then no matter how the breakup went (except in the most improbable case that Wagner, whose financial condition had led to the split, wound up with a larger share of the firm than Pemberton), he would need someone to take the Hartsells' place if he truly believed that they would not work for him. And indeed, when the final change in the split was agreed to on 20 April and the final papers were signed, according to Wagner on 23 or 24 April,[10] there is no evidence that Pemberton had made any effort to contact the Jordans to prepare to commence work on 28 April. This suggests not only that it was not until sometime in the last week in April that Pemberton heard from Lamar Jones about Hartsell's call to Jones (as earlier noted, it was on Friday, 25 April, that Pemberton told Wagner about the NTDS having called, and "as far as he was concerned he didn't need George any more"), but also that this call was a key ingredient in the last-moment decision to hire the Jordans.[11]

Respondent argues that if Pemberton was really upset about Hartsell's call to Atlanta, he could have let him go when (as I have, dubitante, found above), Hartsell reported to work prior to departing for his 22 April run. That argument ignores, however, that it does not appear that Pemberton heard about the telephone call until later in the week.

Perhaps the most difficult aspect of the case, from the General Counsel's point of view, arises from the question of why Pemberton should be so determinedly angry with the Hartsells about their inquiry to Atlanta when, according to the testimony, other drivers had also contacted Atlanta about the bad checks. Paddock said that he spoke to Lamar Jones about the rubber checks and, in a piece of hearsay testimony unobjected to, stated, "[W]e all did." Pemberton testified that on 21 April he received a call from Davis of NTDS in Atlanta that "all of [the drivers] had been calling" about the bad checks.

It could be, however, that Davis did not say to Pemberton, and Paddock did not know, that literally "all" the drivers had called (Pemberton could not remember whether Davis had identified "any particular driver"); or, possibly, a call to Davis was not as significant to Pemberton as a call to Lamar Jones. However, this distinction in treatment might be explained, what cannot be explained away is that Pemberton himself conceded at the hearing that the call to Jones "was just one of the many things that [Hartsell] had done that showed me that he didn't want to work for me," and his pretrial affidavit indicates that he spoke of the telephone call, and only the call, in his termination discussion with Hartsell on 28 April (". . . I do not think you done me right . . . you in [sic] and you asked about the loads for Chris, about the insufficient checks, trying to get NTDS contract with Herb."). It is thus apparent that the telephone call played a major role in the decision not to retain the Hartsells, and the credible testimony of Wagner, Paddock, Alsup, and Stroud all confirm this conclusion.[12]

The question of whether the refusal to continue the employment of the Hartsells constituted a violation of the Act depends on the application of two doctrines. The first concerns whether Hartsell's call to Lamar Jones constituted concerted protected activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, according to the broad outlines articulated by the Board in Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882 (1986) (Meyers II), and Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984) (Meyers I), remanded by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Prill v. NLRB, 755 F.2d 941 (1985). In Meyers I, at 497, the Board held that an employee will be found to have acted concertedly when he or she "acts with or on the authority of other employees," and, embracing Mushroom Transportation Co. v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 683, 685 (3d Cir. 1964), in Meyers II, the Board held that a conversation is statutorily concerted if it has "some relation to group action in the interest of employees." In the present case, we need go no further than the fact that in calling Jones to complain about the worthless checks, Hartsell was doing so both on his own behalf and, as Pemberton knew, on behalf of and "with" his wife, a fellow employee. Consumers Power Co., 282 NLRB 130 (1986).[13]

Moreover, the record makes it clear that the drivers, as would be expected, shared a common concern. the commonality of which each was undoubtedly aware, about the worthless checks. See Every Woman's Place, 282 NLRB 413 (1986), in which the Board found a matrix of "concerted activity" despite the fact, as Chair-

[10] Pemberton agreed with the 20 April date, but said that the signing took place on 30 April. The papers were not offered, and I have no way to choose between their recollections on this point.

[11] I do not accept Pemberton's testimony that, after 20 April, he was "under the impression" that the Hartsells were going to work for Wagner. He knew that Wagner was getting only three trucks out of the deal, that one of them was inoperative, and that the remaining two were being currently driven by drivers who had been qualified by the Bones Company as dump truck drivers.

[12] Although I had varying reactions to the trustworthiness of these four witnesses, I did not feel that any of them was lying; two of them, Wagner and Paddock, made particularly good impressions; and Pemberton did not directly deny any of their allegations about the inculpatory conversations to which they testified.

[13] Paddock testified that Pemberton told him "that he couldn't keep him, just couldn't be keeping him after what they had done." Stroud overheard Pemberton say to Wagner that he "was going to let George and Dorothy—let George go because of what he had done by talking to Atlanta about the checks." As the Board put it in Consumers Power Co., supra, I find "the conclusion inescapable" that when an employee complains about receipt of bad checks, a problem similarly experienced by his co-employee spouse, the employer knows that the two are acting in concert.

man Dotson pointed out in dissent, that the record was silent as to whether employee inquiries about overtime compensation had been made individually by employees to the supervisors or made jointly by them. Paddock demonstrated that mutual awareness when he testified that he knew that Hartsell had called about the paychecks and that "we all did. We was trying to find out what was going on." And, as noted above, Pemberton testified that Davis of NTDS had told him that the "drivers had been calling . . . and wanted to know what the problem is." It seems reasonable to infer, against such a background, that Pemberton understood that Hartsell's call was action taken to resolve a problem of joint and mutual concern to all the drivers, about which they undoubtedly had conferred on the receipt of the worthless wage payments.

Accordingly, I conclude that Hartsell's telephone call to Jones constituted concerted activity for the purpose of mutual aid, as delineated in Section 7 of the Act, both because it represented, as Pemberton knew, a complaint on behalf of George and Dorothy Hartsell and, in addition, a manifestation of the unhappiness unquestionably and vocally shared by other drivers in being deprived of their most valuable benefit.[14]

The second question is whether, having found that the call was a "motivating factor" in Pemberton's decision not to retain the Hartsells, the Respondent has satisfied the opportunity provided by Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), to "demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct."[15] As explained in Centre Property Management, 277 NLRB 1376, 1377 (1985), the burden entails "persuasion" by the employer of this hypothetical premise "by a preponderance of the evidence." I find nothing in this record, including the matter discussed in the preceding footnote, that persuades me that even absent Hartsell's complaint to NTDS about the bad checks, he and his wife would nonetheless have been denied employment by Pemberton. As Pemberton put it to Wagner, "[I]f George had kept his mouth shut, he'd probably still have his job."

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Greenwood Trucking, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce or an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. By terminating the employment of George and Dorothy Hartsell on 28 April 1986 for engaging in concerted activity protected under Section 7 of the Act, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The foregoing unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

The customary cease-and-desist order should be entered and the traditional notices should be posted. The General Counsel seeks the inclusion, as she has done in every case tried before an administrative law judge for many months now, of a visitatorial clause in the remedial order. Although the Board has never flatly rejected the possibility of adopting such a clause, it also has never adopted one. Its invariable response has been that such a clause is not appropriate "in the circumstances" of the case before it. E.g., E. B. Manning & Son, 281 NLRB 1124 at fn. 1 (1986); Princeton Holiday Inn, 282 NLRB 30 at fn. 2 (1986) (finding clause "unnecessary" even in absence of exceptions to it). Although the clause strikes me as benign and useful, clearly the Board does not favor it except, perhaps, in some highly unusual circumstance. This is not that sort of case.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully discharged George and Dorothy Hartsell on 28 April 1986, I shall recommend that it be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, and to make them whole for any net loss of earnings they may have suffered from 28 April 1986 to the date of Respondent's offers of reinstatement, with interest, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 615 (1977).[16]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[17]

ORDER

The Respondent, Greenwood Trucking, Inc., Greenwood, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees in circumstances that restrain or interfere with their right to engage in concerted activity for the purpose of mutual aid under Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights under the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to George and Dorothy Hartsell immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

[14] There is no way to be certain about the extent to which the "loads for Chris" and Hartsell's reference to Wagner taking over the NTDS contract played a part in Pemberton's decision. In describing the call in his second affidavit, Pemberton appeared to place sole reliance on the "bad checks" aspect of the call; he wrote, "The call to Lamar on the checks made no difference, it just put the icing on the cake"; and again, "[T]he call on the checks just put the icing on the cake."

[15] The Board stated in Wright Line that the causation analysis there set out must be applied in all cases alleging violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) or Sec. 8(a)(1) turning on employer motivation. Ibid.

[17] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Remove from its files any references to the discharges of George and Dorothy Hartsell on 28 April 1986, and notify them in writing that this removal has been made and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its place of business in Greenwood, Missouri, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[18] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against any employees in circumstances that restrain or interfere with their right to engage in concerted activity for the purpose of mutual aid under Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of their rights under the Act.

WE WILL offer George and Dorothy Hartsell immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs; WE WILL compensate them with interest for any net loss of pay they may have suffered because we terminated them; and WE WILL remove from our personnel files any reference to their 28 April 1986 discharges, and notify them of this action and of our intention not to rely on such discharges in future personnel actions.

Batesville Casket Company, Inc. and Hill-Rom Company, Inc., Employer-Petitioners and Furniture and Casket Workers Local Union No. 525, a/w United Steelworkers of America (Upholstery Division), AFL–CIO. Case 25–UC–137

30 April 1987

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 21 April 1986 the Regional Director for Region 25 issued a Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding in which he dismissed the instant unit clarification petition, which sought to separate the existing single unit of employees of the Batesville Casket Company, Inc. and Hill-Rom Company, Inc.,[1] represented by the Union at Batesville, Indiana, into two separate units. Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board's Rules and Regulations, the Petitioners filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's decision on the grounds, inter alia, that the Regional Director erred in his application of the principles set forth in Rock-Tenn Co., 274 NLRB 772 (1985), by failing to clarify the unit.

By unpublished order dated 18 July 1986, a three-member panel of the Board (Member Babson dissenting) granted the Petitioners' request for review with respect to that issue.[2] Thereafter, the Union filed a brief on review.[3]

The Board has considered the entire record in this case, including all submissions by the parties with respect to the issue under review, and makes the following findings.

In 1947, in Cases 11–R–1192 and 11–R–1198, the Board certified the Union as representative of all production and maintenance employees of Batesville Casket Company and Hill-Rom Company, combined into a single unit.[4] At that time, Batesville Casket (a manufacturer of burial caskets) had 235 employees, and Hill-Rom (a manufacturer of hospital room furniture) had 15 employees; their work "complex" consisted of 3 adjacent and interconnected buildings where space and equipment were shared. The three Hillenbrand brothers were each officers of both Companies, and G.C. Hillenbrand was responsible for all manufacturing operations. The Companies had common personnel and labor relations policies and shared administrative, accounting, and purchasing functions. In addition, the employees of each Company accrued unitwide seniority, frequently performed work on the other Company's product, and could bid into positions with either Company.

In the early 1950s, additional production buildings were constructed and the Companies' manufacturing functions were moved into separate buildings. There is no evidence of any day-to-day interchange of either employees or supervisors since that time, although, as will be discussed, "tranfers" or "moves" between the Companies are not infrequent. The Hillenbrand complex now includes three buildings containing Hill-Rom operations, two buildings containing Batesville Casket operations, and several additional buildings which are shared by the Companies, including an administration building, a medical facility, and a vehicle garage.

In the mid-1970s, the Companies established separate human resources (personnel) departments and, as with Hillenbrand's other subsidiaries, both now have separate boards of directors, officers, personnel managers, etc. At the time of the hearing in 1985, Hill-Rom employed 615 employees in Batesville, with additional production facilities located in Canada; Batesville Casket employed 575 employees in Batesville, with additional production locations in 3 other States.

Hillenbrand Industries prescreens all applications for employment at the main corporate office and acceptable applicants are referred to one or the other Company for interviews; the individual Companies then make the final decision as to selection or rejection of an applicant. Thereafter, discipline, termination, and promotion is handled by the individual Company. The Companies independently process grievances up to the third level, at which time the union grievance committee (consisting of one plant steward from each of the five manufacturing buildings) and Hillenbrand's senior counsel meet with the management of the particular Company involved. Decisions to proceed to arbitration

[1] Hereinafter referred to as Petitioners.

[2] The panel majority (Chairman Dotson and Member Babson) denied review of the Petitioners' contention that Batesville Casket Company, Inc. and Hill-Rom Company, Inc. are separate employers and hence cannot be compelled to engage in continued multiemployer bargaining. Member Johansen would have granted review of this issue; however, he regards himself as institutionally bound by the vote of the panel majority.

[3] By letter dated 24 July 1986, the Petitioners requested that their request for review be treated by the Board as their brief on review.

[4] In 1939, and again in 1947, the Board found that the Petitioners constituted a single employer and, based on the agreement of the unions and the Petitioners' failure to object (in 1939), and the agreement of the parties (in 1947), that the appropriate bargaining unit was one composed of employees of both Companies. See Batesville Casket Co., 72 NLRB 650 (1947); Hillenbrand Industries, 13 NLRB 167 (1939). See also Hillenbrand Industries, 14 NLRB 316 (1939).

In both instances, the Board expressly found that Hillenbrand Industries was a trade name designating Petitioners. Hillenbrand Industries was incorporated following the 1947 certification, and the Petitioners are presently two of its five wholly owned subsidiaries.

are made by the individual Company; however, Hillenbrand's counsel selects the arbitrators on behalf of management and generally tries any arbitration, although outside counsel also has been employed.

The record shows that an employee of one Company may apply for an opening at the other Company and, if hired, will be credited with overall seniority on completion of a probationary period. Similarly, although bumping is not permitted between these two employers, employees laid off by one of the two Companies may "move" to the other Company if there is an opening. After completing a probationary period, that employee will become a permanent employee with seniority rights carried over from the Company for which he originally worked. The evidence presented showed 23 such "transfers" or "moves" in the 6 months preceding the hearing alone.

The employees of Batesville Casket and Hill-Rom share similar pay scales, and many job classifications are common to both Companies. The average earnings of the employees at the two plants are approximately equal; employees receive identical Christmas bonuses and identical benefits, with the exception that Hill-Rom allows its employees to take vacation a day at a time if they desire while Batesville Casket does not. Plant and safety rules are issued by Hillenbrand and thus are identical for all of the production buildings, and employees from the two Companies participate together in Hillenbrand-sponsored social and athletic activities, as well as in union affairs and community events.

The parties have negotiated a series of consecutive contracts covering this bargaining unit over the past 50 years, and at no time prior to the instant proceeding has any party sought to modify or change the unit, even though Hillenbrand's vice president of human resources serves as spokesman of the Petitioners' bargaining committee, and Hillenbrand's senior counsel is a member of that committee as well.

The Regional Director dismissed the petition on the ground that the Board's clarification process is intended for recent and not historical changes. The Petitioners contend, however, that significant changes in the organizational structure and operations of the two Companies demonstrate that there is no longer any community of interest between the two groups of employees; thus, a combined unit of both Batesville Casket and Hill-Rom employees is no longer appropriate. Further, Petitioners contend that such changes need not be recent in order to justify the separation of the single unit into two separate units, relying on the Board's decision in Rock-Tenn.

It is well established that the Board's unit clarification process is not appropriate for upsetting an agreement of a union and an employer or an established practice of such parties concerning unit placement of various individuals or classifications.[5] The Board determined in Rock-Tenn, however, to clarify an existing multiplant unit to constitute two separate single-plant units when it found that "compelling circumstances" existed for disregarding the bargaining history on a two-plant basis, and that the historical unit no longer conformed reasonably well to the normal standards of appropriateness.[6]

In Rock-Tenn, the union had been representing a combined unit of employees working at a paper mill and a partition plant since the purchase of the plants by the Clevepak Corporation in 1968, and the parties had negotiated successive collective-bargaining agreements covering employees in the combined unit. During both the 1978 and 1980 negotiations, Clevepak proposed bargaining for the employees as separate plant units. On both occasions, the union rejected the proposals. After Clevepak sold the paper mill and the partition plant to separately incorporated operating divisions of Rock-Tenn Company in 1983, the two corporations jointly requested separate negotiations at each plant for a new contract. The union refused, and the companies filed the unit clarification petition.

The Board found that, at the time of the 1983 purchases, there were few remaining factors of commonality between the two plants. Thus, each plant was engaged in a totally different operation with different manufacturing processes, each plant had separate and distinct corporate management and supervisory staff, labor relations control had been completely decentralized, and grievances were handled separately. There were many dissimilarities in working conditions, including different hours of operation, separate hiring, no job bidding between plants, no carryover of seniority if an employee transferred, and separate layoff and recall policies. The collective-bargaining agreement was administered on a separate basis for each plant, and the Board noted that an ambiguous contract provision might be interpreted in one way in one plant and in an entirely different way in the other.

The Board concluded that the significant changes in the organizational structure and operations of the two plants negated any community of interest that may have existed previously among employees of the two plants, and constituted "compelling circumstances" for disregarding the bargaining history on a two-plant basis. Accordingly, the Board clarified the unit as requested by the companies to find that only separate plant units were appropriate. In so doing, the Board specifically noted that the Rock-Tenn corporations had acquired the plants "only recently," and although they continued to abide by the predecessor's collective-bargaining agreement for the "brief period" prior to its expiration, "shortly" after commencing operations they requested the union to bargain on a separate plant basis. Hence, the Board concluded that their "interim adoption" of the two-plant agreement did not preclude resolution of the dispute.[7]

Contrary to the Petitioners' contention that the Regional Director erred in his application of Rock-Tenn, we find that the Regional Director properly applied that case and other relevant Board precedent[8] to the facts of the instant case. Further, while in Rock-Tenn the Board adopted former Chairman Miller's concurring opinion in Columbia Gas,[9] neither that concurring opinion nor the Board's decision in Rock-Tenn indicated that the Board should or would interfere with the composition of long-established bargaining units in the absence of recent, substantial changes.

In the instant case, as in Rock-Tenn and Columbia Gas, there is no ambiguity or dispute regarding the parties' long history of collective bargaining in the combined unit. Unlike the situation in Rock-Tenn, however, here there have been no recent, significant changes in the Petitioners' operations, and at no time before the instant petition was filed did either party seek to modify the existing unit or split it into two units as Petitioners now contend is appropriate.

The record clearly shows that the only "significant" operational changes involving the existing unit were the establishment of separate manufacturing plants and elimination of day-to-day interchange of employees, which occurred nearly 30 years ago, and the creation of separate personnel or human resources departments, which occurred over 10 years ago. No party disputes these facts.[10] Further, the same employees continue to perform the same functions in the same locations under the same immediate supervision, and the changes have had no practical effect at all on several significant areas of personnel policy or labor relations because Hillenbrand Industries remains directly involved with screening all applicants and approving them for hire and with grievances and arbitrations on behalf of these two subsidiaries, as well as with the actual negotiation and execution of all collective-bargaining agreements.

In addition, the Companies have continued to negotiate as one with the Union as representative of their employees in a single combined unit, and successive agreements all have been agreed to on the same unit basis. Lastly, we note that, at this time, no party seeks an election among employees in the established unit or questions the status of the Union as the bargaining representative of the combined unit[11] or of either Company's work force.

We find that, although these two Companies function separately and autonomously in many respects, there continues to exist a high degree of commonality due to the relationship of the parent Company to its subsidiaries and the long history of bargaining as a combined unit. Thus, the great majority of the changes which the Petitioners rely on to support their request for separate plant units are not recent, having occurred over 30 years ago; it is obvious that such changes in no way have destroyed the stability of the bargaining relationship between these parties.

Accordingly, inasmuch as Petitioners have not shown that there have been recent, substantial changes in their operations, or that other compelling circumstances exist which would warrant disregarding the long-existing bargaining history of the two-plant unit, and as the single unit of Petitioners' employees is not contrary to the provisions of the Act, we find it would not further the Act's purpose of promoting industrial stability to clarify this established unit to constitute two separate units, merely because Petitioners now have asked us to do so. Accordingly, we affirm the Regional Director's dismissal of the instant petition.

ORDER

The Regional Director's dismissal of the petition is affirmed.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would grant the Employers' petition to clarify the existing two-plant unit to constitute two separate units. It is

[9] Former Chairman Miller stated that "[i]f the two units proposed . . . were shown to be appropriate units by our usual standards, and if the existing single unit had been rendered inappropriate by reason of organizational changes, I would grant the petition" for clarification. 213 NLRB at 112. He concurred in the result reached by the majority, however, as he found that the two separate units proposed by the Employer were not appropriate, and that the existing unit had been rendered appropriate by bargaining history.

[10] There is evidence, however, that the latter change, creation of separate human resources departments, resulted in little or no change in "labor policy" or "the procedure and process of collective-bargaining."

clear that the historical (combined) unit is no longer appropriate when measured against the Board's usual standards. Thus, Batesville Casket and Hill-Rom are now entirely separate Companies, each with its own board of directors, management, and supervisory hierarchy. Their manufacturing facilities and equipment are separate and distinct, and there is no interchange of employees or supervisors. Each Company has its own administrative and human resources (personnel) departments, and handles its own promotions, discipline, and termination. Grievances are handled within the separate Company up to the third level, and it is the individual Company that makes the decision whether to pursue a grievance to arbitration.

Contrary to the "recency of change" requirement, which my colleagues purport to enunciate today, the standard articulated by Chairman Miller in his concurrence in Columbia Gas Transmission Corp., 213 NLRB 111, 112 (1974), subsequently and specifically adopted by the Board as its standard, in Rock-Tenn Co., makes no mention of recency.[1] Thus, it is immaterial that the changes which occurred in this case are not recent. It is undisputed that these changes did take place, and that the separate corporate and operational structure of these Companies, together with the lack of functional intergration, the decentralization of labor policies, and the absence of employee interchange, have negated the community of interest which once existed between the employees of the Companies, and hence have rendered a combined unit inappropriate for purposes of meaningful and effective collective bargaining.

Section 9 of the Act mandates that the Board determine in each case what unit is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining. In my view, the majority is both abdicating this statutory responsibility and ignoring the realities of business and industry. Whether a single sudden or recent organizational change of enormous impact has occurred should be immaterial to the Board's consideration. The organizational result is the same regardless of whether the changes are sudden and recent or, instead, as in this case, evolved slowly over a longer period of time—the Board must take the case as it is presented and make its determination based on the facts before it.

Finally, I note that the decision in Rock-Tenn, changing Board policy, was announced barely a year before the instant petition was filed. Thus, I find it inappropriate to fault the Employers for not seeking to clarify sooner the historical and, in my view, now clearly inappropriate unit. Accordingly, as the two units proposed are shown to be appropriate units by the Board's usual standards, and as the existing single unit has been rendered inappropriate by reason of organizational changes,[2] I would grant the Employers' petition and clarify the unit into two separate, single-plant units, as requested.

[1] "If the two units proposed . . . were shown to be appropriate units by [the Board's] usual standards, and if the existing single unit had been rendered inappropriate by reason of organizational changes, [the Board should] grant the petition for clarification." 274 NLRB 772, 774 fn. 7 (1985).

30 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 23 May 1986 Administrative Law Judge Arline Pacht issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Local 2017, International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), Greenville, Michigan, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) by reprimanding members Beard, Luce, and Gardner because they filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board. We find that her analysis of the Respondent's motivation is consistent with Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. on other grounds 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), and Limestone Apparel Corp., 255 NLRB 722 (1981). See Mine Workers Local 2202 (Old Devon Corp.), 282 NLRB 106 (1986).

In considering the Respondent's Wright Line defense, Members Babson and Stephens do not rely on the judge's analysis under NLRB v. Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, 391 U.S. 418 (1968). In that case, no question of dual motive was presented. The union there acknowledged that it had expelled a member because the member had filed an unfair labor practice charge against the union. The question in Marine & Shipbuilding Workers was whether the union's action, standing alone, was justified for union institutional reasons. In the present case, by contrast, the Respondent denies that it reprimanded the three members for filing unfair labor practice charges and asserts instead that it reprimanded them because they divulged internal union matters to the Employer in violation of the Union's constitution. Because dual motives are ascribed to the Respondent here, Members Babson and Stephens find that a Wright Line analysis is appropriate and that a Marine & Shipbuilding Workers analysis is inapposite. Cf. Operating Engineers Local 381 (Building Trades Employers), 148 NLRB 679 (1964).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ARLINE PACHT, Administrative Law Judge. Based on charges filed on 28 May 1985, as amended on 2 July, a complaint issued on 23 July 1985 alleging that Local 2017, International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) (Respondent or Local 2017) violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by reprimanding the above-named Charging Parties because they filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board (the Board). The Respondent filed a timely answer denying it had violated the Act.

A trial was held before me in Grand Rapids, Michigan, on 18 February 1986. On the entire record and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Federal Mogul Corporation (the Employer), a Michigan corporation with an office and place of business in Greenville,[1] manufactures, sells, and distributes automotive parts and related products. During the year ending 31 December 1984, a period representative of its operations during all times material herein, the Employer, in the course of its business operations, manufactured, sold, and distributed at its Greenville, Michigan plant products valued in excess of $50,000 which it shipped directly to points located outside the State. Accordingly, the complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that Federal Mogul Corporation is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The Respondent, Local 2017, is and has been at all times material herein a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

For many years, the production and maintenance employees at the Employer's Greenville facility were represented by the Federal Mogul Workers Association (FMWA), an independent labor organization. Early in 1984, the UAW proposed to FMWA's leadership that they consider affiliation. Subsequently, on 8 September 1984, FMWA held a special membership meeting to consider and vote on the affiliation issue. During this meeting, Marcus Gardner, one of the Charging Parties, openly expressed his opposition to the joinder. Although the 500 employee-members differed, affiliation was approved by a vote of 170 to 150. By letter dated 10 September 1984, the Union formally notified the Employer of the outcome and pledged continued commitment to the extant collective-bargaining agreement.

Subsequently, at the next union meeting on 18 September, the Local's executive committee approved a request made by the union leadership for discretionary use of $25,000 to cover various expenses. The following morning, Personnel Manager Lawrence approached Union President Dave Hondorp on the shop floor[2] and accused him of "ripping off" the Union's treasury of $25,000 and amending the Union's constitution and bylaws, thereby failing to represent the employees who had elected him. By letter sent the same day, the Employer rejected the Union's request for recognition, insisting that "the fair and equitable thing to do is to have a vote of the membership of the Federal-Mogul Workers' Association in the plant" under the aegis of the NLRB.

Given the Employer's position, the Union refused to participate with management in grievance-resolution meetings. Consequently, on 9 October, the Company filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board alleging that the FMWA was unlawfully refusing to meet with it to resolve grievances and was attempting to coerce the Company into granting recognition in contravention of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. In the charge, the Employer defended its refusal to recognize the affiliated Local asserting that it would "recognize the UAW only after satisfactory proof that a democratically determined majority of the effected [sic] employees so desire." Two days later, on 11 October 1984, the Charging Parties, Gardner, Luce, and Beard, also filed charges with the Board alleging that the Union's governing body had improperly conducted the affiliation vote, sought discretionary use of $25,000 of FMWA's assets, and colluded with UAW organizers.

Hondorp testified that, after receiving copies of these charges, he noted they were similar in content to the accusations which Lawrence leveled at him on 19 September. Accordingly, Hondorp deduced that the Charging Parties must have supplied Lawrence with the information which he used to denounce him. Hondorp then accused Lawrence directly of meddling in union affairs and of goading the employees into filing the unfair labor practice charges. Lawrence denied that he had instigated these matters and, instead, without naming names, claimed that employees had sought him out on two occasions to voice their dissatisfaction with the affiliation vote.

By letter dated 22 October 1984, Hondorp received notice that the Regional Director had approved withdrawal of the charges filed by the three employees. Subsequently, the Employer also withdrew its charge.[3] Nevertheless, Hondorp advised his fellow union officers of his recent exchange with Lawrence. Apparently as a result of Hondorp's report, internal union charges were preferred against the Charging Parties on 25 October accusing them of violating the following provisions of the Union's constitution and bylaws (G.C. Exh. 9):

> 52. Internal Grievance Policy
> (a) Any member may be fined, suspended, disqualified from holding office or expelled from the Union
> . . . .
> (d) For disclosing to any employer or their representative or any person other than a fellow member any of the decisions or proceedings of the Federal-Mogul Workers' Association which have not been publicly disclosed by the Union.
> (e) For circulating or causing to be circulated false or slanderous statements about the Association or any officer or member thereof, or for causing to be circulated any statements condemning any decision rendered by the Association.

Beard, Gardner, and Luce were notified of the charges against them but not of the specific conduct which allegedly gave rise to them.[4] A hearing on the internal union grievances was held on 16 March 1985. On the advice of counsel, none of the Charging Parties chose to attend the hearing.[5] Therefore, Hondorp was the only witness at this proceeding. He described his second conversation with Lawrence on 19 September to the panel members and also told them that FMWA's former attorney had warned him that charges might be filed by members seeking to contest the affiliation with the UAW. At the conclusion of this hearing, the Respondent decided to issue reprimands to Beard, Luce, and Gardner for "conduct unbecoming a union person." In addition, Hondorp wrote and posted a memo to all union members entitled "RESULTS OF INTERNAL GRIEVANCE," which announced, inter alia, that "the Board decided to issue a letter of reprimand to each of these members" (that is, to Beard, Luce, and Gardner) stating that their actions were unbecoming and slanderous to our Union and members of the Top Bargaining Committee."

At the trial in this matter, the General Counsel asked Hondorp to explain precisely what he meant by the word "slanderous." In response, Hondorp explained that he considered slanderous the comments that union officials had "ripped off the Treasury" and unlawfully amended the Union's constitution and bylaws, the same comments which appeared in the charges filed with the Board. At the same time, he denied that the reprimands had anything to do with the Charging Parties' opposition to the affiliation. However, in an affidavit provided to a Board agent on 11 June 1985, Hondorp gave a different slant to the word "slanderous," averring there that he "was referring to allegations by Gardner, Luce, and Beard that our affiliation election was not proper and I meant by this their actions that made the union look bad." Significantly, Hondorp failed to mention the 19 September encounter in his pretrial statement.

The unfair labor practice charges giving rise to the complaint in this case grow out of the reprimands issued to the Charging Parties.

[2] Hondorp was a Federal Mogul employee for 27 years prior to the instant hearing.

[3] Although the charges were withdrawn, FMWA, apparently bowing to pressures exerted by the Company and dissidents, announced on 26 November that it would conduct a second vote on the affiliation question. The vote, taken at a 15 December meeting, decidedly approved the affiliation.

[4] Subsequently, the charge that they had violated provision 52(e) was dropped.

Discussion

Settled law holds that a Union violates the Act when it resorts to restraint or coercion to prevent a member from filing unfair labor practice charges with the Board. NLRB v. Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, 391 U.S. 418 (1968). Here, contrary to the allegations of the complaint, Respondent contends that it did not reprimand the Charging Parties for reasons condemned by the Act, but solely because they divulged internal union matters to a management representative in contravention of the FMWA's constitution. Thus, the sole question presented by this case is whether the discipline imposed on the Charging Parties was an impermissible intrusion on rights protected by the Act or nothing more than the proper exercise by the Local of its authority to discipline errant members for misconduct in a wholly internal union matter. On the basis of the entire record, I conclude that the Union was predominantly, if not wholly, motivated by a desire to penalize the Charging Parties because they resorted to Board processes. I reach this conclusion for the following reasons:

As Hondorp admitted, the allegations that Gardner, Beard, and Luce filed with the Board on 11 October mirrored the accusations which Personnel Manager Lawrence leveled at him on 19 September. However, the Respondent contends that the Union reprimands were imposed solely because the Charging Parties divulged information to the Employer and had nothing to do with their unfair labor practice charges. Thus, the encounter between Hondorp and Lawrence on 19 September assumes critical importance. Yet, as the General Counsel showed, Hondorp failed to mention this allegedly important exchange with the personnel manager in his pretrial affidavit, which he provided to a Board agent at a point in time when his recollection of events should have been much fresher than it was at the instant trial. It follows, therefore, that the 19 September meeting could not have figured prominently, if at all, in Respondent's decision to discipline the Charging Parties.

Respondent further contends that the unfair labor practice charges filed with the Board entered into the Union's disciplinary action only to the extent that it exposed those who met with Lawrence on 19 September. This contention, too, is unconvincing. As Hondorp readily acknowledged, neither he nor Lawrence identified any employee who met with the personnel manager on 19 September. Hondorp even stressed in his testimony that Lawrence did not indicate the number of employees who met with him. Because Hondorp admittedly knew that some 150 employees had opposed the affiliation, he could not have reasonably concluded that the employees who signed the Board charges were the same or the only members who divulged union matters to the Employer. The Respondent made no further inquiries to determine the identity of those who were suspected of collaborating with management. Instead, the executive committee rushed to judgment and was content to impose discipline solely on the three persons who had the temerity to file Board charges. Accordingly, had these employees not taken this action, it is fair to infer that the Union would not have singled them out for disciplinary action.

Further, although Hondorp attempted to deny that the employees' opposition to the affiliation played any role in the Union's disciplinary decision, he had to retract when shown a flatly contradictory statement in his pretrial affidavit. Clearly, Hondorp's affidavit together with the Union's notice to the employees of the second affiliation election (see G.C. Exh. 7) reveal that the Respondent was displeased with those who pressured the Union into conducting another vote. In that notice, Respondent placed the blame for a second vote squarely on the shoulders of the Company and "its allies." But from Respondent's perspective, the Charging Parties were the only avowed allies of management and it was their unfair labor practice charges that apparently played a large part in provoking the second affiliation vote. Given these circumstances, it is likely that the union leadership was more concerned and chagrined with the unfair labor practice charges than they were with the fact that unidentified employees may have conferred with Lawrence. At the very least, it is reasonable to conclude that the Union viewed the charges as woven closely into a fabric of events which caused it public embarassment and compelled it to rerun the affiliation vote.

The Respondent may well have considered the Charging Parties' conduct as evidence of disloyalty to the Union and a matter requiring discipline. However, the Union's interest in maintaining solidarity must give way here where an overriding policy of the Federal labor laws also is implicated. Any coercion used to discourage "access [to the Board] is beyond the legitimate interests of a labor organization." See NLRB v. Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, supra at 424. Accordingly, by issuing reprimands to the Charging Parties for engaging in such concerted protected activity, the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. Federal Mogul Corporation is now and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act; it will effectuate the purposes of the Act for jurisdiction to be exercised herein.

2. The Respondent, Local 2017, International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), is and has been at all times material herein a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By reprimanding Floyd Beard Jr., Robert Luce, and Marcus Gardner because they filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board, the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Specifically, the Respondent shall be ordered to desist from issuing reprimands or imposing other forms of discipline on its employee members because they have filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board. I shall further recommend that the Respondent be ordered to expunge from its records any reference to the reprimands issued to the Charging Parties, Beard, Luce, and Gardner, and to post an appropriate notice to its members.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The Respondent, Local 2017, International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), Greenville, Michigan, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Reprimanding employees because they filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind and remove from its files any reference to the reprimands issued on 6 May 1985 to Floyd Beard Jr., Robert Luce, and Marcus Gardner and notify them in writing that this has been done.

(b) Post at its business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT reprimand or impose other forms of discipline on our members because they have filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL rescind and expunge from our files any reference to the reprimands issued to Floyd Beard Jr., Robert Luce, and Marcus Gardner on 6 May 1985 and notify them in writing that this has been done.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 13 August 1982 the Regional Director for Region 14 issued a complaint, alleging that the Respondent had violated and was violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The complaint alleges that on 13 July 1982, following a Board-conducted election in Case 14–RC–9383, the Union[1] was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate; and that, commencing about 26 July 1982, and at all times thereafter, the Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested it to do so. On 23 August 1982 the Respondent answered, admitting in part, and denying in part, the complaint's allegations.

On 24 September 1982 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 29 September 1982 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not be granted. The Respondent filed a response to the Notice to Show Cause.

On 6 December 1982 the Board issued a Decision and Order[2] in this proceeding, granting the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and finding that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The Respondent petitioned for review of the Board's Decision and Order in the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. The petition was transferred for venue to the Eighth Circuit, where the Board filed a cross-application for enforcement of its Order. On 3 November 1983 the court granted the parties' joint motion for leave to withdraw, without prejudice, the petition for review and cross-application for enforcement, in order to permit the Board's reconsideration of this case. All parties were offered the opportunity to file statements of positions in connection with the Board's reconsideration of its decision.

In its answer to the complaint, its response to the Notice to Show Cause, and its statement of position, the Respondent repeats the argument, first raised in the representation proceeding, that four employees who solicited union authorization cards were union agents for the purpose of card solicitation so that their improper statements concerning the Union's initiation-fee-waiver policy were imputable to the Union and violated NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270 (1973). Neither the General Counsel nor the Union has filed a statement of position in this supplemental proceeding.

Our review of the record, including the record in Case 14–RC–9383, reveals that on 29 August 1980, pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, an election was held among the employees in the stipulated unit. The tally of ballots shows that of approximately 53 eligible voters, 34 cast ballots for, and 16 against, the Union; there were 2 nondeterminative challenged ballots. The Respondent timely filed objections to conduct affecting the results of the election, alleging, inter alia, that four employees were union agents for purposes of soliciting other employees to sign union-authorization cards and, in that capacity, stated that the Union would waive initiation fees for employees who signed cards before the election, thereby interfering with employees' free choice in the election under NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270 (1973). After a hearing, the Regional Director recommended overruling the objections.

Regarding the fee-waiver statements that were the subject of the Respondent's first objection, the Regional Director concluded that the four employee-solicitors were not agents of the Union and that their statements, when evaluated under the more lenient standards applicable to third-party conduct, were not grounds for overturning the election. The four employees were not union agents when they solicited the cards, the Regional Director concluded, because they neither belonged to an in-plant organizing committee, nor were they "vested . . . with any substantial authority in connection with the distribution of authorization cards." In addition, the Regional Director relied on the absence of evidence that the Union's business agent had actual knowledge of the Savair statements, as well as the absence of evidence that the Union adopted or ratified the employees' statements or otherwise held out the solicitors "in such a fashion that other employees reasonably were led to conclude that they were acting as its agents or on its behalf."

On 13 July 1982 the Board adopted the Regional Director's recommendations and certified the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the stipulated unit.[3] In adopting the Regional Director's recommendations, the Board affirmed its continued adherence to established precedent "which holds that the solicitation of authorization cards by employees, standing alone, does not make those employees agents of the union." 262 NLRB 850 fn. 3 (1982).

The Respondent refused to bargain with the Union. On 6 December 1982 the Board issued a Decision and Order[4] finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the stipulated unit, and by refusing to provide the Union with information relevant and necessary to its role as exclusive bargaining representative.

We have decided to vacate our earlier Decision and Order and Certification of Respresentative.[5] Objections to representation elections based on improper initiation-fee-waiver statements made by employee card solicitors alleged to be union agents have all too frequently been presented to the Board. The question of union agency as it relates to the impact of such statements has been troubling and recurring. As we explain below, the harm resulting from improper fee-waiver statements can be largely avoided by unions undertaking a clear explanation of their policy. The principles set forth today are intended to encourage unions to undertake such explanations so that most Savair objections will be obviated.[6]

The record evidence shows that Doug Hanicke, then employed by the Respondent, initiated the organizing campaign by contacting Richard Vaughn, a union representative, about organizing the Respondent's employees. Vaughn said that the Union would become active in the organizational campaign if a sufficient number of employees were interested in union representation. Vaughn then mailed Hanicke about 50 union-authorization cards for employees to sign. The only instruction Hanicke received was that he should not solicit cards "on company time." Three other employees at the time, Robert German, Ron Nickels, and Charles Rachel, joined Hanicke in soliciting cards from their fellow employees. Donald Owens, the Union's organizer, testified that these card solicitors were four of the five persons who "really worked like hell to keep the guys together and everything else." In the course of soliciting their fellow employees to sign, these four employees made a variety of statements, as found by the hearing officer, to the effect that if an employee signed a card at some point during the campaign before the election, his union initiation fee would be waived. Such statements, if attributable to the Union, are grounds for overturning the election under NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270, 272, 281 (1973).

Section 2(13) of the Act provides that:

> In determining whether any person is acting as an "agent" of another person so as to make such other person responsible for his acts, the question of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling.

Application of this statutory provision leads us to conclude that, in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, employees who solicit authorization cards should be deemed special agents of the union for the limited purpose of assessing the impact of statements about union fee waivers or other purported union policies that they make in the course of soliciting.[7] When a union makes authorization cards available to employees with the understanding that they will solicit other employees to sign them, it thereby vests the solicitors with actual authority to obtain signed cards on its behalf. See Restatement 2d, Agency (1958). Additionally, when a union permits or acquiesces in employees' soliciting on its behalf without indicating to third parties that such solicitation is unauthorized, it thereby vests the solicitors with apparent authority to obtain signed cards on its behalf.[8] In both cases, whether

[5] A respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) usually is not entitled to relitigate issues that were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding. See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. However, this prohibition applies to the parties to the representation proceeding and does not preclude the Board from reconsidering its own earlier action and reopening its representation proceeding.

[6] To the extent that Allied Metal Hose Co., 219 NLRB 1135, 1143–1146 (1975) (in which volunteer employee card solicitors made improper Savair statements and the union did not comment on the subject until after the election), Call-A-Mart, 214 NLRB 225, 228–229 (1974) (in which union representatives did not fully explain the union's initiation-fee-waiver policy and thereafter employees who voluntarily solicited cards on the union's behalf made statements violative of Savair), and other like cases are inconsistent with the analysis set forth herein, they are overruled.

[7] As set out in Restatement, 2d, Agency § 3(2) (1958), "[a] special agent is an agent authorized to conduct a single transaction or a series of transactions not involving continuity of service."

[8] By allowing employees to engage in unfettered solicitation activities and by using the signed cards they obtain to support the filing of a petition, the union becomes "responsible for the information which comes to the mind of the third person" regardless of whether or not it knows of the specific conduct involved. The union in that situation either has "intend[ed] to cause the [unit employees] to believe that the [solicitor] is by action or inaction, the union has created a special agency relationship for the limited purpose of card solicitation. See Restatement 2d, Agency § 3 (1958). Accordingly, the union will be deemed responsible for representations concerning its fee-waiver policies made by its special agent solicitors, whether or not they have been specifically authorized or instructed to speak on this subject. See generally Restatement 2d, Agency § 161A, 162 (1985).

A union may avoid responsibility for the improper fee-waiver statements of its solicitors, however, by clearly publicizing a lawful fee-waiver policy in a manner reasonably calculated to reach unit employees before they sign cards. Such publicity may take any number of forms including, for example, an explanation of the fee-waiver policy printed on the authorization card itself. A union that fails to take adequate steps to provide the employees with an explanation of its policy acts at its peril.[9]

Applying these principles to the facts presented, we find that when Union Business Agent Vaughn mailed 50 authorization cards to Douglas Hanicke with instructions to get them signed, he thereby vested Hanicke with actual authority to engage in solicitation, making Hanicke the Union's special agent for the limited purpose of soliciting cards. By acquiescing in solicitation activities by Nickles, Rachel, and German, the Union vested these three employees with apparent authority to solicit, and likewise rendered them its special agents. All four made improper fee-waiver statements. By virtue of their status as special agents of the Union, their statements were imputable to the Union.[10]

The Union here did not adequately inform the unit employees of a lawful fee-waiver policy. Union Business Agent Vaughn, who gave the cards to employee solicitors, as noted above, gave no instructions regarding to the Union's waiver policy. At most, Vaughn's testimony reveals that at a meeting with employees he may have told them that he would discuss fees after the election. Union Business Agent Owens testified that he "might have" mentioned the Union's fee-waiver policy while meeting with some employees, that he did not see why he "shouldn't of." He testified that in a discussion with employees he may have said he would talk to the Union's district body about reducing fees for the newly organized shop, but could not recall any specific meeting where the matter was discussed. We do not view this as adequate to establish that the effects of the statements of the four solicitors were or could have been neutralized and find that the statements reasonably tended to interfere with the outcome of the election.

Accordingly, we find merit to the Respondent's Objection 1 and deny the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

ORDER

It is ordered that the proceeding in Case 14–RC–9383 is reopened and consolidated with the proceeding in Case 14–CA–16116.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied, and the complaint in Case 14–CA–16116 is dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Certification of Representative in Case 14–RC–9383 is vacated.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the proceeding in Case 14–RC–9383 is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 14 for the purpose of holding a second election.[11] authorized to act for [it] or should realize that [the] conduct is likely to create such belief." Restatement 2d, Agency § 27 (1958).

[9] Obligating a union to provide employees with a clear explanation of its fee waiver is neither onerous nor unfair. Compared with the entirely avoidable expenditure of time, money, and Board resources attendant to litigating Savair objections and holding rerun elections, the burden on a union of publicizing its policy is relatively slight. The union is the party to the election that derives the benefit from card solicitation and is alone in a position to explain authoritatively its fee-waiver policy. By undertaking an effective explanation of its fee-waiver policy, a union may protect the election victory it seeks from attack on Savair grounds.

[10] See Dollar Rent-A-Car, 236 NLRB 206, 210 fn. 11 (1978) (in which it was found that statements made by an employee the union designated to solicit cards were attributable to the union); *J.C. DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 12 February 1987 Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Wallace issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Ersel Prince d/b/a Prince Trucking Company, Ethel, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) Make the following employees whole, with interest, for any loss of wages and benefits suffered by them as a result of unlawfully laying them off about 5 June and 18 July 1986, in the manner set forth in the judge's recommended remedy. The employees laid off about 5 June 1986 were John Sizemore, Jerry Carter, James Dean, Arnold Toler, Arvid Con Barker, Randall Morgan, Cecil Bobbet, Everett Vance, Arthur Farley, Roger Johnson, Chauncy Adams, and Aubrey John Hartman. The employees laid off about 18 July 1986 were John Sizemore, Aubrey John Hartman, Arthur Farley, James Dean, Roger Johnson, Chauncey Adams, and Arnold Toler."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] Although the judge found that the Respondent laid off certain employees on 17 July 1986, the parties stipulated that the layoffs occurred about 5 June and 18 July 1986.

[2] In response to the General Counsel's exceptions, we shall modify the recommended Order and notice to include the names of unlawfully laid-off employees and, as discussed above, to correct the dates of the second unlawful layoff. The General Counsel's request that the remedial Order include a visitatorial clause is denied.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT threaten not to hire and WE WILL NOT refuse to hire or recall people because they filed grievances or engaged in other protected activities.

WE WILL NOT attempt to deter you through threats and coercion from filing grievances or engaging in other protected activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with physical harm because you file grievances or engage in other protected activities.

WE WILL NOT lay you off in retaliation for grievance filing and for engaging in other protected activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, the following employees for any loss of wages and benefits suffered as a result of unlawful layoffs effected by me about 5 June and 18 July 1986.

John Sizemore	Aubrey John Hartman
Jerry Carter	Arthur Farley
James Dean	Cecil Bobbet

ERSEL PRINCE D/B/A PRINCE TRUCKING COMPANY

Donald Becker, Esq. and David L. Ness, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Ersel Prince, Jr., pro se.

DECISION

ROBERT T. WALLACE, Administrative Law Judge. On a series of charges filed by the Union between 9 June and 29 August 1986, as amended, a second consolidated amended complaint was issued on 8 September in which, as further amended at the hearing, it is alleged that Respondent Prince violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by threatening and by laying off employees because they filed grievances and engaged in other protected activities.

The case was tried before me at Logan, West Virginia, 17 and 18 November. On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of a brief filed by the General Counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND ANALYSIS

Ersel (June Bug) Prince operated a coal-hauling trucking company in the Logan area since 1973. On 11 April 1986, however, he abandoned that business and began to produce coal in the Rich Creek Hollow area of Logan, West Virginia, at mine 4. He operated the mine pursuant to an agreement with the owner (Chafin Coal Company) under which he was paid a fixed amount for each ton of coal produced. Prior operators were lessees Hunt Mining Company (during February and March 1986) and Caryco Mining (1980 through January 1986), and Chafin Coal Company (1980 and earlier). The latter is owned by John Chafin. His sons, John Jr. and Arthur, were officers and managers of Caryco.

During 1986, Prince provided services valued in excess of $50,000 for Chafin Coal Company, and the latter sold and shipped from its Logan County facilities coal valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of West Virginia. It is undisputed, and I find, that Prince and Chafin Coal Company are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

As operations began, all of Prince's nonsalaried employees (between 10 and 12) were members of the Union and at least 8 had worked for the predecessor lessees, and Prince recognized the Union and signed the applicable National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement. Here too it is undisputed, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

John Sizemore and Arnold Toler were among those initially hired by Prince. On filing their applications for employment on 10 April, they urged Prince to hire a friend (Neal Dingess) who had worked with them for Caryco. Prince declined stating that Chafin Sr. told him he would have to leave the Hollow (i.e., his lease would be canceled) if he hired Dingess. In context, the statement was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as it could be expected to have a chilling effect on the willingness of the applicants to engage in protected activities as employees of Prince. They were aware that Dingess had been a thorn in the side of Chafin by filing numerous grievances in his capacity as the Union's mine safety committeeman while employed by Caryco and by his efforts as recording[1] secretary of the Union to force several lessees of Chafin operating in the Hollow (including Hunt) to observe state law by posting bonds guaranteeing employees' wages. That dispute, and Dingess' prominent role in it, had been the subject of then current articles in newspapers of general circulation in the Logan area, to wit: The Logan Banner and The Charleston Gazette. In these circumstances, an inference is warranted and taken that Prince was aware of Dingess' activism and the probability that it prompted Chafin's admonition;[2] and by choosing to cite that admonition as his reason for not hiring Dingess, Prince was effectively conveying what his attitude would be towards union activists. Any doubt in that regard is dispelled by his subsequent conduct as described herein.

On 22 April, five individuals who had formerly worked at mine 4 (including Dingess, Arthur Farley, and Audrey Hartman) filed a grievance with Prince claiming that he had deprived them of "panel rights" to bid for jobs at the mine. Later that day Sizemore (who had been hired as an electrician and promptly named by the Union as mine safety committeeman with duties similar to those of a steward) urged Prince to hire some or all the grievants. In the presence of two other employees (Everett Vance and Jerry Carter), Prince reiterated his statement that Chafin would make him leave the Hollow if he hired Dingess; and he added that he would hire Farley and Hartman on the following Monday provided they took their names off the grievance.[3] I find both statements coercive in violation of Section 8(a)(1). The former for reasons indicated above, the latter because of its inhibiting effect on the right of employees to avail themselves of contractual grievance procedures. See United States Steel Corp., 250 NLRB 387, 390 (1980).

On Wednesday, 4 June, Prince told the employees that he wanted to run coal during a 2-week shutdown for vacations scheduled to begin on 28 June, and he asked them to work through that period.

On the morning of 5 June, Sizemore handed two written grievances to General Foreman Bill Merritt, his own and that of Carter.[4] Both contained complaints that supervisors had performed unit work. Merritt took the grievances to Prince who, on reading them, became highly incensed and said: "Well, we'll just cut them off." He then instructed Merritt to hand out layoff slips to all hourly employees[5] at the end of the shift. Merritt asked what he should write on the slips as a reason for the layoffs. Prince replied: "Uneconomic conditions," but added: "[and] be sure to tell them that they were filing too many grievances." Merritt complied, in part, by preparing and issuing the layoff slips that afternoon. However, when Morgan asked him "Why?", he told the assembled employees: "I ain't going to lie to you. The man told me that too many grievances have been filed, and poor economic conditions."

The next day (Friday) normally would have been the last workday of the week. About noon on that day, Merritt and his two section foremen (his brother Roger and Dallas Vance) were alone at the mine. About noontime they attempted to persuade Prince to call the men back. Prince replied heatedly, "No. I'll starve the sons-of-

[1] The Board has held that statements to job applicants may constitute conduct violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. See Semi-Alloys, Inc., 260 NLRB 992, 995 (1982).

[2] See NLRB v. Radcliffe, 211 F.2d 309, 315 (9th Cir. 1954), cert. denied 348 U.S. 833.

[3] Farley and Hartman complied, and they were hired by Prince on 28 April as promised.

[4] Earlier (on 21 April) Sizemore filed a grievance over Respondent's contracting out of coal transportation from the mine. In it he asked that such work be posted for bidding and that backpay be paid for the time involved.

[5] At the time these were 12 in number, as follows: Vance, Randall Morgan, C. Barker, Carter, Toler, C. Bobbett, Sizemore, Hartman, Farley, R. Johnson, C. Adams, and J. Dean.

bitches to death . . . for two or three months if I have to. If I want to run a scoop or . . . want you to . . . that's the way I'll have it. This is my mines [sic] and I'm going to run it the way I want to. I'm tired of John Sizemore and his union bitching and his fucking grievances."

Shortly thereafter Sizemore came to the mine to get his paycheck. While doing so he asked Prince if the men had been laid off over the two grievances. He responded, "Yes," and characterized them as "chicken shit grievances." A brief discussion ensued during the course of which Prince offered to call everyone back if Sizemore and Carter agreed to drop the grievances. Sizemore agreed on the spot and he phoned Carter and obtained his withdrawal. Prince then had Sizemore call the men by telephone and tell them to return to work on Monday. Later on Friday, Prince bragged to the Merritts that he had made Sizemore pull in his horns. I find the notice of layoff and the actual layoff to have been prompted solely by an unlawful purpose (i.e., retaliation for grievance filing) and so to be in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (1), respectively—as alleged in the complaint. I also find the prerequisite for ending the layoff (i.e., dropping the grievances) to have been coercive in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

Work at the mine progressed without significant interruption until 17 July (Thursday) when another layoff was ordered. On that morning, Sizemore reminded General Foreman Bill Merritt that as mine safety committeeman he had a duty to make quarterly inspections of the mine accompanied by a representative of the Union's safety department and someone selected by management; and he gave Merritt the customary 24-hour notice of intent. Merritt, in turn, informed Prince who became indignant and told him: "What do they want to make a safety run for, we just got through with the Federal inspector. It looks like we are going to have to cut them off again to teach John Sizemore a lesson." He thought for a while and then instructed Merritt to lay off all hourly employees (then 11 in number) except 4 who had most seniority, effective at the end of the workday; and he confided that the man with fifth highest seniority (Toler) was being laid off only so that the sixth senior (Sizemore) "wouldn't think I am discriminating against him." He added, "That ought to teach John a lesson." Merritt again asked what reason he should put on the layoff slips. Prince replied, "Not a damn thing." Prior to that moment Merritt had no inkling that a layoff was in the offing.[6] Here too, I find that the layoff was motivated solely by Prince's desire to punish or retaliate against Sizemore and, through him, the Union for engaging in a protected act (i.e., performing a mine inspection as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement)—in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). Also, I credit testimony of Merritt and Sizemore to the effect that on 18 July the former told the latter that the layoff was meant to convey a message that there was a price to be paid for too assiduously pursuing his duties as mine safety committeeman. As communicated by admitted Supervisor Merritt, that message patently was coercive; and it constitutes an independent violation of Section 8(a)(1).

On Monday 21 July, Merritt complained to Prince of being unable properly to run the mine with so few men, and he emphasized the need for an electrician to maintain equipment. The only electricians were Sizemore and Farley and both were on layoff. Sizemore was the senior, and apparently to eliminate that obstacle to his recalling Farley, Prince told Merritt to offer Sizemore a job as a salaried chief electrician at a substantial increase in pay. Prince explained that if Sizemore accepted he would promptly "can him."[7] Following instructions, Merritt then called Sizemore and offered him the chief-ing job. Sizemore declined and inquired, "What's he trying to do to me, can me?" Faced with a direct question Merritt replied honestly, "Yeah, probably." I find that answer tantamount to a threat to punish Sizemore for engaging in protected activities, and so violative of Section 8(a)(1).[8]

Morgan was one of the four hourly workers not laid off; and he succeeded Sizemore as mine safety committeeman. On 29 July, he filed a grievance over salaried employees performing classified work. Later in the day, Prince and the Merritt brothers were at the mine helping each other move supplies. Roger inquired of Prince, "Do you think I can slip this rock dust by . . . Morgan without him filing a grievance?" And Prince replied, "Fuck 'Badeye' [Morgan]. He's already filed one grievance. What you need to do is take him down . . . to the boom hole and . . . whoop the shit out of him . . . I thought I got rid of my problem when I got rid of Sizemore and now Badeye is trying to show his ass." That night Roger, concerned about the conversation, called Morgan and told him what Prince had said. Morgan replied, "Is he that mad that he wants to whoop me?" Roger answered, "Yes, because of the grievance . . . I just want you to keep your eyes on him [Prince] and everything, you know." I find a threat was communicated, in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

Prince ceased to operate the mine on 16 September, assertedly for financial reasons. There is no allegation nor is there any evidence that the shutdown involved any unfair labor practice.

Credibility Determinations

In making many of the findings above, I have credited testimony of admitted Supervisors Bill and Roger Merritt. It seems to me that both testified in a straightforward manner; and neither appears to have any prospect of gain. On the contrary, they testified at considerable risk because they then held supervisory jobs at other mines and could not expect that their appearance in a proceeding of this type would endear them to their present or any future employers. Further, their accounts were consistent with and corroborated by that of the seven hourly workers who testified. In addition, I have credited the hourly workers in situations where the subject of their testimony was peculiarly within their own knowledge, having found them to have spoken without guile. And finally, the testimony of both the supervisors and hourly workers rings true in the context of probabilities arising out of objective facts. For example, both layoffs occurred immediately following assertion of protected rights, and on a Thursday instead of the normal end of a workweek, Friday—thereby lending credence to the claim that Prince acted solely in retaliation for assertion of those rights.

[6] By 23 August all the laid-off employees were recalled and two new ones had been hired.

[7] Under art. XVII, sec. (m) of the applicable National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement employees promoted to permanent supervisory status forfeit their seniority rights immediately.

[8] Further indication of Prince's animus toward Sizemore is the fact that, after consulting with his labor relations advisor (Clifford "Snooker" Martin), he recalled Farley on 23 July ostensibly because he possessed a qualification that Sizemore lacked, to wit: experience in rebuilding hydraulic pumps. But, Farley testified credibly that on recall he performed the same work as before and that it did not involve rebuilding pumps.

In contrast, Prince's flat denial that he made any of the statements attributed to him is unpersuasive. Similarly, I regard as unpersuasive, and indeed pretextual,[9] his claim that the layoffs on 5 June and 17 July were due to economic reasons. In reaching that conclusion I accept (despite absence of adequate data) his assertion that the financial situation of the mine during his tenure as lessee was precarious. But at the time of the layoffs that circumstance is not shown to have been a contributing factor. As to the 5 June layoff, Prince claimed in an affidavit taken prior to the hearing that it was due to his running out of cash and a delay in obtaining a $10,000 loan from his father. But at the hearing he admitted having obtained that loan in April when he began operations. Further, the evidence shows that lessor Chafin had issued Prince a check for $46,196 on 3 June; and absent any explanation from Prince, an inference is warranted that he knew that check (one of the largest he was to receive) was coming and would be received by him on or prior to payday (6 June) when he did in fact meet the payroll. And as to Prince's claim that the 17 July layoff was due to adverse mining conditions (badtop) that condition was known and was being dealt with since 1 June (Tr. 145), and no reason is given as to why the situation would improve by operating the mine with less miners. In that regard, Prince made no reply to Section Foreman Roger Merritt's estimate that they would have been out of the badtop area and operating at full capacity within 2 weeks had a full complement been maintained.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act in the particulars and for the reasons stated above; that it is not shown to have violated the Act in any other respect; and that the unfair labor practices here found to have been committed affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

In addition to the customary cease-and-desist order and requirement for notice mailing,[10] my order will require Respondent to make whole affected employees for all wages and benefits lost as a result of their unlawful layoffs on 5 June and 17 July, in accordance with the principles set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[11] I see no need for, and consequently will not require, the visitatorial clause sought by the General Counsel.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondent, Ersel Prince, d/b/a Prince Trucking Company, Logan, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening not to hire, and refusing to hire or recall, individuals because they filed grievances or engaged in other protected activities.

(b) Attempting through threats and coercion to dissuade employees from filing and pursuing grievances.

(c) Threatening to inflict bodily harm on an employee for engaging in protected activities.

(d) Threatening to fire an employee for engaging in protected activities.

(e) Laying off employees in retaliation for filing grievances and for engaging in other protected activities.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Make employees whole, with interest, for any loss of wages and benefits suffered by them as a result of unlawfully laying them off about 5 June and 17 July 1986, in the manner set forth in the remedy section.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, as well as other records necessary and useful in analyzing the amounts due employees under the terms of this Order.

(c) Mail to the Union and to each unit employee who was on its payroll at any time during the period from 11 April to 16 September 1986, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] The notice shall be duly signed by Respondent on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 10 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached supplemental decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Setterlin Company (the Applicant) filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Applicant, The Setterlin Company, Columbus, Ohio, be awarded the sum of $29,857.31, pursuant to its application for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act.

[1] In his supplemental decision, the judge states that the Respondent's 17 April 1985 Motion for Summary Judgment and the General Counsel's response were sufficient to permit the Board to make a decision on the merits at that point in time without the necessity of holding a hearing. We disagree. Although in hindsight it is clear that the Respondent did present all the relevant evidence to the Board in its Motion for Summary Judgment, the Board did not know at that time that the General Counsel would fail to produce at a hearing any additional evidence in support of her position as alleged in her response.

[2] We believe that Congress, in revising the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504 (1982), as amended by Pub. L. 99-80 Stat. 183 (1985), did not alter but merely clarified the definition of "substantially justified." "Substantially justified" means more than "mere reasonableness." H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 99-120 at 9 (1985).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

Equal Access to Justice Act

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. My decision in the above-cited consolidated cases issued on 10 March 1986. No exceptions were filed. Thereafter, on 6 May 1986 the Board issued its final order adopting the conclusions and recommendations set forth in my decision. Pursuant to the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), Public Law 96-481, 94 Stat. 2325 and Section 102.143 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Respondent on 22 May 1986 filed with the Board in Washington, D.C. an application for fees and expenses with memorandum and evidence in support thereof. On 23 May 1986 the Board referred this matter to me for appropriate action. Subsequently, the General Counsel filed an answer to Respondent's application and Respondent filed a reply, both with supporting memoranda.

The application, answer, and reply raise the following issues:

1. Whether the position of the General Counsel was substantially justified in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding.

2. Whether Applicants' claim for 10.5 hours of legal fees for David P. Hiller for 10 December 1985 is justified in light of the fact that he appeared on that date as witness for Respondent at the unfair labor practice trial and did not make an appearance that date as legal counsel on Respondent's behalf.

The Substantial Justification Issue

On 18 May 1984[1] the charges in the instant case were filed. Shortly thereafter the Region undertook a thorough investigation of the charges. On 25 May Respondent, through its attorney, David P. Hiller, provided the Region with a statement of position that was accompanied by documentary evidence supporting its position. The statement of position traced the history of bargaining between the parties dating back to the date of Respondent's withdrawal of its bargaining rights from the AGC. The supporting documentary evidence consisted of, for the most part, letters between the parties that reflected the record of bargaining or attempted bargaining. The evidence that I relied on in determining that the complaint lacked merit was congruent with the facts and documentary evidence supplied to the Region by Respondent prior to complaint. On 29 May the Region followed up Respondent's evidentiary submission with an interview of Robert L. Jones, executive secretary of Carpenters' District Council from whom an affidavit was obtained. In his affidavit, Jones described the sequence of events that transpired during the bargaining period and thereafter. The substance of Jones' affidavit was factually in total agreement with the facts as presented by Respondent in its 25 May documented statement of position. A comparison of the two positions gave rise to no factual discrepancies warranting credibility findings. The facts discovered by the Region during its investigation are the same as those on which I later rendered my decision.

On 6 July the Regional Director issued the following document in which he refused to issue complaint:

> Gentlemen:
> The above-captioned case charging a violation under Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, has been carefully investigated and considered.
> The investigation does not support the allegations of the charges that the Employer failed to bargain with the Union in violation of the Act as charged. The evidence disclosed that representatives of the Employer met with representatives of the four Charging Party-Unions on several occasions during April and May of 1984. In addition, the Employer met jointly with all the Unions on April 30, 1984. On May 11, 1984, the Employer gave the employees a "Status Report" in which it set forth its own bargaining proposals. Moreover, the Employer stated it would continue to work during a strike and that although employees might be subject to fines or membership suspension if they worked during a strike, they had a right to work and the decision was up to them. It was concluded that the report was not unlawful but was encompassed by free speech provisions of Section 8(c) of the Act. Moreover, it did not constitute direct dealing or bargaining with the employees with an object of unlawfully undermining the Unions' bargaining status. Finally, it was concluded that the parties had reached an impasse on June 1, 1984 when the Employer implemented its fringe benefit proposals which it had earlier offered to the Unions and to which they had not objected. The implementation by the Employer of its last offer, therefore, did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. See E.I. DuPont & Co., 268 NLRB 1075 (1984), and Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967).
> Under these circumstances, it was concluded that further proceedings in this matter were not warranted and I am refusing to issue a complaint.

Subsequent to the Regional Director's refusal to issue complaint, Charging Parties appealed. On 21 December the Office of Appeals sustained the appeal stating:

> Dear Mr. Goodman:
> Your appeal from the Regional Director's refusal to issue complaint in the above-referenced case has been fully considered.
> The appeal is sustained. It was concluded that the Employer's cessation of fringe benefits payments and check-off and its presentation of a bargaining offer directly to employees raised Section 8(a)(1) and (5) issues warranting Board determination based on record testimony developed at a hearing before an Administrative Law Judge.
> Accordingly, the case is remanded to the Regional Director with instructions to issue an appropriate 8(a)(1) and (5) complaint, absent settlement. All further inquirils should be addressed to the Regional Director.

This letter, couched in the usual boilerplate language, offered no explanation as to precisely what Section 8(a)(1) and (5) issues remained that might warrant the taking of testimony at a hearing.

On 4 January 1985[2] Respondent, through its attorney, filed with the Office of Appeals a motion for reconsideration. Accompanying the motion was a 26-page position statement covering the entire course of bargaining, citing appropriate cases and distinguishing cases cited by the Charging Parties from the factual circumstances involved in the instant case. Attached to the motion was the relevant correspondence that had passed between the parties the previous spring and since. Respondent placed before the Office of Appeals its entire case. Virtually everything that it eventually put into the record at the hearing Respondent offered to the Office of Appeals for its consideration in order to avoid having to go to hearing. On 18 January the Office of Appeals sent the following letter to Respondent's attorney:

> Dear Mr. Hiller:
> This is in response to your Motion for Reconsideration dated January 3, 1985 and supplemental letter dated January 9, 1985, requesting oral argument and reconsideration of our decision on December 21, 1984 sustaining the Charging Parties' appeal.
> We have carefully received the evidence presented and adduced in the instant matter in light of the contentions raised in your motion and have concluded that no basis exists for a departure from our initial determination. Accordingly, the motion is denied.

Again, the Office of Appeals failed to explain to Respondent why a hearing was necessary or what issues remained to be litigated.

On 6 March, the Region, having been given no other choice by the Office of Appeals, issued complaint despite the fact that it had in its files the entire case; the undisputed facts, relevant documents, and case citations containing many of the legal findings on which dismissal of the complaint eventually issued. The complaint contained among its allegations paragraphs 10(a), (b), and (c):

> 10. (a) On or about May 10, 1984, Respondent ceased making payments on behalf of employees to the respective health and welfare plans and pension funds provided for in the collective-bargaining agreements to which Respondent was a party with the Bricklayers, Carpenters, Cement Masons and Laborers as described above in paragraphs 6(a), 7(a), 8(a) and 9(a), respectively.
> (b) About May 23, 1984, Respondent implemented its own health and welfare benefits through a plan with Builders Exchange and Phoenix Mutual

[2] Hereafter all dates are in 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

Life and its own pension benefits through the Setterlin Company Pension Plan.

(c) Respondent engaged in the acts and conduct described above in paragraphs 10(a) and (b) without having afforded the Bricklayers, Carpenters, Cement Masons and/or Laborers an opportunity to negotiate and bargain as the exclusive representative of Respondent's employees with respect to such acts and conduct and the effects thereof.

At the time the complaint issued the Region had in its possession documentary proof, supplied to it by Respondent's counsel months before, that the allegations were untrue. Indeed, in an affidavit supplied to the Region on 29 May 1984 the executive secretary of the Carpenters stated[3] that he did not know whether the Respondent had implemented the new health and welfare benefit program as of that date. Seven months later when on 22 October 1985 the Region issued its amended consolidated complaint the errors contained in the above-quoted paragraphs remained unchanged and were not corrected until the day of the hearing. On 20 March Respondent filed its answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices and proffering affirmative defenses to the allegations identical to those eventually pursued at the hearing.

On 17 April Respondent filed a Motion for Summary Judgment with a 32-page memorandum in support thereof. In its memorandum Respondent once again reiterated the entire history of bargaining between the parties and argued that there were no factual issues in dispute that warranted a hearing. Attached to the memorandum were various supporting documents most of which were eventually offered and received by stipulation into the record at the hearing. In addition to a resume of the factual history, Respondent included in its memorandum argument and case law. Several of the cases cited were ones on which I relied in my decision dismissing the complaint.

On 23 April the Associate Executive Secretary of the Board issued an order transferring proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause. On 7 May the General Counsel filed a response to the Notice to Show Cause and Opposition to Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment. In the response the General Counsel requested: "that Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment be denied because it raises factual matters which require development and resolution at a hearing and because the legal basis for Respondent's motion is not supported by Board law or policy." After declaring these reasons as to why a hearing was necessary, the General Counsel laid out the facts that were expected to be adduced at the hearing. The description of facts included in the response, however, though perfectly true in its coverage, totally failed to indicate or give consideration to Respondent's fully documented fears and reasons for taking the action it had. But this fact is of small consequence because Respondent had already placed on record the bases on which it had acted and this was well known to the Board through the contents of the file. Thus, the General Counsel's response was sufficient, along with the information made available to the Board by Respondent, to permit the Board to make a decision on the merits (i.e., the facts), without the necessity of holding a hearing.

Insofar as the legal argument is concerned, the General Counsel, in her Response, argued that Respondent's position is not supported by Board law or policy. The General Counsel, in her Response, conceded "that many of the facts in this case are undisputed and are clearly established by contemporaneous documentary evidence." She argued, however, that "Respondent has totally disregarded and failed to address . . . the unfair labor practice strike issue."

But the position of the General Counsel on this point is untenable because if the record is clear that there are no unfair labor practices, then the issue of whether or not the strike that subsequently occurred is an unfair labor practice strike never evolves as an issue. Though the General Counsel's response offers a number of arguments why Respondent's actions should be considered violative of the Act, it does not adequately present the clearly defined reasons why Respondent took the action it did. The problem of assent was the key issue in the case and the General Counsel, although she mentioned it briefly, did not adequately address the subject despite the fact that her files contained all of the correspondence enabling her to do so.

On 13 May Respondent filed a 17-page reply memorandum in which Respondent once again thoroughly reviewed the entire history of the case, presenting all of the facts none of which were in dispute, and pointing out the General Counsel's failure to address the assent issue as well as the failure of the Charging Parties to request bargaining about the health and welfare and pension implementation issues. Also, Respondent pointed out that on 17 May and again on 29 May it had written to the Charging Parties advising them that the changes in the health and welfare and pension plans had not yet been implemented and that Respondent was still willing to negotiate the subject matter.

On 30 September the Board issued an Order Denying Motion and Remanding Proceeding to Regional Director. The Order contained no explanation or reasons why the motion was denied.

On 22 October the Region issued an order consolidating cases, amended consolidated complaint and order rescheduling hearing. On 1 November Respondent filed its answer, which included the following affirmative defenses:

FIRST AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE

16. Both before and after the unfair labor practices charges were filed by charging parties, as well as before Respondent implemented its proposals with respect to fringe benefits, Respondent offered charging parties the opportunity to bargain with regard to Respondent's proposals.

17. Despite the opportunity to bargain afforded by Respondent, the charging parties neither requested bargaining nor pursued their bargaining opportunities.

[3] Par. 18.

18. The charges and the allegations of the complaint are therefore barred by the doctrines of waiver, acquiescence and estoppel.

SECOND AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE

19. Respondent's Status Report of May 11, 1984 was a protected communication, encompassed by the free speech provisions of Section 8(a) of the Act.

WHEREFORE, Respondent demands that the amended complaint be dismissed, in its entirety, and that Respondent be awarded its costs and expenses herein, including reasonable attorney fees.

Even a cursory inspection of the Region's file in this case would reveal that the allegations contained in the complaint were unsupported by the contents of the file and that the affirmative defenses were wholly supported by the evidence. Moreover, analysis of the Regional file at the time of issuance of complaint would reveal no factual issues subject to credibility determinations. Finally, contained in the Regional file were copies of all of the documents filed by Respondent either with the Region or with the Board. These documents contain many of the case citations that when applied to the facts as reflected by the documentary evidence should have led to the conclusion that complaint should not have issued.

I find that complaint should never have issued in this case, that the General Counsel's position was not substantially justified, and therefore shall recommend that a proper EAJA award be made to the applicant in the amount of $29,857.31.[4]

[4] This amount represents the $30,644.81 claimed (390.25 attorney hours at $75 per hour equals $29,268.75 and expenses in the amount of $1376.06) minus $787.50 (10.5 attorney hours at $75 per hour) claimed for work done on 10 December 1985 for "ULP trial before Judge Jacobs" by David Hiller. Hiller did not make an appearance on that date and appeared only as a witness.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The applicant is a prevailing party with respect to the amended consolidated complaint and meets the eligibility standards set forth in the Equal Access to Justice Act.

2. The General Counsel has failed to establish that the issuance of the consolidated complaint or the amended consolidated complaint and their continued prosecution were substantially justified.

3. The applicant is entitled to be reimbursed for reasonable attorney's fees and expenses incurred in connection with the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding and the fee application as set forth above.

On the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the record in this case, pursuant to Sec. 102.153, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

Applicant, The Setterlin Company, shall be awarded $29,857.31 pursuant to its application under the Equal Access to Justice Act.

[5] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided in Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 103.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

United Supermarkets, Inc. and Retail Clerks Union, Local No. 368, AFL–CIO, Chartered by United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO. Cases 16–CA–8650 and 16–CA–8759

30 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 18 September 1980 Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Union filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The parties stipulated to the basic facts constituting the alleged unfair labor practices, and the facts in general are largely undisputed. The Respondent operates seven supermarkets in the Amarillo, Texas area, including one located in a small shopping center at the intersection of Martin Road and Amarillo Boulevard. The supermarket is situated at the south end of a row of eight stores in the shopping center that are set back about 120 feet from Martin Road. The shopping center's parking lot occupies most of the area between the row of stores and Martin Road.

About 3 p.m. on 10 August 1979, two employees who had been discharged by the Respondent, Pricella Sain and Mary Jane Price, began picketing on the sidewalk in front of the entrance to the supermarket under the supervision of Union Representatives Dennis Patterson and Jim Shelton. Sain and Price walked back and forth wearing picket signs that bore the message: "United Supermarkets Unfair to Retail Clerks Union Local 368 Dallas, Texas." Sain and Price attempted to talk to customers approaching the supermarket about the proceedings then pending against the Respondent.

In 1977, two representation elections had been held among the Respondent's Amarillo area employees. A majority of the employees in the meat department unit had voted in favor of the Union while a majority in the grocery unit had voted against the Union. Additionally, unfair labor practice charges had been filed against the Respondent alleging that the Respondent had unlawfully discharged 13 employees, including Sain and Price, and had unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union. As of the date of the picketing, the unfair labor practice cases and objections to the elections had been consolidated before an administrative law judge.[2]

Sain and Price told approaching customers about the unfair labor practice complaint pending against the Respondent, stated that they wanted the Respondent to settle the matters, and asked the customers to shop at other supermarkets until the matters were settled. They also stated that the wages and benefits paid by the Respondent were inferior to those provided by union supermarkets. Sain and Price did not distribute handbills.

After a short period of time, officials of the Respondent emerged from the supermarket and told Sain and Price, as well as Patterson and Shelton, to move out near the street or into the parking lot, or the police would be called. The four declined to move away from the front of the supermarket, so Max Smithey, the Respondent's Amarillo grocery supervisor, summoned the police. After conferring with Smithey, a police officer asked Sain, Price, Patterson, and Shelton to leave the property and go at least to the city's right of way along the street. They refused to do so and, at 4:30 p.m., were arrested for criminal trespass, with Smithey pressing charges.

The judge found that by threatening to cause the arrest, and by causing the arrest, of the Union's pickets and representatives while they were engaged in activity protected by Section 7 of the Act, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[3] We affirm the judge's finding of 8(a)(1) violations, but do so only on the basis of the analysis set forth in our recent decision in Fairmont Hotel, 282 NLRB 139 (1986).

In Fairmont, the Board reviewed NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956), and its progeny, and determined that in cases involving conflicts between Section 7 rights and property rights, the Board's task is "first to weigh the relative strength of each party's claim." The Board found:

[2] These matters ultimately were decided in United Supermarkets, 261 NLRB 1291 (1982). In deciding this case, we take official notice of that decision.

[3] The judge also dismissed two other alleged violations of Sec. 8(a)(1) unrelated to the picketing. No party has excepted to those dismissals.

> If the property owner's claim is a strong one, while the Section 7 right at issue is clearly a less compelling one, the property right will prevail. If the property claim is a tenuous one, and the Section 7 right is clearly more compelling, then the Section 7 right will prevail. Only in those cases where the respective claims are relatively equal in strength will effective alternative means of communication become determinative.

Fairmont Hotel, supra at 142 (fn. omitted). Factors that may affect the relative strength or weakness of an asserted property right include the following: the use to which the property in question is put, any restrictions placed on public access to the property or to the facility located on the property, and the size and location of the private facility. By way of example, the Board noted that "a single store surrounded by its own parking lot provided exclusively for the convenience of customers will have a significantly more compelling property right claim" than "the owner of a large shopping mall who allows the general public to utilize his property without substantial limitation." Id. at 142. Concerning the Section 7 right, factors that may affect the relative strength or weakness of such a right include the following: the nature of the right asserted, the purpose for which it is being asserted, the employer that is the target of the activity, the situs of the activity, the relationship of the situs to the target, the intended audience of the activity, and, possibly, the manner in which the right is being asserted. Id. at 142. By way of example, the Board noted that "organizational rights and the right to engage in primary economic activity at the situs of a dispute may be viewed as more compelling than handbilling and other informational activity at locations other than the primary situs." Id. at 142.

Applying the Fairmont analysis to the facts of this case, we find that the Section 7 rights are more compelling than the Respondent's property rights. The Respondent's supermarket is in a small shopping center which the general public is invited to patronize. A customer parking lot is provided directly in front of the supermarket and other stores, and there are several entrances to the parking lot to provide ready access from the adjacent public streets. There are no restrictions on access through these entrances. Furthermore, the Respondent's supermarket shares the parking lot with the seven other stores in the shopping center, and the sidewalk in front of the supermarket continues along the entire row of stores. Thus, Max Smithey testified that motorists coming to the shopping center may park in front of the supermarket and not enter the supermarket, but, rather, go to some other store. Additionally, customers of the other merchants in the shopping center walk on the sidewalk in front of the supermarket on their way to and from the other nearby stores. Indeed, Max Tipton, the Respondent's grocery supervisor for all its stores, specifically testified to this fact. There is no evidence that the Respondent or any other merchant at the shopping center takes measures to ascertain that everyone who uses the sidewalk in front of the row of stores is a customer of some store in the shopping center. It is apparent that the sidewalk in front of the Respondent's supermarket is open to virtually anyone and certainly to customers of any of the merchants at the shopping center. Inasmuch as access to the sidewalk in front of the Respondent's supermarket is so unrestricted and is commonly used by persons who are not customers, employees, or suppliers of the supermarket, we conclude that the Respondent has retained only a very limited property right claim to the sidewalk in front of its supermarket.

By contrast, the Section 7 right at issue here is a strong one. By picketing in front of the Respondent's supermarket, Sain and Price, under the direction of Union Representatives Patterson and Shelton, were attempting to protest the Respondent's asserted unfair treatment of its employees that constituted alleged unfair labor practices and to bring pressure on the Respondent to end these practices, as well as to protest Respondent's alleged payment of wages inferior to those of unionized stores.[4] The importance of the right to protest unfair labor practices is evidenced by the greater rights accorded employees who strike over unfair labor practices as compared to employees who strike over economic issues. See, e.g., Pecheur Lozenge Co., 98 NLRB 496 (1951), enfd. as modified 209 F.2d 393 (2d Cir. 1953). Moreover, the Respondent was the target of the picketing in question, and the situs of the picketing was immediately in front of the one of the Respondent's supermarkets at which some of the alleged unfair labor practices had occurred.

[4] We reject the judge's conclusion that "[p]icketing signs carried by Price and Sain in the instant case were synonymous with those in Giant Food Markets and thus plainly of 'area standards' character." JD slip op. at 6 (fn. omitted). As noted above, Price's and Sain's picket signs stated, "United Supermarkets Unfair to Retail Clerks Union Local 368 Dallas, Texas." In Giant Food Markets, 241 NLRB 727 (1979), the picket signs stated: "Informational Picketing—Giant Food Markets does not pay area standards wages and benefits. Please don't shop. Retail Clerks Union 1557, 203 North 11th Street, Nashville, Tennessee." The fact that Sain and Price, in addition to publicizing the Respondent's alleged unfair labor practices, also told prospective customers that the Respondent's wages and benefits were inferior to those at union stores, did add an area standards element to their message. However, their voicing of this additional concern did not reduce the character of the picketing, taken as a whole, from that of unfair labor practice picketing to that of area standards picketing.

Additionally, the Respondent's customers were the intended audience of the Union's picketing. Inasmuch as persons could be identified as customers of the Respondent when they approached the entrance to the Respondent's supermarket, picketing on the sidewalk in front of the supermarket was an appropriate means for the pickets to convey their message to this audience. Also, the picketing activities were carried out not only by nonemployee union representatives but also by two discharged employees whose terminations had been alleged to constitute unfair labor practices. Sain's discharge was ultimately determined to be unlawful, while Price's discharge was not. See United Supermarkets, 261 NLRB 1291 (1982). An unlawfully discharged employee retains her status as an employee for purposes of the Act. Holly Manor Nursing Home, 235 NLRB 426, 428 fn. 4 (1978). Accordingly, Sain's right as an employee to picket in protest of the Respondent's alleged unfair labor practices was perhaps even greater than that possessed by the other three individuals.[5] Finally, contrary to the Respondent's contentions, the manner in which the picketing was carried out did nothing which might arguably diminish its protected character. We agree with the judge's conclusion that the evidence shows that the picketing was peaceful, the supermarket's entrance was not obstructed, and there was no interference with prospective customers.

In sum, the Section 7 interest being asserted in picketing to protest the Respondent's unfair labor practices was quite a strong one, while the Respondent's property interest in limiting the use of the sidewalk in front of its supermarket was relatively weak. Accordingly, we find that the Section 7 right exercised by the Union outweighs the Respondent's property right to exclude the pickets from the sidewalk. Because the rights asserted by the Union and the Respondent are not relatively equal, it is unnecessary to consider the availability of reasonable alternative means by which the Union could have communicated its message to its intended audience. For the foregoing reasons, we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening to cause the arrest of the pickets and by causing their arrest.[6]

[5] See Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507, 521–522 (1976). We reject the judge's conclusion, at fn. 9, that "[t]he fact that both these individuals [Price and Sain] were alleged discriminatees in a case awaiting decision following trial does not appreciably change their status as nonemployees," and that "for analytical purposes here they were equitable with nonemployees."

[6] Unlike his colleagues, Member Stephens does not automatically exclude consideration of the factor of alternative means whenever Sec. 7 rights are more compelling than property rights or vice versa. Fairmont Hotel, 282 NLRB 139 (1986) (Member Stephens concurring). Nonetheless, he reaches the same conclusion as they do here. Where, as here, the Sec. 7 rights are especially strong and the property rights are relatively attenuated, he would impose a much lighter "alternative means" burden on the General Counsel than he would when the relative strengths of Sec. 7 rights and property rights were reversed. The alternative means suggested by the Respondent—purchasing radio, television, and newspaper advertisements or distributing handbills in adjacent residential areas—are not means the employees and the Union could reasonably be required to use as an alternative for communicating with the Respondent's customers under the circumstances here. Therefore, Member Stephens finds that the requirement for showing lack of alternative means is satisfied in this case.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, United Supermarkets, Inc., Amarillo, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1.

"1. Cease and desist from

"(a) Threatening to cause the arrest, and causing the arrest, of any employees or union representatives while peacefully picketing the Respondent's supermarket on Martin Road in Amarillo, Texas, in protest of unfair labor practices allegedly committed by the Respondent.

"(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten to cause the arrest, or cause the arrest, of any employees or union representatives while peacefully picketing our supermarket on Martin Road in protest of unfair labor practices that we have allegedly committed.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

UNITED SUPERMARKETS, INC.

Edward B. Valverde Esq., for the General Counsel.
Don Graf and William Harriger, of Lubbock, Texas, for the Respondent.
Marvin Menaker, of Dallas, Texas, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at Amarillo, Texas, on June 24 and 25, 1980, based on a consolidated complaint alleging that United Supermarkets, Inc. (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by demanding that certain picketing cease on the sidewalk in front of an Amarillo, Texas area store, by causing the arrest of picketers and representatives of Retail Clerks Union, Local No. 368, AFL-CIO, chartered by United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union), when such picketing continued, and by informing persons, including one former employee, that it would not hire them because of their membership in the Union.

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and consideration of posthearing briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

After purchasing the store equipment of three Shop-Rite/Piggly-Wiggly outlets located in Amarillo, Respondent caused a hiatus in retail operation and then reopened these with new employees as part of a seven-store network in and around Amarillo, in Potter County, Texas. The Union had formerly represented employees of the three Piggly-Wiggly stores and is a party to pending litigation which, in part, relates to a representation election conducted in 1977 among employees of Respondent's meat department.[1]

As of August 1979 each store was managed by a store manager and assistant store manager, both of whom were admittedly supervisors within meaning of the Act. The positions of "third man" also existed as one of providing responsibility in greater depth, but about which controversy exists over whether incumbents at given store locations are or are not statutory supervisors. Each store manager reports directly to Max Smithey, Amarillo grocery supervisor, who in turn reports to Max Tipton, general grocery supervisor. Aside from this line of authority, each meat department is run by a market manager, also an admitted supervisor, and this individual reports directly to Amarillo Market Manager Wendell Robbins.

In early August 1979 a meeting of various union members was conducted by Business Agent Dennis Patterson. From this it was determined to picket Respondent because of unresolved unfair labor practice allegations and to publicly press contention that wages and benefits for Respondent's employees were markedly below other unionized grocery chains.[2] In consequence of this representatives Patterson and Jimmy Shelton accompanied Emily Ramey, Mary Jane Price, and Pricilla Sain to Respondent's Martin Road store where in late afternoon of August 10, Price and Sain donned signs and commenced extending their message to all approaching shoppers that were willing to listen. In the course of doing this, the narrow sidewalk running completely in front of the store, and from which the only entrance was available, was patrolled by constant back and forth walking as to best converge with shoppers coming off the adjoining parking lot while fulfilling Patterson's instructions not to physically block store entry. To those who would listen, the picketers expressly suggested that grocery shopping be diverted to union stores. Seeing awkwardness and uncertainty in Price's accomplishment of this, Patterson arranged for Ramey, who was experienced in picketing from a 1975 strike against Piggly-Wiggly, to briefly substitute and demonstrate technique before moving on to another store location.[3]

Sain testified that soon after the activity began, a person identified as Joe Holliman, who she believed to be a second assistant store manager, appeared from inside and engaged Price in conversation. Shortly after this both Tipton and Smithey arrived at the store, and the former addressed Price as "young lady," saying she must get off the sidewalk or face arrest. Patterson elaborated on Respondent's reaction to this onset of picketing by testimony in which he described his conversation with Holliman, during which the latter became increasingly peevish over the refusal of the union adherents to move off the sidewalk surface and out onto the parking lot or the public right-of-way, even more distant. In the course of this, Patterson recalled Holliman's insistence that the private property be cleared, and an added dogmatic statement about personally seeing that the female picketers would not continue to approach customers. Soon Amarillo police officer Jerry Massengill appeared and sought to mediate the confrontation with aid from a superior. At this point Tipton appeared to add heated remarks about how persons devoted to the Union must fall back to the public domain. Utimately, arrests were made of Price, Sain, Patterson, and Shelton, leading to prosecution for criminal trespass in the municipal court and ultimate acquittal.

[1] In the course and conduct of retail grocery business operations at Amarillo, Texas, Respondent annually receives gross revenue in excess of $500,000 while purchasing and receiving goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Texas. On these admitted facts I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and otherwise that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5).

[3] Initially a comprehensive schedule of picketing was envisaged by Patterson to blanket most of Respondent's Amarillo area operations. This was not in actuality fulfilled, yet sufficient picketing did occur on the original August 10 date and throughout that month to trigger all but one of the episodes comprising this case. The Martin Road store is an integral part of a shopping center comprising several other businesses.

A separate branch of the case concerns remarks about the hiring prospects of those identified with the Union. Sain testified that while working a part-time job at Union Foods Distributor Company (a wholesaler totally unrelated to Respondent) in mid-April, she conversed with Steve Johns about job prospects. Johns was at that time market manager for a Bell Street store of Respondent in Amarillo, and was himself working a part-time second job at United Foods. In her former employment with Respondent, this having ended in 1977 under circumstances that form part of the C cases litigation mentioned above, Sain had worked approximately 1 year for Johns as a meatwraper. In this context, and as occurring about mid-April, it is Sain's testimony that Johns conceded he was just losing a meatwrapper, but in view of all the union troubles and problems associated with Sain as "a Union person" he could not consider her for hire back.

On a separate note, Ramey and Elizabeth Nepper testified that on August 31, after numerous days of picketing the South Washington Street store, they initiated conversation with Store Manager Barry Hawkins about whether he was curious concerning their reasons for picketing. Ramey recalled that his answer to this was "because we didn't hire Union people," while Nepper termed it "yes, because we don't hire Union people," following which she asked incredulously, "you mean we can't work for you?" and heard Hawkins answer, "That's right!"

The testimony of Tipton is that after learning of multistore picketing activities during the afternoon of August 10, he persuaded pickets at a Grand Street store to move some distance away from the customer entrance and then traveled to the store at the Martin Road-Amarillo Boulevard intersection. His first observation there was one of Price (surname Walker) and Sain, who in his view were impeding the approach of customers. Tipton spoke with them, bluntly requesting that they move off the sidewalk and at least out to the parking lot. They summoned Patterson, who engaged Tipton (now joined by Smithey) in conversation. The two agreed to disagree over whether Patterson's members need move off the sidewalk, and after further scattered remarks by Respondent's representatives urging departure off the private property, which constituted the approximate 6-foot-wide sidewalk, both officials returned inside where Smithey telephoned police. Smithey was the individual who formally pressed trespass charges on which prosecution of these four persons proceeded to acquittal.

Regarding the April incident involving Sain, on which paragraph 7(c) of the complaint is based, Johns testified that he was sporadically moonlighting as a meatcutter for United Food Company during the spring of 1979.[4] Johns testified that he randomly worked with Sain as she, too, performed part-time employment there as a meatwrapper and a secretary. He recalled a casual talk with Sain as a person once under his supervision, but denied discussing "anything to do with the Union," saying that if the subject of reemployment arose between them he simply and solely referred her to Respondent's main hiring office.

Hawkins testified that as manager of the South Washington Street store he would see Ramey and Nepper sporadically picketing his store for 6–8 hours per day whenever they appeared during August. He made passing remarks to them about weather, but denied any exchanges about employment or the apparent object of their cause. He expressly denied making any statement of the type attributed to him on August 31.

I defer treatment of the issue that is primarily one of law and concerns the respective rights of parties concerning picketing on a private sidewalk in close proximity to the Martin Road store. Taking first the allegations of paragraph 7(c), I conclude it is not time-barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. A statute of limitations ordinarily takes liberal construction, and here the charge in Case 16–CA–8759 as filed October 12 was not originating at a point in time exceeding fair meaning of the estimate "middle of April." There is no ready way to particularize the date of Johns' claimed remark, and I see no reason to hypertechnically reason that a full 6-month period appears to have preceded such filing. A secondary theory that I note is that the earlier charge, filed in August, contained a "catch-all" allegation sufficient to embrace the April incident. Here the quirk is an apparent merger of all aspects of that charge into the original complaint as issued only for Case 16–CA–8650, which is silent regarding this allegation and therefore seemingly breaks a link by which the requisite relatedness must be shown.

On the merits I am first persuaded to term Sain as a highly credible witness. This is so both intrinsically as her demeanor and consistency under cross-examination would show, and comparatively in terms of Johns' wooden, unimpressive testimony on key points in which he projected some recalcitrance to call out his true memory and for which I discredit his flat denial of subjects conversationally covered. However, that does not end the matter. The exact words described by Sain are not free from ambiguity in terms of whether Johns was enunciating a wrongful intent or commenting on the legal position of his employer having formally resisted her pending claim for reinstatement.[5] Johns is not shown to have had any consistently integral role in Respondent's customary hiring practices for its meat departments, nor can it be said that while utterly unattached from the course of his regularly supervisory employment such a chance remark should be enthusiastically attributed to Respondent. I am convinced that Johns' actual words amounted to no more than comment on Respondent's manifest resistance to Sain's resumed employment, as pressed in the NLRB's primary forum. Finally, Sain could hardly be coerced more drastically than through unlawful discharge and, should the purifying process of law result in this conclusion, her rights will be then fully summarized. For these reasons, I decline to characterize the evidence pertaining to paragraph 7(c) of the complaint as adequate proof of an unfair labor practice.

[4] Johns is now employed as a market manager in one of Respondent's Lubbock, Texas stores. At material times he was market manager at the Bell Street store in Amarillo, supervising five other persons of the meat department.

Regarding paragraph 7(d) of the complaint, I find the same general pattern here as to a finding of fact. Ramey and Nepper were persuasively credible in demeanor, candor, and consistency.[6] Conversely, Hawkins impressed me as blandly unwilling to search his memory, and I doubt his version of limited interchange with the picketers to the point of discrediting it. It is highly probable that these picketers did, as described, tire of a seemingly unproductive effort and politely tease some comment from Hawkins, their most visible adversary. Yet, here his words, when taken most favorable to the General Counsel, are even less actionable than those treated above. Hawkins had been impeccably free of unsolicited comment toward Ramey and Nepper, their approach to him on August 31 had somewhat taunting overtones, and the faint meaning of his words by Ramey's version is that he did no more than restate their own legal posture. For these reasons I again decline to find that the episode constitutes an unfair legal practice.

In Giant Food Markets, 241 NLRB 727 (1979), and Hutzler Bros. Co., 241 NLRB 914 (1979), the Board recently found an 8(a)(1) violation in situations practically indistinguishable from what is represented here. Both cases involved attempted indepth publicity by nonemployees to retail customers imminently entering a shopping center establishment, and threat of arrest directed to such publicists. Relatedly, the physical configuration of boundary streets, vehicular entryways, a large parking surface, and targeted sidewalks having the technical character of private property was essentially the same. Such a layout must tentatively be viewed as the functional equivalent of a "community business block,"[7] although not to the extent that it must be deemed randomly open "to the general public."[8] Picket signs carried by Price and Sain in the instant case were synonymous with those in Giant Food Markets, and thus plainly of "area standards" character.[9]

Given this comparability, the question quickly becomes one of whether consideration of Sears Roebuck & Co. v. Carpenters, 436 U.S. 180 (1978), must dictate a different result. Respondent asserts that in Giant Food Markets the Board incorrectly differed with the United States Supreme Court regarding the significance of area standards picketing, and that in Hutzler the high Court's holding was simply ignored.[10] My own duty is to abide the Board's doctrine, unless unaccountably at odds with evident teaching of the United States Supreme Court.

In Sears, five justices, exclusive of a separate concurrence, traced the interplay of trespassing activity by unionists and the relationship to fundamental accommodation between state and Federal sovereignty as manifesting in the doctrine of preemption. This review covered Garner,[11] Farmer,[12] and Garmon[13], leading the Court to review the fact situation of Sears in which a restraining order of state court caused retreat of picketers who had peacefully patrolled a private walkway in ostensible protest of construction craft personnel being utilized inside an adjoining department store without having been dispatched under an applicable master labor agreement. From this the Court reasoned that the injunctive action was privileged because the controversy presented to the state court was carefully focused only on the location of the picketing, a "critical inquiry" quite different from whatever controversy could have been presented to the Board. Furthermore, the Court was influenced by the picketing union's failure to file an unfair labor practice charge and, that as a beleaguered enterprise Sears was without other effective remedy[14] because an unfair labor practice charge of its own would simply trigger the "complex factual and legal determinations completely unrelated to the simple question whether a trespass had occurred" in terms of whether the picketing had a recognitional or work reassignment objective as such would have triggered "arguable" protection under Garmon in the absence of any contemporaneous state interest of compellingly urgent need to protect. Cf. Laburnum Construction Corp. v. Smith, 347 U.S. 656 (1954); Auto Workers v. Russell, 356 U.S. 634 (1958); Linn v. Plant Guard Workers Local 114, 383 U.S. 53 (1966); Farmer, supra.[15]

The Court complicated its rationale with certain conjectures and assumptions, and in the process was moved to comment that a related principle of NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956), scrutinizes the point at which Section 7 rights other than hardcore organizational activity may be favorably accommodated when a "locus" of their respective nature and strength as compared to "private property rights asserted in any given context" leads to some balanced choice at a point "along the spectrum." At this point in the Sears opinion, the Court was intrigued by whether trespassory activity was [6] It is true, however, that their powers of observation or recollection are somewhat suspect when the two versions of their testimony are compared, particularly about Ramey not adding the colorful and presumably memorable final exchange between Nepper and Hawkins.

[9] The fact that both these individuals were alleged discriminatees in a case awaiting decision following trial does not appreciably change their status as nonemployees. From Respondent's standpoint, and here emphasizing its property rights as technical lessee of realty, such persons were validly discharged for cause and lacked any continued connection to the business. My observation is without force regarding the collateral issues of discharge, but only to highlight that for analytical purposes here they were equitable with nonemployees, particularly since accompanied at the time by staff functionaries of the Union.

[10] Respondent reports in its brief that these Board decisions have been appealed to the Sixth and Fourth Circuit Courts of Appeals, respectively.

[14] The Court expressly discounted the course of meek acquiescence as "legitimately" disdained, or self-help as fraught with undesirable "risk of violence."

inherently usually unprotected, yet tied the matter back into Babcock & Wilcox in the sense that the collateral question of alternative reasonable means of communicating the labor organization's message, or discriminatory treatment of solicitations were each involved. The Court also wrote perhaps its most puzzling sentence,[16] and followed with opinion language and a footnote 42 upon which Respondent here places so much emphasis. Such lengthy passages are quoted below:

> Even on the assumption that picketing to enforce area standards is entitled to the same deference in the Babcock accommodation analysis as organizational solicitation,[42] it would be unprotected in most instances. While there does exist some risk that state courts will on occasion enjoin a trespass that the Board would have protected, the significance of this risk is minimized by the fact that in the cases in which the argument in favor of protection is the strongest, the union is likely to invoke the Board's jurisdiction and thereby avoid the state forum. Whatever risk of an erroneous state-court adjudication does exist is outweighed by the anomolous consequence of a rule which would deny the employer access to any forum in which to litigate either the trespass issue or the protection issue in those cases in which the disputed conduct is least likely to be protected by §7.
> If there is a strong argument that the trespass is protected in a particular case, a union can be expected to respond to an employer demand to depart by filing an unfair labor practice charge; the protection question would then be decided by the agency experienced in accommodating the §7 rights of unions and the property rights of employers in the context of a labor dispute. But if the argument for protection is so weak that it has virtually no chance of prevailing, a trespassing union would be well advised to avoid the jurisdiction of the Board and to argue that the protected character of its conduct deprives that state court of jurisdiction.

[42] This assumption, however, is subject to serious question. Indeed, several factors make the argument for protection of trespassory area-standards picketing as a category of conduct less compelling than that for trespassory organizational solicitation. First, the right to organize is at the very core of the purpose for which the NLRA was enacted. Area-standards picketing, in contrast, has only recently been recognized as a §7 right. Hod Carriers Local 41 (Calumet Contractors Assn.), 133 N.L.R.B. 512 (1961). Second, Babcock makes clear that the interests being protected by according limited-access rights to nonemployee, union organizers are not those of the organizers but of the employees located on the employer's property. The Court indicated that "no . . . obligation is owed nonemployee organizers"; any right they may have to solicit on an employer's property is a derivative of the right of that employer's employees to exercise their organization rights effectively. Area-standards picketing, on the other hand, has no such vital link to the employees located on the employer's property. While such picketing may have a beneficial effect on the compensation of those employees, the rationale for protecting area-standards picketing is that a union has a legitimate interest in protecting the wage standards of its members who are employed by competitors of the picketed employer.

[16] As stated in Sears, 436 U.S. at 205:

> For while there are unquestionably examples of trespassory union activity in which the question whether it is protected is very debatable, experience under the Act teaches that such situations are rare and that a trespass is far more likely to be unprotected than protected.

Cf. Seattle First National Bank, 243 NLRB 898 (1979).

Sears, supra at 206–207.

It is clear that the Board would routinely find a violation on the instant fact situation. In Giant Food Markets the Board sweepingly addressed Respondent's contentions by noting that in a shopping center context the labor organization's intended audience is not readily identifiable, that practicalities of vehicular entry from a public throughfare into such typical parking lots is not conducive to orderly communication, and that area standards picketing is an "affirmatively protected" activity. Hutzler practically made a parody of the alternate means of contact notion by analyzing the singular and collective inadequacy of "newspapers, radio and television stations, billboards, sound trucks, posters and banners, office space rentals, handbill distribution at parking lot entrances, street contacts, telephone contacts and home visits." Were this not enough, the opinion that the Board adopted even treated the prospect of tracing license plate numbers, intercepting persons at nearby bus stops, or attempting to convey the desired message to individuals when found in nearby public places including restaurants. I believe that the meaning of Sears is not only that such a controversy as pertains here is uniquely suited for NLRB resolution, but that the necessary balancing militates in favor of the Union. All of its agents behaved peacefully and with deference to legitimate business interests. No alternate form of publicity was present beyond those types rejected in Hutzler, and an unfair labor practice charge was promptly filed in protest of forced suspension of picketing. Respondent has advanced no compelling property interest in the sense of diminished value, and in fact as a lessee (rather than lessor) is more immune from risk based on such an unwelcome advent.[17] Further, there was an actual admission by Tipton that Respondent has allowed bake sales on its sidewalk, a circumstance no less disruptive to free flow of customers than peaceful picketing seeking only voluntary dialogue even while the approaching person continues or quickens their step toward the entrance.[18]

I believe the most influential factor here was the threat of arrest, the arrival of a police officer, and the subsequent prosecution. Most precedent that pertains to a matter of this type merely involves injunctive relief sought institutionally against a labor organization. Logan Valley, supra; Giant Food Markets, supra; Hutzler Bros., supra. Here a personal jeopardy or apprehension was set in motion without a showing that other less drastic options were not available to Respondent.[19] Again in the sense of a "spectrum," this pugnacious tactic is highly coercive in nature and tips the balance in favor of a remedial restoration of the Section 7 rights so unjustifiably abused. Accordingly, I render conclusions of law that by threatening to cause arrest, and by causing arrest, of the Union's pickets and representatives while they were engaging in protected activity under Section 7 of the Act, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, but that it has not violated the Act in any respect other than as specifically found.

[17] See Peddie Buildings, 203 NLRB 265 (1973); cf. Giant Food Markets in which Wiggins & Co., a party to the proceeding in the capacity of lessor to other respondents, was found to have taken no action and was thus exonerated from allegations of unfair labor practice conduct.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The Respondent, United Supermarkets, Inc., Amarillo, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening to cause arrest, and causing arrest, of any union pickets and representatives while peacefully picketing as part of protected concerted activity at Respondent's portion of the Martin Road-Amarillo Boulevard shopping center.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Amarillo, Texas, area stores and other conspicuous places in the Martin Road-Amarillo Boulevard Shopping Center, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 16, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the consolidated complaint be dismissed in all other respects.

[19] I recognize that in Central Hardware an arrest was made, yet that related to the field organizer of a union who ducked an outdoor confrontation and then persisted in remaining inside the store in guise of a "customer." In Scott Hudgens, 230 NLRB 414 (1977), the tortuous fact situation and procedural background involved unfulfilled threats to arrest pickets. In this latter case no law enforcement figure appeared, and to that extent the arguably protected rights in process were not held up to doubt in the public's eye or in the awareness of an employer's own employees.

[20] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[21] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

30 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 30 January 1984 Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

As found by the judge, the Respondent is "an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry" within the meaning of Section 8(f) of the Act. In John Deklewa & Sons, Inc., 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), the Board overruled R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973), abandoned the conversion doctrine, and modified unit scope rules in 8(f) cases. The Board decided to apply the following principles (at 1377–1378):

> (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3); (2) such agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

Applying Deklewa to the instant case, we reverse the judge and conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. On 27 August 1981 the Respondent entered into a compliance agreement with the Union, which bound it to all provisions of the existing Western and Central Washington Area labor contract between the Associated General Contractors of America and pertinent affiliates of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America. The contract was effective until 1 June 1983. On 8 February 1983 the Respondent repudiated the compliance agreement. The complaint alleges that since that date the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing to continue in full force and effect all the terms and conditions of the agreement.

Under the first Deklewa principle, the collective-bargaining agreement is enforceable under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. However, under the fourth principle, the Union enjoyed no presumption of majority status following the contract's expiration date of 1 June 1983, and thus at that point the Respondent was free to repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship. Therefore we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the 1981–1983 contract with the Union during the contract term and shall limit the make-whole remedy accordingly.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By repudiating its 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and withdrawing recognition from the Union during the term of the collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to make its employees whole, as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the contract from 8 February 1983 until 1 June 1983, with interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[1]

[1] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of the proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. Therefore, any additional amount owed with respect to the health and security fund and pension plan shall be determined in accordance with the procedure set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Ken Hash Construction, Inc., Renton, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Withdrawing recognition during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement from District Council of Carpenters of Seattle, King County and Vicinity, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees covered by the agreement.

(b) Refusing to adhere to its 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union until the 1 June 1983 expiration date.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole the above-described employees, in the manner set forth in the remedy, for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the contract from 8 February 1983 until it expired on June 1983.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Renton, Washington office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by District Council of Carpenters of Seattle, King County and Vicinity, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT, during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement, repudiate that agreement and withdraw recognition from District Council of Carpenters of Seattle, King County and Vicinity, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees covered by the agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make our employees whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of our failure to adhere to the 1981–1983 contract with the Union until the contract expired on 1 June 1983.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Seattle, Washington, September 27, 1983.[1] The charge was filed by District Council of Carpenters of Seattle, King County and Vicinity (the Union), on May 13, and the complaint was issued June 28. The primary issues are whether Ken Hash Construction, Inc. (Respondent), repudiated a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union on February 8, and thereafter until June unlawfully failed to maintain in effect former terms and conditions of employment, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent maintains an office and place of business in Renton, Washington, where it is engaged as a general contractor in commercial building construction. During a representative past 12-month period, it had gross sales in excess of $500,000 and sold goods or provided services valued in excess of $30,000 from facilities in Washington to customers within the State, each of whom met an other than indirect jurisdictional standard of the National Labor Relations Board, while during that same representative period purchasing goods and materials directly from outside the State valued at $2500, and purchasing goods and materials from suppliers within Washington, each of whom had in turn obtained such goods and materials directly from sources outside the State, valued at $30,000. Respondent admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5).

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Basis of Analysis

On August 27, 1981, Respondent entered into a compliance agreement with the Union, which bound it to all provisions of the existing Western and Central Washington Area labor contract between the Associated General Contractors of America (AGC) and pertinent affiliates of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (UBCJA). Thereafter in workweeks from that ending Wednesday, September 23, 1981, to that ending February 9, Respondent paid applicable wage scale to its carpenter employees and made periodic contributions to benefit funds. On February 8 Ken Hash, Respondent's president, wrote the Union advising that the initial compliance agreement was repudiated.

During the approximate 18-month period following its effectiveness, Respondent had performed various jobs within the Union's geographical jurisdiction as a tenant improvement contractor. About half these were at Bellevue Square Shopping Center, while the balance were miscellaneous commercial or residential projects in the vicinity. Respondent's steadiest employee was Steven Schneider, a cousin-in-law to Hash. Schneider worked close to a full-time basis during October and November 1981, and then tapered off into the new year following which he did not reappear on the payroll for 6 months because of a skiing injury. Then for the fall and winter months of 1982–1983, his pattern of hours worked resembled those of the prior year. Schneider's chief replacement was S. Robert Tellefson, who averaged 72 hours per week from February through June 1982 and worked briefly again in the fall. Two other persons with significant employment were Jerry Wysocki and John Stenslie, whose total annual hours of at least 230 each were concentrated in early and late 1982, respectively. Hash utilized Chris Hall as a carpenter for 104 hours work in early 1982 and employed former coworker Alvin Klein for 128 hours spread over September and October of that year. Robert Bineck worked an insignificant 30 hours during spring of 1982, and Keith Hanson had a tryout as journeyman carpenter in August, which lasted only 14 hours.

Of Respondent's approximately 20 projects during times material to the case, excluding those under 8 hours total time, Schneider worked on 13, Tellefson worked on 5, while Wysocki and Stenslie each worked on 4. All carpenters employed by Respondent were members of locals affiliated with the Union, and the only cessation of membership involved Schneider who took a withdrawal from Local 1797 in March 1983.

B. Analysis

This is a classic situation of an employer executing a prehire agreement authorized by Section 8(f) of the Act at a time when it had no employees, and then commencing operations appropriate to its business purpose. In that setting the questions are those of whether a permanent and stable work force was achieved, and whether the Union represented a majority of an appropriate unit within such work force.

Here the very nature of Respondent's business anticipates the random deployment of carpenters as various renovation work progresses towards completion. A service of this type is not akin to construction projects in which employment concentrates in a series of discrete jobsites. For this reason the overall profile of when and to what degree carpenters were utilized is the most revealing test on the issue of whether operations led to reopening of the compliance agreement into a recognizable bargaining obligation under Section 9(a).

Such an examination shows only limited, sporadic use of the craft, insufficient to demonstrate that a requisite nucleus of employees was at any time the core work force of permanence and stability over any significant period of time. Cf. Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60 (1980). With rare exception, there was only one carpenter with substantial employment in each of the passing months. The first such occasion was that of November 1981 when Wysocki joined Schneider to the extent of 40 hours work during the month. Wysocki did not continue on the payroll during December 1981 and reappeared for only 114 and 90 hours in February and March 1982, respectively, plus an insignificant 3 hours work later in June. Tellefson became Schneider's essential replacement, but aside from February and March 1982 when he combined variously with Wysocki and Hall for 195 and 214 total monthly hours of work he did not function as part of any appreciable nucleus of employees until Schneider himself had returned by September 1982. In that month, as well as October and November directly following, Respondent's use of carpenters peaked with 289, 307, and 258 hours, respectively. However, these totals include Klein, who worked only portions of 2 consecutive months and Hanson, who was quickly found unqualified. From December 1982 onward only Schneider remained on the payroll, the consequence of this overall review showing only fortuitous, casual and irregular calling of personnel in a manner that lacks the requisite doctrinal characteristic of permanence and stability, let alone a showing of employee combinations for even a significant span of time.

Beginning with 1983, Respondent employed only Schneider, a circumstance leaving the carpenter craft bargaining unit inappropriate. The same policy grounds that influence the Board to decline issuing certifications in single person units apply when it is sought to elevate an 8(f) undertaking to that in which majority representative status is claimed. Accordingly, I render a conclusion of law that Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged.

General Portland Inc./Fort Worth Plant and Cement, Lime, Gypsum Allied Workers Division of International Brotherhood of the Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL–CIO. Case 16–CA–11785

30 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 12 September 1985 Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The Respondent filed cross-exceptions and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Inasumuch as we agree with the judge that the Union's assertion of safety complaints was a pretext to engage in a series of work stoppages, we find it unnecessary to rely on his alternative finding that the Union was obligated to follow the prior grievance procedure for matters which allegedly arose during the extended term of the prior contract. We also find no need to rely on the judge's discussion in fn. 31 of his decision of the legality of an employer's use of permanent and temporary replacements during a lockout. See Harter Equipment, 280 NLRB 597 (1986).

[2] In dismissing the complaint, we emphasize our reliance on the particular facts of this case in which the Respondent had legitimate and substantial justification for placing conditions on the strikers' reinstatement. We further find that the General Counsel has failed to meet the burden of proving actual antiunion intent or that in the circumstances of this case the Respondent's insistence on 21 days' advance written notice of work stoppages and/or its later revised 3 days' advance notice requirement constituted inherently destructive conduct. We also find that the present case is distinguishable from the cases cited by the General Counsel and the Charging Party, in which the Board found that employers had unlawfully conditioned the strikers' reinstatement after they had unconditionally offered to return to work. Unlike here, in Brooks, Inc., 228 NLRB 1365 (1977), the strikers were unfair labor practice strikers and there were no threats by the union of future strikes. American Cyanamid Co., 235 NLRB 1316 (1978), involved unfair labor practice strikers and the employer's requirement of an absolute waiver of reinstatement rights for the strikers, whose jobs had been permanently contracted out, and a 1-year bargaining waiver. Although Lindy's Food Center, 232 NLRB 1001 (1977), and Roadhome Construction Corp., 170 NLRB 668 (1968), involved economic strikers, they are distinguishable because the employers there did not prove a legitimate and substantial business justification for conditions placed on the strikers' reinstatement.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

J. O. Dotson, Esq., for the General Counsel
Ray J. Schoonhooven, Esq., Frederic H. Fischer, Esq., and Kay Ann Hoogland, Esq. (Seyfarth, Shaw, Fairweather & Geraldson), of Chicago, Illinois, for the Respondent
Stephen B. Rubin, Esq. (Asher, Pavalon, Gittler & Greenfield), of Chicago, Illinois, for the Charging Party

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge. At the end of an economic strike called by the Union to protest the suspension of several bargaining unit employees, the Respondent refused to accept the unconditional offer of the strikers to return to work, and it locked out everyone not then working until the Union agreed to give an advance notice of 21 days before calling any future work stoppages. I find that Respondent acted lawfully when it conditioned the return of the strikers on the Union's signing an agreement to give 21 days' notice before commencing any future work stoppages, and I shall dismiss the complaint.

This case was tried before me in Fort Worth, Texas, on 22–25 April 1985 pursuant to the 7 March 1985 complaint issued by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 16 of the Board. The complaint is based on a charge filed 10 August 1984 by Cement, Lime, Gypsum Allied Workers Division of International Brotherhood of the Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL–CIO (Union or Charging Party), against General Portland Inc./Fort Worth Plant (Respondent, GP, or General Portland).[1]

In the complaint the General Counsel alleges that during July-September the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by conditioning reinstatement of strikers at its Fort Worth, Texas plant on a requirement that the Union agree in writing to give Respondent advance notice of up to 30 days before commencing a work stoppage, and by refusing to reinstate strikers when the Union declined to agree to Respondent's condition.

By its first amended answer Respondent admits certain factual matters, denies violating the Act, and pleads several affirmative defenses.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Union, and the Respondent, I make the following

[1] All dates are for 1984 unless otherwise indicated.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

A Delaware corporation with a plant in Fort Worth, Texas, Respondent manufactures, sells, and distributes cement. During the past 12 months, Respondent purchased and received at its Fort Worth plant products exceeding $50,000 in cost directly from points located outside the State of Texas. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The parties stipulated, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act (1:33).[2] Although Respondent so stipulated, it expressly reserved its position that the Union is not the statutory representative of Respondent's employees at the Fort Worth plant. The relevance of this contention is discussed later.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

1. The Fort Worth plant

At its Fort Worth plant Respondent manufactures Portland cement, oil well cement, and other cement-related products. Division General Sales Manager William E. Smith was the manager of Respondent's Fort Worth plant during the 1984 events made the subject of this proceeding (3:596). Smith described in detail the nature of the cement production at Fort Worth and the type of equipment and machinery used. He also submitted a four-page document describing the process (R. Exh. 28).

Raw materials are crushed and formed into a slurry. The slurry is fed in a continuous process into three kilns where it is burned at a temperature of about 2700 degrees Fahrenheit (4:783; R. Exh. 28 at 1). The burning causes the slurry to form into black balls known as clinker (3:622). The clinker is reground with a small percentage of gypsum into Portland cement. The finished product is stored in silos and thereafter shipped to customers (3:622–624).

The heart of this pyroprocessing line, as it is called, is the rotary kiln and its ancillary equipment (3:612). The kiln is a huge horizontal cylinder 11 feet in diameter, over 400 feet long, with walls made of three-fourths-inch steel (3:620, 641). Each kiln is positioned on six sets of rollers and, in the continuous process, rotates about its longitudinal axis about one revolution per minute (R. Exh. 28 at 1). Excluding the refactory brick lining the kiln, the material inside the kiln weighs from 60 to 200 tons or more (3:641; R. Exh. 28 at 4). There is a complex system of fans used to exhaust the heated air and to assist in what cooling is undertaken. General Sales Manager Smith estimated the current cost of replacing a kiln at $15 to $20 million (3:638; R. Exh. 28 at 2).

On leaving the kiln, clinker is moved to the finish mill where it is ground into powder before being stored and shipped to customers. Finish mills also are cylinders, although they are "only" 13 feet in diameter and 16 feet long. They are half full of 3-inch steel balls which grind the clinker into powder as the cylinders are rotated (3:648). As with the kilns, the replacement cost for a finish mill is $15 to $20 million (3:648).

As one might expect with the extreme heat utilized in the kilns,[3] and with the presence of gases there is an abundance of danger from the possibility of explosions which can result in the loss of life and result in damage in the millions of dollars (3:639). Smith described a 1981 incident at Fort Worth resulting in the death of two workers from a steam explosion caused when water rushed into the superhot area of the kiln (4:871–872).

As the record reflects, training of the kiln operator (burner) is extensive, and Respondent has issued its kiln burner employees an instruction manual containing over 60 pages (3:632).[4] Two other employees work with the kiln, a feeder employee and an oiler. The burner, of course, has the critical duties. Respondent's around-the-clock operation requires that employees working in continuous process jobs, including the kilns, change shifts at their duty stations (3:618, 626).

Although massive in size, the kilns are delicate equipment because of the extremely high temperatures used in production. Improperly shutting down a kiln poses severe risks to both people and property. Smith testified that it is during shutdown that the greatest hazard potential exists for explosions, injury, and damage (3:638, 642).

In the production process the kiln expands over 10 inches in length (3:640). When a kiln is shut down, such as for maintenance, a specific procedure is followed. the burner's instruction manual contains three pages devoted to this critical sequence (3:632, R. Exh. 30). A procedure is described for an emergency shutdown. As the kiln cools during the shutdown, it must be rotated every few minutes or it can warp into a giant, useless steel banana (3:640).

As one would anticipate, the normal shutdown time takes longer than is required for an emergency situation. Smith testified that it required 3 days for Respondent to completely shut down kiln 3 in mid-May (4:785–786, 793, 814). However, it appears that kilns are not normally shut down completely to effect minor maintenance or adjustments, particularly when the adjustments occur away from the superhot area of the kiln.

International Representative Paul H. Balliet estimated that it would take 12 to 16 hours to shut down a kiln the size of Respondent's (2:231). He further testified that the rotating could be done periodically and, therefore, the kiln would not have to be attended constantly during the (emergency, apparently) shutdown procedure (2:239–240). I credit Smith over Balliet to the extent there are differences on this. Smith has had much more experience in the cement industry, and he is particularly familiar with the equipment at Respondent's Fort Worth plant.

Smith testified that the emergency procedure requires at least 16 hours of constant attention to shut down a kiln safely (4:765–766, 785, 825). The kiln must be rotated one quarter turn up to four or five times the first 30 minutes (3:640; 4:765), and periodically the balance of the 16 hours (4:784).[5] After the first 16 hours the attendant can cease his constant attention to the kiln and occasionally walk away from it, but even after the 16 hours the kiln still must be turned at different intervals (4:784–787). By the 36-hour mark, Smith testified, an attendant could go to the kiln every hour or so and rotate it slightly (4:826).

The principal focus has been on the kiln, but there are other functions Respondent classifies as part of the continuous process, including the finish mills. Although explosions are not one of the dangers from incorrect operation or an improper shutdown of a finish mill, such actions can result in extensive damage of motors, bearings, equipment, and product (3:648–651). Smith testified that in an emergency a finish mill could be shut down in 15 to 20 minutes (4:767).

2. Bargaining history

Respondent and the Union have been parties to a succession of collective-bargaining agreements (CBA) at the Fort Worth plant (2:84). Recognition is extended there by Respondent to the United Cement, Lime, Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, and its local unions. Local 68 was the union designated for the Fort Worth plant. Respondent negotiated a basic agreement for general application plus supplemental agreements covering the different plants, such as the Fort Worth plant. By its terms, the most recent CBA was effective from 1 May 1981 through 30 April 1984 (R. Exh. 14). Through agreement, the parties extended the contract until either mid-May[6] or 9 July at 7 a.m.[7] Smith, then the plant manager at Fort Worth but now the division sales manager, also testified that after 15 May the parties engaged in further bargaining, but those negotiations were unsuccessful (3:600–601).

Before passing from 15 May, I should note that on that date Smith called Balliet and asked if he would promise an orderly shutdown in the event of a work stoppage. Balliet agreed that he would do so (3:599). Balliet confirmed this at the hearing (2:185). Moreover, Smith credibly testified that Local 68 President Pilcher gave him the same promise on this occasion (3:600). Pilcher did not testify.

It is undisputed that the morning of 9 July (apparently with the start of the 7 a.m. shift) Respondent implemented the terms of its last best offer which it had made to the Union (3:601). From the testimony of International Representative Paul H. Balliet (2:186) and Local 68 President Odis W. Johnson (2:270),[8] it is clear that the Union was aware, or had been notified, that Respondent planned to implement its last offer at that time.[9]

B. The Strike of 9 July 1984 and Subsequent Events

1. Union meeting of 8 July 1984 at Holiday Inn

On Sunday evening, 8 July, the Union held a meeting at a local Holiday Inn. International Representatives Balliet and Hammond attended, along with Local 68's president, Richard Pilcher, Vice President Odis Johnson, plus three or four employees who apparently were members of one or more committees of the Union. About 10 persons were present.

Regardless of whether the initial purpose of the meeting concerned safety, it is clear that at the meeting a discussion ensued concerning a technique of confronting management. Balliet testified that he made available to those in attendance some 10 photocopies of two pages[10] from some book describing a tactic of confrontation allegedly used by UAW Local 282 in St. Louis in 1981 (2:195, 244).

The copied material relates a story concerning UAW Local 282 and Moog Automotive, and begins with the sentence, "Another alternative is what used to be called a 'slowdown strike.'" The article states that in September 1981 Moog Automotive, Inc., a parts supplier, presented the 500-member local with a final offer which would have cut wages by $3 an hour while boasting of record sales and making a 38-percent return on investment.

Rather than calling a traditional strike in the face of probable replacements from the 100,000 unemployed in St. Louis, the Union decided on a different tactic described as follows in Balliet's leaflet:

> When the contract expired, all rules were off. Workers in every department were signed up for a "Solidarity Committee." Under the leadership of a committee, the Moog workers began to "work to rule," refuse overtime, hold union meetings on the plant floor during lunch, and take concerted action to directly confront management over health and safety and production problems right on the spot. Most workers gave a dollar a week to a Solidarity Fund to help workers who might be suspended or fired. "We developed our own strategy on handling grievances," says Mike Cannon, shop chairman. "Workers would all get together, turn off their ma-

[5] Much more is involved than simply rotating the kiln. Thus, the coal feed is stopped, the temperature must be reduced gradually, and other items, such as fans and chains, have to be stopped (R. Exh. 30 at 4).

[6] Thomas W. Tatum, Respondent's vice president of employee relations, testified that August Clavier Jr., the Union's contract negotiator, canceled the contract extension about 10 May (2:507). Smith, the former plant manager, testified that the Union's cancellation was effective for 15 May (3:598).

[8] Johnson took office as president of Local 68 on 1 January 1985. He was vice president of Local 68 during the preceding 3 years (2:251; 3:544).

[9] By letter dated 7 November 1984, NLRB Region 16 dismissed charges in two related cases. The dismissal letter reports that, by letter of 5 July, Respondent informed the Union that it planned to implement on 9 July the terms of its last offer (R. Exh. 5). I note this only in passing, for the 5 July letter is not in evidence, and the 7 November dismissal letter is in evidence only to show a course of events and not as evidence of the truth of independent factual assertions contained in the letter.

chines, and walk into the supervisors' offices. The foremen would cry, "Get back to work," but we insisted on talking about the specific problem until it was resolved."

On January 15, Martin Luther King's birthday, almost the entire work force stayed home. By March, the union was calling regular noontime and breaktime rallies inside the plant. Three times it called plantwide "Solidarity Days" on company time at the union hall. Over 80% of the employees attended.

Moog responded by stepping up the discipline. One worker received a suspension and reprimand for allegedly turning off his machine two minutes before quitting time. He taped the reprimand to the back of his shirt. When the foreman told him he couldn't do that, 70% of the workers in the department taped reprimand forms to their shirts too. The next day, the foreman was transferred.

Finally, Moog capitulated. The workers ratified an agreement that gave them a raise retroactive to their contract expiration date, two more raises over three years, COLA, insurance improvements, Martin Luther King's birthday as a paid holiday, a special grievance procedure on health and safety, and total amnesty and back pay for every single one of the seven members fired and 43 suspended during the six months of the action.

It is clear that the Union here planned to employ a similar tactic at the Fort Worth plant. Thus, a scheme was devised whereby employees would walk off the job the following morning for the purpose of attending a "safety meeting" at 7:30 a.m.

International Representative Hammond testified that he told the Holiday Inn group of how he had used the tactic on two occasions of expanding the safety and grievance committees at Kaiser Cement Company to encompass the whole shift. The Kaiser contract had expired and the Union previously had been unsuccessful in getting Kaiser to discuss the safety (inspecting spindles on quarry trucks) and grievance (Kaiser refusing to allow employees to take emergency calls) matters. According to Hammond, when Kaiser saw that its entire shift of workers had walked off the job and assembled to discuss the safety/grievance matters as a committee of the whole, the Company began talking, the problems were resolved, and the employees returned to work (3:517–518). Hammond then testified (3:518): "I told them that is what we want to do tomorrow."

Hammond further testified that the employees were to ask for relief before leaving their jobs to join the expanded safety committee, and that if Respondent refused to relieve them, then the employees were to shut down their equipment in an orderly fashion without harming anything. Referring to a passage in a book on labor law, Hammond warned the group that the employees' conduct would lose its protected status if the employees damaged equipment, cautioned that the Union could be sued, and told of other adverse consequences (3:516).

Odis Johnson testified that following the Holiday Inn meeting he telephoned several employees at home and told them to attend a safety meeting the next morning. He told them that between 7 and 7:30 a.m. they should ask for relief to attend a safety meeting, and to leave even if they received no relief (2:271–272).

During July–August 1984 C. E. Bartholomew was chairman of Local 68's grievance committee (2:289). He testified that although some of the Holiday Inn attendees were going to call employees that evening, other attendees planned to meet employees as they clocked in the next morning and give them their instructions at that time (2:306).

Testimony confirming all or parts of Hammond's version came from Balliat (2:241–242), Odis Johnson (2:268), C. E. Bartholomew (2:305), Gary L. Gann (3:390–391), and Clyde D. Carter (3:421). Balliet testified that the time suggested to wait for relief before shutting down was 15 minutes (2:248), but that no specific instructions were given to the kiln operators (2:242). Carter testified that as Tim Worthen, the burner/operator of kiln 3, was not present at the meeting, Carter spent about 30 minutes the next morning explaining to Worthen, and to finish mill operator Spencer Hart, that they should shut down their equipment in an orderly fashion if they were not relieved. At the hearing Carter did not define the "orderly fashion" in terms of minutes or hours, and if it differed from the 15 minutes described by Balliet the record does not show it.

During July–August 1984 Gary L. Gann was Local 68's financial secretary and a member of the grievance committee and the negotiating committee (3:376–377). Under cross-examination, Gann confirmed that the Holiday Inn group agreed that the only way the Union could force Respondent to return to the bargaining table was to use the confrontational tactic described to them by Hammond (3:397).

Finally, respecting the photocopy of a page describing the Moog Automotive confrontation, International Representative Balliet testified on cross-examination (2:195–196):

> Q. How do you recognize it?
> A. I reproduced this from a book and handed it on Sunday night to a few employees, members.
> Q. I see. To a few members, I see. What was the purpose of your introducing it and handing it out on Sunday night?
> A. Because of the—it is the Moog case, Moog Automotive case, in regards to protected concerted activity.
> Q. You handed it out so the employees would learn about in-plant tactics. Right?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And about confrontations with management. Right?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And is this what you were doing on Monday morning?
> A. Yes.
> . . . .
> Q. This in-plant confrontation which is described in this document is what you were engaging in on July 9, the morning, is it not?

A. Yes.

References to safety problems at the Holiday Inn apparently were rather vague and limited, as is the testimony concerning the subject. It seems that a certain P & H crane was considered unsafe by Odis Johnson. However, Johnson testified that his complaint about the crane was several months old (2:270). He concedes that he had never filed a grievance concerning the crane nor was he aware of anyone having filed a grievance over the crane's safety (2:270–271). Johnson also testified that he complained at the meeting about the taste of the water (2:270).

Respondent contends that the Union's reliance on safety was nothing but a cloak to mask a "quickie strike" or a form of industrial harassment (1:13; brief at 55–58). The purpose of this confrontation tactic was to bring Respondent back to the bargaining table (3:397, Gann) and, perhaps, to dissuade Respondent from its plan to implement its last offer the morning of 9 July. As we recall, Odis Johnson testified that the Holiday Inn group decided to confront Respondent on 9 July with safety issues because Respondent was going to implement its last offer unilaterally (2:270).

2. Events of 9 July 1984

There can be no doubt that the union officers and committee members successfully spread the word that the entire first shift on 9 July was to seek relief and report for a safety meeting at 7:30 a.m.

As then Plant Manager Smith testified, Respondent implemented its last contract offer effective the morning of 9 July (3:601). About 25 minutes into the 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. shift, the intercom, Smith testified, "exploded" with calls (3:601).[11]

Several witnesses testified concerning what occurred thereafter. About 7:30 a.m. International Representatives Hammond and Balliet, accompanied by Odis Johnson and Gary Gann, arrived at Smith's office and were invited in. Several other employees stood outside the door and looked in.

As this was Hammond's first visit to the Fort Worth plant, he introduced himself to Smith and stated that they were there to discuss some safety problems, specifically the P & H crane "plus others." Smith said he would be willing to discuss safety but that there was a procedure for doing so. Hammond inquired whether Respondent had implemented its last offer, and Smith replied yes. Hammond replied, "We will be operating under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act." Hammond then said the plant would be shut down to bring in all the employees to discuss the safety matters. Smith responded that the plant would not be shut down, that all the employees would not have to attend, and that there was a procedure for discussing safety problems.

By this time several people were speaking at once. The confusion deepened when a supervisor, Administrative Services Manager David E. Parsons, arrived and advised Smith that the kiln 1 operator (Pilcher) was demanding relief in 5 minutes to attend a meeting, and that he, Parsons, has advised the operator not to leave his job or he would be suspended pending discharge.

A moment later Maurice Simpson, first-shift supervisor, arrived and informed Smith that the kiln 3 operator (Tim Worthen) and the finish mill operator (Spencer Hart) were demanding relief in 5 minutes.

Smith then requested Hammond and the union group to go to the conference room, but they declined, saying they would go down to the parking lot to join their brothers. Turning to Parsons and Simpson, Smith instructed them to go into the plant and find out what was happening.

Downstairs the Hammond-Balliet group found employees gathering, and Local 68 Richard Pilcher (kiln 1 burner) informed Hammond that he was to be suspended and terminated for leaving his job when the Company refused to relieve him. About seven other employees informed Hammond that the same fate had befallen them (2:86, Hammond; 3:405, Gann).

The Hammond-Balliet group, this time larger in number, went back upstairs to speak with Smith. The hallway was full of employees, and several were speaking at once. Hammond told Smith that several employees told him they had been suspended pending discharge, and that Hammond wanted the suspensions lifted. Smith replied that he would discuss safety matters, but that he would not agree to anything regarding discipline at that point. Hammond stated that they would not talk about safety until the suspensions were lifted. Hammond warned Smith that he was violating the law because the employees had a right to discuss safety matters with Respondent in this manner and that this is the way they would do business since there was no contract (3:604, Smith).[12]

Smith stated that the same safety discussion procedures were in effect that existed before the contract terminated. Hammond responded that they were not bound to that because there was no contract. Hammond said they would return to the parking lot until Smith came to his senses and agreed not to discipline the employees. The time was about 7:45 to 8 a.m. (3:605). The Hammond-Balliet group returned to the parking area by the building.

About this time Smith observed that a large crowd of employees had gathered in the parking lot under the windows of the administrative offices. A group of about 15 seated themselves by a wall and fixed a stare on the plant manager's office. Meanwhile, supervisors and managers were scrambling to operate the plant and protect the equipment (3:610).

At this time many of the employees[13] began singing a song, "Solidarity Forever," the lyrics of which assert that there is strength for workers through union solidarity (R. Exhs. 2, inside back cover, and 3).

Around 8:40 to 8:50 a.m., Smith dispatched supervisor Bartlett to invite Hammond and his group back upstairs.

[11] Presumably the calls were about employees requesting relief.

[12] Balliet confirms this testimony and also concedes that Hammond said there would be more of these meetings (2:192–193).

[13] Of the 65 first-shift employees, 64 walked off the job (3:611). Hammond testified that these ranks swelled to 100 or more by employees from the second and third shifts (1:89, 90).

When they had arrived, Smith told Hammond that Respondent was willing to meet on safety matters, but that the Company would not change its position regarding discipline. The union group asserted that it would not discuss safety under those circumstances, and the union group returned to the parking lot.

About 9:30 a.m., after a police cruiser arrived on Respondent's request, Smith went to the parking lot and, from the back of a pickup, instructed the employees to leave the premises. The employees thereupon repaired to the union hall.

At the union hall the group held a meeting and decided to strike in protest of Respondent's suspension of some of the employees who had engaged in the work stoppage (2:89, Hammond; 2:149–150, Balliet; 2:253, 277, Johnson).

Around 11:30 a.m., Hammond telephoned Smith and informed him that the Union was commencing a strike at noon to protest Respondent's unfair labor practices. Unknown to Hammond, Supervisor Parsons was listening on an extension, took notes, and testified concerning the conversation. Consistent with the version of Smith and Parsons, I find that Hammond did not mention the suspensions specifically. I note that the charge Balliet filed that very day in Case 16–CA–11725, discussed below, alleges violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5). It is immaterial whether Hammond specifically referred to the suspensions when he spoke to Hammond.

The Union established a picket line at noon on 9 July and did not cease picketing until the morning of 10 August. About 10 July Hammond returned to California, and Balliet remained in Fort Worth until August (2:150). The legend on the picket signs asserted that the strike was to protest unfair labor practices (2:253).

3. Correspondence and later events

During the week following 9 July there were many contacts between the parties, including correspondence and discussions in person.

By mailgram dated 13 July, the Union, by International Representative/Coordinator Paul H. Balliet, notified Smith of the "continued availability" applied to all bargaining unit employees, including those previously suspended. Balliet ends the mailgram by stating, "It is our position that all bargaining unit employees are entitled to full back pay." (G.C. Exh. 2.)

Smith wired a reply on 14 July suggesting the parties discuss matters (G.C. Exh. 3). On 16 July the parties met at a local motel, the Sandpiper, to discuss the situation. Smith described Respondent's conditions for the return. First, the Union, both the International and Local 68, must promise in writing to give written notice at least 30 days in advance of any future work stoppage. Second, Respondent would continue its investigation and would impose discipline in its discretion. Third, there would be no backpay. Balliet expressed no position, but said he would notify Smith later of the Union's response.

Two days later Balliet requested Smith to put Respondent's conditions in writing. Smith did so by letter dated 19 July (G.C. Exh. 5). No reference is made by Smith to backpay, but the other two items (investigation will continue and discipline where appropriate, and a 30-day notice) are. The paragraph setting forth Respondent's position on the 30-day notice is pertinent and reads (G.C. Exh. 5):

> Dear Mr. Balliet:

In light of that and to preclude further potential damage by sudden and unannounced work stoppage, the Company will require as the sole condition upon the return to work of the strikers, a commitment in writing, from the International and Local Union representatives that the Union (International and Local) will give the Company at least thirty (30) days written notice in advance of any future work stoppage by employees of this plant.

By letter dated 24 July, Balliet and Pilcher, signing for the International and Local, respectively, expressed the opinion that Respondent's condition for returning employees was unlawful. In their last sentence, Balliet and Pilcher state (G.C. Exh. 6):

> We also assure you that should any further walkouts be necessitated by your conduct, adequate notice will be given so as to avoid jeopardizing the plant and equipment.

Smith wrote back on 27 July asking Balliet to please define adequate notice "in some quantifiable time frame." (G.C. Exh. 7.)

Balliet replied by letter of 30 July defining adequate notice as being "'Lawfully and reasonably sufficient,' so as to avoid jeopardizing the plant and equipment." (G.C. Exh. 8.)

The jousting over the issue of adequate notice set the parties in their respective positions thereafter. As we shall see, it directly impacted on the employees when they tried to return to work on and after 10 August, the date the strike ended and picketing ceased. Indeed, the debate has carried over to the legal issues to be decided.

The next correspondence is Smith's letter of 4 August to Balliet. As the letter explains Respondent's position, the full text is quoted here. The date of 9 July 1984, appearing in the letter's second paragraph, is shown as corrected by stipulation at the hearing (2:184). The text of the letter reads (G.C. Exh. 9):

Dear Mr. Balliet:

On July 9, 1984, Fort Worth Plant bargaining unit employees walked off the job in concert without any advance notice or warning. International Representative Hammond, during his discussion with me on July 9, 1984, stated that the Union would be doing business in such a manner, that is, shutting down the plant and then talking.

As I indicated to you in my letter of July 19, 1984, the Company cannot subject its equipment to potential damage by sudden and unannounced work stoppages by employees. By the behavior of employees and Mr. Hammond's comments on July 9, 1984, the Company feels that it has a high risk exposure to such "quickie" work stoppages. To protect against this exposure, I previously advised you that the Company will require, as the sole condition upon the return to work of the strikers, a commitment in writing, from the International and Local Union representatives that the Union (International and Local) will give the Company at least thirty (30) days written notice in advance of any future work stoppage by employees of this plant.

In subsequent correspondence, you have indicated that "adequate notice" will be given by the Union "so as to avoid jeopardizing the plant and equipment." To date, however, you have not provided the Company with a measure of time in quantifiable terms that advance notice will be given.

So that the Company can properly evaluate whether it can safely operate the Fort Worth plant under the Union's proposed advance notice terms, please provide me with the number of days or hours of advance notice prior to commencement of future work stoppages that you will guarantee will be given by the Union (International and Local). Upon receipt of your quantified advance notice terms, the Company will determine whether it can accept them or, alternatively, whether some compromise time period is acceptable, and I will respond to you accordingly.

Very truly yours,

Balliet responded by his letter of 11 August. Before reaching that letter, however, we must consider the intervening events. Following Smith's letter of 4 August, the parties met on 9 August at the first guard shack at the entrance of the plant. Balliet was accompanied by about two or three committeemen.

It appears that at the 9 August meeting (at times there was confusion by several talking at once) the parties reiterated their positions initially. Shortly before the meeting at the guard shack, Smith had met with his staff and decided that they could reduce the advance notice from 30 days to 21 as the minimum time required to get the manpower needed to operate the plant in a safe and effective manner (4:691–692). Therefore, when one of the union people inquired[14] at the gate (first guard shack) meeting what Respondent's bottom line was, Smith replied 21 days.[15] Balliet (4:696, Smith) and/or Gary Gann (3:409, Gann) asked why the 21 days were needed. Smith responded by reminding Balliet of their conversation of 15 May in which Balliet had assured Smith that adequate notice would be given in the event a strike was called (4:694, 696).[16]

Smith further asserted, in effect, that the written notice was required because Respondent considered the Union's surprise strike of 9 July to have been both (1) a reneging on Balliet's 15 May assurance, and (2) wholly inadequate as to notice (4:699). He also explained that the time was needed in order to man the plant (3:409, Gann).

Balliet remarked that Respondent had not required the four employees who had left the strike and crossed the picket line to sign such a document (2:218–219).[17] Smith replied that the difference was that conditions were not the same because the others had crossed the picket line (4:697–698).

The Union group told Smith that they could not agree to sign Respondent's document or agree to the time. Balliet announced that the pickets would be removed the next morning by 7 a.m. for the purpose of returning to work as the other four employees had done, as individuals with no conditions (2:222–223, Balliet; 3:378, Gann; 4:700, Smith).

Smith replied that the strikers would not be coming back as the others had, for the others had crossed the picket line and the strikers were engaging in concerted activity (4:700). Smith stated that the strikers would have to be phased back in to allow the contractors' employees to be released in an orderly manner.[18] (2:221; 4:693) He asked Balliet what schedule they intended to return on, and Balliet replied "on our schedule." (2:222, Balliet; 4:701, Smith.)

During the meeting Balliet, in reference to Respondent's advance notice requirement, stated that although the Union would not sign a notice agreement, it would agree to work for 15 days after returning to work. When Smith asked what would happen on the 16th day, Balliet replied that he did not know (2:219; 3:393; 4:699).[19]

The positions expressed the next morning, 10 August, set the pattern that the parties followed thereafter. As Balliet had stated, the strike ended and the pickets were removed by 7 a.m. Committeeman C. E. Bartholomew, in the presence of Odis Johnson and a large group of em-

[14] It is unclear whether Clyde Carter (3:378) or Balliet (4:692) inquired.

[15] Earlier in the meeting Smith furnished a written promise for the Unions to sign commiting to give written notice of at least 30 days in advance of any future work stoppage (G.C. Exh. 10). Although Smith places the event as later in the meeting (4:700), the difference is immaterial.

[17] Smith testified that it was five, not four, employees who crossed the picket line and returned to work and that they indeed were not required to sign any commitment such as required of the Union (4:697, 751, 803).

[18] Respondent had been operating its plant with supervisors, employees, and supervisors from other plants of General Portland, and employees of contractors. No permanent replacements were hired.

[19] At some earlier point Balliet had offered a guarantee that the employees would work 30 days without striking.

ployees at the second security shack, informed Smith that they were there to return to work on an unconditional basis the same as the others who had crossed the picket line (2:294; 4:702, 747).

Smith read the following prepared statement (4:703; R. Exh. 35):

> You are not applying to return to work as individuals. Your International Union Representatives advised me they would remove the picket line so you and all bargaining unit employees could return to work without giving the Company a written promise that the Company would receive written notice adequately in advance of any future work stoppages. This is a concerted union activity.

Bartholomew asked for a copy, but Smith said no. He then asked Smith to talk to them on an individual basis. Again Smith declined (2:294). Smith read the speech again, and then asked the employees to leave (2:294; 4:704) The employee group went to the union hall where they decided to return to the plant in small groups of twos, threes, and fours and seek to return to work (2:295).

On that same day, 10 August, and over the course of the next several days, employees in small groups of mostly two to four or so, and in some cases only one employee, went to the plant and offered themselves back to work unconditionally. Anticipating that this would occur, Smith had a separate statement prepared which he read to these small groups. This second statement reads (R. Exh. 36):

> Your action in returning is pursuant to a joint decision on your part, and is therefore a group action and concerted activity. The Company will not be returning employees from strike under these circumstances.

The response was the same whether it was a visit by a single employee, or to employees in the small groups who each announced that they were applying as individuals. The complaint does not allege that these prepared statements, either alone or together, constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On 10 August Odis Johnson, Local 68's vice president, told Smith that he was willing to do "whatever it took" to get his job back. Smith said he wished he could accept Johnson back, but that Respondent would first have to receive the Union's agreement on a 21-day advance notice (2:262–263). Employee William E. Bellamy even told Smith that he was offering himself back nonunion and as an individual. Smith read one of the statements and said he could not help Bellamy (3:455).

Another employee, Kenneth Mathis, had been on sick leave for knee surgery and had not participated in the strike, although he had stopped to talk with strikers once or twice in the park across from the plant gate. Mathis had just received a partial medical release on 27 August when he asked Smith if he could return to work. Smith gave him the same answer which he gave the others (3:467). Smith testified that Mathis had not been (fully) released (4:807).

When employees pressed concerning what they could do as individuals to return to work, Smith read a third prepared statement as follows (4:706, 707; R. Exh. 37):

> Have your union representatives give us a written notice regarding advance notice before future work stoppages.

It is vividly clear from Smith's testimonial expressions, as well as the other evidence, that there was nothing the former strikers could sign, say, or do which would persuade Respondent to accept their offers to return to work—short of the Union providing Respondent with a written commitment for advance notice of 21 days (4:757–758, 761–763). In short, any offer to return to work, whether made by an individual, by a group of employees, or by the Union on behalf of the former strikers, was doomed before made unless the Union signed a commitment to give Respondent an advance notice of 21 days before calling any future work stoppages.

On 11 August Balliet led a group of employees to the plant where he spoke to Smith and offered the employees to work unconditionally. Smith gave him a copy of the proposed commitment to give an advance written notice of at least 21 days for Balliet to sign (2:172; 4:708; G.C. Exh. 11). Saying the document was illegal, Balliet refused to sign. He said they would work 15 days without a strike. When Smith asked what would happen on the 16th day, Balliet replied that he could not say (4:710).[20] Balliet then left.

Before he left for the plant that day (2:173), Balliet mailed a letter, dated 11 August, responding to Smith's letter of 4 August. As the letter describes the Union's position, it is set forth here (G.C. Exh. 12):

> Dear Mr. Smith:
> Your letter of August 4, 1984 has been received.
> First, I believe that you misconstrued the statements of International Representative Hammond on July 9, 1984.
> Even so, we believe that no employer has the right to regulate or impose restrictions on the protected right of workers to engage in lawful concerted activity.
> The adequate notice to which I referred in my letter of July 24 is not capable of being quantified. If a concerted action were to occur, that notice is adequate which permits either for the immediate relief of an operator or the orderly shutdown of the plant's equipment and production facilities.
> As soon as the General Portland Cement Company begins to understand the rights which workers have in the absence of a collective bargaining agreement, and returns to employment those employees who have made an unconditional application to return, without imposing unlawful conditions, the relationship between the Union and the Employer will improve substantially.

Paul H. Balliet, International Representative Coordinator

The next communication between Balliet and Smith was not for several weeks (2:174; 4:711).

The parties stipulated that on 14 August Smith mailed to each Fort Worth employee a letter explaining Respondent's position (2:174). Smith begins his letter by saying he wants to clarify some misconceptions he has heard from employees. He then describes the 21-day notice requirement. The last four paragraphs of his letter read as follows (G.C. Exh. 13):

> This commitment is required to protect against equipment damage and critical interruptions caused by sudden and unannounced work stoppages. The behavior of employees on July 9, 1984, and the comments of International Union representatives has convinced the company that "quickie" work stoppages are likely unless there is something to prevent them.
> For some reason unknown to me, your Union representatives have been unwilling to give the company the written commitment. Because of this refusal by Union representatives, the Company has not permitted the return of employees from strike.
> If you want to return to work, insist that your International and Local Union representatives sign the written commitment (for your information I have attached an exact copy of the commitment the Company is requesting). Upon receipt of a properly signed written commitment, the Company will promptly arrange for the orderly return to work of employees.
> Disciplinary action is pending for many employees because of their misconduct on July 9, 1984. A few employees will be subject to discharge for gross misconduct. Appropriate discipline will be taken where warranted.

The next communication between the parties occurred when Smith, by letter dated 21 September, reduced Respondent's advance notice requirement from 21 days to 3 days (G.C. Exh. 14). A minimum notice of 3 days, Smith wrote, would enable Respondent "to obtain the necessary manning by outside contractors to continue to operate the plant and, thus, avoid costly damage and/or costly shutdown."

In his one-sentence reply of 1 October, Balliet responded that the Union "reiterates its position, whereby, we are and have been willing to give you adequate notice of any shutdown to avoid jeopardizing plant equipment." (G.C. Exh. 15.)

By letter dated 4 October[21] Smith asked Balliet whether he was agreeing to give 3 days' notice by his letter of 1 October (G.C. Exh. 16). Balliet never responded. Balliet testified that after 4 October International Vice President Richard A. Northrup, of Chicago, took charge of resolving the strike (2:175).

By mailgram dated 31 October Northrup wrote Smith that "We are again advising you that we have terminated our strike and are available to work without conditions." (R. Exh. 38.) Smith replied on 1 November with his own mailgram repeating the advance notice requirement of 3 days (R. Exh. 39).

Matters moved quickly thereafter, and on 8 November the parties entered into a settlement (G.C. Exh. 17). Paragraph 1 of the document provides that Northrup, on behalf of the International and the bargaining unit, agrees to give an advance notice of 36 hours before any work stoppage between the date of the agreement and that of any new contract (G.C. Exh. 17). Local 68 is not included, nor is there any requirement that the 36-hour notice be in writing. Respondent agreed to begin returning employees to work on 13 November subject to certain categories of employees subject to various forms of discipline.

C. Procedural History of Charges

The Union filed several unfair labor practice charges concerning Respondent's actions. A summary of the procedural history of the cases helps to show the overall context of events.

On 9 July the Union filed a charge in Case 16–CA–11725 alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by suspending 8 employees, ordering 65 employees to leave its premises, and Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to discuss safety with the Union (R. Exh. 4).

By date of 23 July the Union filed a charge in Case 16–CA–11754 alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act on 16 July by notifying the Union that some 65 employees would be subject to disciplinary action when they returned to work, by discharging two employees, and by suspending seven others (R. Exh. 6).

The Region dismissed these two charges on 7 November. In the meantime the Union filed the charge in the instant case. Filed 10 August, the charge in the instant proceeding, Case 16–CA–11785, alleges that on 10 August Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing to return to work "its employees who made an unconditional offer to return to work on or about August 10, 1984."

In his 7 November letter dismissing the first two charges, Cases 16–CA–11725 and 16–CA–11754, Regional Director Michael Dunn attached an explanation covering over two pages (R. Exh. 5). The antepenultimate and penultimate paragraphs of Dunn's dismissal letter are pertinent and read:

> It was concluded that the initial work stoppage was unprotected as its stated reason was safety disputes which arose during the term of the collective bargaining agreement and thus, the Union's duty to arbitrate and not to strike over the disputes continued past the expiration of the contract. Goya Foods, Inc., 238 NLRB 1465, Nabisco, Inc., 267 NLRB No. 196. Therefore, the Employer's suspension of the original eight employees was not unlawful. Further, since the Employer was privileged to refuse to rescind the lawful suspension of the original eight employees, its failure to consider rescission did not constitute an unlawful failure to bargain. Further, the Employer offered to discuss safety at several different times throughout the morning of July 9. Hence, the Employer did not unlawfully refuse to bargain with the Union over the safety disputes.

[21] At the hearing the parties stipulated that the date appearing on the letter is incorrect, and that the correct date is 4 October (2:152–153).

The Employer's suspension of the entire first shift work force was not unlawful as the evidence did not establish that this suspension was motivated by a desire to retaliate against the employees for engaging in protected activity or that the suspension was inherently destructive of employee rights. In this regard, while the Employer initially suspended only eight employees for leaving their work stations without relief or permission, it would have been privileged to suspend everyone at that time as they were not engaged in protected activity as indicated above. Later, when it became clear that no discussion of safety would take place and work would not resume, the Employer decided to send everyone home and investigate the circumstances of the initial stoppage. And, the Employer ultimately disciplined or discharged only those employees who, like the original eight, left their work stations without relief or permission. Therefore, it could not be established that the Employer's suspension of the whole work force was motivated by a desire to retaliate against the employees' protected activity. Further, the events of the morning of July 9, indicate that the suspension of all employees reasonably would not be perceived by the employees to mean that protected strike activities always will be followed by adverse Employer action. Thus, it could not be found that the Employer's action was 'inherently destructive' of the employees' statutory rights. Furthermore, although the Employer's action may have had some adverse effect on employee rights, the Employer's legitimate business justification of investigating the initial unprotected action, in the absence of anti-union motivation, warrants a conclusion that the suspension of the entire work force was not unlawful.

Eight days later, on 15 November, Acting Regional Director Jerome Avedon, in dismissing the instant charge,[22] similarly attached a two-page explanation (R. Exh. 40). The final three paragraphs of Avedon's dismissal letter read:

> The Union was repeatedly informed by the Employer that its advance notice requirement was to avoid subjecting its equipment to potential damage by a sudden and unannounced work stoppage particularly in view of the work stoppage that had occurred on July 9. There was no evidence that the Employer's purpose in requiring an advance notice commitment was to break the Union nor did the Employer ever hire permanent replacements. Further, the Employer offered evidence that much of the plant had to be shut down to avoid damage as a result of the July 9 walkout and it was not until August 6 that the plant was finally back up to production with the last kiln back on line.
> Thus, it is concluded that no violation has occurred as the Employer had a legitimate business justification—advance notice for safety purposes and sufficient time to be able to secure contractors—for insistence on its demand, whether it be 30, 21 or 3 days, for advance notice of a strike as a condition of reinstatement of its employees because the Union refused to accept the lawful condition for reinstatement imposed by the Employer.
> In American Ship Building v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300 (1965), the Supreme Court concluded that the use of a temporary layoff of employees solely as a means to bring economic pressure to bear in support of the employer's bargaining position after impasse has been reached was not unlawful. The Board has found that an Employer may lock out its employees to avoid economic loss or business disruption where the Employer believed a strike was imminent and the Union would not give assurance of continued work. Building Contractors Association of Rockford, Inc., 138 NLRB 1405. In the instant case, the lockout was based on the Employer's legitimate view that the employees would engage in further work stoppages or intermittent strike action without advance notice to the Employer and was strengthened by the Union's repeated refusal to define in hours or days its "adequate" notice assurances.

Following the dismissals, Respondent apparently discharged three employees who had been operating critical equipment the morning of 9 July. Thus, on 10 January 1985 the Union, by its attorney, filed a charge in Case 16–CA–11985 alleging that on 4 December Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Spencer Hart, Richard Pilcher, and Timothy E. Worthen (R. Exh. 7).

Pursuant to the 8 November memorandum of agreement settling the strike/dispute (G.C. Exh. 17), the cases of the three discharges were heard by Arbitrator Harold H. Leeper on 20 December. At page 2 of his 24 December Opinion and Award affirming the discharges, Arbitrator Leeper wrote, "The three Grievants were operators of the three most critical and most expensive machines in the plant. Pilcher was the operator (burner) of the number 1 kiln; Worthen was the operator of the number 3 kiln; and Hart was the operator of the Finish Mill." (R. Exh. 9.)

The Union appealed the Region's 15 November dismissal of the instant case (as well as Case 16–CA–11774), and on 22 February 1985 the General Counsel, through her Office of Appeals, wrote Stephen B. Rubin, the Union's attorney, as follows:[23]

> Dear Mr. Rubin:
> Your appeal from the Regional Director's refusal to issue complaint in the above-captioned cases has been fully considered.
> The appeal in Case No. 16–CA–11785 is sustained and the appeal in Case No. 16–CA–11774 is denied. The Employer's conditioning of the return of strikers after August 10, 1984, upon the Union's agreement not to strike for 30, 21 or 3 days raised Section 8(a)(1) and (3) issues warranting Board determination based on record testimony developed before an Administrative Law Judge, absent settlement. However, the appeal is otherwise denied inasmuch as there was insufficient evidence that the Union had made an unconditional offer to return the strikers prior to August 10, 1984.
> Accordingly, the case is remanded to the Regional Director with instructions to issue an appropriate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) complaint absent settlement. All further inquiries should be addressed to the Regional Director.

> Mary M. Shanklin, Director
> Office of Appeals

Presumably a confidential explanation from Shanklin was attached to the copy sent to the Region. We therefore are not favored with Shanklin's theory except to the extent counsel for the General Counsel incorporates and articulates that theory in his brief.

To complete this sequence, I note that by letter dated 13 March 1985 the General Counsel's Office of Appeals wrote to Attorney Rubin as follows regarding the related cases (R. Exh. 8):

> Dear Mr. Rubin:
> Your motion for reconsideration in Case Nos. 16–CA–11725 and 16–CA–11754 and your appeal in Case No. 16–CA–11985 have been fully considered.
> The appeal and motion are denied. Apart from considerations as to whether the employees' initial refusal to work on July 9, 1984, might otherwise have been considered concerted protected activity, in the circumstances of these cases, the Employer's tentative decision to terminate eight employees for leaving their critical work sites after having been told not to do so and the Employer's final decision to terminate three of these eight (Pilcher, Hart and Worthen) was not unlawful.
> It was concluded that the eight employees who left critical job positions without permission engaged in strike misconduct under Marshall Car Wheel and Foundry Co., 107 NLRB 314, and therefore, their actions were removed from the protection of the Act. In this regard, it is irrelevant that supervisors took over operation of the critical machinery and therefore no actual damage was done; it is sufficient that the eight aforementioned employees' actions could have led to extensive damage to the equipment. Nor is it significant that non-critical workers were not told to return to work, as the supervisors took control of the operation of the facility.
> In light of the determination that any disciplinary action taken by the Employer against those employees who left critical positions without permission was not unlawful (and noting the absence of any affirmative evidence that the Employer took unlawful disciplinary action against any employee in a non-critical position), as well as the Union's failure to raise any new issue of law or fact in the motion for reconsideration, or appeal, further proceedings were deemed unwarranted.

[23] The 22 February 1985 letter was not made part of the record. After the hearing closed, and at my request, Respondent supplied a copy of the letter. I mark the copy as ALJ Exh. 1, receive it in evidence, and insert it in the folder for the General Counsel's Exhibits.

D. Analysis and Conclusions

Before treating the merits of the case, I first shall address some peripheral matters. Although Respondent, as earlier noted, stipulated that the Union is a labor organization, it expressly reserved its affirmative defense that the Union is not the statutory representative of Respondent's employees at the Fort Worth plant. This contention relates to the fact that on 15 March 1984 the United Cement, Lime, Gypsum and Allied Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, voted to merge into and become a division of the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL–CIO (R. Exh. 2 at 119). Shortly thereafter, apparently on 1 April 1984, the emerger was implemented. Respondent contends that certain "flawed and inadequate" procedures resulted in a postmerger organization legally imcompetent to act as the representative of the Fort Worth employees (Br. 47). This allegation becomes relevant only because the complaint alleges, and evidence was offered, that the Union, as the statutory representative of the bargaining unit, made an unconditional offer on 10 August on behalf of the striking employees to return them to work.

Citing Knapp-Sherill Co., 263 NLRB 396 (1982), the General Counsel argues that Respondent is estopped from contesting the Union's statutory representative status (1:32). The Union joins in that position, and further argues that Respondent improperly seeks to place the employees in a Catch-22 situation. Thus, on the one hand Respondent argues that the Union cannot speak for the employees, yet on the other it contends that it was justified in rejecting unconditional offers by individual employees, or small groups of employees, unless "their" Union signed a commitment to give an advance notice of 21 days. Respondent appears to argue that it is entitled to the best of both worlds because it did not learn of the alleged merger defects until 2 weeks before the instant hearing. The Union contends that it would be unconscionable to allow Respondent to prevail on this issue (Br. 11). In any event, argues the Union, the evidence shows that groups of strikers, by their presence before Smith, implicitly designated union representatives to speak on their behalf as their agent-in-fact. At the hearing the parties stipulated that Respondent has never, including up to the date of the hearing, withdrawn recognition from the Union (3:505).

Although there is much force to the positions advanced by the General Counsel and the Union, I need not resolve the statutory representative question for two reasons. First, as previously noted, any offer to return would have been an exercise in futility, and the law does not require that citizens engage in acts of futility. The strikers were therefore relieved of any need to offer themselves back to work, and an unconditional offer will be deemed as of 10 August concerning all strikers. Eagle International, 221 NLRB 1291 (1975).

Second, I need not resolve this issue because I dismiss the complaint on the merits. For this reason I need not pass on the Union's 5 July 1985 motion to reopen the record to receive an attached letter, dated 17 January 1984, relating to the merger issue.[24]

I find that the Union's assertion of safety as the basis for confronting Plant Manager Smith the morning of 9 July was merely a cloak devised to conceal its true motive—to engage in a series of confrontational tactics designed to force Respondent to return to the bargaining table and, perhaps, to dissuade Respondent from unilaterally implementing its last offer. Moreover, the Union was not free to disregard the prior grievance procedure for safety matters which allegedly arose, as here, during the extended term of the prior contract. Nabisco, 267 NLRB 1236, 1237–1238 (1983); Goya Foods, 238 NLRB 1465 (1978).

Respondent contends that the strike was unprotected regarding all the strikers, and not simply to the few who were disciplined for abandoning their critical job duties before they were relieved, because of Respondent's rules prohibiting employees from leaving their duty stations during working time without permission (Br. 63). However, such rules cannot restrict the proper exercise of statutory rights. Respondent makes no argument that all 64 employees from the first shift who engaged in the initial work stoppage in some way were aware of or ratified the Union's planned tactics. Moreover, over 100 other employees were not at work the morning of 9 July. They later joined the strike, or honored the picket line established at noon on 9 July, but they did not abandon critical jobs the morning of 9 July.[25] Regardless, in my view this case turns on Respondent's right to lock out the employees.

We now can turn to the merits of the case. On and after 10 August Respondent refused to return the former strikers to their jobs until the Union signed an agreement commiting to giving an advance notice (initially 21 days and then 3 days). By so refusing, Respondent locked out all employees not already working. Pointing to the fact that Respondent took back five strikebreakers without requiring them to sign any commitment, the General Counsel and the Union argue that an unlawful motive has been shown. The Union, in particular, contends that Respondent sought to punish the strikers (Br. 21, 22).

The five strikebreakers returned to work during the strike and before the lockout. Had Respondent suggested to employees during the lockout that Respondent would return them to work if they canceled their membership in Local 68,[26] then a strong argument could be made that Respondent's real motivation was to destroy the Union.[27] We do not have that here. Indeed, Plant Manager Smith rejected an offer of substantial nature made by employee William E. Bellamy on 10 August. Thus, Respondent locked out everyone not already working in its countereffort to put economic pressure on the Union to sign an advance notice commitment. Respondent acted within its legal rights.

As for the length of the notice Respondent demanded, it is clear that the Union recognized that a notice of some duration—even if just 15 minutes—was necessary. The debate between the parties was, and is, over what length of time would be adequate. Respondent could lawfuly demand a specific time frame in view of the apparent difference of opinion between it and the Union concerning what would constitute an adequate time to effect an orderly transition[28] at the beginning of a strike.

Respondent wanted an adequate time assurance because (1) in Smith's view Union Representative Balliet had reneged on his 15 May promise to provide sufficient notice for an orderly shutdown, (2) on 9 July Union Representative Hammond had expressly stated that work stoppages would be the way that business would be conducted in the future since there was no contract,[29] and (3) in July Respondent experienced serious problems in securing qualified employees from outside contractors.

An employer must reinstate economic strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work unless he is able to show that his refusal to do so was due to "legitimate and substantial business justifications." NLRB v. Fleetwood

At the conclusion of an economic strike, an employer may have reasonable cause to fear that the employees will abruptly go on strike again as part of a series of "quickie" strikes. In that situation, an employer may lawfully lock out its employees until it receives assurance that there will be no future work stoppage without adequate notice to the employer. Tidewater Express Line, 142 NLRB 1111 (1963) (return conditioned on advance notice of 48 hours before any future strike); Building Contractor's Assn. of Rockford, 138 NLRB 1405 (1962) (return conditioned on advance notice of 30 days before any future strike); and International Shoe Co., 93 NLRB 907 (1951) (return conditioned on a no-strike agreement).

Rather than closing down when it locked out the former strikers, Respondent chose to operate with temporary replacements.[30] It is not a per se violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act for an employer to lock out his employees and to continue operating with temporary replacements. Pankratz Forest Industries, 269 NLRB 33, 38 (1984). Such a lockout is unlawful, however, if it is motivated by antiunion considerations. Pankratz at 38. "The purpose, or motive, behind the lockout is therefore the critical factor in determining whether the lockout violates the Act." Morris, I The Developing Labor Law, 217-218 (1983) (DLL).[31]

On 9 August Respondent reduced its time condition to 21 days. Thus, when the picketing ceased the morning of 10 August and the former strikers began offering themselves back to work unconditionally,[32] the existing condition for reinstatement was agreement by the Union to give an advance written notice of 21 days before engaging in another work stoppage.

On 10 August Smith knew that in mid-May, in anticipation of a strike, he had made all the necessary arrangements to effect a transition from unit employees to staffing the plant with strike replacements, and that this had been accomplished in a period of 3 days (4:768, 778–779, 793). Yet on 10 August Smith conditioned the return of strikers on union agreement to a notice of 21 days. Does this discrepancy reveal a motive to punish the strikers?

Smith credibly testified that in the days on and after 9 July he had much difficulty in obtaining an adequate staffing of replacements from the outside contractors. Initially there was some difficulty in securing the numbers needed, but the principal problem was that the quality level was low (4:817). On the 9 August recommendation of his staff, Smith reduced the time from 30 days to 21 days as the advance notice Respondent would need to assure the continued operation of the plant (4:691–692, 774, 824).

I find that Respondent did not impose the 21-day condition on 10 August to retaliate against the strikers. Smith, I find, simply desired to give himself plenty of breathing room in the event the strikers accepted the 21-day condition and returned. He was not thinking, I find, in terms of what notice he could get by with at an absolute minimum. I find that Smith also considered his July problems in trying to obtain adequate staffing. With that less than satisfactory experience in mind, Smith, acting with an abundance of caution, set the notice time as 3 weeks rather than the minimum time needed of 3 days.

As already noted, I have not overlooked Smith's testimony that the kilns could be shut down in 3 days,[33] or his testimony that in anticipation of a strike in mid-May Respondent shut down one of the three kilns (4:768–769), arranged with outside contractors to provide assistance (4:778–779, 817), included operation of critical equipment as part of the overall training of some supervisors (4:821–822, 831, 832–834), and that all this was accomplished in 3 to 4 days (4:778, 779). Nevertheless, I find that Smith acted from an abundance of caution on 10 August and not from an unlawful motive.

The next question which arises is why Smith waited another 42 days (from 10 August to 21 September) before reducing the time condition to 3 days. Smith was not directly asked this specific question at the hearing, but his position can be gleaned from his explanation of his basis for reducing the time to 3 days on 21 September. He testified that by 21 September Respondent had established ties with the outside contractors so that there was trained manpower available, and, as GP had experienced strikes at some of its other plants in September, it also had an abundant supply of trained salaried personnel available (4:715–716, 827–828).

Smith testified that he reached an adequate staffing level about mid-August (4:817). This meant, he explained, that he then had enough skilled help from the contractors to operate the plant (4:820). Moreover, Smith made clear that the 3 days specified on 21 September was deemed enough time to make the transition to operation of the plant; not simply to shut it down, but to keep it runing (4:828). I find that Smith knew in mid-August that he could make the transition in 3 days. Even so, I find that Smith's delay from mid-August to 21 Sep-

[30] The temporary replacements included supervisors, clerks, salaried personnel from other plants, summer students regularly employed, the five employees who abandoned the strike and crossed the picket line, and employees of independent contractors hired on and after 9 July.

Former Plant Manager Smith testified that Respondent elected to remain in operation rather than to shut down (4:676, 677, 774, 775, 795). Respondent chose to operate in order (1) that it could manufacture Class H oil well cement so that it would not lose that business to its several competitors (4:677, 775), (2) to avoid the costly damage known as spalling which accrues to refractory and bricklining the kilns whenever a kiln is shut down and restarted.

[31] A discussion of whether hiring permanent replacements, or using outsiders as temporary replacements, can be a violation of the Act by being "inherently destructive" of important employee rights appears at 1 DLL 204–205, 219–220, 633, and 2 DLL 1053–1056. For further background discussion on the use of temporary replacements, including their use for a "prolonged" period, see two memorandums of the General Counsel's Division of Advice: Weissman Industries, 116 LRRM 1511 (1984 Datz), and Georgia-Pacific, Southern Division, 104 LRRM 1167 (1980, Datz).

[32] An earlier offer by the Union was not unconditional. Moreover, the picketing did not cease until 10 August.

[33] Although Smith testified that after 16 hours a kiln did not have to be attended constantly (4:766, 785), he also clearly testified that it takes 3 days to shut down a kiln completely, such as in preparation for major maintenance or mothballing (4:768–769, 778, 785–786, 793). Although Respondent finally settled with the Union for 36 hours' notice, Smith credibly testified that he was not consulted as to the 36 hours and, more significantly, that the 36-hour figure is unrelated to the production process (4:826–827).

I note that there is no evidence or allegation that Smith uttered any remark indicating antiunion animus.[34] I further observe that at no point during this timeframe did the Union attempt to negotiate with Respondent for a shorter time condition. Indeed, the period of mid-August (following Respondent's 14 August letter to all employees) until 21 September is practically a complete blank insofar as the record discloses. I therefore can only assume that during this period of some 5.5 weeks Smith, content with the security of a supply of adequate strike replacements, simply waited for new developments. I am unable to discern any unlawful motive in these circumstances.

The General Counsel focuses on the "16 to 24 hours" Respondent allegedly would need to shut down the kilns safely,[35] argues that anything beyond that is without business justification (Br. 14), and contends that ordinary business interruptions or loss normally incident to a strike are circumstances insufficient to justify invoking a lockout (Br. 14–15). This argument is based on the false premise that an employer in Respondent's industry (operating expensive equipment under extremely dangerous conditions in a continuous manufacturing process) has a right only to the notice required to shut down safely, without regard to the damage to equipment a shutdown and restart causes, the loss of product incident thereto, or the loss of a substantial portion of the business if the work is not continued by strike replacements.[36] Such is not the law, and I find that the lockout itself was lawful and that Respondent had the right to continue operation of its plant during the lockout by using temporary replacements.

Taking the final step, the Union argues that the prior condition imposed by Respondent violated the Act because it is "inherently destructive" of employees rights (Br. 20).[37] To the extent this position argues a per se approach, it clearly is without support in the controlling cases since American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300 (1965).

Aside from the Union's possible per se contention about "inherently destructive," neither the Union nor the General Counsel expressly argues that the facts call for a conclusion that the 21-day time condition was an "inherently destructive" time condition. By implication the Union suggests that such is the case, but it does not analyze the question of whether such a prolonged period is inherently destructive.

When the picketing ceased the morning of 10 August and the former strikers began offering themselves back to work, Respondent locked them out pending the Union's agreement to give an advance notice of 21 days. GP had been operating with temporary replacements for a full month. As of 10 August Respondent had all three kilns in operation (R. Exh. 32) and some 140 temporary replacements employed (R. Exh. 34). If we assess the lawfulness of Respondent's lockout as of 10 August, is it a prohibited per se approach (since that is the first day of the lockout) even though we analyze Respondent's current situation in light of the nearly 5 weeks leading up to 10 August? Stated differently, must the examination begin by looking forward, with the "prolonged" use being measured by the length of time subsequent to 10 August? If the latter, should the 5 weeks preceding 10 August be considered in an overall analysis?

If the starting date for any analysis of "inherently destructive" is 10 August, then we count 42 days before Respondent reduced the time condition to 3 days on 21 September.[38] Although there is a chart in evidence (R. Exh. 34) showing the numbers of the temporary replacements and their sources (whether outside contractors, students, new hires, salaried staff, and the like), there is practically no other evidence covering the portion of that period starting about mid-August.[39]

However, Smith did testify that by mid-August he considered his temporary replacements adequate both as to numbers and quality (4:816–817).[40] As of 15 August Respondent had about 140 temporary replacements (R. Exh. 34). As the students (a maximum of 22) returned to school beginning in early August, respondent increased the number of its outside contractor employees. Total replacements increased to 149 for the week beginning 3 September, reached the peak number of 176 for the week beginning 10 September, and thereafter steadily declined to 141 the week beginning 12 November just before Respondent began phasing back in the former strikers. The record does not disclose why there was a peak the week beginning 10 September.

Was the peak to meet a special order for some customer, or was that Respondent's desired level which it was unable to maintain? The latter explanation is unlikely, for as we have seen, and will mention again shortly, Respondent had several sources of ample replacements by September for the forseeable future. The evidence is inconclusive, as Respondent's regular complement of unit employees for its three shifts approximated 173. Although the record does not expressly disclose the correct

[34] As previously mentioned, the General Counsel does not allege that Smith's prepared statements first delivered on 10 August, telling the strikers that their return to work offers were part of a "concerted union activity," violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[35] Based on Smith's credited testimony, I have found that it takes 3 days to shut down a kiln completely. Counsel for the General Counsel may have reference to Smith's testimony that after 16 hours the kiln does not require constant attention by an experienced burner (4:765–766, 784–786, 825–826).

[36] The Class H oil well cement, manufactured by Respondent at its Fort Worth plant only, amounts to about one-third of the products manufactured there (3:614; 4:677, 775).

[37] As to the Supreme Court's "inherently destructive" phrase, see NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967).

[38] Based on all the evidence, I find that the period of 3 days advance notice is the time Respondent normally would need to make the transition from unit employees to a safe level of strike replacements possessing the skills minimally necessary to operate the plant.

[39] As stated earlier, small groups of employees presented themselves for work in the first few days on and after 10 August, and Respondent's 14 August letter (G.C. Exh. 13) to all employees, including the former strikers, is the last correspondence until Smith reduced the time condition by his letter of 21 September (G.C. Exh. 14).

[40] If a finding was necessary, I would find that Respondent was as adequately staffed on 10 August as it was on 15 August. Respondent's own manpower chart so demonstrates (R. Exh. 34). Another of its records shows that as of 9 August all three kilns were in operation (R. Exh. 32).

number,[41] I reach the number of 173 from the list of 147 employees (G.C. Exh. 18) identified by Odis Johnson, Local 68's vice president, as those entitled to strike benefits, plus the 21 names on another list (C.P. Exh. 5) who, Johnson testified, were not eligible for strike benefits because they apparently were receiving medical insurance payments (4:853–854), plus the 5 strikebreakers.

As previously mentioned, Respondent reduced the time condition to 3 days on 21 September because by then GP, having experienced strikes at some of its other plants in September, had salaried personnel trained to operate the equipment, and there was an abundance of qualified help available from outside contractors (4:715–716, 827–828).

What can be made of the delay from 15 August (when Respondent admittedly was adequately staffed) to 21 September (when the available sources of replacements reached the point of abundance)? Can it be said that at some point during that timeframe Respondent's failure to reduce the time condition to 3 days was conduct "inherently destructive" of important employee rights and, therefore, as a matter of law, a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act?

Did a violation accrue on 15 August, or 3 days later, or are these dates too soon? Should the week ending Sunday, 2 September, be the decisive date? That would allow Respondent 2.5 weeks of adequate staffing to contemplate what to do. During that time, and from mid-May, Respondent knew that with a supply of adequate replacements available, it could replace unit employees in 3 days in the event of a strike. Respondent knew that it could do this in 3 days based on its mid-May experience. That obviously is how Smith settled on 3 days in his letter of 21 September.

Is this inquiry academic? After all, when Respondent did reduce the time condition to 3 days, the Union simply reiterated its same position that it would give adequate notice. I find that Respondent was justified in considering the Union's position, unexpressed in hours or days, as completely insufficient in light of the events of 9 July and the statements of Union Representative Hammond, on 9 July, and the August statements of Union Representative Balliet concerning no guarantee after the 15th or 31st days of work.

Thus, it is clear that had Smith framed the condition on 9 and 10 August as an advance notice of 3 days, the Union would not have accepted it. These circumstances hardly seem appropriate in which to find Respondent's conduct as "inherently destructive" of important employee rights.

As already noted, the complaint does not allege that Smith's first and second prepared statements are violative of the Act. Nor is the position advanced that the statements reflect an unlawful motive by unnecessarily asserting, even stressing, that the return to work offers were union and concerted activities. The one-sentence third statement, and the letter of 14 August from Smith to each employee, do not mention, much less emphasize, union and concerted activities. Those two communications, one short and the other long, properly state the need of a commitment from the Unions. It could be argued that Respondent should have so limited all its messages to the former strikers as they offered themselves back to work. After all, the reason Respondent locked out the employees was the lack of a commitment from the Unions. Respondent did not lock out the employees because they had engaged in, or were engaging in, union or concerted activities as such. Yet the latter is, in effect, what Respondent told the employees. In fact, Respondent was locking out all employees not already at work by the end of the strike because it feared that they might follow the call of the unions to embark on a "quickie" strike in the future. Respondent wanted a commitment from the unions to protect itself. But it failed to limit its statements to that simple need.

Neither is it alleged that the 21-day advance notice condition, imposed at a time (9–10 August) when Respondent knew that it was adequately staffed, joined (as with the separate elements of TNT) with the first two statements of Smith to the former strikers so that the combined impact was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights.

I have found that Respondent was not unlawfully motivated in imposing the condition of an advance notice of 21 days or, later, 3 days, before the employees participated in another work stoppage. I have further found the circumstances here, including the Union's unwillingness at any time to accept a time condition of 3 days, inappropriate in which to make any finding concerning whether Respondent's time condition of 21 days, even though outstanding for a lengthy period of 37 days (15 August to 21 September) after Respondent admitedly had adequate staffing,[42] was conduct "inherently destructive" of important employee rights. Accordingly, I shall dismiss the complaint.[43]

In conclusion, I shall dismiss the complaint because the General Counsel has failed to establish that Respondent was unlawfully motivated by its actions, or that its conduct was inherently destructive of employees' statutory rights.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing to return former economic strikers to work between 10 August and 8 November 1984, and conditioning their return to work on the Union's signing a commitment to give an advance notice of a specific period of time before commencing any future work stop-

[41] There were 65 unit employees on the first shift (3:611). Of those, 15 to 20 were involved in the continuous process of Respondent's operation (4:801).

[42] On 15 August Respondent knew that it could have made the transition from unit employees to strike replacements in 3 days.

[43] Complaint par. 14(a) was amended at the hearing to allege that on or about 19 July (rather than 10 August) Respondent imposed a notice condition of 30 days (3:477, 479). As the date of 19 July precedes any unconditional offers to return to work, the allegation regarding a 30-day notice condition would be dismissed in any event. Finally, it was at the 16 July (not 19 July) Sandpiper Motel meeting when Respondent advised the Union of the 30-day notice condition.

pages, Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act because there is insufficient evidence showing that (a) Respondent took its actions to discourage union membership or activities, or (b) Respondent's action is inherently destructive of important employee rights.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[44]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[44] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 29 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Winifred D. Morio issued the attached decision. Respondent Starlite Fashions, Inc. filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondents, Gracinda Fashions, Inc., and its alter egos Grace Fashions, Inc. and Starlite Fashions, Inc., Newark, New Jersey, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] Respondent Starlite Fashions, Inc. has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

William F. Grant, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Kenneth P. Samson, Esq. (Samson & Samson), of Maplewood, New Jersey, for Respondents Gracinda Fashions and Grace.
Steven R. Weinstein, Esq. (Schwartz, Tobia & Stanziale), of Montclair, New Jersey, for Respondent Starlite.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WINIFRED D. MORIO, Administrative Law Judge. This case, heard on 9 October 1986 at Newark, New Jersey, was based on an order consolidating cases, first amended complaint, and notice of hearing that was issued by the Regional Director for Region 22 on 4 August 1986.

The complaints allege, in substance, that about 15 August 1985 Gracinda Fashions, Inc. (Gracinda Fashions) established Grace Fashions, Inc. (Grace) as a subordinate instrument to and a disguised continuance of Gracinda Fashions and that about 1 June 1986 Gracinda Fashions established Starlite Fashions, Inc. (Starlite) as a subordinate instrument to and a disguised continuance of Gracinda Fashions and that all three corporations are alter egos and constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act. The complaints also allege that these corporations were employer-members of the Association of Rain Apparel Contractors, Inc. (the Association) and as such were parties to collective-bargaining agreements with Local 144, International Ladies Garment Workers Union, AFL–CIO (Local 144) covering their production, maintenance, packing, and shipping employees. The complaints further allege that representatives of the corporations withdrew their recognition of Local 144 as the exclusive representative of their employees about 15 August 1985 and since that date these representatives have failed and refused to abide by the terms of the most recent agreement between the Association and Local 144, which was effective from 1 June 1985 to 31 May 1988. The answers filed by counsel for the corporations deny the commission of the unfair labor practices as alleged.[1]

All parties were afforded the opportunity to present witnesses, to cross-examine witnesses and to file briefs. Briefs were filed by counsel for the General Counsel and counsel for Starlite.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witness and on consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, Gracinda Fashions, Grace, and Starlite, New Jersey corporations with facilities in Newark, New Jersey, were engaged in the business of assembling coats, jackets, and related items of clothing. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, Gracinda Fashions and Grace in the course and conduct of their business operations provided services valued in excess of $50,000 for various enterprises, including Cortland Fashions, Inc. (Cortland), which enterprises are located in New Jersey, and during that same period Cortland and the other enterprises purchased goods and materials in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of New Jersey and derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the direct sale and shipment of products to customers located outside the State of New Jersey. Based on a projection of its operations for a 12-month period since about 1 June 1986, Starlite in the course of its business operations will provide services valued in excess of $50,000 for various enterprises, including Majestic/FTP, which enterprises are located within the State of New Jersey. During the past 12 months these other enterprises, including Majestic/-FTP, purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of New Jersey and derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the direct sale and shipment of products to customers located outside the State of New Jersey. The parties admit, and I find, that Gracinda Fashions, Grace, and Starlite are employers within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The parties admit, and I find, that Local 144 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On 20 September 1985, Local 144 filed a charge in Case 2–CA–14035 against Gracinda Fashions and Grace alleging, in substance, that representatives of Gracinda Fashions had established Grace in order to avoid their bargaining obligation with Local 144. On 6 January 1986, the parties entered into a settlement agreement with respect to that charge, which was approved on 7 January 1986 by the Regional Director. The agreement was executed by Gracinda Soares on behalf of Gracinda Fashions and by Rosa DaSilva on behalf of Grace. The agreement, on its face, stated that the parties agreed to execute and be bound by a collective-bargaining agreement that was attached to the settlement agreement. The attached document stated that Gracinda Fashions and Grace agreed that, for labor relations purposes, they were alter egos; that Grace had been the employer since September 1985;[3] and that Grace would become a member of the Association and would honor the Association's collective-bargaining agreement, with Local 144, as modified by terms of the settlement agreement. According to this attached document, the Company agreed that its machinery would be collateral for moneys owed and the Company further agreed to pay all accrued benefits. The Union agreed to a schedule of reduced benefits.

On 1 August 1986, the Regional Director issued an order in which he withdrew his approval of this settlement agreement and set aside the settlement agreement on the ground that Gracinda Fashions and Grace had established Starlite as a disguised continuance of Grace and had refused to recognize Local 144 and to honor the collective-bargaining agreement entered into as part of the settlement agreement. Notwithstanding this order, which set aside the settlement agreement, it is the position of the General Counsel that the Companies were bound to honor the document, attached to the settlement agreement, because it was tantamount to a collective-bargaining agreement and Local 144 had entered into this agreement and made concessions in order to permit the Companies to remain in business. Thus, it appears that the General Counsel considers the settlement agreement and the document attached to it as separate agreements and, therefore, the order that set aside the settlement agreement did not have any effect on the obligation of the Companies to honor the document that was attached to the settlement agreement. The General Counsel further contends that Starlite, as the disguised continuance of both corporations, also was obligated to honor the collective-bargaining agreement that arose because of the settlement.

This case presents an unusual situation. The only witness called by the General Counsel in support of the allegations of the complaints was Alfred Soares, who was admittedly an officer of Gracinda Fashions, one of the corporations charged with violating the Act. Counsel for Starlite contended that Soares' testimony was motivated either because of animosity to his wife and daughter or as a means of securing certain production machinery, part of which he claimed he owned, and that was used by the employees of the three corporations.

Soares testified that Gracinda Fashions began its manufacturing operations about 1979 under the direction of his wife, Gracinda Soares. Soares claimed that he had given his wife "permission" to start the business but he did not become involved with the Company on a full-time basis until 1982. The operations of Gracinda Fashions were conducted at St. Francis Street, Newark, New Jersey, and the machinery used in the operations had been purchased at some point from Cortland, the company for which Gracinda Fashions manufactured coats and jackets. This machinery, which appeared to be the only asset of Gracinda Fashions, was owned jointly by Alfred and Gracinda Soares.

Gracinda Soares, Company president, directed the work of the production employees and handled the customer, Cortland. She was assisted in these duties by her daughter, Rosa DaSilva, who acted as an interpreter for her parents, Alfred and Gracinda Soares, because they did not speak English. Alfred Soares was primarily responsible for the maintenance of the machinery and it does not appear that he directed or supervised the employees or had contacts with the customers. Gracinda Fashions had a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 144 for its production employees by virtue of its membership in the Association, which Gracinda Soares had joined in April 1978.

During the period between 1979 and September 1985, Cortland, as a union jobber, made contributions for pension and welfare benefits for the Gracinda Fashions employees as required by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Association and Local 144. However, in September 1985, Cortland went out of business and ceased its contributions to Local 144 for benefits for the Gracinda employees. Gracinda Fashions was unable to pay the employee benefits and was also unable to secure a union jobber. Soares testified that because their effort to secure union work was unsuccessful, "we had to open a new firm, Grace Fashions. So it was not to have a union." After consultation with an attorney, Kenneth Samson, Soares and his wife and daughter decided that Soares and his wife would not appear as officers of Grace but their daughter, DaSilva, would be listed as an officer.

The new corporation was located at the same address as Gracinda Fashions and utilized the same machinery, which had been owned by that Company. In addition, Gracinda Soares continued to direct the day-to-day operations and to supervise the same employees who had been employed by Gracinda Fashions and these employees performed the same type of work, although it was now being performed for nonunion companies. DaSilva continued to act as an interpreter for her mother. Soares testified that his daughter, DaSilva, had an accountant prepare a document to show that Gracinda Fashions had sold its machinery to Grace, but Soares denied that there had been such a sale or that he had signed any document transferring the machinery to Grace. No document was produced to establish such a sale and there was no evidence that Soares received money for his share of this machinery.

According to Soares, about September 1985, his wife told the employees that they were now working for a new firm, the firm was nonunion, there was no need for a union.

The Regional Director issued a complaint wherein he alleged that the new firm, Grace, was a disguised continuance of Gracinda Fashions and that, therefore, it had an obligation to recognize and bargain with Local 144. As noted, Gracinda Soares and Rosa DaSilva executed a settlement agreement in January 1986 to settle the allegations of that complaint.

Soares testified that after the settlement agreement was executed, he had a conversation with his wife, Gracinda, during which she told him that they would have to form another company to avoid the union. Thereafter, at the request of her parents, Rosa DaSilva met with their attorney, Kenneth Samson.[3] According to Soares, DaSilva told her parents that the attorney had advised her that they would have to put the new corporation in the name of a person who was not a member of the family and they would have to move to a new location. In the second week of February 1986, Soares, with the help of his wife, daughter, and some truckmen, who were paid by Soares, moved the machinery that had been owned by Gracinda Fashions and then used by Grace to a new location, 397 Market Street, Newark, New Jersey. Soares testified that he installed the machinery at the new location and made the electrical connections and, during the months of February, March, and April, he continued to install the machines. He further testified that he approached a cousin and he requested this cousin to allow his name to be used for incorporation purposes for the new Company but, after some consideration, his cousin rejected his request.

At this point his wife approached a neighbor, Francilina Palmer, and asked her to allow her name to be used for incorporation purposes and this neighbor agreed to the arrangement. The new Company was called Starlite. Soares maintained that he accompanied his wife to court where they received the corporate records from Samson and paid him for them.[4] Soares testified that production began at Starlite in early June with 12 employees, about 4 of whom had been employed by Gracinda Fashions and Grace. Soares claimed that Gracinda Soares hired these employees and during the time that he was there she directed the work of these emloyees. Palmer performed only production work and she did not direct or supervise other employees. It appears that within a few days after production started at Starlite, Soares and his daughter and wife had an argument and Soares was locked out of the plant and his home. It was Soares' testimony that he owned stock in Starlite because he owned half of the machinery.

[3] Samson represented both Gracinda Fashions and Grace during the hearing in the instant case and he was present during the hearing.

[4] Soares stated that they paid Samson $500: $400 for the incorporation of Starlite and $100 to defend Soares on an assault charge.

Discussion

The Board has held that a settlement agreement will be set aside if its provisions are breached or if postsettlement unfair labor practices are committed. Cambridge Contracting, 259 NLRB 1374, 1381 (1982); Ann's-Schneider Bakery, 259 NLRB 1151, 1152 (1982). The Board also has held that presettlement conduct may be considered as background evidence in determining the motive or object underlying a respondent's postsettlement conduct. Vore Cinema Corp., 254 NLRB 1288, 1291 (1981); Laborers Local 185 (Joseph's Landscaping), 154 NLRB 1384 (1965). In the instant case, it is the General Counsel's contention that the provisions of the settlement agreement were breached and that unfair labor practices were committed and, therefore, the agreement should be set aside. The settlement agreement was executed by Gracinda Soares, on behalf of Gracinda Fashions, and by Rosa DaSilva, on behalf of Grace. Both of those corporations, allegedly, have ceased to exist and the only operating corporation, Starlite, was not in existence at the time the settlement agreement was executed. Therefore, in order to determine whether the contention of the General Counsel has any validity and whether the principles enunciated above have any application to this case it is necessary to decide what relationship, if any, existed among the corporations.

It is the position of the General Counsel that the real principles in all three corporations were Gracinda and Alfred Soares and that these two individuals first formed Grace to avoid their bargaining obligation to Local 144 and when that effort was unsuccessful they improved their "methodology" and created Starlite. Counsel for Gracinda Fashions and Grace did not file a brief. The brief filed on behalf of Starlite claims that the facts show that neither Gracinda or Alfred Soares or their corporation, Gracinda Fashions, owned stock in either Grace or Starlite and neither Gracinda or Alfred Soares were officers in either Grace or Starlite. Counsel further argues that the General Counsel has "an affirmative burden of proof and must show by a preponderance of the affirmative evidence on the record as a whole that the allegations of the complaint are in truth supported," mere suspicion alone will not suffice to prove an unfair labor practice. Counsel contends that there is no evidence to support the following allegations of the complaint; Gracinda Fashions created Grace or Starlite, Alfred and Gracinda Soares are coowners of Grace and Starlite. DaSilva was an agent of Grace and Starlite, a majority of employees of the Companies designated Local 144 as their bargaining representative, and there have been a succession of collective-bargaining agreements with Local 144.

As noted, the only witness who testified in this proceeding was Alfred Soares and the only documents admitted into evidence were the settlement agreement, the membership form in the Association executed by Gracinda Soares, and the certificate of incorporation for Starlite. Thus, the first issue to decide is whether Soares testified truthfully, or whether he fabricated a story in retaliation against his wife and daughter for their actions against him. The next issue is whether his testimony, even if credited, is sufficient to support the affirmative burden placed on the General Counsel with respect to the allegations of the complaint.

There are several factors that convince me that Soares testified truthfully. In the first place, I observed Soares throughout his testimony and my observation of his demeanor convinces me that he told the truth about the events surrounding the formation of the two corporations. Second, it should be noted that outside events support Soares' testimony. Thus, long before Soares was locked out of the plant by his wife and daughter, or had any reason to retaliate against them, Gracinda Soares and Rosa DaSilva entered into a settlement agreement to resolve the charge that Grace had been formed in an effort to avoid the bargaining obligation of Gracinda Fashions. Third, Gracinda Soares, Rosa DaSilva, Kenneth Samson, and Francilina Palmer, implicated by Soares in the scheme to deceive Local 144, failed to testify and no explanation was offered for their failure to testify. Kenneth Samson was in the hearing room during the proceeding, but he did not testify and refute Soares' testimony. Palmer, the alleged owner of Starlite, the only corporation presently in existence that could bear the burden of remedying the unfair labor practices, did not testify to protect her alleged independent corporation. It is highly unlikely that a disinterested owner would have acted in such a fashion. It is well established that when a witness is not produced to deny or explain the testimony given by witnesses for the General Counsel an adverse inference is warranted that they could neither refute nor deny that testimony. NLRB v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co., 613 F.2d 1338 (5th Cir. 1980); Siligman & Associates, 273 NLRB 1216, 1218 (1984), Earle Industries, 260 NLRB 1128 (1982).

Therefore, based on the testimony of Alfred Soares, I find that Gracinda and Alfred Soares, officers of Gracinda Fashions, with the assistance of their daughter, Rosa DaSilva, and their attorney, Kenneth Samson, formed Grace as a disguised continuance of Gracinda Fashions in order to avoid their bargaining obligation with Local 144. I also find that Gracinda Soares continued to direct and control the day-to-day operations of Grace and to supervise the same employees at the same location. Further, I find that when these initial efforts to avoid their collective-bargaining relationship with Local 144 were unsuccessful the Soares, with the assistance of Francilina Palmer and their attorney, Kenneth Samson, formed Starlite as a disguised continuance of Grace and Gracinda Fashions and, thereafter, Gracinda Soares, as she had at the two former corporations, directed the day-to-day operations of Starlite, supervised the employees, and handled the customers. The fact that only 4 of the 12 Starlite employees had been employees of the former corporations is insufficient to establish that Starlite was a totally separate and independent Company. In this connection, it should be noted that the only tangible asset of all three Companies was the machinery, which was owned in part by Alfred Soares. Contrary to assertion by Starlite's counsel, the record does disclose the basis on which Starlite used that equipment. Soares testified that he personally paid for the delivery of that equipment to Starlite premises and he installed it. Soares made it clear on the record that he was not paid by Starlite for his share of that machinery and he credibly denied that he had authorized the transfer of that machinery to Grace or Rosa DaSilva.[5]

In the circumstances of this case, I do not consider that the certificate of incorporation for Starlite, which lists Palmer as owner, is sufficient to outweigh the testimony by Soares concerning the reason why she was so listed. This is particularly true in view of Palmer's failure to testify. Nor do I consider the fact that Gracinda Soares and Alfred Soares were not listed as officers or stockholders of either Grace or Starlite to be dispositive of the issue in view of the credible testimony by Soares that they were not listed as part of the scheme to deceive Local 144. Further, in view of my finding that the true principles in the corporations were Gracinda and Alfred Soares, I do not consider that Soares' testimony concerning conversations he had with his daughter about her discussions with Samson are hearsay. DaSilva acted as an agent for her parents when she discussed the formation of both Grace and Starlite and when she relayed the attorney's instructions to her parents she did so in her capacity as their representative. Soares had the right to disclose those instructions during his testimony. Moreover, assuming arguendo that the testimony was hearsay the Board has stated, "Administrative agencies ordinarily do not invoke a technical rule of exclusion but admit hearsay evidence and give it such weight as its inherent quality justifies." Alvin J. Bart & Co., 236 NLRB 242 (1978).

In Fugazy Continental Corp., 265 NLRB 1301 (1982), the Board stated that in deciding whether one company is an alter ego of another, it would consider whether there was common ownership and management, common business purposes, common premises and equipment, common customers, and the nature of the operations and supervision. The Board also stated that it would consider "whether the purpose behind the creation of the alleged alter ego was legitimate or whether, instead, its purpose was to evade its responsibilities under the Act." If the factors outlined above are considered in relation to Grace and Starlite, it is evident that both corporations are alter egos of Gracinda Fashions. Thus, Gracinda and Alfred Soares were the owners of Gracinda Fashions and Grace, they are the owners of Starlite, and they are equal owners of the equipment. The business purpose of Gracinda Fashions and Grace was to manufacture coats, and that is also the purpose of Starlite. And the direction of the day-to-day operations of the three corporations was and is within the control of Gracinda Soares. Further, as Soares testified, both Grace and Starlite were formed for the purpose of evading the Soares' responsibilities under the Act.

In these circumstances, I find that the settlement agreement was breached and was properly set aside. However, contrary to the General Counsel, I do not find a basis to set aside the agreement although at the same time directing the parties to abide by one of the terms of that agreement (i.e., the collective-bargaining agreement attached to the settlement agreement). However, I do note that Starlite, as an alter ego of Gracinda Fashions, is a member of the Association and as such is obligated to recognize and bargain with Local 144 for its production employees and to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement in existence between the Association and Local 144.[6] The contention by counsel for Starlite that the record does not disclose the employees represented by Local 144 or that there were a series of collective-bargaining agreements is without merit. Soares testified that all production employees were represented by the Union and that they had been from the beginning of Gracinda Fashions "until last year when Gracinda Fashions was closed and Grace Fashions was opened."

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Gracinda Fashions, Inc. (Gracinda Fashions), Grace Fashions, Inc. (Grace), and Starlite Fashions, Inc. (Starlite) are employers engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 144, International Ladies Garment Workers Union, AFL–CIO (Local 144) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Grace Fashions, Inc. and Starlite Fashions, Inc. for the purpose of this proceeding are the alter egos of Gracinda Fashions, Inc.

4. All nonsupervisory production, maintenance, packing, and shipping employees employed by employer-members of the Association of Rain Apparel Contractors, Inc. (the Association), including Gracinda Fashions, Grace, and Starlite, constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

5. Since about 24 April 1978, Local 144 has been and is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

6. By failing and refusing to bargain in good faith, since about 15 August 1985, with Local 144 as the collective-bargaining representative of their employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit, and by failing and refusing to abide by the Association contract, effective from 1 June 1985 to 31 May 1988, Gracinda Fashions, Grace, and Starlite have engaged in and are engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Gracinda Fashions, Grace, and Starlite have engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I shall recommend that Gracinda Fashions, Grace, and Starlite be required to bargain with Local 144 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit found appropriate herein. I shall further recommend that Gracinda Fashions, Grace, and Starlite be required to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement in effect between the Association and Local 144 covering the aforesaid employees and reimburse Local 144 for all health, welfare, pensions, and other moneys due to the employees in the aforesaid unit, since about 15 August 1985, with interest thereon, in the manner established in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950); Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

The Respondents, Gracinda Fashions, Inc., Grace Fashions, Inc., and Starlite Fashions, Inc., their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to bargain collectively with Local 144, International Ladies Garment Workers Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following unit:

> All nonsupervisory production, maintenance, packing and shipping employees employed by employer-members of the Association of Rain Apparel Contractors, Inc. (Association), including Gracinda Fashions, Grace and Starlite, but excluding office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Failing and refusing to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement in existence between Local 144 and the Association of Rain Apparel Contractors, Inc.

[6] The evidence in the record establishes that Gracinda Fashions became a member of the Association in 1978. There is no evidence that Gracinda Fashions resigned from the Association. Thus, Starlite as an alter ego of Gracinda Fashions is bound to honor the collective-bargaining agreement in existence between the Association and Local 144.

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain in good faith with Local 144, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit set forth above.

(b) Honor the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement in effect between the Association and Local 144 and reimburse Local 144 for all health, welfare, pensions, and other moneys due to employees in the above-described unit, from about 15 August 1985, under the terms of that agreement with interest on those moneys in accordance with the formula described above under the remedy section.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Newark, New Jersey Facilities, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Trico Industries, Inc. and John Jay Clark. Case 6–CA–18816

30 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 6 August 1986 Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Trico Industries, Inc., Bradford, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The judge found that personnel records fail to reflect "a single incident" where an employee was warned or otherwise disciplined for engaging in excessive conversation or any conduct resembling Clark's conversations with Union President Baxter on 14 and 15 January 1986. The record shows that on one occasion an employee received a written warning for "visiting with" Baxter for a prolonged period of 10 to 15 minutes without permission. As found by the judge, however, the record shows that the Respondent does not ban all idle conversation between employees during working time and the Respondent did not demonstrate that an interference with production resulted from the conversations of 14 and 15 January. Having considered this evidence, we agree with the judge that the Respondent's discharge of Clark violated the Act. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), approving Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in Bradford Motor and Mechanics Lodge No. 1286, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, or any other labor organization, by discharging or in any other manner discriminating against employees with respect to their wages, hours, or terms and conditions or tenure of employment.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer John J. Clark immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify John J. Clark that we have removed from our files any reference to his discharge and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL A. HARMATZ, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was heard by me in Bradford, Pennsylvania, on 30 April 1986, on an initial unfair labor practice charge filed on 27 January 1986, and a complaint issued on 28 February 1986, alleging that the Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by stating that employee inquiries concerning working conditions should be addressed to management, rather than the exclusive bargaining representative. The complaint further alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging John Jay Clark in reprisal for his union and/or protected concerted activity. In its duly filed answer, the Respondent denied that any unfair labor practices were committed. Following close of the hearing, briefs were filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

On the entire record in this proceeding, including consideration of the posthearing briefs, and my opportunity directly to observe the witnesses while testifying and their demeanor,[1] I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a California corporation, with a place of business in Bradford, Pennsylvania, from which it is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale of oil well pump parts. In the course of the operations, during the 12-month period ending 31 December 1985, a representative period, the Respondent received goods and materials at the location valued in excess of $50,000, shipped directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and also shipped from the facility, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, directly to points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and it is found that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and it is found that Bradford Motor and Mechanics Lodge No. 1286, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Principally at stake in this proceeding is the question of whether the Charging Party, John Clark, was terminated for reasons prescribed by the Act.

Clark was hired on 16 December 1985. He worked for only about 1 month, all on the second shift, from 3:30 p.m. to midnight. According to his immediate foreman, "Smokey" DeGolier, Clark was a good worker, who gave him no trouble. Clark's discharge occurred on 16 January 1986[2] in the context of an established bargaining relationship that dated back several years. At the time a collective-bargaining agreement, scheduled to expire on 9 October 1987, was in effect. The discharge occurred prior to Clark's completion of the 45-day probationary period set forth in article VII, section 2 of the contract.[3]

The General Counsel contends that Clark was discharged because he was observed conversing with a union official on 14 and 15 January, activity that according to the General Counsel is protected by Section 7 of the Act. The Respondent defends essentially on the claim that Clark was terminated for legitimate cause; namely, his poor attitude and demonstrated lack of initiative.

The dispute centers on the last week of Clark's employment, when Gerald M. Alexander Jr., the Respondent's plant superintendent, soured on Clark. During that week Alexander learned of Clark's frustration with his inability to advance to a higher paying job on sophisticated, computerized machinery. The equipment in question is known in the trade as "Numerical Control" or NC machines. In previous employment, Clark had acquired experience on the automated machinery and personally owned tools, apparently having special utility on the numerical control equipment. This type of equipment was mentioned prominently in the newspaper advertisement that lured Clark to apply with the Respondent.[4]

Clark, prior to his discharge, was not afforded the opportunity to operate any NC equipment. He discussed the possibility of doing so with his supervisor, Smokey DeGolier, as well as Alexander and the assistant plant manager, Al Harris. He was encouraged by management to pursue his interest in this respect. For example, Supervisor DeGolier demonstrated the numerical control machine called the "Mazak," giving Clark a copy of the manual. Apparently this led to disappointment, when DeGolier informed Clark that an employee hired after Clark had been transferred to the day shift to begin training on the "Mazak."

The first real opportunity for Clark to formally declare his interest in this respect arose on 6 January, when the Company posted job vacancies. This represented the initial bidding since Clark's hire. Of the four jobs posted on that occasion, only one involved a computerized machine. That job drew eight bids. It was the only position bid by Clark. Needless to say, his seniority was too limited and the competition too intense; he did not get the job.

A second round of bidding on new vacancies was later scheduled for Monday, 13 January. The events of that day are central to the defense. That evening Alexander, with knowledge that Clark was a disappointed bidder, made a personal effort to preserve Clark's interest in seeking other jobs. He approached Clark at the latter's work station, offering to show Clark certain machines that would be put up for bid that evening. In accepting Alexander's offer, Clark indicated that he felt useless running the machines that he had been assigned to,

[1] Credibility resolutions hereinafter made may be accompanied by objective rationale. This is merely intended to reenforce, not discount, perceptions gained through my firsthand observation of the witnesses. adding that he had a toolbox worth $500 to $700 just sitting collecting dust.[5]

Alexander first showed Clark a "five spindle" machine. Clark apparently displayed a lack of enthusiasm for this job by stating that an employee with several years seniority was expected to bid on it. Alexander then took him to the "eight spindle" machine. While Alexander was showing Clark the equipment, the operator thereof asked Alexander a question. When the latter responded, a conversation ensued, whereupon Clark simply walked off, returning to his workplace.

Alexander testified, in this instance, believably, that his conversation with the operator was short, and when he discovered that Clark had left, he was outraged.[6]

On the basis of this incident, and despite Foreman DeGolier's positive evaluation of Clark, Alexander claims to have reached the following conclusions with respect to Clark:

> . . . John had a poor attitude, didn't take interest, he was finished as far as I was concerned, unless something really great that he did during the week he was finished.

That evening, Clark worked the balance of his shift apparently without incident. In the course thereof he registered unsuccessful bids for two jobs.[7]

Despite Alexander's reaction, not only did Clark continue to work, but at no time did Alexander, or any other supervisor, discuss with Clark or call his attention to any impropriety in his conduct of 13 January. The next day, Tuesday, 14 January, at approximately 3:45 p.m., Clark initiated a conversation with John Baxter, the president of Local 1286. Baxter was off duty. Clark was working. His machine was in full operation. Clark quizzed Baxter about (1) job bidding procedure; (2) the Company's financial assistance policy concerning the purchase of safety boots; (3) participation in the credit union; (4) eligibility for health insurance benefits; and (5) the Company's practice of requiring two different machines to perform simultaneous operations on a particular wrench.

Alexander observed them, but testified that at first he thought nothing of it and continued on making his rounds through the plant. According to Alexander, later, when he observed that the conversation was continuing, he approached, inquiring about whether there were any problems. At the time, Clark and Baxter were discussing the drilling and deburring required under the Respondent's manufacturing scheme with respect to the "sucker-rod wrench."[8]

Throughout the conversation, Clark was working, running back and forth to and from his machine to tend the parts being cut. It does not appear that Alexander criticized or made any comment concerning the appropriateness of this arrangement.

The complaint alleges that in the course of this exchange the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act through an alleged remark by Alexander that questions concerning wages, hours, and working conditions should be addressed to the Respondent and not to union representatives. In support, Baxter claims that on Alexander's arrival, he informed Alexander that Clark was asking about health insurance, wrench handles, and some other things. In response, Alexander allegedly stated, "[t]hat these were things that he should be asking his supervisor." Clark failed to testify to any such remark and it does not appear that any such comment was carried beyond Baxter.[9] Baxter, however, on cross-examination, confirmed that as Alexander approached he and Clark were discussing the procedure for processing the "wrench handles" that required two operations at once, running two different machines. At the time, Baxter admittedly was studying the route sheet describing the manufacturing process. This, according to Alexander, was the limited focus of his remark. Thus, he testified that it was during their reference to the drilling and deburring route within the wrench manufacturing cycle that he told Baxter that questions of this nature should be addressed to the foreman. In this instance, I am inclined to give benefit of the doubt to Alexander. Baxter's capacity for recollection of detail was unimpressive. In any event, neither version suggests anything beyond a passing, innocent expression of opinion, as distinguished from a remark having any mandatory connotation. Because Alexander was addressing an issue that obviously had been raised by Clark, if an "instruction" were intended, he certainly would have sought out Clark to "direct" him about the appropriate procedure. Thus, Baxter's account merely evidences a remark that was subject to evaluation as an expression of viewpoint not phrased as instruction or direction or having any tendency to impede employees in the exercise of rights guaran-

[5] The foregoing is based on the testimony of Clark. Alexander gives a slightly different version. He claims that Clark stated that "if he did not get a NC, that he might as well take his tools home." Although Alexander did not impress me as entirely trustworthy, it is entirely possible that in this instance he provided an honest recollection of either what was said, heard, or understood. Note that according to Foreman DeGolier, immediately after the incident in question, Alexander informed him of his anger at Clark, while repeating that Clark had stated that "he would take his tools and go home, if he didn't get an NC." Quite plainly, this version is more offensive than that related by Alexander. In any event, the conflict derives significance from further testimony by Alexander that he took umbrage at Clark's comment. Considering Alexander's own version of the remark, together with his testimony that he "did not show any outward signs of reaction to this," I am convinced that he recognized Clark's statement for what it was—an appeal in support of advancement and not an attempt to demean his job or management. Alexander's attempt to portray his reaction to the remark differently was so strongly disbelieved as to lessen confidence generally in his reliability as a witness.

[6] Foreman DeGolier confirmed that shorly after the incident, he was confronted by Alexander who inquired as to the whereabouts of Clark, explaining that while he was showing Clark around, Clark walked off. Alexander remarked to DeGolier that he was "pissed-off," commenting that Clark had said that he would take his tools and go home if he did not get a numerical control job. When DeGolier told Alexander that he had experienced no trouble with Clark and that he was a good worker, Alexander stated that as far as he was concerned Clark was "done." DeGolier indicated that he did not agree that Clark should be let go.

[8] Apparently, Alexander participated in a discussion concerning a possible bid on a Mazak machine, informing Alexander that if he had the requisite seniority there should be nothing to prevent him from securing such a position.

teed by the Act.[10] Moreover, on the credited testimony of Alexander, it is clear that his comment was addressed to a manufacturing method or process, an area of acute familiarity to supervision. He was free to make that point without offending statutory interests. There being no indication that the production process involved was viewed by Clark as impacting on him adversely, or that he intended to grieve or complain about it, Alexander's remark was a perfectly legitimate expression that a request for information concerning work flow procedures be addressed to those responsible for the initiation and implementation of that process. Accordingly, the Respondent did not in this respect violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Alexander does not appear to have manifested any degree of hostility toward the Clark/Baxter conversation of 14 January. However, at the start of the second shift on Wednesday, 15 January, Alexander again observed Clark and Baxter in conversation. On this occasion, Baxter approached Clark to deliver a union calendar and to express his opinion about possible health insurance coverage of a pregnancy in Clark's family. Workwise, Clark, at the time, had completed his first "part" and had turned off his machine to take the part to his foreman for inspection. This time it was with immediacy that Alexander approached them, angrily asking what the problem was, stating "we don't want to start any bad work habits." On that note, all three went their separate ways.

Later that day, according to Alexander, he discussed Clark with Walt Harris, and recommended as follows:

> Nothing good is going to happen with this fellow, he's engaged in poor work habits now and tomorrow's pay-day we might as well do it [terminate Clark] tomorrow.

Harris reportedly was in total agreement.[11] Accordingly, when Clark reported to work at 3:30 p.m. on Thursday, 16 January, he was not given his regular assignment, but was instructed to report to Alexander. In their meeting, Alexander expressed dissatisfaction as to Clark's "initiative," while also criticizing Clark's "attitude." Clark was informed that he would be let go as Harris and Alexander did not feel it was going to work out for him. Clark then became provocative to the point of inviting Alexander to discuss the matter "outside."[12] The termination form completed by Alexander defined the reason for discharge as "poor attitude & lack of initiative."[13]

On analysis it should be apparent from the foregoing that Clark's conversations with Union President Baxter furnish the only causation possibly warranting statutory intervention. If protected by Section 7, and if the General Counsel has shown that those incidents were at least "a" motivating factor in the decision to discharge Clark, under the Board's Wright Line test,[14] the burden will shift to the Respondent to convincingly demonstrate that it would have taken the same action against Clark even if those conversations had not occurred.

The threshold issue is whether the Baxter/Clark encounters constituted activity protected by Section 7 of the Act. Both occurred while Clark was on duty and supposedly working. During that which occurred on 14 January, Clark admittedly was running back and forth from his machine some 5 feet away. Though witnessed by Alexander, he voiced no objection to Clark's dual involvement at that time. In the second conversation, according to Clark, he had just completed his first unit of production, had turned his machine off, and was preparing to take the part to Foreman DeGolier for inspection when Baxter appeared. On this occasion, Alexander did caution against "poor work habits."

As an abstraction, discussions between a union representative and an employee concerning terms and conditions of employment entail assertion of a fundamental statutory right. Section 7 of the Act fosters the right of employees to know[15] and obligates union agents to educate,[16] as essential links in the representational scheme whereby benefits are negotiated, identified, and pursued. Inquiries concerning benefits as a preliminary to grievance activity is indispensable to, and hence "reasonably directed toward the enforcement of a collective bargaining right." NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984). Any interpretation that would allow management to terminate with impunity those who participate in such exchanges would seriously undermine this phase of the overall congressional scheme.

At the same time, however, the Act does not interfere with management's rights to assure through reasonable restrictions that employee interests are asserted under conditions that do not impede production and efficiency. For many years the idea that "work time is for work" has provided a helpful reference in the attempt to reconcile the tension between employee rights in this area and the right of employers to maintain discipline. See, e.g., Peyton Packing Co., 49 NLRB 828, 843 (1943); Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 803 fn. 10 (1945); Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 (1983). This does not mean, however, that all employee activity on working time is beyond the protective mantle of the Act.[17] Board

[10] The Board's recent decision in Tenn-Tom Constructors, 279 NLRB 465, 469 (1986), is inapposite. In that case, an 8(a)(1) violation was found when employees as a group were confronted and told by a general foreman that "from then on they should bring their problems to him." This "direction" under the circumstances was distinguishable from the off-the-cuff expression of opinion passed on by Alexander to Union President Baxter, apparently beyond earshot of Clark and any other employees. The evidence here shows that the remark was neither intended to establish a standard, nor conveyed as a direction, instruction rule, or policy. Another case, R.J. Liberto, Inc., 235 NLRB 1450, 1451, 1453 (1978), is distinguished on the same ground.

[12] The above is based on testimony of Alexander. Clark testified that he was told that things were not working out and that they were going to let him go because he "[D]idn't seem to be interested in job bids" Clark denied that any other reasons were offered in explanation of the discharge. The conflict need not be resolved.

precedent strongly suggests that when an employer has failed to adopt and publish a valid rule regulating union activity during working time, discipline for that reason will be upheld as lawful only when the employer demonstrates that it acted in response to an actual interference with, or disruption of work. See, e.g., Zack Co., 278 NLRB 958 (1986), Chairman Dotson dissenting on other grounds; Greensboro News Co., 272 NLRB 135, 138 (1984); Foley-Wismer & Becker, 263 NLRB 793 (1982); Selwyn Shoe Mfg. Corp., 172 NLRB 674, 676 (1968). Consistent therewith, the Board has stated that "A discharge based on work time . . . [activity] . . . in the absence of a valid rule is suggestive that the employer was reacting to the protected aspect of the employee's conduct, rather than considerations of plant efficiency." Greentree Electronics Corp., 176 NLRB 919 (1969). In other words, when there is no published rule regulating working time, the assumption is that the employer tolerates incursions until they reach disruptive levels.[18]

In this case, plant policy regulating working time is evident in both the employment manual maintained by the Respondent and the negotiated collective-bargaining agreement. Insofar as relevant, the latter recites as follows:

> . . . There shall be no solicitation for union membership or collection of union dues or other payments on Trico time. Nor shall there be any other union activity on Trico time that will interfere with production or violate Trico's rules with regard to visiting between departments in the plant.[19]

The Respondent's published employment guide offers a further restraint, as follows:

> Engaging in excessive conversation or in any way disturbing or interfering with the work of other employees is prohibited.[20]

Beyond the foregoing, the Respondent has not communicated that employee participation in union or other activity during their working time is restricted or might result in discipline.

As the published rules imply, the Respondent does not ban all idle conversation between employees during working time. Moreover, personnel records fail to reflect a single incident in which an employee was warned or otherwise disciplined for engaging in excessive conversation or any conduct resembling Clark's role in the conversations with Baxter on 14 and 15 January.[21] While a conversation when one should be working is commonly regarded as "a bad work habit," no claim is made by the Respondent that any published rule was violated by the conversations in question or that an interference with production resulted. In these circumstances, the record does not warrant a finding that Clark's attempt to ascertain his employment rights lost protected status because asserted on working time. See, e.g., International Packings Corp., 221 NLRB 479, 482 (1975).

The question remains about whether in accordance with Wright Line, supra, a finding is warranted that Clark was discharged for this reason. There can be little dispute that the timing of Clark's termination was influenced by his conversations with the union president. Alexander conceded as much on cross-examination by the General Counsel, as follows:

> Mr. Franckiewiez: So, on January 13th you did not decide to discharge him on the spot?
> Mr. Alexander: No. I decided to discharge him on the spot, unless he showed me something really spectacular.
> Q. And assuming that he did not show you something spectacular, the discharge would be effective when?

> A. No matter who he was talking to, he was displaying poor working habits.
> Q. What he was in fact doing was talking to John Baxter, is that correct?

> A. That's correct.
> Q. On those two particular days did he demonstrate poor work habits in any manner other than by being observed conversing with Baxter?

It wasn't the fact that he was conversing with Baxter, it was the fact that he was operating on the first day a piece of equipment and he was trying to run back and forth between his equipment, John Baxter, and even myself. You can't successfully operate equipment on that basis over long periods of time. And I don't expect probationary employees to display poor work habits like that. And, it's just not acceptable.

[18] In contrast a properly phrased, published, nondiscriminatory rule will be deemed presumptively lawful since inherently necessary to the maintenance of production and discipline. As in the case in which no rule exists, specific proof of justification is required when the published restrictions are overly broad and extend to nonworking time. See, e.g., Stoddard-Quirk Mfg. Co, 138 NLRB 615 (1962).

[21] See Jt. Exhs. 1–10, and 12 inclusive.

A. That would be a fair statement.

Considering the hostility with which Alexander greeted Clark and Baxter on 15 January, together with the sudden discharge of a good worker the very next day in the midst of a payroll period,[22] it is concluded that Alexander's admission in the above colloquy is sufficiently indicative of a union-related causation to compel the Employer to come forth with evidence that Clark would have been terminated even if the protected conversations had not occurred.[23]

The defense depends vitally on Alexander's testimonial account of his state of mind in effecting the discharge. In examining whether an employer has met its burden under Wright Line, the Board does not "rubber stamp" such testimony without scrutiny. Instead, the assigned reason for the discipline will be carefully examined for internal consistency and logical acceptability. See Heck's, Inc., 280 NLRB 475 (1986). When considered in that light, Respondent's case is unpersuasive.

First it is noted that personnel records bear out Alexander's admission that discharge is not "normal procedure" at Trico. Only eight employees suffered such a fate during the 6 years prior to Clark's termination. Half were based on attendance. (See Jt. Exhs. 1, 3, 4, and 6.) The remainder were founded on the employee's lack of suitability to perform the work. (See Jt. Exhs. 7, 8, 9, and 10.)

Concerning the specific grounds assigned, Alexander's admission that the Clark/Baxter conversations gave impetus to the discharge did not fit the umbrella of "initiative" or "attitude" and presented a marked shift from his original description of the reasons for the discharge. Indeed, the details about Alexander's dissatisfaction with Clark's attitude are not clearly defined, but left to conjuncture. In any event, critical to the defense is Alexander's testimony that Clark's fate was virtually sealed on 13 January in consequence of his remark concerning his tools,[24] the fact that he merely bid one job on 6 January and his having walked away from Alexander at the eight-spindle machine. Despite DeGolier's defense of any professed evaluation of Clark as a good employee, Alexander testified that on this basis he elected to terminate Clark on Friday if he did not show some spectacular achievement or "complete turnabout" during the balance of the week. When questioned, however, about just what he expected of Clark, he indicated as follows:

> Well, if he'd made double rate for a day, or had come and said to me, that he really was interested in the machines, or that he had had other things on his mind yesterday, and that he was sorry, you know, that he was rude and walked away from me, and that he was interested in the machines and the other things.
> If something like that would have happened, I probably would have changed my mind.

Several undeniable facts of record show that the foregoing constituted little more than a transparent dodge to obscure the reality that Clark was not discharged on 13 January because Alexander did not regard Clark's conduct that evening as a justifiable basis for discharge. That conclusion, together with the fact that the protected activity of 14 and 15 January furnished the decisive stroke was evident not only in Alexander's reference to "poor work habits" in his 15 January recommendation to Harris, quoted above, but from his conduct during the balance of that week.

Alexander neither warned, counseled, nor otherwise alerted Clark to the possibility that Alexander considered him to have been guilty to misconduct on 13 January. Simply put, despite several confrontations between them prior to the discharge, the matter was never even broached. In this light, it is particularly difficult to understand how Alexander could have expected an apology.

Also lacking was any followup prior to the discharge to ascertain whether Clark had met Alexander's alleged, secretly held demands. First, Alexander, not being the immediate supervisor of Clark, was not in a position to evaluate routinely, the latter's performance. Prior to the discharge, he had no way of knowing and made no effort to check Clark's productivity.[25] Moreover, as the discharge occurred on Thursday, 15 January, Clark was preempted from working that day and on Friday, the last day of the payroll period, and hence Clark was denied the balance of the workweek to rejuvenate himself as Alexander claims to have intended.

As for Clark's attitude toward the machines, which, according to Alexander established his "lack of initiative," Alexander admittedly did not check or know whether Clark on 13 January had bid on additional jobs. In fact, that evening Clark bid two of the five jobs that were posted on 13 January. (See the G.C. Exh. 7(a).) This reflected a greater interest in advancement than shown by any of the other probationary employees on payroll status at the time. (See the G.C. Exh. 6.) Moreover, this asserted ground for discharge is difficult to reconcile with the fact that the Respondent maintains no requirement that employees bid on jobs. Finally, all the [22] Although Alexander's admission makes this element somewhat cumulative, the fact that Thursday was payday would not alter the suspicion generated by the midweek discharge. Respondent's payroll period ends on Friday. Thus the Thursday termination failed to serve management's convenience. As is clear from testimony of both Clark and Alexander, the check given Clark that day was not his final paycheck, but only covered the "last full week of work."

[23] The fact that the General Counsel has failed to prove that the Respondent held an overarching or general union animus is by no means fatal to its case. The unlawful motive sought to be proven here does not rest on the Employer's attitude toward union membership or unionization as an institution. The fact that an employer might accept collective-bargaining does not necessarily mean that it welcomes every vestige of union activity, including those to which managers might understandably take affront. Quite clearly, the General Counsel's position with respect to the discharge of Clark is founded on Alexander's reaction to Clark's successive conversations with a union official, rather than any concern for Clark's basic allegiance.

[24] As heretofore indicated, Alexander's testimony that he took offense at this remark was not believed. In any event, I have difficulty reconciling Alexander's position in this regard with his accusation that Clark's lack of initiative was demonstrated by his disinterest in other jobs.

[25] It is noteworthy that the record fails to suggest that Clark had any type of productivity problem. DeGolier's rating of him implies that there was no such problem.

best copy available

evidence in this record reflects that Clark's difficulty stemmed from his strong desire for, rather than any indifference toward advancement.[26]

It is true that an employer may judge employees during their probationary period with greater stringency and perhaps even less rationality than that which obtains in the case of permanent employees. Nonetheless, probationary employees are entitled to no less protection under the Act. In either case, the issue will turn on the true motive for the discipline.

Alexander's rage on 13 January was perfectly understandable. However, his silence concerning the matter, the delay in acting on it, and the fact that the incident did not refute DeGolier's evaluation of Clark as a good worker, combine to suggest that explanation for the discharge lay elsewhere. All credible proof points to the fact that Alexander, irritated with Clark's consecutive conversations with Baxter, lost control, and precipitously terminated him. From Alexander's own testimony, it is apparent that if any preconceived formula for preservation of Clark's job existed it was abandoned after those developments. Thus, despite his alleged plan to give Clark until Friday to prove his metal, the discharge occurred at shift-start on Thursday, cutting the workweek short by 2 days. More importantly, after the supervening events of 14 and 15 January, Alexander lost interest in any "spectacular" achievement on Clark's part and opted for discharge without verification or knowledge of Clark's subsequent performance. Had Alexander shown any interest he would have learned at a minimum that the asserted lack of initiative on Clark's part was impossible to reconcile with the Respondent's own records, which demonstrate that as of 15 January, Clark had bid more jobs than any other probationary employee.

Simply put, the Respondent's assertions concerning lack of initiative are incomprehensible on the face of this record. This, together with vagaries engulfing Clark's alleged unsatisfactory "attitude" tend to confirm the empirical causative influence generated by Alexander's renewed anger at the conversations between Clark and the union president. In this light and on the total record, it is concluded that the Respondent has failed to persuade "by a preponderance . . . that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of union activity." Roure Bertrand Dupont, Inc., 271 NLRB 443 (1984); Centre Property Management, 274 NLRB 190 (1985). For these reasons, as Clark's inquiry to the union official constituted union activity of a protected nature, it is concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging him on 16 January 1986.

[26] In a further attempt to deflect attention from the events of 14 and 15 January the Respondent argues that a report from two employees, Giordano and Ackley, influenced Alexander's decision to terminate Clark. The assertion, however, was not substantiated by Alexander. The report apparently originated with Giordano, who claims to have heard Clark complain in the men's room about the Company's bidding procedure while stating that the Company "sucked." According to Giordano and Ackley, Giordano reported the remark to Ackley, who later informed Ackley's brother-in-law, Alexander. On behalf of the Respondent, it is argued that on receiving his information from Ackley Alexander elected to finalize the termination. Alexander, on the other hand, appears to deny that this was the case. Although one would expect Alexander to enjoy full command of the basis for his actions, Alexander could not recall whether he received the reports before or after the discharge. Indeed, he related that on matters of this kind, he does not rely on input from coworkers. From the testimony of Alexander, it is impossible to conclude that these reports had any relevance to the issue of motivation in this case.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging employee John Jay Clark on 16 January 1986 because he engaged in union activity the Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. The unfair labor practice found above constitute an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practice, it shall be recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent, having discriminatorily discharged John Jay Clark, shall be ordered to offer him reinstatement and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits by reason of the discrimination against him. Backpay shall be computed on a quarterly basis from the date of discharge to the date of a proper offer of reinstatement, less net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[27] It also shall be recommended that the Respondent be required to remove from its records and files all reference to the discharge, notifying Clark in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against him in the future.

The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause is denied as there is no showing that such relief is warranted in the circumstances of this case. See O. L. Willis Co., 278 NLRB 203 (1986); Nathan's Furniture Store, 278 NLRB 268 (1986); and Rebel Coal Co., 279 NLRB 141 (1986).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[28]

ORDER

The Respondent, Trico Industries, Inc., Bradford, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

[27] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[28] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in a labor organization by discharging or in any other manner discriminating against employees with respect to wages, hours, and terms and conditions or tenure of employment.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer John Jay Clark immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove and delete from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of John Jay Clark and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the discharge, in the future, will not be used against him in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facilities in Bradford, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[29] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

30 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 18 February 1986 Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and a brief in answer to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

I.

The judge found the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by reducing its powder-line employees' hours after employee Paul Martin contacted the Indiana Human Rights Department and filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board contending that the Respondent unlawfully denied powder-line employees contractual wages and benefits, and that the Union failed properly to represent them.[2] We disagree.

The parties' contract limits the contractual unit to full-time production and maintenance employees and plant clericals. Part-time employees are not included in the unit. The contract also contains a 45-day probationary period. According to Union Chief Shop Steward Dwayne K. Norman's uncontradicted testimony, an employee would be regarded as part of the unit only if he or she worked 40 hours or more each week for 45 days. Norman regarded employees who work 40 hours or more each week, but for less than 45 days, as excluded from the unit.[3]

The Respondent established its powder line in 1983 to powder-coat the display shelving that it manufactures with a pigment finish.[4] The Respondent expected that it would powder-coat products far faster than it would produce them and thus intended to seek contracts with other manufacturers to powder-coat their products as well. Even with outside contracts, however, it did not operate the line full time. When it hired employees to work on the powder line, it told them they would be part-time employees. The Respondent did not regard the powder-line employees as part of the contractual unit, did not pay them the contractual minimum wage, and did not provide them with contractual holiday pay, insurance, pension, or other contractual benefits.

The Respondent hired employee Paul Martin for its powder line in September 1984. From the time the Respondent hired Martin through at least February 1985, the Respondent's powder-line employees, including Martin, often worked for 40 hours or more per week, although none did so for 45 consecutive days. The powder line did not always operate full time during this period. Finishing Department Supervisor Gregory Jaques, who was responsible for hiring and scheduling powder-line employees, gave the employees extra hours by assigning them to maintenance and cleanup work and work in other departments.

Martin believed almost from the start of his employment that because the powder-line employees often worked 40 hours or more each week, they should be included in the contractual unit. Martin repeatedly complained to Union Steward Norman, to two other powder-line employees, and to Supervisor Jaques. The Union contacted the Respondent in mid-October 1984 following Martin's complaints and the Respondent thereafter established one full-time unit job on the powder line: powder-line "operator." Norman told Martin he could not otherwise help him. He said he "couldn't get him in the union because of the contract."

Employees Rick East and Tim Slayden, the powder-line employees with whom Martin discussed his complaint, declined to help Martin press the matter further. East, who expected to transfer

The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In sec. IV,B, in the sixth paragraph under the heading "Analysis," the reference to November 1973 in the second sentence should read "November 1983." In that same sentence, the word "now" should read "nor." We correct these inadvertent errors.

[2] The General Counsel did not allege that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(4).

[3] Thus, Norman testified that two part-time employees in the Respondent's packing department worked 40 hours per week when enough work was available. When asked if they were therefore considered full-time employees, Norman stated, "No, sir, they were part time."

[4] The complaint, the judge, and some of the witnesses at the hearing described the operation as a "paint-line" or as the "painting department." In fact, the Respondent does not paint the components. It instead "powder coat[s]" them, electrostatically bonding a powder finish to the metal.

into a unit position, told Martin he "didn't want to get involved and mess his chances up of getting in the union." Slayden told Martin he "didn't really want to get involved because, at that time, he was . . . averaging about 40 hours a week, and he didn't want to mess that up."

When Martin again complained to Union Steward Norman in January 1985, Norman suggested that Martin file a complaint with the Indiana Department of Human Rights. In February, Martin decided to do so and again asked East and Slayden to help him. Both declined.

Martin had an appointment with the department for the evening of 26 February 1985. That day, he told Supervisor Jaques of his plans and told many other employees as well. Jaques told Martin, "Go ahead and do what you have to do."

Jaques discussed Martin's plans with East and Slayden. Jaques told them that if Martin filed a complaint with the human rights department, Jaques would "just have to reduce the hours" because he "was just doing [them] a favor by letting [them] work that many hours a week because he knew [the employees] needed the money."

Martin went to the Indiana Human Rights Department alone on 26 February. A department attorney told Martin her department could not handle his complaint, but that she would help him fill out a National Labor Relations Board charge. Martin made plans to return to the department at a later date to sign a Board charge.

The next morning, when Martin and Slayden reported to work, Jaques told Martin, "You fucked up by going to Human Rights. [Respondent Treasurer and Controller] Frank O'Brien told me I had to cut everybody's hours." Jaques also said, "It would not have been so bad if he hadn't gone and blown off his mouth to everyone before he went, but he had to do it, so nobody could work forty hours."

Martin signed a Board charge against the Union on 7 March 1985, contending the Union denied him representation "unfairly." The Regional Director for Region 25 dismissed Martin's charge and, on 23 May 1985, Martin filed a charge against the Respondent.

When Respondent Treasurer and Controller O'Brien in March 1985 received a copy of the charge Martin filed against the Union, he again contacted Jaques about the hours the powder-line employees worked. This time O'Brien told Jaques to eliminate unnecessary maintenance work and to hire more employees. O'Brien reminded Jaques that the powder-line employees were supposed to be part time and said, "[L]et's try to keep it that way."

In April, Martin and Slayden complained to Jaques about the fact that their hours had been cut. Jaques told them that they had been working too many unproductive hours. He also stated that it had been Martin who had brought to O'Brien's attention that Jaques had been letting them work unnecessary hours. He told Martin, "[Y]ou made your bed, you're going to have to lie in it."

The Respondent through January and February 1985 operated its powder line with four employees and the employee complement averaged just under 40 hours per week per employee. In early March, Jaques hired more employees and the average number of weekly hours per employee fell to 30. In April the employee complement dropped to four and the weekly hours per employee briefly exceeded 40, but Jaques quickly hired more employees and the average dropped to less than 25. By June the Respondent had nine employees for its powder line. In July it had seven or eight and the average number of weekly hours per employee dropped to below 20. When asked why he hired the additional employees, Jaques could not recall.

The judge found Martin had not engaged in concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, relying on the Board's decision in Meyers Industries.[5] The Board in Meyers held that an employee who, by and on behalf of himself only, contacted a state agency to make a statutory safety complaint, had not acted concertedly. There was no applicable collective-bargaining agreement in Meyers and the Board specifically distinguished the facts in Meyers from those to which the Board's Interboro doctrine[6] might apply. Under the Interboro doctrine, an employee who honestly and reasonably asserts a right grounded in a collective-bargaining agreement acts concertedly within the meaning of Section 7, even if the employee acts alone. The United States Supreme Court approved the Interboro doctrine in NLRB v. City Disposal Systems.[7]

Although Martin contacted a state agency, he did so contending the Respondent wrongfully denied its powder-line employees contractual wages and benefits and that the Union did not properly represent them when it failed to secure for them their contractual rights. Martin based his contention on the fact that full-time employees were included in the contractual unit and thus entitled to contractual benefits. The Respondent's powder-line employees, who often worked more than 40 hours each week, Martin argued, were full-time employees. We find Martin's claim objectively reasonable and there is no contention Martin pressed his claim in bad faith. Accordingly, the Board's decision in Meyers Industries does not apply in this case. Instead, we find Martin was engaged in concerted activity when he went to the Indiana Human Rights Department and when he filed a charge with the Board, pursuant to the Interboro doctrine. Because we also find Martin acted for the employees' mutual aid or protection, we find Section 7 protected Martin when he individually pressed his claim.[8]

Although the judge found that the Respondent reduced the powder-line employees' hours in response to Martin's claim, he concluded the Respondent had not done so unlawfully because he found the Respondent had an economic justification. The judge found the Respondent lawfully intended to keep the powder-line employees part time from the start because its business did not justify operating the line full time. The Respondent, the judge found, was fearful Martin might succeed in his effort to have the powder-line employees included in the unit.

Jaques, however, did not simply reduce the employees' hours to just below 40 to make it clear they were not full-time employees. By July he had instead reduced their weekly hours to below 20. In light of Jaques' statements to Martin that he had "fucked up by going to Human Rights" and that he had "made [his] bed" and was "going to have to lie in it," we find that Jaques reduced the powder-line employees' hours so drastically in retaliation for Martin's protected claim.[9] Accordingly, we find the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1).[10]

II.

The judge concluded the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and/or (1) or Section 8(d) by "fail[ing] and refus[ing] to assign full-time employment to certain of its [powder-coating] department employees," as the complaint alleged. We agree, but we do not rely on the judge's factual analysis.

The judge found the Respondent and the Union agreed that powder-line employees would be excluded from the unit. More precisely, the parties agreed that powder-line employees would be part-time employees and, for that reason, would be excluded from the unit.[11]

In finding the parties agreed to exclude powder-line employees from the unit, the judge evidently relied on his further finding that the Union had dropped its demand in contract negotiations that the powder-line employees be included. In fact, according to both Union Chief Shop Steward Dwayne K. Norman's and Respondent Treasurer and Controller Frank O'Brien's uncontradicted testimony, the Union proposed that all part-time employees be included in the unit. Both O'Brien and Norman testified that they understood that the contract excluded powder-line employees from the unit because they were part time. There is no indication they ever agreed that the contract excluded powder-line employees whether or not they worked full time.

We nevertheless agree that the Respondent did not unlawfully fail or refuse to apply the contract to the powder-line employees. As discussed above, the parties' contract included a 45-day probationary period and Union Steward Norman understood the Respondent could thus work employees for 40 hours per week for less than 45 days and properly exclude the employees from the unit. None of the powder-line employees worked 40-hour weeks for 45 consecutive days.

The Union, in any event, acquiesced to the Respondent's excluding the employees from the unit. Norman became aware powder-line employees worked 40 hours or more as early as mid-1984 and employee Paul Martin from September 1984 through February 1985 persistently demanded they be included in the unit. Although the Union met with the Respondent in mid-October 1984, after which the Respondent established a full-time

[9] In sec. III,B, par. 18 the judge found that O'Brien "credibly" testified that he had not retaliated against the powder-line employees in response to Martin's claim. Whether we would be bound by that credibility determination if contradicted by other evidence independent of O'Brien's testimony is questionable. Nonetheless, Jaques, not O'Brien, carried out O'Brien's instructions and it is Jaques whom we find tainted by unlawful motives.

Because we find that Jaques reduced the powder-line employees' hours so drastically solely in retaliation for Martin's protected claim, and not for any lawful reasons, we further find that the Respondent necessarily failed to carry its burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), to establish that it would have taken the same action even absent the protected conduct.

[10] The judge attempted to distinguish Akron General Medical Center, 226 NLRB 953, 956 (1976), but we find the facts in that case strikingly similar. The contract in that case excluded part-time employees who worked less than 20 hours per week. By practice, "oncall" employees also were not covered by the contract. The employer placed a freeze on adding further unit jobs early in 1975, but began to work oncall and other part-time employees more than 20 hours per week after the freeze. When the union and oncall and part-time employees filed grievances seeking contractual wages and benefits, the employer cut their weekly hours to less than 20. A hospital administrator said she had "tried to be a nice guy" in giving the employees extra hours, but that the hospital administration insisted she cut their hours because of the grievances. 226 NLRB at 954–955. The Board found the employer violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1). Id. at 956.

powder-line position, the Union did not further pursue the matter.[12]

Accordingly, we shall dismiss this part of the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By reducing its powder-line employees' work hours because an employee honestly and reasonably asserted a right grounded in the Union's collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

2. The Respondent has not otherwise violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) or Section 8(d) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order the Respondent to make its employees whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, to be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[13]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Stor-Rite Metal Products, Inc., Michigan City, Indiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Reducing its employees' work hours because an employee honestly and reasonably asserted a right grounded in the Union's collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make its employees whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Michigan City, Indiana facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 25, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

MEMBER STEPHENS, dissenting in part.

I agree, for the reasons stated by my colleagues, that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by declining to apply the contract to the powder-line employees. I also agree that employee Martin's series of activities aimed at securing the benefits of the collective-bargaining agreement for himself and other powder-line employees was protected concerted activity. For the reasons stated below, however, I would affirm the judge's dismissal of the complaint.

I am willing to assume that the General Counsel made out a prima facie case of discrimination in violation of Section 8(a)(3), i.e., she produced evidence from which we could infer that the Respondent was motivated, at least in part, by a desire to penalize the powder-line employees for Martin's protests when it reduced their hours. Certainly the remarks of Supervisor Jaques provide strong evidence of a discriminatory motive. Controller O'Brien, however, is the official who made the decision to reduce the employees' hours, and the judge credited O'Brien's testimony that receipt of the Board charge that Martin had filed regard-

[12] See City Hospital of East Liverpool, 234 NLRB 58 (1978); Clarkwood Corp., 233 NLRB 1172 (1977).

[13] We find that the violation began in early March 1985 when Finishing Department Supervisor Jaques hired additional employees and reduced the average number of weekly hours he assigned to powder-line employees to 30.

The General Counsel has requested that the Order include a "visitatorial clause" authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure with supervision by the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

ing denial of the contract benefits induced him to order the reduction of hours because it then became clear to him that Jaques was giving those employees the equivalent of full-time work. Even assuming (contrary to the judge's finding) that O'Brien was also motivated by annoyance at Martin's activities, I would find that the Respondent has carried its burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. on other grounds 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 400–403 (1983), of showing that it would have taken the action in question even in the absence of the protected concerted conduct. Specifically, the record evidence persuades me that it is more probable than not that the Respondent would have reduced the powder-line employees' hours even if the potential liability for contractual benefits had come to its attention from nonemployee sources and no employee had ever protested the matter. It seems clear that the Respondent wanted to protect what it regarded as its bargain with the Union to exclude the powder-line employees from the unit, and the evidence indicates to me that, for example, it would probably have reduced the powder-line employees to the status of irrefutably part-time employees even if it was simply advised by its counsel that giving the powder-line employees the equivalent of full-time employment might raise a question whether they should be included in the definition of "full-time employees" entitled to contractual benefits.

That the Respondent did not reduce the hours before Martin's protests does not, in my view, defeat the Wright Line defense. It seems clear to me that not until then did O'Brien have reason to think there was any serious issue about the powder-line employees' status, and hence he had no reason to believe until then that changing their hours might be advisable as a means of ensuring that the Respondent's contractual bargain with the Union over their status would be protected.[1] The fact that the Respondent eventually reduced the powder-line employees' weekly hours to a greater extent than was strictly necessary to reduce them below the 40-hour average similarly does not persuade me to join my colleagues in the majority. The record shows that the Respondent put in place a procedure designed to ensure that it would not thenceforth ever find itself in a position of needing to ask powder-line employees to work 40 hours a week or more. This procedure resulted in much less work for powder-line employees in July, but in earlier months it simply fulfilled the goal of keeping the employees' weekly hours below 40. The institution of such a procedure is not inconsistent with an aim of simply assuring that the powder-line employees would not appear to be full-time employees, arguably subject to the collective-bargaining agreement.

[1] The union steward and O'Brien had discussed the matter in October and the result was the creation of one full-time position in the painting department that would be deemed within the contractual unit. At that point O'Brien reasonably could feel assured that the matter had been resolved and that the powder-line painting work could be done by the full-time employee and the other six powder-line employees working part time.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT reduce your work hours because one of you honestly and reasonably asserts a right grounded in General Service Employees Union Local No. 73's contract with us.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make our powder-line employees whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from our discrimination against them, plus interest.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 30 September and 1 and 2 October 1985 at Michigan City, Indiana. The charge was filed 28 May 1985 by Paul W. Martin. Complaint issued 31 July 1985 alleging that Stor-Rige Products, Inc. (Respondent or Company) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5)[1] and Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act. More particularly the complaint alleges that:

[1] Respondent, at the hearing, moved for dismissal of certain allegations contained in the complaint on grounds that they had not been included in the original charge. However, as stated in NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 301, 307–308 (1959):

> A charge filed with the Labor Board is not to be measured by the standards applicable to a pleading in a private lawsuit. Its purpose is 6(a)[2] Certain painting department employees are full-time production employees as described in and covered by the existing collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) Full-time employees in the painting department did not receive the benefits received by other full-time employees as required by the existing collective-bargaining agreement.

(c) Between 25 September 1984 and 26 February 1985 certain employees of the painting department requested the Union to represent them and obtain for them the benefits accorded other employees under the existing collective-bargaining agreement.

(d) Between 25 September 1984 and 26 February 1985 the Union registered grievances with Respondent in an attempt to obtain for certain employees of the painting department the collective-bargaining agreement benefits.

(e) On 26 February 1985, Charging Party Martin filed a National Labor Relations Board[3] charge to obtain for the employees of the painting department, the benefits accorded other employees under the existing collective-bargaining agreement.

(g) About 27 February 1985, Respondent reduced the work hours of certain of its painting department employees.

(h) Since about 27 February 1985, Respondent failed and refused to assign full-time employment to certain of its painting department employees.

(i) Respondent reduced the work hours of and failed and refused to assign full-time employment to certain of its painting department employees because Charging Party Martin and other employees requested the Union to represent them and obtain the benefits of the existing collective-bargaining contract for them; because Martin filed the National Labor Relations Board charge; and because the Union registered grievances with Respondent on behalf of Martin and other painting department employees.

(j) Respondent reduced the work hours of certain of its painting department employees and failed and refused to assign them full-time employment in order to avoid its obligation under the collective-bargaining agreement to grant to all employees employed in its painting department, all the rights and benefits accorded to full-time employees under the existing collective-bargaining agreement.

In its answer, Respondent admitted some and denied others of the above allegations. It denied, however, the commission of any unfair labor practices.

The General Counsel and Respondent were represented at the hearing and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, present evidence, and argument.[5] Both the General Counsel and Respondent[6] filed briefs. On the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after giving due consideration of the briefs, I make the following: merely to set in motion the machinery of an inquiry. NLRB v. J. & M Electric Co., 318 U.S. 9, 18. The responsibility of making that inquiry, and of framing the issues in the case is one that Congress has imposed on the Board, not the charging party. To confine the Board in its inquiry and in framing the complaint to the specific matters alleged in the charge would reduce the statutory machinery to a vehicle for the vindication of private rights. This would be alien to the basic purpose of the Act. . . .

Once its jurisdiction is invoked the Board must be left free to make full inquiry under its broad investigatory power in order properly to discharge the duty of protecting public rights which Congress has imposed on it. There can be no justification for confining such an inquiry to the precise particularizations of a charge.

The Supreme Court, in an earlier case, had remarked that it could find no warrant in the language or purposes of the Act for saying that it precluded the Board from dealing adequately if initially with unfair labor practices in the complaint and hearing stages of proceedings where those unfair labor practices are related to those alleged in the charge. National Licorice Co. v. NLRB, 309 U.S. 350, 369 (1940).

In the instant case, the charge was filed by an ordinary citizen, a working man, neither a lawyer nor a legal scholar. In sec. 2 of the charge he laid out fully and clearly the basis for his charge, quite sufficient to apprise the Respondent of the underlying causes for the filing of the charge. The fact that he failed to identify the specific subsections of the Act under which his alleged cause of action might fall does not warrant the dismissal of his claim. Moreover, the inclusion in the complaint of the identifying subsections cured the initial defect and adequately alerted Respondent to the basis for all allegations. The motion is denied.

[2] The numbered paragraphs conform to those numbered paragraphs in the complaint, each of which denotes a specific allegation.

[3] Filed through the Indiana Human Rights Department.

[4] Par. 6(f) was conclusionary and was not a substantive allegation.

[5] Respondent at the hearing moved for dismissal of pars. 5 and 6 of the complaint on grounds that these allegations "do not describe a violation of the Act." Because the very purpose of these proceedings, i.e., the taking of testimony and adducing of evidence at the hearing and the issuance of a decision based thereon, is to determine whether the incidents alleged actually occurred and, if so, whether singly or collectively they amount to a violation of the Act, the motion, when made, was premature, and, if granted, would have deprived the General Counsel of his right to try his case. Whether the complaint describes a violation will be decided herein. Motion denied.

[6] Counsel for Respondent, in his brief, complained that his client was "denied due process from the outset of the hearing," stating that "while the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) stated that the complaint was confusing, thereafter General Counsel refused to described and the ALJ declined to compel the General Counsel to described how the allegations of the complaint described the violation of the Act."

According to the record, the General Counsel offered the formal documents and counsel for Respondent objected on several grounds including his belief that the complaint was confusing and the allegations did not state a violation within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act. In order to help Respondent's counsel understand the theory of the General Counsel, the General Counsel was invited to and in fact did make an opening statement explaining his theory (Tr. 13–15). The fact that his explanation was more than adequate to apprise Respondent of his theory of the case is reflected in the adequacy of Respondent's own brief in which he capably argued his client's position. Moreover, if counsel for Respondent found the complaint confusing, the time to do something about it was at the time of receipt of the document when a motion for a bill of particulars would have been in order. The day of the hearing is a bit late.

Another complaint voiced by counsel for Respondent in his brief was that he had obtained certain documents from the General Counsel that were identified and admitted, then withdrawn by the General Counsel for copying. Respondent's counsel complains in his brief that he never received copies of these documents: R. Exh. 5, G.C. Exh. 7, G.C. Exh. 8, G.C. Exh. 5(a), and G.C. Exh. 12. However, under standard Board hearing procedures each attorney submitting exhibits is required to submit a sufficient number of copies to supply the administrative law judge and each of the parties. That Respondent's counsel failed to submit a sufficient number of R. Exh. 5 can hardly be blamed on anyone but himself. Regarding the General Counsel's exhibits, the time to bring such deficiencies are first discovered so that the needed documents can be obtained in time to be used in preparation of the brief. Respondent's counsel took no steps and made no attempt to communicate to me the fact that he had not received copies of these documents. Because he chose to submit his brief without benefit of these documents, he can hardly effectively complain in his brief about their absences.

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Respondent, an Indiana corporation,[7] maintains its principal office and place of business in Michigan City, Indiana, where it is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of metal shelving and related products. During the past 12 months, a representative period, Respondent sold and shipped from its Michigan City facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points located outside the state of Indiana and purchased and received at its Michigan City facility, products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Indiana. I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that General Service Employees Union Local No. 73 (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The Facts

A. Background

The Respondent is a manufacturer of display shelving and related products. Its operation is divided into four departments: manufacturing, packaging, shipping and receiving, and finishing or painting. Management personnel chiefly involved in the instant proceeding include Frank O'Brien, controller and treasurer, who is in charge of the day-to-day operations of the Company, and Gregory Jaques, who is in charge of the painting department.[8]

Respondent and the Union have negotiated and entered into a succession of collective-bargaining agreements since 1977 pursuant to the Union's certification that year by the National Labor Relations Board. The unit for which the Union is the bargaining representative is described in the most recent (1983) contract as:

> All full-time production and maintenance employees and plant clerical employees at the facilities and unit described in the NLRB Certification Consent Election Agreement Case 13–RC–14474, dated August 2, 1977. Excluded office clerical shall include executive secretaries, accounting clerks, payroll and timekeepers, receptionists, order control clerks, sales, designers and computer workers. Set-up men shall be included in the unit effective November 9, 1983, with full seniority credit from date of hire for incumbent employees currently holding those positions for all purposes.

In 1982 the plant moved from Chicago, Illinois, to Michigan City, Indiana. Shortly after relocation, the Respondent decided that it would create its own finishing or painting department that previously had not existed. It had been contracting out the painting of the parts it manufactured. In addition to painting its own parts, Respondent also planned to seek contracts to paint parts manufactured by other manufacturers. Even so, it was recognized that there would not be sufficient work available for painting department employees to keep them operating on a full-time basis. Indeed, it was expected that the painting department would probably operate only 2 or 3 days per week because under ordinary circumstances that amount of time would be sufficient to paint all the parts manufactured by Respondent in a week. Consequently, from its inception, and according to plan, the new painting department operated on a part-time basis, almost exclusively, running parts only 2 or 3 days per week. This occurred despite Respondent's efforts to obtain outside contracts to increase production in its painting department.

As noted above the Union represented all full-time employees of Respondent since its certification in 1977. The various departments employed a few part-time employees who were neither represented by the Union nor granted the wages and other benefits provided to the full-time employees covered by the contract. However, these part-time employees were permitted to bid on full-time union jobs as they became available and were usually given preference over outsiders or union full-time employees, who under the contract, were not permitted to bid laterally on job openings.

In early 1983, when the painting department was being set up, Gregory Jaques was hired to supervise that department. He was told at the time by O'Brien that there was no need for the painting department employees to work over 40 hours per week and that he should keep the nonproductive hours down. Jaques, in turn, advised each employee as hired that he would be working part-time outside the unit but would be permitted to bid on unit jobs as they became available. This procedure was followed and as each painting department employee quit, was terminated, or transferred into the unit, a new employee would be hired to take his place. Similarly, as production fluctuated the painting department complement of employees would increase or decrease accordingly between three and seven throughout 1983. The same procedure was followed throughout 1984 during which the complement of painting department employees remained relatively steady, usually at four or five for the first several months, then at six in the last few months when production was high. Toward the end of December production dipped as did the available number of hours. From late December through early March 1985 the complement of painting department employees remained rather steady at four. When work was available they worked over 40 hours and no attempt was made by Jaques to keep them below 40.

As noted earlier, the Union represented only full-time employees. The part-time employees in all departments remained outside the unit. From its very inception, the painting department was considered by both the Union and Respondent to be outside the unit, primarily because it was in operation only 2 or 3 days per week, it being quite capable of finishing all Respondent's manufactured production in that period of time. In 1983, although occasionally a painting department employee might work 40 hours or more, the entire department averaged far fewer hours. Therefore, when the parties negotiated a new collective-bargaining agreement in November 1983 and the Union initially requested the inclusion of the painting department in the unit and Respondent rejected this demand, it was finally agreed that the entire painting department would remain outside the bargaining unit with its employees unrepresented and not subject to the contractual provisions.

In mid-1984 the chief steward for the Union became aware that occasionally some painting department employees would work over 40 hours. He approached management about bringing those employees into the unit, but was told that there was still not enough work in the painting department to make it full time. Although the steward brought the subject up on several occasions with management and informed his business agent about the situation, the matter was never formally pursued through the contractual grievance procedure.

B. The Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

On 25 September 1984[9] Jaques hired Paul Martin to work on the paint line. Jaques told Martin, upon being hired, that there would be some weeks when he would not work 40 hours, that he would be considered a part-time employee with a wage rate of $4 per hour. He also advised him that, although his job was nonunion, he would be eligible to transfer into a unit job as openings occurred and that he would be considered for any available unit job before anyone on the street.[10] Thereafter, Martin worked on the paint line as needed, sometimes 40 hours or more, sometimes less, depending on production requirements.

In September or early October Martin, who at the time was working 40-hour weeks, began to complain to the union steward that although the painting department employees were working full time, they were still considered part-time employees being paid less than union scale and receiving none of the contractual benefits of the contract. He wanted to know why they were not included in the unit. The steward advised Martin that they were not included in the unit because of the contract, that he was trying to get them in but there was nothing he could do. Despite the steward's explanation of the situation, Martin continued persistently to complain to him about the situation almost daily.

Possibly as a result of Martin's complaints, a meeting was held between the Union and management during which the steward advised O'Brien that he was getting flack about the part-time employees not being in the Union. Shortly thereafter, and probably as a result of this meeting, and the fact that production in the painting department dramatically increased and its complement expanded, a new position was created in the department. This position, a full-time paint operator, was to be the only union job in the painting department. Clearly, management felt that the number of hours being worked by the painting department, at the time, was sufficient to support one full-time position, but that because of the erratic nature of the paint department's production, it would be economically more feasible to keep the rest of the painting department employees working on a part-time basis. Coinciding with the creation of the new full-time position was the increase in October in the number of painting department employees to an average of six. As noted earlier, production hours increased dramatically at this time and the increase in the number of employees became necessary if the department were to remain part-time.[11]

From early October through mid-December production in the painting department remained high but in late December it fell off dramatically. The complement in the painting department fell to an average of four. With the drop in paint line production some of the employees would be sent home early. For those who did not want to go home, Jaques would try to find work in other departments for them in order to increase their hours. Others would be given cleanup work to perform.

For 2 weeks in October, Martin worked in the packaging department, still as a part-timer. When he returned to the painting department, he began to discuss with other employees, Ron East and Tim Slayden, their not being in the Union and not getting union wages and benefits. He argued that because he had been doing a unit job in packaging, he should have received the benefits of the contract. When he suggested talking to the shop steward about it, however, East said that he did not want to get involved because he was in the process of becoming a union member and did not want to mess up his chances of doing that. Slayden said he did not want to get involved because he was working a 40-hour week and was satisfied. Martin also aired his complaint to Jaques, but to no avail.

In November Martin again talked to the chief steward several times about getting the painting department into the Union. The steward told Martin that there was nothing he could do until contract time, that his hands were tied.

In mid-November one of the painting department employees quit. Jaques, however, did not replace him as was the usual practice in the past. Instead he had some of the other remaining employees report in more often, thus resulting in a greater number of hours worked, frequently over 40. Instead of waiting to be called, these employees were told to report every day. This continued until Christmas. In mid-December Martin again complained to Jaques about working 40 hours and not being in the Union, but then with the sudden drop in production around Christmas at least one painting department employee, Slayden, was laid off for lack of work and the complement dropped to three.

In January 1985[12] painting department production again increased, but Jaques did not hire new employees, although he did recall Slayden back.[13] The complement remained steady at four and with the increased number of hours available Martin and the other painting department employees began again to work a regular 40-hour week.[14] This prompted Martin once again to complain to the steward that the paint department employees were being discriminated against by allowing only one of them to be in the Union when all were working over 40 hours per week. The steward suggested that Martin take his case to the Indiana Human Rights Department. Martin also once again discussed getting into the Union with East and Slayden. Slayden agreed with Martin that it would be nice to get into the Union and receive the wages and benefits of the contract, but stated that he was not going to protest his situation because he was working a 40-hour week and was lucky to have a job at all because a lot of people did not have one. East agreed with Slayden.

In January the Company installed some new equipment in the painting department that made the paint line run more efficiently. This, in turn, reduced the number of available hours. The four painting department employees therefore shared fewer hours resulting in their receiving over 40 hours in just 1 week of 4 in February. About 5 February, however, before the decrease in available hours, Martin confided to Slayden that he had talked to the chief steward once again about getting the painting department employees into the Union, but that the steward had done nothing about it and was not going to do anything about it. Martin said that because the steward was doing nothing he was going to go to the Indiana Department of Human Rights about the matter and file charges against the Company and the Union to get the paint line employees into the Union because they were already working a 40-hour week.

In mid-February, the full-time paint operator was fired for absenteeism and East was in line to replace him. Slayden had been working over 40 hours in January and averaging close to that in February. Therefore, when Martin announced to Slayden and East about 26 February that he was going to file charges with Human Rights and asked them to come with him, Slayden refused, stating once again that although it would be nice to be in the Union and have all the benefits he was happy to be working 40 to 45 hours per week. East also refused to accompany Martin because he was in the probationary period in the full-time paint operator's position and did not wish to get involved.

In addition to telling East and Slayden of his intention of going to Human Rights, Martin, on 26 February, also told a number of other employees of his intentions. He told Jaques that he had an appointment there later that day to file a complaint against the Union and the Company. He explained to Jaques that he felt it was discriminatory to have one painting department employee in the Union and the rest of the painting department out of the Union, and the Company doing what it wants and the Union letting the Company get away with it. Martin argued that the painting department employees work 40 hours and just as hard as the union employees. Jaques replied that he would like to see the whole finishing department in the Union to end the bickering about it, but that it was because the painting department could paint parts faster than they could be produced that there was no need to have it operating 40 hours per week. When Martin stated that he was nevertheless going to file a charge, Jaques replied, "Go ahead and do what you have to do."

Slayden, East, and Jaques discussed Martin's plans to file charges against the Respondent and the Union. Jaques told Slayden that if Martin filed the complaint with Human Rights he would just have to reduce the hours of the painting department employees because he had been just doing them a favor by letting them work so many hours a week, knowing that they needed the money. Later Slayden told Martin that if he went to the Human Rights Department he would just mess it up for all the painting department employees because their hours were just going to be cut. He told Martin that the Company would cut their hours so that the painting department employees would not be considered full time.

On the evening of 26 February Martin went down to the Indiana Human Rights Department in Michigan City to file his charge. He explained the situation to the individual in authority who told him that her department did not cover the problem but that she would obtain and fill out for Martin the proper charge form for the National Labor Relations Board.

On the morning of 27 February, when Martin and Slayden reported for work Jaques told Martin, "You fucked up by going to Human Rights. Frank O'Brien told me I had to cut everybody's hours."[15] Jaques said that he had gotten a phone call the night before and that he had been told to reduce the hours and hire more people because Martin was stirring up such a ruckus by taking the matter to Human Rights. He added, "It would not have been so bad if Martin hadn't gone and blown off his mouth to everyone before he went, but he had to do it, so nobody could work 40 hours." Jaques went on to explain that the painting department jobs were part-time jobs and painting department employees were not supposed to be working more than 40 hours per week.

On 7 March Martin returned to the Indiana Human Rights Department and signed the charge against the Union. The charge was forwarded to the Board's Indianapolis Regional Office, where on 13 March 1985 it was docketed.[16] Shortly thereafter a copy of the charge was received by Respondent.

Meanwhile, whereas Martin had been averaging well over 40 hours per week since the second week of January, and the painting department, as a whole, had been averaging just under 40 hours since then, beginning in the first week in March, average hours for painting department employees including Martin dropped so that the average in March was approximately 30 hours per person. Although the drop in average hours is partly due to a decrease in production it was also, in part, due to the increase in the number of painting department personnel from four in January and most of February to five or six and at one time seven in March. Though in January and February the four painting department employees ran the paint line, as usual only two or three times per week, they were given sufficient maintenance, cleanup, and/or work in other departments on other days to get their 40-hour, 5-day workweek in. However, after 27 February Martin and the other painting department employees were told by Jaques that because everybody's hours had been cut, they would no longer automatically report every day for work but would report in accordance with a work schedule he intended to set up. The schedule would advise his employees which of them were scheduled to work on what days.[17] It is thus quite clear that beginning in March available hours were distributed among a larger number of painting department employees. In the first half of April Respondent maintained a complement of five or six painting department employees who averaged less than 30 hours per week. When, however, in mid-April the complement dropped to four and the average number exceeded 40 hours, Respondent quickly hired two additional employees and the average hours worked dropped below 25. Thereafter, when the average number of hours worked approached or exceeded 40 hours Respondent hired additional employees.[18] In June there were as many as nine painting department employees and in July, seven or eight were employed, who averaged less than 20 hours each.

[13] A few employees were hired for a couple of hours at night to work on special orders.

Whereas in 1984 Respondent maintained a sufficient number of regular employees in the paint department to get the work done, hiring additional employees to meet production or to replace quit, terminated, or transferred employees, and working them over 40 hours whenever necessary, and whereas in late January and February 1985 Respondent consistently employed the same four employees working them 40 or close to 40 hours per week. By May and June Respondent had devised a rotating system whereby between six and nine employees would be kept on the payroll, working one group on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays and another group Tuesdays and Thursdays, reversing the procedure the following week.[19] This type of scheduling guaranteed that rarely would any painting department employee work a 40-hour week except for the union paint operator.

On several occasions after the painting department employees had their hours reduced, Slayden asked Jaques if they could get their 40 hours back. Each time Jaques replied that he was only supposed to work them part-time because they were hired part-time. Indeed, O'Brien testified that after receiving a copy of the charge that Martin filed against the Union in which Martin claimed to have been working 40 hours, he asked Jaques about this claim. When Jaques explained that he had been short-handed and had a lot of maintenance, O'Brien told Jaques to cut out the unnecessary maintenance and hire more employees. He told Jaques to remember that the paint department employees were supposed to be part-time, and "let's try to keep it that way." O'Brien testified credibly that his instructions to Jaques on this occasion were not in retaliation for Martin's filing of the charge against the Union but rather as a result of O'Brien's getting a copy of the charge and thus becoming more aware of the problem; the problem being that Jaques had been working painting department employees' hours he should not have been working them. Following O'Brien's instructions to Jaques, Jaques began hiring new employees. This began in March and continued, at least, through July.[20]

On one occasion in April, Martin and Slayden complained to Jaques about the decrease in their hours. Martin stated that they had not been making anything before and with the cut in hours they were now making even less. He asked why the hours had been cut. Jaques replied that the painting department had been working too many unproductive hours and that it had been Martin who brought to O'Brien's attention that Jaques had been letting them work unnecessary hours. He added, "You made your bed, you're going to have to lie in it."

As of the date of the hearing negotiations for a new contract had begun. The Union, according to the chief steward, was proposing, as it had in the past, inclusion in the unit of the painting department employees.

Analysis

Substantively, the General Counsel alleges[21] that Martin and certain other employees in the Respondent's finishing/painting department have been full-time production employees within the meaning of the unit description set forth in the 1983 collective-bargaining agreement. The record reveals, however, that the status of the painting department employees was the subject of negotiations prior to the execution of the 1983 agreement. During those negotiations, the Union proposed the inclusion of the painting department employees within the unit of "All full-time production and maintenance employees," which it represented. Respondent, however, took the position that because the painting department only operated two or three times per week and available work fluctuated so drastically, it was never certain how [17] Jaques denied that there was any change in scheduling. When his testimony differs from that of Martin and Slayden on this point, the latter are credited.

[18] Although Jaques did all the hiring of the new paint line employees in March and thereafter, he could not explain his reasons for doing so.

[19] In his testimony O'Brien implied that a rotating system had historically been used and that six to eight employees were always kept on-call to ensure there would be four or more available at any given time. Payroll records supplied by Respondent do not support this testimony.

[20] There is no inconsistency in finding, as I have, that O'Brien learned of Martin's planned visit to the Human Relations Department on 26 February and took some action based thereon and learned additional facts later in March upon receiving a copy of the charge against the Union and thereafter took additional action based thereon.

many hours the painting department employees would work, the entire department should be regarded as composed of part-time employees, outside the unit, not subject to the collective-bargaining agreement, and unrepresented. The Respondent's position prevailed and the contract was executed and ratified with the mutual understanding, never formally nor seriously challenged by the Union, that the painting department employees were not covered by the contract. It is not the Board's province to insert itself in the bargaining process by redefining the terms of a lawfully negotiated collective-bargaining agreement in a way totally contrary to the intentions of the parties. I find that the painting department employees are not and never were intended to be covered by the contract.

The General Counsel alleges[22] that Respondent has failed and refused to afford Martin and certain other painting department employees all the rights and benefits accorded full-time employees by the collective-bargaining agreement. The record indicates that Respondent did, in fact, refuse to afford painting department employees the wages and benefits that were provided for by the contract. However, inasmuch as I have found that, by mutual agreement of the parties, these employees were not covered by the contract, there was and is no requirement that Respondent extend its provisions to the painting department employees.

The General Counsel alleges[23] that on several occasions Martin and certain other painting department employees requested that the Union assist them in obtaining contractual rights and that the Union through the chief steward registered grievances[24] with Respondent in pursuance of these requests. The record reveals, however, that Martin, acting alone, made numerous unsuccessful requests of the steward to try to obtain for painting department employees the contractual benefits that unit personnel were receiving, but was informed by the steward that nothing could be done, that his hands were tied until it was time to renegotiate a new contract. Granted that there occurred in late 1984 a meeting between the Union and management in which it was agreed that one new unit position be created in the painting department, in my opinion Respondent was not obligated by the contract to grant this concession, and its having done so reflects well on its desire to negotiate in good faith. I find that the Union did not file formal grievances as alleged and Martin did not act in concert with other painting department employees on this matter.

The General Counsel alleges that Martin on 26 February registered a complaint with the Indiana Human Rights Department[25] as a continuation of his previous efforts[26] to obtain contractual rights for the painting department employees and that thereafter the hours of these employees were reduced.[27] The record clearly supports these allegations to the extent that it reflects that Martin did seek the aid at the Michigan City office of the Human Rights Department for the purposes alleged. Further, I find that following Martin's visit to the Human Rights Department the hours of painting department employees were reduced by the expedient of hiring additional employees to work in the painting department and dividing the available work along the larger complement, thus reducing the number of hours that would have been worked had the total number of painting department employees not been enlarged.

The General Counsel alleges[28] that Respondent reduced the hours of its painting department employees and has since about 27 February failed and refused to assign full-time employment to these employees because Martin and his fellow employees requested the Union to assist them in obtaining contractual rights, because Martin registered a complaint with the Indiana Human Rights Department, and because the Union through the chief steward registered grievances with Respondent on behalf of Martin and other painting department employees to obtain contractual rights for them.[29] But the record contains no evidence that the hours of the painting department employees were reduced, as described, in retaliation for Martin's seeking to obtain contractual rights for the painting department employees, either through the Union or through the Indiana Human Rights Department. If retaliation were the motivating factor for the reduction in hours, I would find a violation. Akron General Medical Center, 226 NLRB 953 (1976). However, I do not find it so. Rather, the reason for the reduction in hours through the expansion of the painting department complement appears to be economic and most easily understood through an analysis of the factual history of the problem as discussed above.

Thus, the Respondent and the Union have enjoyed a long history of amicable labor management relations as reflected in successive collective-bargaining agreements dating from 1977. In negotiating their most recent contract in November 1973, the Union and Respondent agreed that the employees in the painting department would be considered part-time and therefore neither represented by the Union now subject to the provisions of the contract. Jaques was instructed not to work his people over 40 hours.

In 1983 and the first half of 1984 Respondent ran its painting department with whatever number of employees were necessary to run the parts, do proper maintenance, and cleanup. Although occasionally a painting department employee might work a full 40-hour, 5-day week, this was the exception rather than the rule. In September 1984 business and production increased markedly, new employees were hired and most of them worked over 40 hours. This continued through mid-December when business and production once again dropped off. The drop in production necessitated the layoff of one employee and a decrease in the number of hours worked. In the second week in January, production again increased. Jaques recalled the laid-off employee but did not hire any new people. Instead, he worked the four regular employees regularly over 40 hours per week or very close to 40 hours. To ensure that the painting department employees received a maximum number of hours Jaques assigned them maintenance and cleanup work that, in some cases, was not absolutely necessary, and occasionally had some temporarily assigned to other departments, again for the purpose of giving them additional employment.

On 26 February, when Martin announced to East, Slayden, Jaques, the chief steward, and anyone else who would listen that he was going down to the Indiana Human Rights Department to file a charge because he and the other painting department employees were working 40 hours but not receiving the contractual benefits received by unit employees, word of his intention must have gotten back to O'Brien because the following day Jaques told Martin and Slayden that he had been told the night before that he should reduce the number of hours worked by the painting department employees and hire additional employees because Martin was causing such a ruckus by filing the charge with the Human Rights Department and blowing off his mouth to everyone before he went. Clearly, from the very beginning O'Brien intended the painting department to be part-time so that it could remain flexible and meet the peculiar demands of the erratic nature of its production. The Union had agreed to this. But then Jaques, out of the kindness of his heart, decided to give the painting department people 40 hours and more because they needed the work. That was all right until Martin announced to his fellow workers, management, and the Union that because the painting department employees were working 40 hours they should be considered full time, placed in the unit, and given all the contractual benefits. Fearful that Martin's activity would result in demands by the Union that the paint line be made full time, thereby losing its capacity to deal with the fluctuations in production, O'Brien ordered that the hours worked by the painting department employees be cut below 40 hours, by decreasing the number of nonproductive hours, and by hiring additional employees and spreading the available work out among the greater number so that each employee worked fewer hours. I conclude that the reduction of hours of the employees in the painting department was economically motivated and not in retaliation for the filing of the charge by Martin. Indeed, if retaliation were the motive, the discriminatory act would most likely have taken the form of an action against Martin, not against all the employees in the department, all of whom refused to join Martin in his singular crusade. I find no violation of Section 8(a)(5) or Section 8(d) because from its very inception the painting department was considered by the Union and Respondent to be part-time, unrepresented, and not subject to the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement; the reduction of the work hours of the painting department employees was not violative of the Act; and the Respondent was never obligated to assign full-time employment to the painting department employees. Further, I find no violation of Section 8(a)(3) because the reduction of the hours of the painting department employees and the hiring of additional painting department employees were economically motivated.

Finally, I find that although Martin acted on behalf of the welfare of all the employees in the painting department when he sought the help of the Union and of the Indiana Human Relations Department to obtain for them the benefits of representation and of the collective-bargaining agreement, he did so without obtaining authority to act on their behalf. Indeed, both Slayden and East rejected his overtures to have them act in concert with him, stating explicitly that they did not wish to become involved. I find, therefore, that Meyers Industries[30] is controlling and that Martin's activity was not concerted. Moreover, even if it were so considered, there is no evidence that Respondent was aware of any employee other than Martin who was so engaged and therefore no violation can be found. Center Ridge Co., 276 NLRB 105 (1985).

I have found that Respondent did not violate the Act in any manner alleged in the complaint. Consequently, I shall recommend that the case be dismissed in its entirety.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent has not engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

5 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 30 December 1985 Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting and answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

We agree with the judge that Branch Manager Pentheny restrained and coerced employee William Daros, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Pentheny invited Daros, a union adherent who had solicited other employees to sign authorization cards, for a cup of coffee at a restaurant near the plant. What began as a friendly chat soon took an ominous turn when Pentheny banged his fist on the table and asked Daros, "Why are you doing this to me?" Then he called Daros a "sneak" and a "snake." Daros responded that he was trying to better himself. Although Pentheny did not identify Daros' union activity expressly as the source of his irritation, the circumstances, including the absence of any other identifiable cause for his rancor, reasonably led Daros to believe that it was. Further, the total effect of these outbursts could hardly have failed to be threatening to the employee. In addition to the coercive interrogation concerning the reason for Daros' union activity, we find, in agreement with the judge, that Pentheny's remarks reasonably tended to create the impression that Daros' activities, which were not shown to have been open and notorious, had been under surveillance.

We do not find, however, that an additional coercive interrogation occurred when Supervisor Castoria asked employee Morrison whether he had been approached by anyone regarding unions. Morrison answered that he had not been approached personally, but had received a union card (which had been mailed to him for signature) and that he had overheard rumors about unions. Neither Castoria nor Branch Manager Raucci, who was also present, followed up this response, and the conversation just ended. We are unable to find that the totality of circumstances added up to a reasonable tendency to restrain or coerce. Sunnyvale Medical Clinic, 277 NLRB 1217 (1985); Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), affd. 760 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1985). Castoria's single question lacked any intrinsically threatening quality, and the supervisors' passing up of the opportunity to press Morrison any further on his response to the question made it unlikely that Morrison would have left the conversation feeling coerced. We conclude that the General Counsel has failed to prove the requisite tendency to restrain or coerce and, accordingly, dismiss that allegation.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Pony Express Courier Corp., Colwyn, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(g).

"(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(b) Remove from the Respondent's files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and

As we agree with the judge that the Respondent unlawfully solicited grievances when Branch Manager Raucci spoke to employees at a Saturday morning meeting soon after he took over as branch manager, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's cumulative finding that Regional Manager O'Neal also unlawfully solicited grievances.

[2] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's recommended Order to the extent that it does not include a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

We further find that the unfair labor practices committed here do not warrant a broad cease-and-desist order under Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). We therefore shall narrow the judge's recommended Order.

[3] Member Johansen finds it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding of a violation with respect to Morrison's questioning as it is cumulative and does not affect the remedy or the Order.

that the discharges will not be used against them in any way."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT create in the minds of employees the impression that their union activities are the subject of company surveillance.

WE WILL NOT solicit employee grievances for the purpose of adjusting them.

WE WILL NOT promise employees benefits if they abandon their union activities.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employees concerning their union sympathies and activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten to close the plant if employees become unionized.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in or activities on behalf of Highway Truck Drivers and Helpers Local Union No. 107, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, or any other labor organization, by discharging employees or otherwise discriminating against them in their hire or tenure.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Phillip Nye and Janet Dordell immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharges, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify Phillip Nye and Janet Dordell that we have removed from our files any reference to their discharges and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

PONY EXPRESS COURIER CORP.

Bruce G. Conley, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Thomas Franklin, Esq., of Atlanta, Georgia, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER H. MALONEY JR., Administrative Law Judge. This case came on for hearing before me at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on an unfair labor practice complaint, amended at the hearing,[1] which alleges that Respondent Pony Express Courier Corp.[2] violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) the Act. More particularly, the amended complaint alleges that the Respondent created among its employees the impression that their union activities were the subject of company surveillance, coercively interrogated employees, solicited employee grievances with a view toward remedying them, promised employees benefits if they would abandon their union activities, and threatened to close the plant if it became unionized. The amended complaint also alleges that the Respondent discriminatorily discharged employees Phillip Nye and Janet Dordell. The Respondent denies the commission of independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) and claims that Nye and Dordell were discharged because they failed to report for work as scheduled. On these contentions the issues were joined.[3]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ALLEGED

Respondent operates about 100 facilities throughout the United States where it is engaged in the delivery of packages and correspondence within metropolitan areas. Typical of its operation is the transportation of canceled

[1] The principal docket entries in this case are as follows:

The charge was filed by Phillip Nye, an individual, against the Respondent about June 25, 1985; the complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 4 on August 7, 1985; Respondent's answer was filed on August 21, 1985; the hearing was held in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on November 20, 1985; and the briefs were filed with me by the Respondent and the General Counsel on or before December 23, 1985.

[2] Respondent admits, and I find, that it is a Delaware corporation, which is engaged in the interstate transportation of packages. It maintains an office for this purpose at Colwyn, Pennsylvania. In the course and conduct of its business, Respondent has received in excess of $50,000 for services performed in interstate commerce. Accordingly, the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Highway Truck Drivers and Helpers Local Union No. 107, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

I have not attempted to correct all the errors of spelling, punctuation, and sentence formation that appear in this transcript. Suffice it to say that this case has one of the most poorly prepared transcripts that I have had the occasion to review as an administrative law judge.

checks from banks to clearinghouses and the transportation of internal company mail between various business locations that a customer maintains. These items are transported in vans, station wagons, and other passenger-type vehicles that are given by employees it calls courier guards. Courier guards are uniformed drivers who are dispatched from a central location daily with routing slips that direct them to pick up and deliver customer correspondence to and from designated locations. They report back to the dispatch facility each day at the end of their routes. Respondent employs about 30 such employees at its Colwyn, Pennsylvania terminal, a suburb of Philadelphia, from which point they drive a series of routes in and about the Philadelphia metropolitan area. Some of these routes extend as far north as New York City and as far south as the Maryland suburbs of Washington, D.C. The Colwyn facility, formerly located at Lansdowne, Pennsylvania, is unorganized and has no bargaining history. Respondent admits that it is strongly opposed to the unionization of its courier guards, both at Colwyn and throughout its system, and has only a handful of organized plants anywhere in the United States.

Following a regional meeting of Respondent's managers in November 1984, the Respondent announced, both at its Lansdowne (now Colwyn) facility and elsewhere, that it was discontinuing its former practice of paying employees time and a half for hours worked in excess of 40 per week. Apparently it had received a legal opinion that straight time after 40 hours was lawful under exemptions found in the Federal Wage and Hour Act for over-the-road drivers. Shortly after this announcement was made, several employees decided to inquire at the Department of Labor whether this practice was lawful. There is a central meeting place in downtown Philadelphia that serves as an informal clearinghouse for drivers assigned to certain routes. They meet daily near the P.N.B. Bank at Fourth and Market Streets to exchange packages destined for delivery that have been picked up by drivers on other routes. On one such occasion late in December 1984, the six or seven drivers who met at this location selected discriminatee Phillip Nye to go to the Labor Department to inquire about the lawfulness of discontinuing overtime payments.

Nye did so and reported back at a subsequent employee gathering near the P.N.B. Bank that he had been informed that the discontinuance of overtime payments was lawful. On learning this information, the assembled drivers decided to organize a union and once again selected Nye to act on their behalf. Nye first phoned Teamsters Local 107 and then went to its office on Spring Garden Street in Philadelphia. He was told that the Teamsters wanted signatures on designation cards from two-thirds of the members of the 30-member bargaining unit before they would file for an election. He was given cards for this purpose.

At another gathering at Fourth and Market, Nye passed out cards to other drivers for their own signatures and for further distribution. Nye signed a card on December 26. He collected other cards at a later date and turned them in to the Teamsters office. Between December 26, 1984, and February 5, 1985, seven cards had been signed and returned to the union office. Some cards were mailed in and others were turned in by Nye. Nye gave out cards to employees at the Lansdowne facility and mailed cards to other drivers whom he could not reach personally. He even solicited a card from a lead courier, Robert Hines. Hines turned him down on the basis that Hines was a part of management and was not eligible for unionization.[4]

The Lansdowne facility was undergoing a change of management in late January and early February 1985. Former Branch Manager Al Pentheny was being replaced by Richard Raucci. Raucci took over on February 1. This transition was being accomplished by Phillip O'Neal, the Respondent's regional manager, who maintains his office in Richmond, Virginia.

O'Neal had been unhappy with Pentheny's performance for some time, but told Pentheny that he would not be coming to Philadelphia during the fall of 1984 because he was preoccupied at that time with establishing a new facility in Baltimore. Not long before Pentheny was removed as branch manager, he had occasion to engage driver William Daros in a private conversation after Daros had finished his route. Pentheny invited Daros to have a cup of coffee at a nearby cafe and, in the course of their conversation, asked Daros, a union supporter, "Why are you doing this to me?" Pentheny banged his fist on the table and accused Daros of being a sneak and a snake. Daros simply replied that he was simply trying to better himself.[5]

O'Neal came to Philadelphia to interview prospective replacements for Pentheny in January 1985. During the course of his visit he took advantage of the occasion to hold private interviews with several drivers, including Nye. O'Neal testified that the purpose of these interviews with drivers was to give them an opportunity to have some input into the question of Pentheny's fitness as a branch manager. Nye testified credibly that O'Neal asked him how he felt about things in the office and how things could be improved. Specifically, O'Neal asked Nye what he thought of Pentheny as a manager. Nye replied that he did not think well of Pentheny as a manager. He went on to complain about problems involving vehicle safety. He told O'Neal that vehicle safety—or the lack thereof—was the biggest gripe the drivers had. He mentioned such things as bald tires, grinding brakes, the lack of a vehicle maintenance or safety program, and a reply he once received from Pentheny when complaining about the condition of a truck, namely, that he would either have to take a truck out on his route or go home and not work on the day in question. Nye specifically mentioned to O'Neal a couple of times when he was required to drive a vehicle with bald tires. On one occasion, while driving this truck, he slid through an intersection, and on another occasion he went up an embankment because of the slick condition of the tires. O'Neal said he would do what he could and told Nye that there would be some changes coming soon.

[4] Later on in the campaign, Nye also solicited signatures on union authorization cards from lead couriers Willie James and Lee Morrison.

[5] Driver Mark Zavitski described Pentheny as being scared of union people. He testified that he never mentioned the Union to Pentheny, but Pentheny kept talking about it anyhow.

O'Neal testified that his conversations with other drivers during this visit were similar to the one he had held with Nye. Several drivers complained to him about vehicle maintenance and stated that the manager did not respond to their needs as he should have done. They also complained about wages and benefits (or lack of benefits), about the fact that they did not get a raise, about the discontinuance of overtime, and some asked about health insurance. O'Neal replied, with reference to Pentheny, that changes would be forthcoming and that he would study the possibility of instituting more full-time positions, meaning more positions that included health insurance as a fringe benefit.[6] He also told complaining drivers that the Company's response to the complaint that overtime payments had been discontinued was that it preferred to allow drivers to maintain their income levels by giving them extra hours to work rather than by cutting them off at 40 hours a week to avoid overtime payments.

Not long after Raucci took over as branch manager, he held a Saturday morning meeting with drivers to discuss problems of mutual concern. Just before this meeting began, head courier Felix Castoria held a conversation with union supporter Leedom Morrison in the company vehicle maintenance area. Raucci was present during this conversation. Castoria asked Morrison if he had been approached concerning the Union. Morrison said that he had not been approached, but had received a union card, meaning that he received one in the mail. He told Castoria that he had heard rumors that unionization was afoot.

At the meeting, Raucci introduced himself and told employees that he had previously worked for various Philadelphia newspapers. He said he had been a teamster himself and had dealt with Teamsters before, noting that he was aware of union activity at the Pony Express terminal. He said he would try to get the employees better wages and working conditions, but that he could do nothing about the discontinuance of overtime. He also said he knew that there was a problem about vehicle maintenance. He asked the employees to put their union activity on a back burner for 6 months and give him a chance to straighten things out. Raucci then went around the room and asked each driver present if he had any grievances. Nye complained about bald tires, about sliding through an intersection because of the poor condition of the tires, and the fact that he had gotten a ticket on this account. Raucci said he would take care of it. Driver David Reed complained about certain routing problems he had encountered with company salesmen. He wanted the Company to eliminate extra stops on his route because he was no longer getting overtime. Again Raucci said that he would look into it. Driver Quails complained about the fact that his schedule had been increased with extra hours that conflicted with his school hours. Other drivers talked about vehicle safety, about defective windshields, defective turn signals, bad brakes, and bad steering equipment. Raucci told them that he would try to improve things and specifically that he would try to create more full-time positions that offered fringe benefits. I credit Nye's testimony that Raucci told employees on this occasion that, if a union came in at the terminal, the Company would close down and padlock the doors.[7]

After listening to Raucci, Nye came to the conclusion that he meant well, so he decided to take him up on his offer to put aside union activities for 6 months. A few days thereafter, Nye turned into Raucci the blank Teamsters cards that he still had in his possession and told Raucci that the drivers were going to give him a chance for 6 months. O'Neal corroborated this event, stating that Raucci had phoned him and informed him that an unnamed driver had turned over unsigned union cards and that the employees were going to allow the Company to recertify the complaints that the employees had voiced without unionization.

About mid-May, Nye had another change of heart. According to Nye, Raucci had come to the conclusion that certain drivers were not paying sufficient attention to their duties so he removed the fuses from the vehicles so they could not listen to the radio while driving. His action had the side effect of knocking out turn signals and taillights and, in some instances, windshield wipers. Nye complained to Raucci, saying that he could not use the turn signs on his vehicle because the fuse had been removed. Raucci told him to use hand signals. Nye objected, telling Raucci that he had to drive on I-95 near Washington and he might as well be a kamikazi as use hand signals on that road. Raucci insisted, telling him to do it anyway. The following day, Raucci again spoke with Nye, referring to him as a "union big mouth." On this occasion, Raucci told Nye that he would allow drivers to put the fuses back in their vehicles if they could go through the day without any more "screw-ups." Shortly thereafter, Nye went back to the Teamsters office, obtained more cards, and renewed his organizing effort.

The events leading up to Nye's discharge took place on Thursday, June 20, and Friday, June 21, 1985. At that time, Nye was assigned to a route that involved a 480-mile round trip each day. He serviced certain customers in Philadelphia and then drove as far south as Gaithersburg, Maryland, making pickups and deliveries at Sears & Roebuck locations in the Metropolitan Washington area. He normally left the Colwyn terminal at 2 p.m. and returned at 2 a.m. the following day. On June 20, he noticed, about 6 p.m., that a yellow light had come on in his vehicle. He also smelled exhaust fumes emanating from the motor. The fumes became so intense that Nye had to drive with the window open. Notwithstanding this move, he began to feel nauseous, developed a headache, and noticed that his eyes had become red and watery.

[6] Almost all the drivers at the Colwyn terminal were classified as part-time employees. This classification bore no relation to the number of hours they worked. It was merely a company designation indicating that they were not entitled to health insurance or any other company benefit. For instance, Nye worked a 96-hour week during the first week of his employment and averaged 68 hours a week throughout his stay with Pony Express. Nevertheless, he was classified as a part-timer.

[7] Raucci did not testify and was not summoned by the Respondent to present any version of events that contradicted either Nye's account or the testimony of other drivers. I also note that the Respondent also did not produce Al Pentheny, Norris Schier, or Jerry Nichols to substantiate its position, being content to limit its defense to the testimony of Regional Manager O'Neal.

Before leaving for the southern portion of his run, he returned to the terminal and complained to Norris Schier, the lead courier or dispatcher on duty, that the truck was defective and that he was too ill to drive. Schier had no one to finish the route and no other truck at the terminal so he called Raucci at home to report this problem. Raucci asked Nye, through Schier, if he would agree to finish the route that evening if they found him another truck. Nye reluctantly did so. Schier was able to find another truck by calling a customer location and contacting another driver. He asked that driver to return to the terminal and the driver did so. Nye then switched his delivery items to the other vehicle and proceeded to Maryland. Before leaving, he told Schier that, if he had to finish the route that evening, he wanted Friday off so he could go to the doctor. (He would normally report to work on Friday at 2 p.m.) Schier said that this would be no problem because the Company would have almost a full day to round up a replacement. Nye finished his route on Friday morning about an hour late and returned to the terminal about 3:30 a.m.

The other discriminatee in this case is Janet Dordell. She is what was euphemistically referred to on the record as Nye's "fiancee." In fact, they had been living together for some time, and there is record evidence to support a finding that company management was aware of this cohabitation. Dordell had been hired about 3 weeks before as a driver for the summer months and there had been some discussion with management, not yet finalized, that she might continue to work after she returned to college in the fall. She had completed a 40-hour week by Thursday of the week in which Nye was discharged. About 3:30 that afternoon, Raucci called her at her home and asked her if she wanted any more hours that week. She agreed, so he told her to report at 4:30 Friday morning, to go out on a route with driver Dan Fabrizio in order to learn Fabrizio's route.

When Nye returned to the terminal early Friday morning from his route in Maryland, Jerry Nichols was the lead courier-dispatcher on duty. Nye asked Nichols when Dordell was due to report. Nichols replied that she had been asked to train on an additional route and was supposed to report at 5 a.m., to go out with Fabrizio. When Nye arrived home, he turned off the alarm that Dordell had set and informed her that she did not have to report for work until 5 a.m., therefore she had an extra half-hour to sleep. Nye called Nichols at 4:30 to say that Dordell was on her way. Nichols then informed him that Fabrizio had come and gone and had refused to wait for Dordell. He then gave her the option of coming in at 5 or 5:30 a.m. to go out on a training route with another driver, Robert Hines. Dordell declined, saying that Hines was a dangerous driver and that she did not want to ride in the same vehicle with him. Nichols then told Nye that Dordell did not have to come in at all, so both of them went to sleep.

At 10 o'clock Friday morning, Nye went to see his physician, Dr. Joel Snyder. He told Dr. Snyder about his symptoms, which had improved since the preceding evening, and was informed by the doctor that he was suffering a toxic reaction to exhaust fumes. He advised Nye to take a lot of liquid, flush out his system, and continue to take Tylenol and use cold compresses.[8] After leaving the doctor's office, Nye went to his mother's home. That afternoon they went shopping together.

About 3:30 on Friday afternoon, Dordell received a call at her home from Raucci's secretary, who asked if Nye had left for work. Dordell said he had not, adding that she did not think he was supposed to report that afternoon. Raucci got on the phone and she repeated the same statement to him, saying that Nye was supposed to go to the doctor and had told the dispatcher the previous evening that he was going. Raucci then told Dordell to get in touch with Nye to tell him to report for work, adding that if he did not report, he would be fired. She immediately called Nye's mother's house but Nye was not there, so she left a message for him to call. Nye did not get the message until it was too late to report for work, so he did not go to the terminal until his regular starting time the following Monday afternoon.

On arriving at the terminal on June 24, Nye noticed that his timecard was not in the rack so he went in to speak to Raucci. Raucci told him that he had not been excused from reporting to work on Friday and was fired. Nye argued that Schier, the dispatcher, had approved his absence while talking over the phone with Raucci on Thursday evening. Raucci replied he did not remember this conversation. They argued at some length. Nye also complained that this was his first offence and that he had not even received a previous verbal warning about his work. Raucci held fast, saying that it did not matter what kind of offense it was. He asserted that, by not showing up on Friday evening to cover the Maryland route, Nye might have cost the Company its account with Sears & Roebuck. He ended by telling Nye that Nye was out of a job and that Raucci "had no more union problems."

On the same afternoon, Dordell called the company office to inquire about her schedule for the coming week. Raucci took the call and told her that she did not work there any more because she had not reported for work on Friday morning as scheduled. Dordell replied that she had spoken with Jerry Nichols, the dispatcher, and he had said that she did not have to come in because the driver she was supposed to go out with, Fabrizio, had already left. Raucci told her that this did not make any difference and that she should have reported anyhow. They argued at length. She told Raucci that Nichols himself was frequently late and nothing was done about it. She also charged that she was being fired because of her association with Nye. Raucci denied the charge and refused to change his decision.

Immediately thereafter, Nye engaged private counsel respecting this discharge. His attorney, John P. Williamson, wrote a letter to Raucci, dated June 24, which stated:

[8] A few days after he was discharged, Nye obtained a medical slip from the doctor evidencing the fact that he had sought medical attention. He presented this slip to Raucci. Raucci said it made no difference with respect to the discharge.

> Please be advised that I represent Phillip Nye, who was illegally terminated by you today. My client is sincerely interested in retaining his position with your company. I am, therefore, preparing a complaint against you and your company to be filed in Federal District Court. Should you care to settle this matter by offering Mr. Nye his old position, then kindly advise immediately.

This letter was referred to Marc P. Katz, Respondent's vice president, for reply. In a reply to Williamson, dated July 10, Katz stated:

> Your letter of June 24, 1985 addressed to Mr. Raucci, our Philadelphia branch manager, has been forwarded to me for response. Please be advised that I have investigated the situation raised in your letter and find that Mr. Nye was terminated properly pursuant to the Company's work rules. He apparently missed work on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of the week in question and did not call in regarding his absence. The Company has suffered a loss of business due to this action and could not tolerate such conduct on the part of Mr. Nye.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

Respondent's regional manager O'Neal testified that the Respondent has a strong policy of resisting the unionization of its employees, either by Teamsters or any other labor organization,[9] and this policy is set forth in a lengthy statement found in its employee handbook. All employees are required to read this handbook and to sign a statement acknowledging that they have read it. The statement is as follows:

> This is a non-union facility and we feel very strongly that a union is not necessary. Without a union, you as an individual are free to deal directly with Pony Express without some third party representing or speaking for you. It is not necessary for you or anyone else to belong to a union in order to work at Pony Express.
> Pony Express has always tried to deal fairly with its employees in every way and provide everything that goes toward making a good job and good working conditions for any employee who sincerely and honestly deserves such an opportunity.
> We are convinced that our employees prefer to deal directly with Pony Express rather than through a union. We are also convinced that whatever unions come in, they generally bring trouble, strife, and discord. Because of this, it is our belief that a union here will not work out for your benefit or for the benefit of other employees. We believe that employees of Pony Express have been better off, and will always be better off in the future, without a union. Therefore, it is our policy to oppose unionism at Pony Express by every proper and legal means.
> If anybody threatens you or puts you under an undue pressure to join a union, this is illegal and you may protest it to the U.S. Government. If requested, Pony Express will provide you with the address and phone number of the government agency that enforces our Federal labor laws. No person will be allowed to solicit or carry on union organizational activities during that employee's working time. Anyone who does so and who thereby neglects his own work or interferes with the work of others will be subject to disciplinary action.

The General Counsel levels no complaint at the legality of these statements per se. Instead, they form the context for evaluating the balance of the evidence in this case and should be looked to in determining whether, in this instance, Respondent has gone about its business of opposing unionism by every proper and legal means, or whether it resorted to improper and illegal means to keep Nye and his associates from organizing its Philadelphia branch office.

III. INDEPENDENT VIOLATIONS OF SECTION 8(A)(1) OF THE ACT

Just before he left the employment of the Respondent, Pentheny took employee Daros aside, bought him a cup of coffee, and asked him why he was "doing these things to me." In the course of the conversation, Pentheny banged his fist on the table and accused Daros of being a sneak and a snake. Although the word "union" was not uttered, Daros' reply, namely, that he was just trying to better himself, makes it clear that Pentheny was referring to Daros' efforts on behalf of the Teamsters, which had included participation in the informal meetings that generated the union drive, signing a union card, distributing cards to other employees, and soliciting support from lead courier Hines. Both the text and the context of Pentheny's statements make it clear that he was letting Daros know that he was aware of Daros' union activities. Moreover, he was coercively interrogating him concerning these activities. By these acts, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Soliciting employee grievances when a union is organizing a plant with a view toward adjusting them is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Reliance Electric Co., 191 NLRB 44 (1971); Hi-Lo Foods, 247 NLRB 146; Montgomery Ward & Co., 253 NLRB 196 (1980); Berger Transfer & Storage Co., 253 NLRB 5 (1980). It is of little consequence that, in the course of such solicitation, an employer makes an express disclaimer of doing anything about the grievances he uncovers, if, in fact, he moves to remedy the grievances or if he promises to look into the problems that have been brought to his attention. Illinois Central Community Hospital, 224 NLRB 632 (1976); Western, Inc., 251 NLRB 1547 (1980); Stride-Rite Corp., 228 NLRB 224 (1977); National Micronetics, 277 NLRB 993 (1985). Early in 1985, O'Neal came to Philadelphia and, in the course of his visit, spoke privately to Nye and to other drivers in order to give them input into a pending decision to discharge the branch manager. Penth-eny's statement to Daros, discussed above, indicates that the Respondent was well aware at that time that a union effort was underway at this facility. O'Neal indicated in the course of these confidential interviews that he planned to take some action concerning complaints against the branch manager, and in fact he did so shortly thereafter. Other complaints were also voiced. With respect to safety complaints, O'Neal said that he would see what he could do. With respect to complaints about wages and fringe benefits, O'Neal replied that he was contemplating the establishment of more full-time positions, a move that would carry with it more widespread entitlement to fringe benefits.

[9] In light of O'Neal's testimony on this point, Respondent's defense that it did not fear a Teamsters organizing effort because only a plant guard union could represent its "courier guards" is frivolous.

Not long thereafter, at his first encounter with unit employees, Raucci did the same thing. Noting that he was aware that union efforts were afoot and that he had dealt with the Teamsters before, Raucci went around the room and asked each driver in attendance to express himself on the subject of what was wrong with the Company. Raucci got an earful. He told Nye he would take care of his complaint concerning bald tires. He told Reed that he would look into a burdensome scheduling problem. Others complained about wages and benefits as well as a multitude of safety problems concerning the company vehicles. Raucci said he would look into them. He reiterated O'Neal's words that the Company would try to create more full-time positions carrying with them fringe benefits. Both of the above-recited series of conversations amount to unlawful solicitations of grievances with a view toward adjustment and violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Raucci's promise to create more full-time positions constitutes an unlawful promise of benefit in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Any lingering doubt about these violations can be laid to rest by Raucci's request to assembled employees that they put unionization on the back burner for 6 months in order to give him a chance to straighten things out.

During the course of this meeting, Raucci also told employees that, if the Union came into the Philadelphia facility, the Company would close it down and padlock the doors. This statement is a clear and flagrant threat to violate rights protected by Section 7 of the Act and, as such, is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Castoria asked Daros a few minutes before this meeting, in the presence of the branch manager, whether he had been approached by the Union. Morrison replied that he had not been personally approached but had received a union card. This statement constitutes illegal interrogation and is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. It does not constitute a solicitation of grievances nor a promise of benefits, so any allegations in this regard pertaining to Castoria should be dismissed.

In many particulars, Katz' statement to Nye's lawyer was factually false and totally at odds both with O'Neal's testimony and company documents. Nye did not miss work on Wednesday or Thursday of the week in question, nor did the Company suffer a loss of business due to Nye's absence on Friday. Sears was angry that the Pony Express driver was late on his rounds but it did not cancel its delivery contract. O'Neal reorganized the division of Sears work between the Philadelphia branch and the new Baltimore branch, transferring a delivery run in Gaithersburg, Maryland, to the Baltimore office and removing it from Philadelphia's responsibility. He also volunteered to Sears that he was firing the driver who came late, but Sears did not request such action. Sears remains a Pony Express customer with respect to its Gaithersburg business, Katz' statement to the contrary notwithstanding.

The operating rule that Nye assertedly violated was rule 17: "Tardiness or absence without prior notification and approval." Nye testified credibly that he was excused from reporting on Friday afternoon and that this excuse was given to him on Thursday evening by the lead courier, Schier, with Raucci's approval. The occasion of this approval was Nye's agreement to take the balance of his Thursday run to Maryland despite an illness due to inhaling exhaust fumes from one of the Respondent's vehicles. Neither Schier nor Raucci appeared at the hearing to contradict this testimony.

Nye was the leader of the in-house movement to organize a union at the Philadelphia branch. He obtained union cards, signed a card, passed them out, turned them in, and disclosed his union affiliation to Raucci early in Raucci's career as branch manager when he turned unused union cards over to Raucci as a gesture of good faith following Raucci's meeting with company drivers. This latter act was corroborated by O'Neal, although O'Neal professed not to know the identity of the union supporter who had tipped his hand by surrendering union cards. Later, Raucci referred to Nye as a "union big mouth" and told him, on the occasion of his discharge, that by removing Nye he was getting rid of a union problem. In light of this uncontradicted testimony, it clearly appears that the Respondent admitted to Nye that it was firing him for union activities and that its contrived responses to Nye's lawyer and to the amended complaint in this case were merely pretexts clumsily put together. In light of these circumstances, including declared animosity to unionization and demonstrated animus to organizing at the Philadelphia facility, I conclude that, by discharging Phillip Nye, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The discharge of Dordell need give only scant pause. It took place in the context of the intense antiunion animus outlined above and the several violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) already found. It also took place in the context of an operation that was haphazard at best, that experienced enormous turnover, and that treated courier guards as fungible commodities to be assigned and reassigned with ease and little concern for any consideration except that a route be covered on the day in question by drivers who had a working knowledge of where pickup and delivery points were located. Raucci told Dordell on the occasion of her discharge that not showing up for a scheduled run was the "biggest sin" in the courier business. The above-recited evidence makes it abundantly clear that the biggest sin in the Respondent's courier business was engaging in union activities. The record in this case in replete with numerous instances of courier guards failing to show up and giving no notice, yet being allowed to resume their duties as if nothing had happened. The record is also clear that the standard of acceptable practice at the Philadelphia branch when Dordell was discharged was that a courier guard would be excused if he gave 3 hours' or more notice that he was not coming to work.

In the case here at issue, Dordell was scheduled to take only a training run. In fact, the run she was originally scheduled to take, as well as the run she was later offered by Nichols, were both covered by regular drivers. Her presence was for instructional purposes only. The original offer from Raucci to go on a training run with Fabrizio was an offer that was optional on her part to accept. In fact, she did accept. The substituted offer of a training run with Hines was likewise optional on her part. In fact, when she told Nichols she did not want to ride with Hines, Nichols told her that she did not have to come in at all. As he was the lead courier and dispatcher on duty at 4:30 a.m. on the Friday in question, he was the chief spokesman for the Company at the facility at the time, and Dordell had the right to rely on his assurance. As with other supervisors, Nichols did not appear to testify, and the Respondent presented no evidence to contradict her account of what transpired.

Having been fired for an asserted misdeed that was of little consequence, both in fact and as the Company regarded employee behavior, the next question to be posed was why Raucci took this step. Although he denied that her discharge had anything to do with the discharge of Nye, in point of time they were accomplished almost simultaneously. Her close affinity to Nye was well known at the Company. Indeed, Raucci had spoken to her on Friday afternoon when he called Nye's apartment to locate Nye, and he utilized Dordell's services to transmit a message to Nye. The economic impact on Nye of discharging an individual who shared Nye's apartment and presumably his rent is obvious, as is the emotional impact of such a discharge both on Nye and other employees. Dordell's own union activities were admittedly nominal. She discussed unionization with Nye and in fact had signed an authorization card. However, it is clear that the Respondent took this action for the purpose of punishing Nye for his well-known and hostilely regarded union leadership. Having been discriminated against in the hire and tenure of her own employment in order to discourage the union membership and activity on the part of Nye, Dordell is herself a discriminatee and her discharge is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. I so find and conclude.

On the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record herein considered as a whole, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Pony Express Courier Corp. is now and at all times material herein has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Highway Truck Drivers and Helpers Local Union No. 107, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging Phillip Nye and Janet Dordell because of their sympathy with and activities on behalf of the Union, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

4. By the acts and conduct set forth above in Conclusion of Law 3; by creating in the minds of employees the impression that their union activities are the subject of company surveillance; by soliciting employee grievances for the purpose of adjusting them; by promising employees benefits if they abandon their union activities; by coercively interrogating employees concerning their union sympathies and activities; and by threatening to close the plant if employees become unionized, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The unfair labor practices set forth above in Conclusions of Law 3 and 4 have a close, intimate, and adverse effect on the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has committed certain unfair labor practices, I will recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take other affirmative actions designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Having found a repeated and continuing disposition on the part of this Respondent to violate the Act in serious ways, I will recommend to the Board a broad 8(a)(1) order designed to suppress any and all violations of that section of the Act. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). I will also recommend that the Respondent be required to offer full and immediate reinstatement to Phillip Nye and Janet Dordell to their former or substantially equivalent employment, and to make them whole for any loss of pay or benefits that they may have suffered by reason of the discriminations found, in accordance with the formula set forth in the F. W. Woolworth case,[10] with interest thereon at the adjusted rate used by the Internal Revenue Service for the computation of tax payments. Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980); Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). I will also recommend that the Respondent be required to post the usual notice, advising its employees of their rights and of the results in this case.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

The Respondent, Pony Express Courier Corp., Colwyn, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Creating in the minds of employees the impression that their union activities are the subject of company surveillance.

[11] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Soliciting employee grievances for the purpose of adjusting them.

(c) Promising employees benefits if they abandon their union activities.

(d) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities.

(e) Threatening to close the plant if employees became unionized.

(f) Discouraging membership in or activities on behalf of Highway Truck Drivers and Helpers Local Union No. 107, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America or any other labor organization by discharging employees or otherwise discriminating against them in their hire or tenure.

(g) By any other means or in any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to Phillip Nye and to Janet Dordell full and immediate reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent employment, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at Respondent's Colwyn, Pennsylvania place of business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED insofar as matters set forth in the amended complaint have not been found herein to be violations of the Act, the amended complaint is dismissed.

5 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 17 September 1986 Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Respondent further filed a motion to reopen record for the purpose of introducing certain records, and the General Counsel filed a response to the motion.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record[1] in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

[1] The Respondent in its motion to reopen urges that the record be reopened to permit the introduction of certain records regarding hiring hall referrals in January 1986. The Respondent does not state any reason why this evidence could not have been presented at the hearing nor does the Respondent state that this is evidence that has become available only since the close of the hearing. The Respondent's motion is therefore denied.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Concerning the Respondent's hiring hall procedure, Chairman Dotson finds, as the record establishes, that as individuals come in to report they are out of work, the Respondent's secretary, Linda Corbin, has a practice of placing their names, along with the date, at the bottom of out-of-work lists, one for carpenters, another for millwrights. As companies call requesting millwrights or carpenters, referrals are made from the top of these lists. In January 1986 Herbert Currie was second on the millwrights out-of-work list. After Currie accepted referral 2 January for a millwrights job with NISCO beginning 6 January, the Respondent's business agent referred two other employees that ranked below Currie on the list to the NISCO position, without first informing Currie. Later that day the Respondent offered, but Currie declined, a night-shift job with Multi-Craft. Currie testified he understood the Multi-Craft position was canceled before it began. The judge found Corbin confirmed this fact.

The Respondent contends that Corbin's testimony on the subject of the Multi-Craft job being canceled was indecisive. Chairman Dotson agrees. Nonetheless, he finds Currie's credibility is not undercut by his possibly mistaken belief in this regard. Further, even if the Multi-Craft job was not canceled, the fact remains, as the judge found, that for reasons which were arbitrary, invidious, or irrelevant to legitimate business interests, the Respondent deviated from its established referral procedure by taking the NISCO job away from Currie. Accordingly, Chairman Dotson, in agreement with his colleagues and the judge, finds that this conduct, and the Respondent's failure to refer Currie on 5 February to a job at Westinghouse at a time he was first on the millwrights out-of-work list, violates Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) and (2).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Carpenters & Joiners of America, Local 283, Augusta, Georgia, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Sharon E. Howard, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Charles W. Wilkinson, Esq., of Augusta, Georgia, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Augusta, Georgia, on 25 June 1986. The complaint, which issued on 9 May 1986, and is based on a 27 March 1986 charge, alleged that Respondent failed to refer Herbert Currie for employment since 6 January and 5 February 1986 "in disregard for Currie's proper placement on Respondent's referral list."

The complaint alleged, and Respondent admitted, that Respondent is a labor organization and is party to a collective-bargaining agreement with various employers including Pullman Power Company, that that collective-bargaining agreement provides that its party-employers hire all classifications of journeymen and others exclusively through Respondent's referral procedures;[1] and that Pullman[2] is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Evidence

The General Counsel's case is based on evidence that Respondent unlawfully withdrew a 6 January referral of member Herbert Currie to a job with NISCO and that Respondent unlawfully failed to refer Currie to a 5 February 1986 job with Westinghouse.

Herbert Currie testified without rebuttal that he is a millwright member of Respondent. Pursuant to established procedure, Herbert Currie was included on Respondent's out-of-work list before and on 6 January and 5 February 1986.

On 2 January 1986, according to Currie's testimony, he was visiting relatives in Tabor City, North Carolina, where he received a message that Respondent needed him for a job on Monday, 6 January. Currie called Respondent's hall on 2 January and spoke with Business Agent David Frambes.[3] Frambes told Currie that Respondent needed millwrights on a job with NISCO beginning Monday, 6 January 1986. Currie told Frambes that he would take the job. Due to the requirement that Currie begin work at 7 a.m. on Monday morning, Frambes told Currie that he would leave Currie's referral slip under a floormat outside the door of Respondent's hall.[4] After talking with Frambes, Currie telephoned him later on 2 January,[5] and asked Frambes if Respondent could also refer Currie's son, an apprentice, to the NISCO job. Frambes agreed that he would refer both Herbert Currie and Currie's son Bill to the 6 January NISCO job.

[1] Respondent's answer further alleged that the exclusive referral procedure in the collective-bargaining agreement also provides "if Respondent does not provide the required manpower within 48 hours, employers can hire needed workers from off the street or through any other source."

[2] The record evidence illustrated that other employers party to the exclusive hiring hall contractual provisions included NISCO and Westinghouse at Plant Vogle.

[3] As business agent, Frambes was the ultimate authority on all job referrals. Frambes, who was business agent during material times, has since been replaced.

Linda Corbin testified that Herbert Currie ranked number 2 on Respondent's January 1986 out-of-work list and number 1 on Respondent's February 1986 out-of-work list. Corbin, when first called by the General Counsel, testified that she usually handled referrals for Respondent, but she did not know if she called Herbert Currie about the 6 January NISCO job. Later, when called by Respondent, Corbin testified, "I think I remember calling [Currie] and he couldn't quite—he hadn't made up his mind yet (regarding whether to accept the referral to the 6 January NISCO job)." Subsequently, Corbin admitted that she could not remember whether she talked to Currie before 6 January regarding the NISCO referral. Corbin admitted that Business Agent Frambes sometimes personally handled referrals.

Currie drove back from Tabor City, North Carolina. At 4:30 a.m. on 6 January, he checked by Respondent's hall but the referral slips were not under the floormat as promised by Business Agent Frambes.[6]

Shortly after Respondent opened its hall on 6 January, Herbert Currie phoned and asked to speak with Business Agent Frambes. Currie was told by Linda Corbin that Frambes was not there. A few minutes later, Currie telephoned again and asked Corbin to have Frambes telephone him. Currie telephoned again after lunch, but was told that Frambes was not in. Currie then drove back to Respondent's hall where he found and talked to Frambes. Currie asked Frambes if the NISCO job had been canceled. Frambes replied that the job had been filled. Frambes mentioned day- and night-shift jobs with Multi-Craft. Currie asked for the day shift but Frambes said the day-shift jobs had been filled. Currie told Frambes to send the out-of-towners to the Multi-Craft night shift and send Currie "where he was supposed to have sent me." Frambes replied that the Multi-Craft night shift was all he had open. Currie said the night shift would be very temporary.[7]

Paul Cobb testified that he was referred to the NISCO job where he started work on 6 January. Cobb admitted that Linda Corbin told him on Friday, 3 January, that Herbert Currie and Currie's son were going on the 6 January NISCO job with Cobb.[8] However, Cobb testified that two "out-of-towners" showed up at NISCO on 6 January and worked instead of Currie and Currie's son.

Respondent's out-of-work list plus notes of Linda Corbin and Corbin's testimony show that two "out-of-towners" (i.e., members of locals other than 283) were referred to the 6 January NISCO job along with Paul Cobb, even though the out-of-towners should have been referred after Currie. The two out-of-towners, Carl McNeil and Gale Thompson, reported to the NISCO job and worked on 6 January 1986.

On 5 February, Currie visited Respondent's hall after his nephew, a foreman for Westinghouse at Plant Vogle, phoned him that Westinghouse had asked Respondent to refer two millwrights. As shown above, Currie was number 1 on Respondent's referral list on 5 February. Currie testified that he contacted Respondent and was told by Linda Corbin that Respondent had referred two out-of-towners to the Westinghouse job, and that those employees had not been specifically requested by Westinghouse. Respondent's February referral list and notes prepared by Linda Corbin in the normal course of her work were received in evidence. Those documents support Currie's testimony. The two "out-of-towners" referred to the 5 February Westinghouse job were Gary Stonecipher and James O'Mahoney.

Discussion

I find that Herbert Currie was a credible witness as to material questions regarding the alleged unfair labor practices. Currie's testimony was not rebutted. Moreover, his testimony regarding the allegedly violative action was supported by Respondent's records including Respondent's January and February 1986 referral lists and notes prepared by Respondent's secretary Linda Corbin.

The testimony of Linda Corbin to the effect that she may have talked to Currie about the 6 January NISCO referrals cannot be credited. Corbin admitted that she could not recall talking with Currie on that occasion. Currie denied that he told Corbin that he had not made up his mind regarding the NISCO job. I credit Currie's denial.

Additionally, I do not credit the testimony of Paul Cobb regarding his telephone conversation with Currie on the night of 6 January. Cobb admitted at the beginning of his testimony that he did not think it was right for Currie to sue the Union. Moreover, I was not impressed with Cobb's demeanor. Additionally, Cobb's testimony, especially in response to the General Counsel's questions, illustrated an eagerness to testify in a manner harmful to Currie. For example, when asked if Currie told him that Currie had turned down a night-shift job

[4] Both Currie and a secretary for Respondent, Linda Corbin, testified that it was normal procedure for Respondent to leave referrals under the floormat when referral employees were required to pick up the referral slips while Respondent's hall was closed.

[5] Currie's telephone bill shows phone calls from Tabor City, North Carolina, to Respondent's hall that were charged to Currie's home phone at 10:24 a.m. and 10:27 a.m. on 2 January 1986.

[6] There was no dispute, but referral slips were required before an employee would be accepted on a job.

[7] Currie testified and Linda Corbin confirmed that the Multi-Craft night-shift job was subsequently canceled before it began.

[8] According to Cobb, Currie expressed concern with passing a urine test. Cobb testified that Currie told him in a telephone conversation on the night of 6 January that Currie had been "smoking pot." Cobb recalled that he told Currie that NISCO required a urine test and that Currie would have failed the test if he had been smoking pot. Currie testified in rebuttal that he did telephone Paul Cobb on 6 January, but that nothing was said about not passing a urine test because Currie had been smoking marijuana. According to Currie, he phoned Cobb to ask who had been referred to the NISCO job in his place.

with NISCO, Cobb replied, "How can they offer it to him if they can't get in touch with him." Despite Cobb's testimony, there was no probative evidence that Respondent expressed difficulty contacting Currie regarding the 6 January job with NISCO. I credit Currie's testimony that he did not tell Cobb that he had been smoking marijuana.

In view of my credibility findings, I find that the evidence shows that Respondent told Currie that he was being referred to the 6 January NISCO job. Subsequently, without first informing Currie, Respondent, through its Business Agent Frambes, referred two other employees that ranked below Currie on Respondent's referral list. Respondent's refusal to refer Currie to the 6 January NISCO job was contrary to Respondent's established referral procedure.

Additionally, I find that the evidence shows that Respondent's refusal to refer Currie to the 5 February 1986 Westinghouse job at Plant Vogle was contrary to Respondent's established referral procedure.

Conclusions

In Electrical Workers IBEW Local 11 (Los Angeles NECA), 270 NLRB 424, 425 (1984), the Board found:

> The Board has held that a union which operates an exclusive hiring hall must represent all individuals who seek to utilize the hall in a fair and impartial manner. The labor organization conducting [an exclusive hiring hall] has a duty to conform with and apply lawful contractual standards in administering the referral system, and any department from the established procedures resulting in a denial of employment constitutes discrimination which inherently encourages union membership. This discrimination constitutes a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

In Stage Employees IATSE Local 646 (Parker Playhouse), 270 NLRB 1425 (1984), the Board sustained findings of an administrative law judge that a union must use objective criteria or standards for referring employees pursuant to exclusive referral provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement.

The law does not require a showing of specific intent to discriminate to support a finding of an unfair labor practice in the improper operation of a hiring hall. Carpenters Local 25 v. NLRB, 769 F.2d 574, 580 (9th Cir. 1985). No evidence illustrated that Business Agent Frambes had a legitimate reason to deny the material referrals to Currie. Respondent refused to refer Currie "for reasons which were arbitrary, invidious, or irrelevant to legitimate union interest." Operating Engineers Local 478 (Stone & Webster), 274 NLRB 567 (1985).

The record proves that Respondent refused to refer Currie to the NISCO and Westinghouse jobs in contravention of its established policies and procedures. Respondent used no objective criteria or standards in denying those referrals to Currie. I find that Respondent's failure to refer Currie to those positions on 6 and 5 February 1986 constitutes unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. Pullman Power Company is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Carpenters & Joiners of America, Local 283 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent, NISCO, Westinghouse, and other employers are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement whereby Respondent operates an exclusive hiring hall for the referral of employees by Respondent to the employers.

4. By failing and refusing to refer for employment Herbert Currie in the manner established by Respondent's collective-bargaining agreement and its own policies and procedures, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully failed and refused to refer for employment Herbert Currie in accord with its established policies and procedures and in accord with its collective-bargaining agreement, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to make Currie whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits resulting from Respondent's discrimination in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), together with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[9]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Carpenters & Joiners of America, Local 283, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to refer employees for employment in accordance with the hiring hall practices and procedures established pursuant to its collective-bargaining agreements.

[9] See generally Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Operate its exclusive hiring hall in accordance with its established practices and procedures pursuant to its collective-bargaining agreements.

(b) Refer Herbert Currie to positions to which he is entitled pursuant to the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement.

(c) Make whole Herbert Currie for any loss of earnings or other benefits resulting from its discrimination against Currie in the manner prescribed in the remedy section of this decision.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its hall copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 1 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Burton Litvack issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel and the Charging Parties filed cross-exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Charging Parties filed a brief in response to the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided, for the reasons set forth below, to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

This case involves nine employees who resigned their union memberships and returned to work during a strike against the Employer. The judge's decision issued before the Board's decision in Machinists Local Lodge 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984) (Neufeld), the Supreme Court's decision in Pattern Makers League v. NLRB, 473 U.S. 95 (1985), and their progeny. Accordingly, while we adopt most of the judge's conclusions, we do so only for the reasons set forth below.

1. The judge found that the restriction on resignations contained in the Respondent's constitution[3] is unlawful and that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by maintaining that restriction. We agree. Neufeld, supra; Sheetmetal Workers Local 73 (Safe Air), 274 NLRB 374 (1985).

2. The judge also found that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by bringing internal union disciplinary proceedings, imposing fines, and prosecuting state court lawsuits[4] to collect the fines against employees Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez,[5] Gehr, and Barrios because of those employees' postresignation conduct in working at McDonnell Douglas Corporation's Monrovia facility during the strike that began on 25 March 1981. Neufeld, supra; and Pattern Makers, supra.[6]

3. In accord with our decisions in Food & Commercial Workers Local 1439 (Allied Employers), 275 NLRB 995 (1985), and Laborers Northern California Council Local 294 (Baker Co.), 275 NLRB 278 (1985), we shall order the Respondent, inter alia, to make the nine employees whole for any loss of earnings, benefits, travel expenses, or any other expenses incurred as a result of their need to defend themselves against the charges preferred against them, including any such losses that resulted from the Respondent-initiated state court action to collect the unlawfully imposed fines.

[1] The Charging Parties have requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The constitutional provision at issue defines "improper conduct of a member" as follows:

> Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration. [Art. L, sec. 3.]

[4] The complaint does not allege and the General Counsel does not contend that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) by barring the nine employees from holding union office for 5 years.

[5] The record shows that employee Melendez returned to work during the strike before her resignation was received by the Union. It is also clear, however, that Melendez was fined for both preresignation and postresignation conduct. Because only the fines that were imposed for postresignation conduct are unlawful, we shall leave to the compliance stage the determination of the amount Melendez was unlawfully fined.

[6] A substantial portion of the record and the judge's decision deal with the issue of whether the employees had actual notice of the Respondent's rule restricting resignations. Although the notice issue, at one time, was important in this type of case, see, e.g., Auto Workers Local 1384 (Ex-Cell-O Corp.), 227 NLRB 1045 (1977), that issue is no longer determinative inasmuch as the Board has ruled that any restriction on resignations is unlawful. Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's findings concerning the employees' notice of the rule and the exceptions to those findings. In addition, we find it unnecessary to decide whether the judge was correct in concluding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A), independently of the other violations, by taking action against the nine employees "without legally sufficient notice" of the resignation restrictions.

4. In all other respects, we affirm the judge's findings, rulings, and conclusions.[7]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, District Lodge 94, Local Lodge 575, Monrovia, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Maintaining or giving effect to the following rule, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, to the extent it defines 'Improper Conduct of a Member' as:

> Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration."

2. Insert the following as paragraphs 2(d) and (e) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(d) Make whole the above-named employees for any loss of earnings, benefits, travel expenses, or any other expenses incurred as a result of their need to defend themselves against the internal union charges preferred against them, including any such losses that resulted from the state court action against them to collect the unlawfully imposed fines.

"(e) Remove from its governing documents any provisions which required adherence to the portion of article L, section 3, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers set forth above."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT maintain or give effect to the following rule of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers: which defines improper conduct of a member as:

> Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce employees of McDonnell Douglas Corporation (MDC), at its Monrovia, California plant, who have duly resigned from, and are no longer members of, this labor organization, in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act by bringing internal union proceedings, imposing fines, and filing lawsuits to collect the fines against them because of their postresignation conduct in crossing a picket line and working for MDC during the strike which began 25 March 1981.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees that they will be discharged unless they pay membership dues, or the equivalent thereof, where such is otherwise lawfully required as a condition of employment, during a period in which they have been prohibited from holding office in this labor organization for exercising their Section 7 rights to refrain from continuing to honor and support a strike against their Employer.

[7] The judge did not order the Respondent to remove the unlawful restriction from the governing documents under its control. In accord with our decision in Auto Workers Local 73 (McDonnell Douglas), 282 NLRB 466 (1986), we will order the Respondent to remove from the governing documents under its control any provision which requires adherence to the portion of art. L. sec. 3, of the International union's constitution quoted above in fn. 3.

WE WILL NOT fail to inform members who are prohibited from holding office in this labor organization of their obligations under the contractual union-security clause.

WE WILL NOT continue to demand from employees of MDC the payment of membership dues, or the equivalent thereof, where such is otherwise lawfully required as a condition of employment, during a period in which they have been prohibited from holding office in this labor organization for exercising their Section 7 rights of refraining from continuing to honor and support a strike against their Employer.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees of MDC that we will demand their discharge if they do not pay us a reinstatement fee without initially having notified the employees of their membership duties giving rise to their obligation to pay such fee as a condition of employment.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL remove from our governing documents any provisions which require adherence to the portion of article L, section 3, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers set forth above.

WE WILL rescind the unlawful fines levied upon former members Ramon Fuentes, Juliet P. Rosales, Glenn Van de Sande, Alice Vargas, Patricia Miller, Stella Melendez, Amalia Morales, William A. Gehr, and Harlan C. Barrios for their respective postresignation conduct of having worked for MDC during the period of the strike which began 25 March 1981, and WE WILL remove from our files and records any references to the internal proceedings, respective fines, and lawsuit to collect the fines against the former members for the above conduct.

WE WILL refund to Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, Gehr, and Barrios any membership dues and fees, including reinstatement fees or the equivalent thereof, paid to date, with interest, and collected after our failure to advise them, subsequent to the imposition against each of them of a prohibition from holding office in this labor organization, of their respective obligations under the contractual union-security clause.

WE WILL make whole the above-named employees for any loss of earnings, benefits, travel expenses, or any other expenses incurred as a result of their need to defend themselves against the internal union charges preferred against them, including any such losses that resulted from the state court action against them to collect the unlawfully imposed fines.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS AND AEROSPACE WORKERS, DISTRICT LODGE 94, LOCAL LODGE 575

Ann Reid Cronin, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Robert M. Simpson, Esq. (Rose, Klein & Marias), of Los Angeles, California, for the Respondent.
Raymond J. LaJeunesse Jr., Esq. (National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, Inc.), of Springfield, Virginia, for the Charging Parties.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BURTON LITVACK, Administrative Law Judge. The above-captioned matters were tried before me on June 1 and 2 and July 20 and 21, 1983, in Los Angeles, California. On April 27, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a second consolidated amended complaint, based on an unfair labor practice in Case 31–CB–4259 filed by Ramon Fuentes, an individual, on June 30, 1981; an unfair labor practice charge in Case 31–CB–4809 filed by Fuentes and Juliet Pena Rosales, an individual, on October 19, 1982; and original and first amended unfair labor practice charges in Case 31–CB–4837 filed by Glenn G. Van de Sande, an individual, on November 15, 1982, and April 19, 1983,[1] respectively, alleging that International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, District Lodge 94, Local Lodge 575 (Respondent), engaged in acts and conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent filed an answer, denying the commission of any unfair labor practices. At the hearing,[2] all parties were permitted to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to offer any relevant evidence, and to argue their positions orally. Additionally, all parties filed posthearing briefs that have been carefully considered. Accordingly, on the entire record, the posthearing briefs, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, McDonnell Douglas Corporation (MDC) has been, and is now, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Maryland, with an office and place of business located in Monrovia, California, where it is engaged in the manufacture and sale of aircraft and related items. In the course and conduct of its business operations, MDC annually sells and ships goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 from its Monrovia, California facility directly to customers located outside the State of California. Respondent admits that MDC is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[1] Besides Van de Sande, the named Charging Parties on the first amended charge are Alice Vargas, Patricia Miller, Stella Melendez, and Amalia Morales.

[2] The General Counsel moved and was permitted to extensively amend the second consolidated amended complaint at the hearing. The amendments were substantively denied by Respondent.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent admits that it is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ISSUES

1. Did Respondent engage in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by instigating and prosecuting internal union disciplinary proceedings against Fuentes, Rosales, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, Van de Sande, William A. Gehr, and Harlan C. Barrios, who were employed by MDC at its Monrovia facility, for crossing a picket line, sanctioned by Respondent, and working for MDC after duly resigning from Respondent; by fining the individuals for the conduct; and by instituting a lawsuit against the individuals to collect the fines?

2. Did Respondent violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by, after impairing the membership rights of each of the above nine individuals, as discipline for crossing a sanctioned picket line, failing to advise each that, while his or her membership rights were impaired, the union-security provision of the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and MDC would not be utilized to force him or her to continue paying dues or the equivalent under a threat of discharge?

3. Did Respondent violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by threatening Fuentes and Rosales with discharge and cancellation of membership and insurance for nonpayment of dues or an equivalent amount?

4. Did Respondent engage in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by demanding payment of a reinstatement fee from Fuentes and Rosales without having given sufficient notice of such a requirement?

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

The record establishes that in the mid-1960s MDC purchased an ownership interest in the Monrovia, California facility involved herein from Hycon Manufacturing Company; in 1971 MDC assumed absolute ownership of the plant by purchasing a controlling interest in Hycon and two other companies and by merging them to form Actron, a division of MDC; and on January 1, 1979, the name of the Monrovia facility was changed to McDonnell Douglas Astronautics Company. The record further establishes that Respondent[3] was certified as the exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining for the production and maintenance employees at the plant in February 1972, and since that date there have been successive collective-bargaining agreements between MDC and Respondent, the most recent of which is effective from May 4, 1981, until March 18, 1984.[4] The nine individuals involved in these matters (Ramon Fuentes, Juliet Rosales, Glenn Van De Sande, Alice Vargas, Patricia Miller, Stella Melendez, Amalia Morales, William Gehr, and Harlan Barrios) were all employed[5] by MDC at the Monrovia plant, were working in job classifications within the collective-bargaining unit represented by Respondent, and were all members[6] of the latter through March 1981.

During new contract negotiations, the predecessor to the current collective-bargaining agreement between MDC and Respondent expired, by its terms, on March 15, 1981. The latter thereupon gave the requisite 7-day written notice to MDC of its intent to terminate the agreement, and on March 21 the bargaining unit employees voted to reject the Company's final contract proposal and to engage in a concerted work stoppage against MDC in support of their contract demands. The strike commenced on March 25 and continued until May 4, 1981, at which time the employees ratified an MDC contract proposal. During the initial period of the strike, the nine above-mentioned employees honored the picket line; however, apparently due to financial reasons, each decided to abandon the work stoppage and return to work. In this regard, the record discloses that Barrios crossed the picket line and returned to work on April 15, 1981; that Fuentes, Rosales, Miller, Vargas, and Morales returned to work on April 22; that Melendez' first day of work after the strike began was April 25; that Gehr and Van De Sande returned to work on and April 27 and 28, respectively; and that each worked through the remainder of the work stoppage. The record further discloses that each of the nine employees attempted to resign from Respondent's membership before returning to work. Thus, there is no dispute that employees Fuentes, Rosales,

[3] John Pettitt, who is employed by District Lodge 94 of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers (IAM) as a business representative and who is assigned to Local Lodge 575, testified that District Lodge 94 is comprised of seven local lodges of which Local Lodge 575 is one.

[4] Apparently, each successive contract has contained a union-security provision whereby "all employees covered by this agreement shall, at the expiration of thirty (30) continuous calendar days of employment, become members of [Respondent]."

[5] Of the nine individuals, only Gehr did not testify. Barrios had been employed at the Monrovia facility since September 1980 as a material handler; Vargas since March 16, 1967, as an assembler; Rosales since July 24, 1978, as an electrical assembler; Van de Sande since September 22, 1980, as a tool grinder; Morales since June 7, 1977, as a precision mechanic; Melendez since 1966 as a mechanics assembler; Miller since 1966 as an electrical assembler; and Fuentes since 1980 as an electronic receiving inspector.

[6] The eight employee/members who testified each stated that he or she executed a membership application card for Respondent at some point during his or her tenure of employment, and that they were told either by an MDC employee (Barrios, Rosales, Van de Sande, Morales, and Fuentes) or by an agent of Respondent (Miller and Vargas) that such was required in order to work at the MDC Monrovia facility. Further, each witness denied ever having been informed by a representative of Respondent that rather than becoming a member of Respondent, he or she could fulfill the union-security clause requirements and continue working for MDC by paying an amount equivalent to Respondent's membership dues and fees.

Vargas, Van de Sande, Gehr, Morales, and Miller mailed resignation letters to Respondent and that the latter received each respective letter prior to the date that the writer returned to work, thereby abandoning the strike.[7] Regarding Harlan Barrios, who was on layoff status at the commencement of the strike but recalled during it, he testified, without contradiction, that, on receiving the recall notice and speaking to MDC personnel officials, he hand-delivered a resignation letter[8] to Respondent's office where an official, Al Loop, read it, said it was John Pettitt's decision "whether he wanted to accept [the letter] or not," and warned that Barrios could be "charged" for crossing the ongoing MDC picket line. After arguing with Loop regarding abandoning the strike, Barrios left Respondent's office and, a day or two later, mailed a copy of the same letter to Respondent. Concerning employee Stella Melendez, the parties stipulated that she mailed a resignation letter[9] on April 24 and Respondent received it on Monday, April 27; she testified that she crossed the picket line and returned to work on April 25.

There is no record evidence that on receipt of the resignation letters from the nine MDC employees Respondent's officials made any effort to notify any of them that the resignations might not be effective. Rather, in a series of letters dated April 23 and May 11 and 21,[10] Angel Cruz, president of Respondent, advised each of the nine that internal union charges had been filed against him or her for violating article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution[11] by crossing the MDC picket line and that a committee would be appointed to investigate the allegations. Thereafter, about June 8, John Slavik, the chairman of Respondent's trial committee, in separate letters to Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Vargas, Miller, Melendez, Morales, Gehr, and Barrios, advised them that "A Trial Committee was appointed to investigate the [respective charge that was enclosed]. An investigation was conducted and the Trial Committee has determined that there is sufficient question to warrant that a trial hearing be held," and that an internal union trial, in accordance with the IAM constitution, would be held, with each employee entitled to be heard and to present evidence in his or her behalf.[12] Trials were held on July 8, 1981, and each of the nine employees were found guilty of having acted in violation of article L of the IAM constitution by crossing a sanctioned picket line and performing bargaining unit work for MDC during the pendency of the March 25 through May 4 strike. By separate letters to the nine employees dated September 2, 1981, Cindy Cliver, Respondent's recording secretary, informed each that as punishment he or she was fined[13] and declared "ineligible to hold any office in the [IAM] for five years." None of the nine employees paid his or her fine, and about March 1, 1982, Respondent filed a lawsuit against the nine MDC employees in the Municipal Court of Santa Anita Judicial District, County of Los Angeles, State of California, seeking to collect the fines. On September 13, 1982, the lawsuit was dismissed "without prejudice"[14] to date, none of the fines has been paid.

It is the position of both the General Counsel and the Charging Parties that the resignations from membership in Respondent, which were tendered by the nine MDC employees, were effective on receipt by Respondent and that, therefore, the subsequent internal union proceedings, fines, and court suit to collect the fines were unlawful. In support of their position and besides asserting that article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution constitutes an unenforceable restriction on resignation, they contend that none of the resignees had notice[15] of the above provision prior to tendering his or [7] The parties stipulated that Fuentes' resignation letter was mailed on April 16 and received by Respondent on April 17; Rosales' resignation letter was mailed on April 18 and received by Respondent on April 20; that Vargas' resignation letter was mailed on April 16 and received by Respondent on April 17; Van de Sande's resignation letter was mailed on April 20 and received by Respondent on April 24; Gehr's resignation letter was mailed on April 21 and received by Respondent on April 22; Morales' resignation letter was mailed on April 16 and received by Respondent on April 20; and that Miller's resignation letter was mailed on April 20 and received by Respondent on April 21. Analysis of these letters (G.C. Exhs. 18–20 and 22–25) reveals that each is one sentence in length and states the writer's intention to resign from Respondent's membership. In none of the letters does an employee recognize his or her continuing obligation to pay to Respondent the equivalent of the latter's membership dues or fees.

[8] The letter (G.C. Exh. 26) is dated April 8 and states Barrios' intent to resign from the Union. There is nothing therein regarding his obligation to continue paying to Respondent the equivalent of the latter's membership dues and fees.

[9] The letter (G.C. Exh. 21) states Melendez' desire to resign from membership in Respondent, but is silent regarding her obligation to continue paying to Respondent the equivalent of the latter's membership dues and fees.

[10] Apparently, Rosales, Morales, Miller, Vargas, and Fuentes received the April 23 letter; each of the nine employees, except Barrios and Melendez, received the May 11 letter; and Barrios and Melendez received the May 21 letter.

> Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration.

[12] The letters stated that the trials would be conducted on June 23, 1981. However, the trials were subsequently postponed to July 8. There is some question about whether Van de Sande received notice of this new date inasmuch as the letter, advising of such, was apparently not sent to him.

[13] The amounts of the fines were as follows:

Fuentes	$31,298.00
Vargas	1,662.00
Miller	1,457.30
Morales	1,298.00
Rosales	1,534.00
Barrios	1,376.00
Melendez	1,534.00
Van de Sande	432.00

[14] The record discloses that Fuentes, Vargas, Rosales, Barrios, and Morales jointly incurred court and legal fees in connection with Respondent's lawsuit in the amount of $195.

[15] Gehr did not testify at the hearing, and any conclusions about him would be speculative.

her resignation from membership to Respondent. Initially on this issue, I note that Melendez, Barrios, Vargas, Miller, Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, and Morales all denied ever having been given or ever seen copies of the IAM constitution prior to submitting their resignations and that John Pettitt admitted that not all members are even aware of the existence of this document. Nevertheless, Respondent contends that Pettitt notified the MDC bargaining unit employees of the existence of article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, by reading the provisions word by word and discussing its meaning at two prestrike meetings—February 2 and March 21, 1981. The record establishes that Pettitt, who was Respondent's agent responsible for conducting the 1981 contract negotiations with MDC and for coordinating any work stoppage, caused a notice to be posted at the Monrovia facility about January 26, informing MDC bargaining unit employees that a meeting would be conducted at 3:45 p.m. on Monday, February 2,[16] to "discuss and formulate proposals for the up-coming negotiations"[17] and to "take our first strike vote." The meeting was to be held at the Immaculate Conception Church, which is located across the street from the MDC Monrovia facility, and there is no dispute that not only did such a meeting occur as scheduled, but also employees Melendez, Vargas, Miller, Fuentes, and Morales had notice of and attended it.[18] The record further establishes that approximately 200 employees were present at the start of the meeting; it began between 3:45 and 4 p.m. and lasted until approximatley 6:15 p.m. in the church's auditorium; Pettitt and the employee negotiating committee were on a stage in the front of the room; and Pettitt conducted the meeting, utilizing a lectern on which he had "just the proposals that the committee and I had gone over." There is no dispute that the major portion of the meeting was consumed by a discussion of the contract proposals that had been formulated by the negotiating committee. There were numerous questions by bargaining unit members and informal approval or disapproval votes on various proposals. While this was ongoing, Fuentes left at approximately 4:15 p.m. as "I got tired of listening to all the bull-shit" and, according to Melendez, she and Miller left between 5:10 and 5:15 p.m. Further, both Morales and Vargas left the meeting at 5:30 p.m.; the former stated that contract proposals were still being discussed, while Vargas insisted that the meeting was over inasmuch as Pettitt had concluded reading the contract.[19] In any event, the record also establishes that when the employees concluded discussion of their contract proposals,[20] the next order of business was a strike vote. According to Pettitt and John Slavik, the former announced that an initial strike vote would be taken but that such did not necessarily mean a strike would "definitely" be called; rather, a vote was necessary to demonstrate that the negotiating committee had the full support of the bargaining unit in presenting its proposed contract. It was at this point, according to Pettitt, that he read the above portion of article L, section 3 of the IAM constitution, reciting from a small yellow sheet of paper[21] (R. Exh. 15). On finishing, several employees asked questions regarding the consequences of crossing a sanctioned picket line, and Pettitt said "that if anybody crosses the picket line they can be fined and this union will charge the members." According to Pettitt, he continued, explaining about a case in which Respondent had gone to court to collect fines for crossing a picket line and had been 4 years in litigation. Someone asked about the amount of such fines and whether Respondent could take the member's house away. Pettitt replied that he could not go that far, but that the fines could equal what the individual earns while working during the strike. After this discussion, stated Pettitt, an initial strike vote by secret ballot was taken.

Analysis of the record discloses that apparently only four of the employee witnesses remained until the conclusion of the February 2 meeting and that, of these, just two, Irma Bullock and Duane Karam, have not served Respondent in some official capacity[22] in the past. According to Bullock, the only topic for discussion at the meeting was the negotiating proposals and, after that, "I think we did take a strike vote, because I remember everybody going around now. But it was not a strike vote; it was supposed to be to see if a strike was going to be favorable." Bullock recalled that the voting was by secret ballot and that such was termed a first strike vote. Concerning whether any portion of article L, section 3 was read out loud, Bullock stated, after reading lines 24 through 40 to herself at the hearing, "I have never heard this read, at that negotiation or any other negotiation."[23]

[16] The meeting at 3:45 p.m. was to be for the day-shift bargaining unit employees; a meeting for the night-shift employees was scheduled for 2 p.m.

[17] Prior to this meeting, an employee negotiating committee had been elected, and its members, along with Pettitt, had formulated various tentative contract proposals.

[18] Employees Barrios, Rosales, and Van de Sande testified that they did not attend the February 2 meeting. Regarding William Gehr, Vargas recalled seeing him at this meeting, but there is no evidence how long he remained if, indeed, he was present.

[19] In insisting that the meeting had concluded, Vargas averred that "the people that were sitting . . . all got up and left" and the subject of a strike was never discussed nor was a strike vote taken.

[20] The record establishes that at least half the employees had left the meeting by the time the discussion of the contract proposals concluded at approximately 5:30 p.m.

[21] Pettitt testified that prior to June 3, 1980, he never quoted the provisions of art. L, sec. 3 to members who were contemplating a strike against their employer. On that date, the IAM transmitted an internal guideline, Official Circular No. 697 (R. Exh. 14), to all local officials. The document concerned the procedure that was to be followed to make sure that members were aware of the resignation provisions of art. L, sec. 3, and instructed local officials, "in all instance," to read the above "at the first strike vote meeting." In order to facilitate the IAM dictate, Pettitt had prepared for his use 8-1/2 inch by 5-1/2 inch sheets of yellow paper on which lines 24 through 40 of art. L, sec. 3 were printed verbatim. Pettitt admitted that the MDC contract situation was his first subsequent to the publication of Circular No. 697.

[22] John Slavik and William Bennett testified on Respondent's behalf, essentially corroborating Pettitt's testimony about the February 2 meeting. Each has served Respondent in an official capacity in the past—Bennett as a chief steward district delegate and Slavik as vice president, recording secretary, and financial secretary—and did not impress me as an entirely reliable witness.

Karam, who stated that he sat at the front due to a hearing problem, testified that the meeting began with a review of the employees' proposed negotiating positions—"to see if the people approve of it, or had any changes or suggestions." These matters lasted approximatley 1-1/2 hours; next there was a secret ballot vote "to authorize the committee to have a strike backing them on their negotiations." He further testified that, prior to the vote, Pettitt spoke on how a strike "would be handled." Then, "he read I guess it was a constitution . . . you couldn't terminate your . . . withdrawal from the union 14 days before the termination of the contract. And then he went on to say about the penalties" for crossing a picket line. Karam added that Pettitt did appear to be reading from something while speaking of the 14-day requirement. At that point, questions were asked about the type of penalties, with one person asking if a member's house could be taken. Pettitt replied that such was never done. In all, according to Karam, this discussion consumed no more than 5 minutes and immediately preceded the strike vote.[24] Finally, regarding this February 2 meeting, there is no evidence that during the 90 minutes prior to allegedly doing so, Pettitt ever alerted the employees that he would read article L, section 3 to them.

Lines 24 through 40 of article L, section 3 of the IAM constitution were next allegedly read, word by word, to the MDC bargaining unit employees at the March 21 prestrike meeting. The meeting was held at the Elks Lodge in Monrovia on a Saturday morning; there is no dispute that such a meeting occurred and was held for two reasons: to accept or reject MDC's final contract proposal and, if rejected, to reaffirm the prior, first strike vote. Of the nine[25] employees involved herein, five (Vargas, Fuentes, Miller, Melendez, and Rosales) were present; Pettitt also conducted this meeting. According to the latter, who was seated on a slightly raised stage along with the negotiating committee and Sid Cohen, a grand lodge representative, the subject of the constitutional provision arose subsequent to the rejection of MDC's final offer. Thus, Pettitt announced the results of the vote and said that the employees would, therefore, have to reaffirm their prior strike vote. The approximately 265 bargaining unit employees began cheering, and Cohen whispered to Pettitt, "[D]on't forget, John, you got to read from the good book, and he was referring to the constitution." Thereupon, Pettitt announced to the group that he was going to read from the constitution as he had at the first meeting, and proceeded to read article L from the constitution itself. After doing so, according to Pettitt, he explained what the provision entailed and explained the consequences of a strike, mentioning its effect on contractual health and welfare payments, unemployment insurance, and IAM strike benefits. Next, questions were asked regarding failures to picket and the consequences of crossing a picket line. Regarding the latter, as he had at the church meeting, Pettitt mentioned the pending court case to collect fines for such conduct. Subsequent to the questions, Pettitt testified, a strike vote by secret ballot was taken. The testimony of witnesses Slavik and Bennett, as with the February 2 meeting, essentially corroborated Pettitt's account of the reading of article L, section 3 at this meeting. Contrary to them, employees Miller, Fuentes, Melendez, Rosales, and Irma Bullock specifically denied that Pettitt either read or paraphrased lines 24 to 40 of that provision at the March 21 meeting, but all testified that Pettitt did answer questions and discussed the consequences of crossing a picket line, with Miller and Rosales recalling that he did mention fines for such conduct on other occasions.[26] Finally, Duane Karam testified that he also attended this meeting and that he again sat near the front of the hall. According to him, subsequent to the vote on accepting or rejecting MDC's contract offer, but prior to the secret-ballot strike vote, Pettitt "picked up a book—and he read it." At the hearing, on reading to himself lines 24 through 40 of article L, section 3, Karam further testified that such was what Pettitt read to the bargaining unit employees on March 21, but that, at the February 2 meeting, "he didn't read it . . . word for word."[27] Next, Pettitt responded to questions regarding the consequences for crossing a picket line.

Subsequent to Respondent's levying of its internal union penalties[28] against the nine MDC employees, four of them (Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, and Vargas), believing that they were under no obligation to pay membership dues to Respondent as a condition of employment, while ineligible to hold any office in Respondent, timely revoked their respective previously executed checkoff authorizations, in writing, whereby MDC was authorized to deduct from their respective wages, and remit to Respondent, union fees and membership dues.[29] The record discloses that with regard to Fuentes, MDC ceased deducting union membership dues and fees in July 1982 and that he admits, thereafter, "I stopped paying" any moneys to Respondent. Approximately 2-1/2 months later, Fuentes received (G.C. Exh. 44), a notice dated September 20, 1982, from Marybelle Egge, secretary-treasurer of Respondent, stating that he was 3

[24] Karam stated that he knew nothing of any 14-day requirement prior to the church meeting and that he heard people talking about it as he departed from the church—while understanding what Pettitt said, "[M]ost of the guys . . . had never heard of it at that time."

[25] There is no evidence regarding Gehr's attendance at this meeting.

[26] Vargas' testimony about whether Pettitt read verbatim or paraphrased article L, section 3 at the March 21 meeting was hardly a model of clarity. However, while again and again denying that Pettitt read art. L of the IAM constitution, she admitted that not only did he mention the provision, but also "He explained it, yes."

[27] Karam added that Pettitt, at the February 2 meeting, read from something, but "he went through it and, I just assumed he hit the highlights of it."

[28] Barrios, Van de Sande, Morales, Vargas, Miller, Fuentes, Melendez, and Rosales each denied ever having been advised, subsequent to being fined by Respondent and prohibited from holding office in it for a 5-year period as punishment for crossing the picket line and returning to work for MDC, by any official of Respondent that he or she would not be required to pay membership dues or fees, or the equivalent thereof, for the time period during which he or she was prohibited from holding internal union office.

[29] Fuentes' revocation letter is dated June 22, 1982; Rosales' revocation letter is dated July 6, 1982; Van de Sande's revocation letter is dated September 1982 and was received by MDC on September 1, 1982; and Vargas' revocation letter is dated January 18, 1983. It is uncontroverted that MDC received the revocations, and Respondent does not assert any are invalid.

months in arrears and warning that "your membership and your insurance will be cancelled at the close of this month." Three weeks later, Fuentes received a letter dated October 8, 1982, from Egge. It reads, in part, as follows:

> Dear Mr. Fuentes,
> We regret to inform you that you permitted your membership to lapse August 31, 1982 by allowing your dues to become two (2) months in arrears.
> The law, specifically, Section 8 (a) (3) of the National Labor Relations Act permits a Union and an Employer to establish, as a condition of continued employment, covering employees within a bargaining unit covered by a labor agreement, a contract clause which requires membership in the Union on or after the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of such agreement, whichever is later. The United States Supreme Court has defined "membership" as the obligation to tender periodic dues and initiation or reinstatement fees uniformly required by the labor organization as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.
> There is a lawful Union Security Clause in the collective bargaining agreement between this Union and your Employer which covers your job. It has been in force and effect at all times pertinent to your employment. We know of no reason why this lawful clause should not apply to you.
> Under the terms of that agreement, you are required to pay to the Union the uniformly required reinstatement fee which applies at your shop, which is $100.00. Your obligation to make that payment became effective the first day after the lapsing of your membership.
> Further, your obligation also includes the obligation to pay a sum equivalent to uniformly required dues. Under your classification your monthly dues are 19.50. At the present time, you owe dues for October 1982. Accordingly you presently owe to the Union the sum of $119.50, which includes an amount equivalent to the reinstatement fee of $100.00 and an amount equivalent to one months dues.
> Please be advised that unless you make arrangements satisfactory to this Union, to fulfill your obligation to it within 10 days from the date of this letter, I will assume that you have no intention of doing so and no bona fide reason for not doing so. In that event, immediately after the 10 days have passed, the Union will demand that your Employer terminate your employment within the bargaining unit represented by us . . . .

Afraid of the possibility of termination, Fuentes paid the required $119.50 to Respondent "under protest" and has since continued to pay all required dues and fees. He testified that prior to the October 8 letter he had been unaware of the necessity that he pay a "reinstatement fee" to Respondent. Regarding Rosales, MDC ceased deducting membership dues and fees from her wages and remitting same to Respondent in August 1982, and she paid no moneys to Respondent for a 3- or 4-month period. Thereupon, she received in the mail a notice (G.C. Exh. 39) from Respondent containing the same warning as received by Fuentes on September 21: "Your membership and your insurance will be cancelled at the close of this month." Shortly thereafter, Rosales received a letter, dated October 8, 1982, from Egge. It reads, in part, as follows:

> Dear Ms. Rosales:
> We regret to inform you that you permitted your membership to lapse September 30, 1982 by allowing your dues to become two (2) months in arrears.
> The law, specifically, Section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act permits a Union and an Employer to establish, as a condition of continued employment, covering employees within a bargaining unit covered by a labor agreement, a contract clause which requires membership in the Union on or after the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of such agreement, whichever is later. The United States Supreme Court has defined "membership" as the obligation to tender periodic dues and initiation or reinstatement fees uniformly required by the labor organization as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

> Under the terms of that agreement, you are required to pay to the Union the uniformly required reinstatement fee which applies at your shop, which is $100.00. Your obligation to make that payment became effective the first day after the lapsing of your membership.
> Further, your obligation also includes the obligation to pay a sum equivalent to uniformly required dues. Under your classification your monthly dues are $19.50. At the present time, you owe dues for _____. Accordingly you presently owe to the Union the sum of $100.00, which includes an amount equivalent to the reinstatement fee of $100.00 and an amount equivalent to _____ months dues.
> Please be advised that unless you make arrangements satisfactory to this Union, to fulfill your obligation to it within 10 days from the date of this letter, I will assume that you have no intention of doing so and no bona fide reason for not doing so. In that event, immediately after the 10 days have passed, the Union will demand that your Employer terminate your employment within the bargaining unit represented by us . . . .

Prior to receipt of this letter, Rosales testified, she had been unaware of any requirement that she pay a $100 "reinstatement fee" to Respondent for becoming arrears in dues payments. Rosales paid $119.50 to Respondent on October 15 and has continued to regularly pay dues "under protest" each month.

The record further discloses that with regard to Van de Sande, MDC ceased deducting union dues and fees from his wages in October 1982, and he testified that he failed to make any payment to Respondent that month. Thereafter, he received a notice, dated October 28, from Marybelle Egge, warning Van de Sande that "your membership and your insurance will be cancelled at the close of this month." In response, he paid his dues to Respondent for that month and since has continued to do so "under protest." Concerning Alice Vargas, MDC ceased deducting union dues and fees from her wages and remitting same to Respondent in February 1983, and she paid no moneys on her own to Respondent that month. Vargas testified that thereafter she received a three-page document, dated March 10, 1983, from Respondent. The first page is the identical notice, received by Fuentes, Rosales, and Van de Sande; signed by Egge, it warned Vargas "your membership and your insurance will be cancelled at the close of this month." The second page, a "general" information sheet, was also signed by Egge and contains the following warning: "Please be advised that if you allow your membership to lapse due to nonpayment of dues for two (2) months you will be required to pay a reinstatement fee of $100 in order to become a member in good-standing again . . . ." Worried that she might have to pay the same $100.00 fee, paid by Fuentes and Rosales, Vargas paid all moneys "owed" to Respondent and has done so since—"under protest." Finally, Miller and Morales testified that each decided not to revoke her checkoff authorization for fear that the identical consequence that befell Fuentes and Rosales—the necessity of paying a $100 reinstatement fee to avoid possible termination—would happen to her.

B. Analysis

The General Counsel and the Charging Parties essentially contend that the resignations from membership in Respondent that were tendered to it in April 1981, during the pendency of the concerted work stoppage against MDC, by employees Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, Gehr, and Barrios were effective on receipt by Respondent; that article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution constitutes an unenforceable restraint on resignation; and that, therefore, as alleged in the second consolidated amended complaint, the internal union disciplinary proceedings, the resulting fines levied against the above nine employees and the lawsuit to collect the fines were all violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. In defense, Respondent argues, based on the asserted approach "uniformly followed by the Supreme Court" that the common law of contracts applies to these types of situations and it will not disturb the express contractual restrictions on the right to resign of voluntary associations, that limitations on resignations, such as article L, section 3, "are enforceable, particularly where the purpose of the limitation, as here, is to preserve group solidarity and mutual reliance in situations in which a collective effort is necessary to achieve a particular result." Accordingly, Respondent's counsel asserts, the nine employees' tendered resignations were not effective and, having crossed a sanctioned picket line and worked for their employer, the resultant discipline of each was lawful internal union activity. The issue, regarding this aspect of the allegations herein, is, succinctly put, as stated by the General Counsel in her posthearing brief—"whether a union may, through an express provision in its constitution, absolutely prohibit an employee for the duration of a strike from changing his or her status from that of a full union member, subject to union discipline . . . to that of a former member, immune from [discipline] imposed by the union . . . ."

The Board and the courts of appeals have long recognized that employees have the Section 7 right to not honor a picket line and return to work for their employer if they have first resigned their membership in their union and to resign from membership in a union absent some valid restriction on such. Carpenters San Diego Council (Campbell Industries), 243 NLRB 147, 148 (1979); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1260 (KITV), 239 NLRB 923, 927 (1978); Teamsters Local 439 (Loomis Courier), 237 NLRB 220, 221 (1978); NLRB v. Chemical Workers Local 6-578, 619 F.2d 708 (8th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Machinists Lodge 1871, 575 F.2d 54 (2d Cir. 1978). However, the Supreme Court has ruled that a labor organization does not act in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by imposing fines on "members" who decline to honor an authorized strike and by attempts to collect such fines,[30] but that a labor organization commits an unfair labor practice when it levies fines or seeks enforcement thereof after a member has lawfully resigned his membership. NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175, 195 (1967); NLRB v. Textile Workers Local 1029, Granite State Joint Board, 409 U.S. 213, 217 (1972). Specifically left unresolved by the Court in Granite State and in a subsequent decision[31] was the issue of to what extent, by an internal rule, can a labor organization curtail a member's freedom to resign. In this regard, the Court has also held that "a properly adopted rule" of a labor organization is not violative of Section 8(b)(1) of the Act if the internal rule "reflects a legitimate union interest, impairs no policy Congress has imbedded in the labor laws, and is reasonably enforced against . . . members who are free to leave the [labor organization] and escape the rule." Scofield, supra at 430.

Utilizing the foregoing principles as guidelines, the Board has, in the past, examined several union rules restricting members' rights to resign and found them to be unreasonably restrictive and, therefore, invalid. Electrical Workers IUE Local 444 (Sperry Rand Corp.), 235 NLRB 98 (1978); Auto Workers Local 1384 (Ex-Cell-O Corp.), 227 NLRB 1045 (1977); Auto Workers Local 647 (General Electric), 197 NLRB 608 (1972). Turning to consideration of article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution, I note that within the preceding 18-month period, the Board has, on three separate occasions, found the identical provision of the IAM constitution to constitute an invalid, unreasonable, and unenforceable restriction on resignation. Machinists Lodge 758 (Menasco), 267 NLRB 1147 fn. 1 (1983); Machinists Lodge 160 (Gray Motor), 265 NLRB 1049 (1982); Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor), 263 NLRB 984 (1982).[32] In the latter decision, a two-member plurality decision, with two members concurring and one dissenting (Members Fanning and Zimmerman) in the plurality decision, concluded that "[A] union rule which limits the right of a union member to resign only to nonstrike periods constitutes an unreasonable restriction on a member's Section 7 right to resign"; while Chairman Van de Water and Member Hunter, concurring, stated that "any union rule that restricts a member's right to resign is unreasonable and any discipline taken by a union against an employee predicated on such a rule violates Section 8(b)(1)(A)." Dalmo Victor, supra at 986, 992. Although the plurality decision makes it clear that its findings are the "law of the case only" and, therefore, of no precedential value, the Board, in Menasco, Inc., supra, also adopted the view that the constitutional provision, herein involved, is a restriction on resignation and concluded, "that under either the plurality or concurring views expressed by the Board in Dalmo Victor, Respondent's rule in the instant case would also be invalid and unenforceable." Id. at fn. 1. Utilizing Menasco, Inc. and Gray Motors, supra, as precedent, notwithstanding Respondent's cogent arguments as to the constitutional provision's enforceability and noting that Dalmo Victor, supra, is currently pending before the Ninth Circuit, I find that article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution is an unreasonable and invalid restraint[33] on resignation from membership and that, therefore, the resignations of the involved nine employees were valid when received[34] by Respondent. Accordingly, the internal union disciplinary proceedings, the fines, and resultant lawsuit to collect he fines, at issue in these matters, must be found violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act as conduct that coerced and restrained the nine former members in the exercise of a Section 7 right—the right not to honor a strike. Menasco, Inc., supra; Gray Motors, supra. Furthermore, although not alleged[35] as such, the Board finds, "that the mere maintenance of such a constitutional provision restrains and coerces employees, who may be unaware of the provision's unenforceability, from exercising their Section 7 rights. Its effect is analogous to the effect of an employer's maintenance of an overly broad no-solicitation rule." Engineers & Scientists Guild (Lockheed Corp.), 268 NLRB 311 (1983). Accordingly, by maintaining the foregoing provision as its restriction on resignation, Respondent also restrained and coerced employees in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

[30] In a later decision, the Court explained that by union members, it meant "voluntary union members." Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423, 428 (1969).

Both counsel for the General Counsel and counsel for the Charging Parties argue, in the alternative, that assuming arguendo the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals or, ultimately perhaps, the Supreme Court finds article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40 a permissible restriction on resignation, the internal union disciplinary proceedings, the fines, and the resultant lawsuit to collect the fines against the nine MDC employees, nevertheless, must be found unlawful as none of them had notice of the existence, much less the terms, of the IAM constitutional provision prior to tendering his or her resignation from membership.[36] The existence of a restriction on such [32] The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed a prior Board decision in Dalmo Victor, finding the language of article L, section 3, LL. 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution to constitute "a restriction on a member's right to resign" and remanding the matter to the Board for a consideration of the provision's validity as such. NLRB v. Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor), 608 F.2d 1219 (9th Cir. 1979).

[33] I find it unnecessary to pass on the Charging Parties' argument that any restrictions on resignation are unenforceable and invalid.

[34] It is clear that resignations are normally deemed to be effective when received. Teamsters Local 610 (Browning-Ferris), 264 NLRB 886 (1982). Further, if a constitutional provision unreasonably restricts resignation, a member is free to resign at any time by clearly conveying such to a labor organization. Teamsters Local 36 (Strong Building Materials), 266 NLRB 1057 (1983). Herein, there is no question that the resignations of each of the nine employees clearly conveyed such an intent to Respondent, and I so find.

With regard to the resignation letters of Barrios, I note that he delivered a copy, in person, to Respondent and also mailed a copy. I find that he effectively resigned. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 66 (Houston Lighting), 262 NLRB 483, 486 (1982). Regarding Stella Melendez, the record establishes that Respondent received her resignation 1 day after she returned to work. Such, I find, does not invalidate the effectiveness of her resignation, but Respondent should be entitled to fine her for 1 day of work, April 25. Machinists Local 778 (Whitaker Cable), 224 NLRB 580, 581 (1976).

[35] Obviously, the validity of art. L, sec. 3 was extensively argued in the posthearing briefs. Accordingly, there has been no denial of due process by my finding of a violation about the maintenance of the provision.

[36] It is also argued, in the alternative, that the internal disciplinary proceedings, the fines, and the lawsuit to collect such fines are unlawful inasmuch as neither at the time each of the nine employees executed his application for membership in Respondent, or at any time thereafter, did agents of the latter inform him or her that he or she was not required to become a member in order to fulfill the contractual union-security obligation, but rather he or she was only required to pay the equivalent of membership dues and fees to Respondent. At the outset, while the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and MDC requires membership in Respondent 30 days after employment, "it is permissible to condition employment upon membership, but membership, insofar as it has significance to employment rights, may in turn be conditioned only upon payment of dues and fees. 'Membership' as a condition of employment is whittled down to its financial core." NLRB v. General Motors Corp., 373 U.S. 734, 742 (1963). Both the General Counsel and counsel for the Charging Parties rely on the one Board decision on this issue, Retail Clerks Local 322 (Ramey Supermarkets), 226 NLRB 80 (1976), as support for their contention; while the latter argues, more broadly, that Respondent's failure to advise in this regard meant that the nine MDC employees never became full voluntary members of Respondent so that none were ever bound by the tenets of article L, section 3 of the IAM constitution and that Respondent never had any authority over them. The situation in Retail Clerks is similar to the one here—the union refused to honor the resignations of 10 employee/members and instituted internal disciplinary proceedings against each for crossing a picket line and working for his employer. The union's defense was a constitutional restriction on resignation, the terms of which were not adhered to by the 10 employees. Without ruling on the validity of the provision, the administrative law judge, with the Board affirming, held that the union penalties were unlawful, reasoning:

> It has long been clear that Congress intended in enacting the Taft-Hartley amendments that employees should not be required to undertake or maintain any obligation to the labor organization beyond the obligation to "tender the periodic dues and initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership," unless the employee voluntarily assumed other obligations. See N.L.R.B. v. General Motors Corporation, 373 U.S. 734 (1963). In the present case, as has been found, both the Union and the Company considered that the employees were covered by a union-shop con-rule "prior to tendering his resignation, then the member's resignation becomes effective immediately . . . ." Dalmo Victor at 987 fn. 20; Loomis Courier Service, supra at 223; Ex-Cell-O Corp., supra at 1048. Moreover, I agree with the proposition set forth by both counsel—that the necessity to give members notice of the existence of any rules or impediments to resignation prior to penalizing them for failing to adhere or comply with such is required by a labor organization's fiduciary duty of fair representation (Ex-Cell-O Corp., supra at 1049), and that the rules for the preciseness of such should be as strict as that required of a labor organization prior to demanding enforcement of a constitutional union-security clause against a delinquent employee. Pattern Makers League (Rockford-Beloit), 265 NLRB 1332, 1334 (1982), enfd. 724 F.2d 57 (7th Cir. 1983); Western Publishing Co., 263 NLRB 110, 111–112 (1982). Further, the burden is on the respondent labor organization to establish that the resigning employees had "proper notice" of language restraining the resignations. Ex-Cell-O Corp., supra at 1049 fn. 21. In the instant circumstances,[37] Respondent contends that actual notice of its restrictions on resigning, in the form of reading article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, word by word, was given to the MDC bargaining unit employees at the two prestrike meetings held on February 2[38] and March 21, 1981. Inasmuch as I believe that any notice given at the Elks Lodge meeting on the latter date would have been ineffectual and meaningless,[39] the issue is whether employees Fuentes, Miller, Vargas, Morales, and Melendez did, indeed, receive notice of the terms of the constitutional provision at the church meeting on February 2.

Initially, I must determine whether Respondent's agent, John Pettitt, should be credited that he read each word of article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, to the assembled employees; in this regard, I note that Pettitt himself admits that the document from which he allegedly read was not the IAM constitution itself, but rather a sheet of paper on which lines 24 through 40 are printed verbatim. Analysis of the entire record convinces me that the only truly credible corroborative account[40] of what occurred at this meeting was that of employee Duane Karam, who, at all times, impressed me as an honest and candid witness and who seemed to be forthrightly attempting to recall what was said. According to the witness, Pettitt did seem to be reading from something, saying that withdrawal from the Union was not permitted 14 days preceding the termination of the contract. Karam's honest recollection seems to have been faulty, and I believe, and find, that Pettitt was, indeed, speaking regarding the provisions of article L, section 3. Regarding whether Pettitt read or merely paraphrased the words, Karam's testimony is most revealing—"he didn't read it . . . word for word," merely hitting the "highlights." I credit this rather than Pettitt's asserted version of what he did concerning article L, section 3.[41] Accordingly, I find that, prior to the secret-ballot strike vote on February 2, Pettitt did, to some extent, discuss the provisions of article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40 and the consequences for crossing a picket line and that the discussion, as testified to by Karam, lasted for just a few minutes. However, the record establishes that employees Fuentes, Miller, Vargas, Morales, and Melendez probably had departed by that time, each having left during the contract proposal discussions. Nevertheless, Respondent's counsel contended at the hearing that the notice requirement was satisfied by Pettitt's actions afterward. I do not agree. Respondent's fiduciary duty of fair representation is not to be lightly construed, and the retract, and the employees were informed that they had to join the Union and did so. There is no evidence that the employees were advised that they had the option not to join if they would tender the dues and fees required. Under the circumstances, it must be held that the employees joined under compulsion. However, the record does show that when the employees tendered their resignations, they did advise the Union that they were willing to continue paying such legal dues and fees as might be required. In my opinion, where it is not shown that the employees were clearly advised of their option not to join a labor organization before assuming membership in that union, the most that should be required of the employees as a condition precedent to resignation from membership is a commitment to continue paying the periodic dues and fees which may uniformly be required of members under the Act. In that way, the employee is guaranteed his rights under the Act, while at the same time continuing financial support to the bargaining representative which must represent him.

Id. at 90. Two points are evident from the foregoing. First, contrary to counsel for the Charging Parties, notwithstanding the union's failure to advise the employees of their choices, the Board apparently found them to, in fact, be members who, as members, were able to resign without regard to the union's constitutional restrictions on such. Thus, to the Board, the failure to advise affects the employee's right to resign and not the union membership itself of the employee. Second, a condition precedent exists to a member's right to freely resign in circumstances as existed in Retail Clerks and as exist in the circumstances herein—he must advise the labor organization of his intent to honor his "financial core" obligations under the union-security clause. None of the nine MDC employees so advised Respondent; therefore, absent the unenforceable constitutional impediment to resignation, Respondent could have lawfully refused to honor the resignations herein under this rationale. Therefore, I place no reliance on this alternative theory of the alleged violations herein.

[37] The testimony of employees Fuentes, Rosales, Van De Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, and Barrios that each neither possessed nor had examined a copy of the IAM constitution prior to resigning was uncontroverted by Respondent, and the latter offered no evidence that employee Gehr possessed or was familiar with the constitution.

[38] It was uncontroverted that employees Barrios, Rosales, and Van de Sande were not at the February 2 meeting, and the record evidence is inconclusive, at best, that Gehr was present.

[39] If actual notice of the terms of art. L, sec. 3, LL. 24 through 40 was first given at the March 21 employee meeting, bargaining unit employees, if they so chose, would have had just 4 days in which to resign prior to the commencement of the strike against MDC. By its terms the aforementioned constitutional restriction on resignation requires that, to be effective, a resignation must be tendered more than 14 days prior to the start of a strike. Thus, no employee, who desired to take advantage of the "actual notice" given on March 21, could have effectively resigned as "he had no ability to comply with the resignation procedures." Strong Building Materials, supra at 1058 fn. 2.

[40] I do not rely on the corroborative testimony of witnesses Slavik or Bennett. Their respective testimony impressed me as being too "pat" to be credited. On the other hand, while Irma Bullock seemed to be a credible witness, her memory of what was done and said by Pettitt at both prestrike meetings was at odds with other accounts sufficiently to convince me that her honest recall was not always accurate and should not be relied on—I do not do so.

quirement of actual notice, as in the enforcement of a union-security clause, is strictly enforced by the Board. Distillery Workers Local 38 (Schenley Distillers), 242 NLRB 370, 371 (1979). Extended to the instant facts, Respondent was under a duty to ensure that each and every person who attended the meeting was informed of article L, section 3, its existence and provisions. Herein, there is ample evidence that many employees departed the meeting during the discussion of the contract proposals—to the extent that only slightly more than half of the group remained for the initial strike vote. Yet, there is no evidence, and no contention by Respondent, that Pettitt made any earlier announcement that article L, section 3 would be read to them at some later point—in order to forestall the departures. This is highly significant; for the matter of resignation and restrictions thereon would seemingly have been a matter of vital concern to employees involved in a potential strike situation. Indeed, the IAM apparently recognized this by publication of its Circular No. 697. Simply put, fundamental fairness dictates that employees, who probably had no reason for being aware that any restriction on resignation existed in the constitution, should not bear the burden in these circumstances, especially when to force such directly impairs the exercise of a Section 7 right. Id. at 371. Rather, Respondent's strict fiduciary duty herein extended, at least, to the point of notifying everyone in attendance at this February 2 meeting that an important announcement, regarding his resignation rights and the consequences thereof, would be made later. In such circumstances, perhaps an argument could successfully be made that Pettitt's discussion of article L, section 3 fulfilled Respondent's notice requirements in that regard to all those at the meeting—even those who had left, including Fuentes, Miller, Vargas, Morales, and Melendez. Such, however, is not the case, and I find that neither these five employees nor employees Van de Sande, Barrios, or Rosales had sufficient[42] notice of the provisions of article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, at the time they tendered their resignations to Respondent.[43] Therefore, notwithstanding the assumed validity of that section of the IAM constitution, and I have found such to be unlawful, Respondent's subsequent internal disciplinary proceedings, fines, and attempted collection of them, were violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Strong Building Materials, supra.

The record is uncontroverted that neither at or subsequent to the imposition of the intraunion sanctions, prohibiting each of the nine MDC employees from holding office in Respondent for a 5-year period for having crossed the picket line and working for MDC at the time of the 1981 strike, by Respondent did its agents or officials explain to each one that, during this period of impaired membership rights, the union-security provision of the current MDC-Respondent collective-bargaining agreement would not be utilized to force him or her to continue paying dues, or its equivalent, under a threat of discharge. Equally, there is no dispute that Respondent threatened employees Fuentes and Rosales with enforcement of the union-security clause unless they paid to Respondent dues arrearages, or the equivalent, and reinstatement fees. The second amended consolidated complaint alleges Respondent's failures to inform and threats to be conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. In support, counsel for the General Counsel and the Charging Parties cite four Board decisions, in chronological order—Steelworkers Local 4186 (McGraw Edison), 181 NLRB 992 (1970); Communications Workers Local 9509 (Pacific Telephone), 193 NLRB 83 (1971); Communications Workers Local 1101 (N.Y. Telephone), 211 NLRB 114 (1970); Telephone Traffic Union (N.Y. Telephone), 241 NLRB 826 (1979). Analysis of Board rationale in these cases, at least where employees engaged in conduct privileged by Section 7 of the Act, discloses that, rather than the respondent labor organization's impairment of membership rights for such conduct, which may not be unlawful,[44] the Board considers as unlawful and "a continuing form of coercion," which restrains the exercise of Section 7 rights, the labor organization's continued insistence on payment of dues or the equivalent thereof during the period of the membership impairment. Such insistence, under penalty of discharge pursuant to a union-security clause, is not "disassociated," by the Board, from the membership impairment, is viewed as "hardly necessary to preserve the [labor organization's] existence as an institution, nor . . . as a noncoercive form of internal discipline" and is, therefore, found, by the Board, to be violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[45] This result holds whether the affected employee is a present member of the labor organization and whether he pays to the labor organization membership dues and fees or merely the equivalent thereof.

Analysis of the record convinces me of the merits of these particular allegations of the second amended consolidated complaint. In this regard, that I have previously concluded that the nine MDC employees who effectively resigned from membership in Respondent prior to the imposition of intraunion sanctions is an irrelevant factor[46] inasmuch as, having refused to honor said resig-

[42] Assuming arguendo proper notice was given to the MDC employees on March 21, given the circumstances, as described in fn. 39, supra, the notice would not have been sufficient.

[43] I make no finding with regard to whether employee Gehr had proper notice, nor do I reach the issue whether what Pettitt did on February 2, as testified by Karam, constituted adequate notice of art. L, sec. 3, to those employees who heard what he said.

[44] The General Counsel concedes that declaring the nine MDC employees ineligible to hold office is a form of intraunion discipline protected by the proviso to Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

[45] I note that, although not mentioned as justification for its decisions on this issue, the Board made certain to specify a linkage between the privileged intraunion sanction and the threatened imposition of the contractual union-security clause to collect dues arrearages that resulted from the internal penalty. Therefore, such can be said to constitute threatened external union enforcement of an intraunion sanction—"[T]his interference with the employer-employee relationship violates Section 8(b)(1)(A)." Teamsters Local 122 (Busch & Co.), 203 NLRB 1041, 1042 (1973).

[46] I reject the contention of Respondent that, having effectively resigned, each of the nine MDC employees continued to have a "financial core" obligation to Respondent pursuant to the union-security clause and that, therefore, Respondent's efforts to collect arrearages were not unlawful. I do so not because the argument is without considerable merit, but rather because such does not adequately explain or comport with Respondent's conduct herein of continually treating the nine MDC employees as members and because this argument strikes me as a belated justification for conduct that was motivated by other concerns.

nations, Respondent, at all material times, continued to deal with the employees as members for purposes of the office holding prohibitions and the collection of dues arrearages. Thus, I note that the intraunion sanctions concern the nine employees' membership rights; that, in threatening to invoke the contractual union-security clause against employees Fuentes and Rosales, Respondent noted that each had permitted his or her "membership to lapse"; and that, in advising employees Van de Sande and Vargas of their respective dues arrearages, Respondent threatened to cancel the membership of each. In any event, treating, as I have, this aspect of the instant proceedings within the parameters established by Respondent, I initially find that the rendering of each of the nine employees ineligible from holding union office for a 5-year period constituted a substantial impairment of his or her rights as a member (Schonfeld v. Penza, 477 F.2d 899 (2d Cir. 1973); McGraw Edison, supra at 992) and that the impairment directly related to the exercise of the nine employees of a Section 7 right. With regard to the alleged failure of Respondent to inform each of the nine MDC employees that, during the period of impaired membership, the existing contractual union-security provision would not be utilized to require him or her to continue paying membership dues or the equivalent thereof, the only mention in the above cases of such an obligation is in a footnote of the administrative law judge's decision in Telephone Traffic Union, supra. Therein, conceding the lawful nature of the membership impairment, a suspension from membership, the respondent union was, nevertheless, held, pursuant to its fiduciary duty of fair representation, to have an affirmative obligation to inform the employee/member "that during her suspension the union-security provision would not force her to continue paying dues or its equivalent under a threat of discharge." Id. at 829 fn. 4.[47] Respondent's defense, rather than to the rationale itself, concerns the fact that the employee in Telephone Traffic Union was suspended from membership in the union, while the only limitation placed on the employees herein is their respective ineligibility to hold union office for a 5-year period. Contrary to counsel, nowhere in the relevant footnote or elsewhere does the administrative law judge or the Board justify this holding on the basis of the severity of the membership impairment, nor do they give any indication that such constitutes a relevant consideration, at all. Moreover, I have already concluded that the prohibition herein is, indeed, a substantial one. Accordingly, I find Respondent's defense to be without merit and its failure to advise the nine MDC employees in the manner set forth above, either at the time of or subsequent to the imposition of the union office prohibition, to be a breach of its fiduciary duty of fair representation and violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. With regard to the threats to employees Fuentes and Rosales, Respondent's conduct is exactly that which the Board concluded was unlawful in Communications Workers Local 1101, supra, and Telephone Traffic Union, supra at 826, fn. 3. Thus, having lawfully disciplined each for engaging in conduct privileged by Section 7, Respondent insisted, under penalty of discharge, on their continued payment of dues—while continuing intraunion sanctions. Respondent's defense is, as described in footnote 45 supra, and is without merit. Therefore, I find the threats, by Respondent to Fuentes and Rosales, that the former would demand their discharges by MDC for failure to pay the equivalent of dues arrearages, while the membership of each in Respondent was substantially impaired, to be violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Id.

The record establishes that, along with its demands, on penalty of discharge, for dues arrearages, Respondent also demanded that Rosales and Fuentes each pay a reinstatement fee of $100. Such is alleged as a further violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act and, as a supporting theory, the General Counsel and the Charging Parties argue that neither employee had prior notice of such a requirement and that Respondent's failure to so inform Fuentes and Rosales before demanding payment of the reinstatement fee was in breach of its duty of fair representation. At the outset, Respondent did not controvert the testimony of either employee that, prior to receiving Respondent's demand for payment of the $100 fee, he or she had been entirely unaware of this requirement. As stated above, Respondent could not lawfully require the payment of dues under threat of discharge in these circumstances, and it logically follows that a demand for reinstatement fees, in the same circumstances, would likewise be unlawful. Moreover, it is standard Board law that, in order to comply with its fiduciary duty of fair representation, "a union which seeks to enforce a union security clause with respect to particular employees has the absolute duty to see that they are in fact informed of their financial membership obligations prior to demanding . . . discharge for nonpayment of regular dues and fees," including payment of a reinstatement fee as a condition of continued employment. Machinists District 9 (Borg-Warner Corp.), 237 NLRB 1278, 1278–1279 (1978). Herein, the first, and only, notice to both Fuentes and Rosales that they would have to pay reinstatement fees came in letters in which Respondent also warned that failure to pay the fee and dues arrearages would result in implementation of the contractual union-security clause. This type of notice has been held by the Board "to be insufficient notice to members of their potential obligation to pay the fee," and a threatened enforcement of a union-security clause of failure to pay in such circumstances is violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Marvel-Schebzer, supra at 1279; Busch & Co., supra at 1042. Accordingly, in the absence of adequate notice of the reinstatement fee, Respondent's threats were violative of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. MDC is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[47] Although the Board modified other aspects of the decision, it left standing fn. 4 and the reasoning therein. Presumably, therefore, the footnote was adopted by the Board, and such is a correct statement of the law.

3. By maintaining in force and effect, as its rule restricting members' rights to resign, article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution, Respondent coerced and restrained employees of MDC in the exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By bringing internal union disciplinary proceedings, imposing fines, and prosecuting lawsuits to collect the fines against former members Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, Gehr, and Barrios, all of whom had resigned from membership in Respondent, for their postresignation crossing of a sanctioned picket line and working during a strike, which began on March 25, 1981, at the MDC Monrovia, California facility, Respondent restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and, thereby, engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

5. By bringing internal union disciplinary proceedings, imposing fines, and prosecuting lawsuits to collect the fines against former members Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, and Barrios, all of whom had resigned their membership in Respondent without legally sufficient notice of any restrictions on their respective rights to resign their membership, for their postresignation crossing of a sanctioned picket line and working during a strike, which began March 25, 1981, at the MDC Monrovia, California facility, Respondent restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and, thereby, engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

6. By failing to advise employees Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, Gehr, and Barrios of his or her obligations under the union-security clause of the existing contract between MDC and Respondent at the time each was prohibited from holding any office in it for a 5-year period for having crossed a picket line and worked for MDC at its Monrovia, California facility during the strike that began March 25, 1981, Respondent failed to afford them fair representation and, thereby, restrained and coerced them in the exercise of their Section 7 rights, and engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

7. By threatening employees Fuentes and Rosales with discharge unless they paid dues arrearages while simultaneously continuing the intraunion disciplinary sanctions imposed as a result of their having engaged in activities privileged under Section 7 of the Act, Respondent restrained and coerced Fuentes and Rosales in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and, thereby, engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

8. By threatening employees Fuentes and Rosales with discharge under the union-security clause of the contract between MDC and Respondent without affording either adequate notice of their membership obligations, Respondent engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having concluded that Respondent engaged in certain acts and conduct violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. More specifically, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist from maintaining and enforcing, as its rule placing restrictions upon members' rights to resign from it, article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution, and that it rescind the fines levied against employees Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez,[48] Gehr, and Barrios.[49] Having concluded that, pursuant to its duty of fair representation, Respondent was obligated to inform each of the above MDC employees, at the time of the imposition of intraunion sanctions, that the existing contractual union-security clause would not force him or her, under penalty of discharge, to continue paying dues or its equivalent and that Respondent violated its fiduciary duty by not doing so, I shall recommend, in view of this significant infirmity, that the latter be required to cease demanding, under penalty of discharge pursuant to the existing union-security clause of its contract with MDC, the payment of membership dues or the equivalent from these nine MDC employees until the expiration of the prohibition against each from holding office in Respondent and to reimburse Fuentes, Van de Sande, Rosales, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, Gehr, and Barrios, respectively, for all dues paid, until the cessation, by Fuentes and Rosales since April 20, 1982; by Van de Sande since May 16, 1982; and by Vargas, Miller, Melendez, Morales, Gehr, and Barrios since October 20, 1982,[50] with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[51] Further, in view of the fact that Respondent must reimburse dues payments to employees Fuentes and Rosales and the unlawful demand for such, under penalty of discharge, during the pendency of the intraunion sanction described above, was accompanied by the unlawful demand for payment by each of a reinstatement fee, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to refund the fees to [48] Respondent's fine against Melendez stands—to the extent it involves preresignation work for MDC during the strike.

[49] Contrary to counsel for the Charging Parties, I shall not recommend that Respondent be ordered to reimburse Fuentes, Rosales, Barrios, Vargas, and Morales for their legal expenses in connection with the lawsuit to collect the fines. In this regard, while the effect of the lawsuit was to coerce and restrain employees in the exercise of Section 7 rights, such does not alone compel the extraordinary remedy requested by counsel. Commercial Workers District 227 (Kroger Co.), 247 NLRB 195 (1980). Further, there is no evidence that the lawsuit was filed because Fuentes had previously filed a charge with the Board; the fact that the filing occurred subsequent to a signed stipulation of facts, a portion of which stated that Respondent had not attempted to collect the fines, evidences poor timing rather than malicious intent. Moreover, while the size of the awards would have been large, they would have corresponded exactly to what the employees knew to be the amount of the fines, with no unforeseen expenses involved. Finally, despite my finding that the filing of the lawsuit was unlawful, I am unable to conclude that such was in bad faith inasmuch as the restriction on resignation herein involved was then, and is now, the subject of extensive litigation, the outcome of which is not free from doubt.

[50] In accord with the suggestion of the General Counsel, noting the mandates of Sec. 10(b) of the Act, and in view of the vague nature of the remedy in Telephone Traffic Union, supra, I shall require dues reimbursements for the period beginning 6 months preceding the filing of the applicable unfair labor practice charges.

each, with interest, as described above.[52] In addition, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to remove from its files any references to the internal union proceedings, the fines, and the lawsuits to collect the fines against these nine MDC employees.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[53]

ORDER

The Respondent, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, District Lodge 94, Local Lodge 575, Monrovia, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining or giving effect to, as its rule for restricting the resignation rights of its members, article L, section 3, lines 24 through 40, of the IAM constitution.

(b) Restraining or coercing employees, who have duly resigned from and are no longer members of Respondent, in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act by bringing internal union proceedings, imposing fines, and filing lawsuits to collect the fines against them because of their postresignation conduct in crossing a picket line and working at MDC during the strike that began in March 1981.

(c) Threatening employees that they will be discharged unless they pay membership dues, or the equivalent thereof, where such is otherwise lawfully required as a condition of employment, during a period in which they have been prohibited from holding office in Respondent for exercising their right under Section 7 of the Act to refrain from continuing to support a strike against their employer.

(d) Failing to inform members who are prohibited from holding office in Respondent of their obligations under the contractual union-security clause.

(e) Continuing to demand from employees of MDC the payment of membership dues, or the equivalent thereof, where such is otherwise lawfully required as a condition of employment, during a period in which they have been prohibited from holding office in Respondent for exercising their Section 7 right of refraining from continuing to support a strike against their employer.

(f) Threatening employees of MDC that it will demand their discharge if they do not pay a membership reinstatement fee without having initially notified the employees of their union duties giving rise to their obligation to pay such fee as a condition of employment.

(g) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the unlawful fines levied on its former members, Fuentes, Rosales, Van de Sande, Miller, Vargas, Morales, Melendez, Gehr, and Barrios, for their respective postresignation conduct of having worked for MDC during the period of the strike that began March 25, 1981.

(b) Remove from its records and files any references to the internal proceeding, respective fines and lawsuit against the above-named employees for their respective postresignation conduct of having worked for MDC during the period of the strike that began on March 25, 1981, and notify the employees in writing of the actions taken in this regard.

(c) Refund to the above-named employees, in the manner set forth in the remedy section above, any membership dues and fees, including reinstatement fees, or the equivalent thereof, with interest, collected after our failure to advise them, after the imposition against each of them of a prohibition from holding office in Respondent for a 5-year period, of their respective obligations under the contractual union-security clause.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to agents of the Board, for examining and copying, if necessary, all records and files that are relevant to a determination of the amounts to be refunded herein.

(e) Post at its meeting hall, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[54] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[52] I have ordered reimbursement of the reinstatement fees notwithstanding the recent Board decisions in Teamsters Local 595 (Certified Grocers), 257 NLRB 492 (1981), and Teamsters Local 572 (Ralphs Grocery), 247 NLRB 934 (1980), both involving a lack of proper notice, enforcement of a union-security clause, and an alleged violation of Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act, inasmuch as Respondent was not entitled to even demand the payment of a reinstatement fee herein had proper notice been given. This must be so, for it would be incongruous, indeed, to hold that Respondent was not entitled to demand the dues arrearages under penalty of discharge, but was entitled to demand a reinstatement fee in the same circumstances and for having had the employees' memberships canceled for nonpayment of dues.

[53] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

6 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 27 May 1986 Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed limited exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Ruth Morton, the president of the Union.[2] We also agree that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) when it solicited employee Addie Dorsey to check with the employees to see if they were going to walk out, and report back to the Respondent.[3]

The General Counsel excepts to the judge's failure to find in addition that about 28 or 29 December 1985 the Respondent again unlawfully solicited Dorsey to conduct surveillance on the union activities of other employees, and report those activities to the Respondent. The Respondent contends that the General Counsel's allegation that there was a second incident of unlawful solicitation of surveillance goes far beyond the narrow allegations of the charge in this case. We find merit in the General Counsel's exception, and we agree with the judge that the surveillance allegation does not exceed the scope of the charge.

In finding that the Respondent unlawfully coerced employee Dorsey into interfering with the employees' protected union activities, the judge credited Dorsey's testimony that, on 27 December 1985, Acting General Manager Clayton asked Dorsey to check with the maids to see if they were going to walk out so he could get somebody else in there to work, and that Dorsey did report back that the maids were not going to walk out. However, Dorsey also testified that a day or two later Clayton again asked her if she would talk to the ladies and find out what was going on with the Union. According to Dorsey, a couple of days after that, she reported to Clayton that the maids were not talking to her and that if they were talking when she approached, they would stop talking.

We find, based on this testimony of Dorsey, who was generally credited by the judge, that by this second incident the Respondent again solicited its employee to report on the union activities of her fellow employees, and thus again interfered with their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1).[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Sussex Properties, Inc., Birmingham, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting its employees to report on union activities of other employees and to engage in the surveillance of the union activities of other employees."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Member Babson agrees with the judge's finding that the Respondent knew of Morton's position. In so doing, however, he does not rely on the judge's statement that "[I]t is incredible that any employer would hear of a possible strike without fully investigating the status of the employee that uttered the threat."

[3] See, e.g., Holding Co., 231 NLRB 383, 388 (1977). In adopting the judge's conclusion, we find it unnecessary to pass on his reliance on Eagle Headers, 273 NLRB 1486 (1985). Member Babson additionally notes that no exception was filed to the judge's finding that Dorsey is not a supervisor.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT solicit our employees to report on activities of other employees or to engage in surveillance of the activities of other employees on behalf of Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees Local Union 886, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT discharge our employees because they engage in union activities or other concerted activities protected under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Ruth Morton immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from her discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify her that we have removed from our files any reference to her discharge and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Birmingham, Alabama, on 21 March 1986. The charge was filed on 30 December 1985, and amended on 13 February 1986. The complaint, which issued on 7 March 1986, alleges that Respondent[1] violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by discharging employee Ruth Morton, and Section 8(a)(1) by soliciting its employees to engage in surveillance of its employees' union activities.

On consideration of the entire record and briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following[2]

FINDINGS OF FACT

This case involves an admitted successor employer and the discharge of the Local Union's president because she made a statement to a nonunit employee about a strike.

Respondent operates a hotel in Birmingham, Alabama, which has changed owners on several occasions during the past few years. From 1980 until 27 December 1985, the hotel was owned by the Birmingham Hilton. In 1976, the hotel was called the Kahler Plaza, and from 1978 until 1980 it was called the Plaza Hotel South. Respondent purchased the hotel effective 12:01 a.m., 27 December 1985.

The unit employees involved in the instant matter have been represented by Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees Local Union 886, AFL–CIO continuously since 1977.

Alleged discriminatee Ruth Morton served as vice president beginning in 1979. She also served as shop steward in the housekeeping department.

From 1982 on, Ruth Morton was Local 886's president.

On 27 December 1985 Respondent interviewed numerous applicants for employment, including employees of the predecessor employer. One of those applicants was Ruth Morton. Morton had worked continuously at the hotel under its various owners since August 1976. According to Morton's testimony, which I credit,[3] she was interviewed by Acting General Manager Stan Clayton. Before beginning the interview, Morton noticed Clayton talking with Assistant Housekeeper Addie Dorsey.[4] Clayton left Dorsey, walked to Morton, and said, "Oh, you're Ruth." Morton said she was wearing an identification button and a union button during the interview. However, according to Clayton, he did not notice Morton's name tag.

On the night of 27 December, around 8:30 p.m., Morton was called by Addie Dorsey and told to report to work at the hotel the next morning.

Morton reported to work on 28 December. She worked approximately 6 hours when she was paged by Addie Dorsey. Dorsey directed Morton to report to the front office where she was discharged by Stan Clayton.

[1] The charge and the complaint show Respondent as Columbia Sussex Corporation, Inc. However, the parties stipulated during the hearing that the correct name of Respondent is Sussex Properties, Inc.

[2] Neither jurisdiction nor the status of the Charging Party is at issue. Respondent admitted that it is an Alabama corporation with a Birmingham, Alabama location, where it is engaged in the business of providing hotel and restaurant services to the public and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Respondent also admitted that the Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[3] Respondent's acting general manager Stan Clayton demonstrated by his testimony that he did not recall Morton's interview in detail.

[4] Dorsey had been employed at the hotel since it was the Kahler Plaza. When Respondent took over the hotel on 27 December, Dorsey was a member of the staff and was included in the meeting of the department heads on that day.

Present at the discharge interview were Clayton, Morton, Addie Dorsey, and Karen Mineo. Mineo testified that she works "for the home office . . . more or less in quality control."

Stan Clayton asked Karen Mineo to sit in the interview, but not to say anything.

According to Morton, Stan Clayton asked her about her problems and told her "I've got an employee that would tell me you said you all was going to strike." Morton admitted that she denied telling any employee that she was going to strike. Clayton subsequently called in employees Norma Gaddy and Rhonda Hatcher who said that Morton had told them that "they was going to strike on Saturday."

Morton was discharged. Her payroll charge notice states:

> Ruth Morton was heard by Norma and Rhonda that she was going on strike Saturday.

Addie Dorsey testified that she was present at a staff meeting on 27 December. During the meeting, Rhonda Hatcher told Stan Clayton that "he should know they had plans to strike that Saturday." Hatcher said to Clayton that "it was told to her in confidential [sic] by Ruth Morton."[5]

Clayton told Dorsey "to check with the ladies to see if they were going to walk out so he could get somebody else in there to work." On the day of Morton's discharge, Dorsey reported to Clayton that the ladies "weren't going to walk out because they needed to work."[6]

Conclusion

The evidence does not dispute that on 27 December employees, including Ruth Morton, received their final paychecks from the predecessor employer. Ruth Morton went to the office to inquire why insurance premiums were deducted from both her wage and vacation checks. At the office Morton spoke with Executive Secretary Rhonda Hatcher. According to Morton, Hatcher had been Morton's "inside source" and they maintained a close relationship.

After discussing Morton's insurance deduction problems, Hatcher asked Morton "what is [International Union Agent] Marshall Race gonna do about this mess, Ruth?" Morton responded, "We gonna strike."

Morton then noticed that an employee later identified as Norma Gaddy was standing behind her. Hatcher assured Morton that Gaddy would not say anything.[7]

The record illustrates that a strike did not occur as forecast by Morton. Nevertheless, the question of whether Morton's comment was correct is not of significant importance in the instant analysis. The issue at this point is whether Morton's action was protected by the National Labor Relations Act.

At the time of Morton's comment, no collective-bargaining agreement was in effect.[8]

Respondent does not quarrel with the above facts. However, Respondent argues that it was unaware on 27 and 28 December that Ruth Morton was the Local Union's president, and for that reason it did not realize if Morton was engaged in union activities. Additionally, Respondent argues that it understood Morton was threatening that she alone would strike, and her action was not concerted or protected.

Respondent's argument must be rooted in jurisprudence that has established that a so-called pretextual or mixed motive allegation must fail in those situations where the General Counsel is unable to prove that the employer knew of the alleged dischargee's union or protected activities. See, e.g., Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982). Here, Respondent contends that I should credit evidence that it had no knowledge that Morton was engaged in protected activities when she talked with Rhonda Hatcher.

In that regard, the record evidence shows that Addie Dorsey was present when Rhonda Hatcher told Acting General Manager Stan Clayton of Morton's comment. As indicated above, I credit Dorsey's testimony. Dorsey testified:

> A. Rhonda Hatcher. She told Mr. Clayton she thought he should know they had plans to strike that Saturday.
> Q. Did she say anything else?
> A. She said it was told to her in confidential, you know, by Ruth.
> Q. Did she say Ruth who?
> A. Ruth Morton.
> Q. Was anything else said at that time?
> A. Well, he asked me to check with the ladies to see if they were going to walk out so he could get somebody else in there to work.
> Q. What ladies are those?
> A. The maids.
> Q. And did you do that?
> A. Yes, I did.

[5] Clayton's testimony about what he was told by Hatcher is similar to the above testimony of Dorsey. However, Clayton testified that Hatcher talked with him after the staff meeting outside the hearing of Dorsey. I credit Dorsey who showed good demeanor. Dorsey's testimony reveals personal knowledge she could not have possessed if Clayton's version of the incident is correct. Neither Rhonda Hatcher nor Norma Gaddy testified.

[6] Clayton denied that he asked anyone to "spy on the Union." When asked if he asked anyone to let him know if they heard anything about a strike, Clayton testified:

> Not really. I was concerned that we were going to be busy with the All-American Bowl and I was concerned if anyone wasn't going to show up because of the change in ownership.

Again I credit Dorsey over Clayton. Clayton's answer demonstrated that he was concerned about a strike after hearing that a strike was predicted. His testimony that he did not inquire about a strike appears improbable and somewhat self-contradictory. Moreover, I was more impressed with Dorsey's demeanor.

[7] Neither Hatcher nor Gaddy testified. Apparently, neither is now employed by Respondent. I credit Morton's testimony of the incident with Hatcher and Gaddy. Her testimony is unrebutted and it is supported by record evidence about matters that flowed from that incident.

[8] The Union asked Respondent to assume the contract of the predecessor, but Respondent refused.

Q. Did you have a further conversation with Mr. Clayton after you had checked with the ladies?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. When was that?

A. It was the same day I told him they weren't going to walk out because they needed to work.

It is obvious from the above that Clayton was told that Ruth Morton had said that the employees planned to strike. Additionally, Clayton's subsequent action in asking Dorsey to check out the employees' plans supports my conclusion that he was originally told the employees planned to strike.

Moreover, Respondent retained department heads, including Addie Dorsey, from the predecessor employer. All of those people knew that Ruth Morton was, and had been since 1982, president of the Local.

I am convinced that Respondent knew of Ruth Morton's position as Local 886's president before her discharge. In the first place, as shown above, Respondent retained several department head supervisors from the predecessor employer. Therefore, Respondent, through its supervisors and agents, knew of Morton's union position. Moreover, the actual source of Respondent's information that Morton was threatening to strike, Rhonda Hatcher, was fully aware of Ruth Morton's position as president of the Local. Finally, it is incredible that any employer would hear of a possible strike without fully investigating the status of the employee that uttered the threat. See Marathon LeTourneau Co. v. NLRB, 699 F.2d 248 (5th Cir. 1983); United Supermarkets, 261 NLRB 1291, 1301 (1982).

Respondent also argues that Morton's comment was inconsistent with the Union's request that Respondent should assume its collective-bargaining agreement with the predecessor employer in that the predecessor employer agreement contained a no-strike provision. I find no merit in that argument. The record is not in dispute that Respondent rejected the Union's efforts to extend to Respondent the terms of its predecessor agreement. Cf. Energy Coal Partnership, 269 NLRB 770 (1984), in which the union made a specific recommendation to the alleged discriminatees that they not engage in a strike.

The issue here is much more fundamental than Respondent's arguments would imply.

Here, the facts and issues are simple. An employee, Rhonda Hatcher, asked the Local Union's president what the Union planned regarding changed working conditions. There can be no real dispute regarding the import of Hatcher's question. That Hatcher's question referenced union action was established by Hatcher mentioning International Union Representative Marshall Race.

The instant matter is similar in many ways to the landmark case of NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21, (1964). See also Rubin Bros. Footwear, 99 NLRB 610 (1952); K & K Transportation Corp., 262 NLRB 1481 (1982). In Burnup & Sims, the employer was advised by an employee that while soliciting him for membership in the union, two employees had said that "the union will use dynamite to get in if the union did not acquire the authorization." 379 U.S. at 21. There, as here, the employer argued that its knowledge should be determinative. In Burnup & Sims, the employer argued that its good-faith belief that the two employees engaged in misconduct should show that it did not engage in illegal activity. Here, Respondent argues that it was unaware that Morton was engaged in protected activity. The Supreme Court in Burnup & Sims held that where employees are engaged in union activities, an employer's good-faith belief is immaterial unless the record shows that the employees actually engaged in misconduct.

Here, the record shows that Rhonda Hatcher questioned Ruth Morton about what the Union, through its International representative, planned. Ruth Morton responded in kind (i.e., she told Hatcher the Union planned to strike). Hatcher and Gaddy understood that Morton was talking about union action. In fact, unrebutted testimony shows that Gaddy tried to persuade Morton to avoid calling a strike. Morton's discussion of union activities constitutes protected activities[9] as much as the employees' solicitation efforts constituted protected activities in Burnup & Sims. Therefore, Respondent's action against Morton is illegal unless it is shown that Morton engaged in misconduct.

The record shows that Morton did nothing more than predict a strike. She made no threat to Respondent. In fact, the evidence shows that Morton did not intend to convey her comments to Respondent. There was no instant collective-bargaining agreement and, of course, there was no contractual prohibition to striking. Therefore, neither a strike nor a prediction of a strike constitutes misconduct in this instance. Cf. Champion Parts, 260 NLRB 731 (1982); John Morrell & Co., 270 NLRB 1 (1984); General Electric Co., 253 NLRB 1189 (1981).

I find that Morton was engaged in union activities when she discussed the Union's plans with employee Rhonda Hatcher on 27 December 1985. Those activities are protected by the National Labor Relations Act. Respondent did not have a good-faith belief that Morton's activities were unprotected. Nor did Respondent have a good-faith belief that Morton engaged in misconduct. In fact, Ruth Morton did not engage in misconduct. I find that Respondent's discharge of Morton violates the terms of the Act.

The General Counsel also alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by asking Addie Dorsey to report on its employees' planned union activities.

The only record evidence dealing with Dorsey's employee status illustrates that she was not a supervisor.

The credited evidence proves that Stan Clayton asked Dorsey "to check with the ladies to see if they were going to walk out so he could get somebody else in there to work."

The Act protects employees from being required to report on union activities.

I agree with Respondent's argument that it had a legitimate business interest in inquiring whether the housekeeping employees would strike. However, Respondent [9] Since the credited evidence shows that Respondent was told that Morton had said that the employees were going to strike, I find that she was forecasting concerted activity that is protected regardless of Respondent's knowledge about her position as president of the Local.

had other sources to determine whether a strike was planned. For example, Respondent could have checked with International Representative Marshall Race. By requiring an employee to investigate and report, Respondent coerced that employee into interfering with the employees' protected union activities. The Board has consistently found similar activities to be violative of Section 8(a)(1). Eagle Headers, 273 NLRB 1486, 1490 (1985).[10]

ADDITIONAL CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By soliciting its employee to report on the union activities of other employees, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By discharging employee Ruth Morton on 28 December 1985, Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent has illegally discharged its employee Ruth Morton in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall order Respondent to offer Morton immediate and full reinstatement to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make Morton whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against her. Backpay and interest shall be computed in the manner described in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[11]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondent, Sussex Properties, Inc., Birmingham, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting its employees to report on union activities of other employees.

(b) Discharging and refusing to reinstate employees because of their protected union activities.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Ruth Morton to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, and make Morton whole for any losses she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against her in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from Ruth Morton's personnel files any reference to its discharge of her and notify Morton in writing that this has been done and that evidence of its unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against Morton.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Birmingham, Alabama facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[10] Respondent argues that the General Counsel's 8(a)(1) allegation should be dismissed as outside the scope of the charge and additionally that it was misled by the General Counsel regarding the nature of the evidence in support of that allegation. That contention by Respondent must be rejected. If Respondent was prevented from properly preparing a defense because of a misunderstanding as to the nature of the allegation, its proper recourse would have been to ask for sufficient time to prepare after the conclusion of the General Counsel's evidence. Respondent failed to make that request.

[11] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Hahn Motors, Inc., and Hahn Truck Sales & Service Corp. and United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC. Case 4-CA-13275

6 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 30 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

In adopting the judge's findings of violations and his finding that the Respondents, Hahn Motors, Inc. (HMI or Hahn Motors) and Hahn Truck Sales & Service Corp. (HTS or Hahn Sales), are a single employer, we find it unnecessary to reach the question whether an alter ego relationship exists. In making the single employer finding we rely, as did the judge, on Robert Stavin's role as chief executive officer in each company; his exercise of virtually unrestricted operational, financial, administrative, and labor relations control over both companies; the substantially similar ownership of both companies, i.e., Robert Stavin and his wife Marion owning Hahn Sales outright as well as 35 percent of Hahn Motors, with practically the entire remainder inuring to the beneficial interest of Marion Stavin, her mother, and her sister;[1] and the interrelation of the two companies' operations, as evidenced by the functional integration of their businesses, the extensive financial and operational support provided Hahn Sales by Hahn Motors, the centralized telephone and accounting systems, and the deliberate extension of Hahn Motors' goodwill to Hahn Sales by virtue of Stavin's letters of introduction to customers, the similarity of their corporate names, and the use of the same company stationery and corporate logos. We find that these factors establish that Hahn Motors and Hahn Sales do not maintain an arm's-length relationship such as is found among unintegrated companies. See NLRB v. Al Bryant, Inc., 711 F.2d 543 (3d Cir. 1983), enfg. 260 NLRB 128 (1982). Accordingly, as noted, we find that HMI and HTS constitute a single employer.

Further, we find that the relocation of the service department employees to a new facility did not destroy the community of interests that had existed within the plantwide Hahn Motors unit to justify depriving these employees of continued representation. Indeed, the only significant difference in working conditions that the relocated employees experienced was the move to a different facility 7 miles away. At the time Hahn Sales commenced operations, all its employees were former Hahn Motors service department unit employees. Those employees shared single unit status with the other Hahn Motors employees and were represented by the Union until Stavin formed Hahn Sales. As Hahn Sales employees, they continued to work the same hours under the same clock numbers they had used at Hahn Motors and to perform substantially the same work they had performed as service department employees, using much of the same equipment and skills, and working under the same immediate supervisor, Harry Close.[2] The work performed at the two facilities continues to be highly integrated, with Hahn Motors manufacturing the parts used by Hahn Sales and Hahn Sales performing predelivery and warranty work on Hahn Motors-produced trucks. Employees at both locations are covered by a single life and medical insurance policy and the employees of Hahn Sales enjoy the same benefits as the Hahn Motors employees.

We find that these factors demonstrate that the Hahn Sales employees continue to share a community of interests with the existing Hahn Motors unit and that the Respondent's efforts to fragment that unit by unilaterally imposing a geographic separation of 7 miles is inadequate to defeat the service employees' right to continued union representation. Accordingly, we find that the Respondents unlawfully failed to continue to recognize the Union as the bargaining representative of the unit employees

[2] Thus, day-to-day supervision has remained unchanged. At Hahn Motors these employees had been under the direct supervision of Close, who was the "service department" manager there. At Hahn Sales they continued under his direct supervision as its "general manager." Furthermore, the former service department employees of Hahn Motors who accepted jobs with Hahn Sales were not required to file new employment applications.

Despite the fact that the service employees are now performing their duties at Hahn Sales rather than Hahn Motors, the differences between their duties and those performed by the production and maintenance employees have remained unchanged. It is also important to bear in mind that the question here is not whether the service employees might also constitute a separate appropriate unit. It is whether the overall unit remained an appropriate unit when the Respondent moved the employees 7 miles down the road.

working at the Hahn Sales location and to apply the contract terms to them.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondents, Hahn Motors, Inc., Hamburg, Pennsylvania, and Hahn Truck Sales & Service Corp., Shartlesville, Pennsylvania, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[3] Because we have adopted the judge's finding that the Respondent's relocation of a part of the established unit does not relieve it of its obligation to recognize and apply the contract to the new site, we place no reliance on the judge's separate analysis under the now-overruled Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982). See Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601 (1984), affd. sub nom. Auto Workers v. NLRB, 765 F.2d 175 (D.C. Cir. 1985).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL A. HARMATZ, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was heard by me in Reading, Pennsylvania, on April 14, 1983, on an initial unfair labor practice charge filed on October 15, 1982, and a complaint issued on November 29, 1982, alleging that Hahn Motors, Inc. and Hahn Truck Sales & Service Corp. (the Respondent) constitute an alter ego and single employer within the meaning of the Act, and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by dealing directly with certain employees in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit, and further violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by relocating these employees and refusing to apply the applicable collective-bargaining agreement at the new worksite. In its timely filed answer the Respondent denied that any unfair labor practices were committed. After close of the hearing, briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Respondent.

On the entire record in this proceeding,[1] including my opportunity directly to observe the witnesses while testifying and their demeanor,[2] and on consideration of the posthearing briefs, it is found as follows

[1] Certain errors in the transcript are noted and corrected.

[2] The fact that my credibility rulings are accompanied by objective rationale does not discount, but merely serves to reinforce, impressions gained from my first-hand observation of the witnesses. Furthermore, although it should go without saying, testimony, whether or not contradicted, is rejected by implication to the extent that it includes matters that might not be reconciled with expressly credited evidence. Cf. Herbert F. Darling, Inc., 267 NLRB 476 (1983).

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. JURISDICTION AND THE SINGLE EMPLOYER ISSUE

A. Preliminary Statement

Hahn Motors, Inc. (HMI) is, and has been at all times material, a Pennsylvania corporation engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of firefighting apparatus from its facility located in Hamburg, Pennsylvania. Prior to May 1, 1982,[3] the operations of HMI included a service department. During that same period, United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC represented a production and maintenance unit, numbering some 100 employees, including 7 who were assigned to the service department. These employees at that time were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement not scheduled to expire until April 30, 1984.

On May 1, 1982, a new corporation, Hahn Truck Sales & Service Corp. (HTS) commenced operations in Shartlesville, Pennsylvania, only 6–8 miles distant from Hamburg. This new firm, as of the date of the hearing and since the inception of its operations, has been engaged almost exclusively in "servicing" firefighting equipment.

Contemporaneous with the opening of HTS' Shartlesville facility, HMI terminated its service operations. Prior thereto, however, all seven of the latter's service employees were offered employment with HTS; six accepted. HTS refused to recognize the Union or honor HMI's subsisting collective-bargaining agreement as binding with respect to these Shartlesville employees.

The resulting partial curtailment of the established bargaining relationship is challenged by the instant complaint on the premise that HMI and HTS constitute an alter ego or single employer and, hence, all that was involved was a single entity's relocation of unit work to a nearby, newly established facility. See, e.g., Westwood Import Co., 251 NLRB 1213 (1980), enfd. 681 F.2d 664 (9th Cir. 1982). It also is argued that the removal of the service operation was designed to evade bargaining and that the Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. See, e.g., Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co., 235 NLRB 720 (1978); Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982); Oak Cliff-Golman Bakery Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973). By way of remedy, it is urged that the Respondent be directed to recognize the Union at the Shartlesville site, and to apply the existing collective-bargaining agreement to the employees at that location, while making them whole for lost benefits. Also sought is compensation for the Union with respect to dues not remitted on behalf of employees who had executed valid checkoff authorizations.

On behalf of the defense it is asserted that the two firms possessed qualities of independence sufficient to negate alter ego or single employer status, and, hence, HMI simply terminated the service end of its business, action that is not subject to any obligation to bargain under either the Supreme Court's decision in First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981), or the management-prerogative clause of the subsisting agreement.

The "single employer-alter ego" issue is plainly determinative here. Thus, neither the pleadings, controlling precedent, the manner in which this proceeding was litigated, nor the posthearing briefs suggest that this complaint might be salvaged if HMI and HTS are deemed legally independent persons in the statutory sense. Indeed, the jurisdictional allegations appear to concede the point. For the commerce facts are alleged, and admitted, under conditions presupposing that HTS and HMI are a single entity, and there is no basis for ascertaining whether either firm independently met the Board's jurisdictional standards. Clearly, dismissal of the complaint on that ground alone would be impelled should the General Counsel fail to establish that HTS and HMI constitute a single entity.[4]

At the same time, the Respondent raises a number of defenses that would lack vitality and require no consideration if single employer status is substantiated. Within this category is the Respondent's reliance on First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, supra, and other cases reconciling management's right to terminate a segment of its business. For, if HMI and HTS are deemed to be a single entity, this case would involve a transfer within a single enterprise, rather than a discontinuance, of the service operation. Hence, First National Maintenance would be plainly inapposite. Falling within that same category would be the Respondent's further contention that, by virtue of article 6 of the contract with HMI, the Union waived its interest in collective bargaining with respect to the events in issue here. In this regard, section I thereof, in material part, merely recites as follows:

> The management of the plant and the direction of the working force including . . . the right to relieve employees from duty because of lack of work or for other legitimate reasons . . . the right to determine the extent to which the plant shall be operated, the products to be manufactured, the method of manufacturing . . . and to extend, limit or curtail its operation, is vested exclusively in the Company.

Here again, if HTS and HMI are to be regarded as a single entity, the matter under scrutiny would be limited to a "relocation" or "transfer" of unit work, action which transcends the broad, general language of the above-cited management-prerogative clause. Under longstanding Board policy, a waiver on the part of a labor organization under such a generalized provision is not to be "lightly inferred." Rather, it must be manifested by "clear and unmistakable" evidence. See, e.g., Park-Ohio Industries, 257 NLRB 413–414 (1981).

Thus, for the above reasons, the waiver defense as well as that arising under the Supreme Court decision in First National Maintenance, supra, will prove either superfluous or nonmeritorious depending on final resolution of the single employer issue, and, hence, there will be no further discussion of either.

B. Conclusions on the Single Employer Issue

The principles pertaining to analysis of single employer issues were summarized recently by the Third Circuit Court of Appeals as follows:[5]

> Four criteria have been used by the Board in determining whether separate entities constitute a single employer: interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations, and common ownership. Radio & Television Broadcast Technicians Local Union 1264 v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256 . . . . The Board finds no one factor controlling, although it has stressed the first three factors, particularly centralized control of labor relations, which tend to show "operational integration.". . . Ultimately, single employer status depends on all the circumstances of the case and is characterized by absence of an "arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies."

On this record, as shall be seen, little question arises in the area of centralized control or operational interdependence. As for ownership and control, as of May 1, 1982, the members of the board of directors of HMI were: Robert Stavin; Marion Stavin (Robert Stavin's wife); Thomas F. Confer, Esq. (president of Hamburg Savings & Trust); Lulu Ann Sheetz (Marion Stavin's sister); and Mrs. R. J. Steinhauer (Marion Stavin's mother).

Of the 1100 shares of outstanding HMI stock, Robert Stavin and his wife, Marion, own 384 outright, with the latter also possessing beneficial interest in one-half of a trust, whose corpus included 510 shares. Of the remaining outstanding shares, only 4 are owned by individuals who are not related to the Stavins, and the next largest singly owned block is the 146 held outright by Robert Stavin's mother-in-law, R. J. Steinhauer.

The board of directors of HTS consisted solely of Robert and Marion Stavin, who jointly owned 100 percent of that firms outstanding stock. Robert Stavin and Larry Hummer were president and secretary-treasurer, respectively, of both firms, with Stavin serving as president and Larry Hummer secretary-treasurer.[6]

[4] The admission of jurisdiction in the Respondent's answer, considering the manner in which the pleadings are framed, only admits that both firms collectively are engaged in commerce. It is an admission conditioned on the ability of the General Counsel to substantiate the single employer allegation.

[6] Robert Stavin testified that with respect to HMI he and Hummer were the only corporate officers. This testimony was afforded while Stavin had access to the articles of incorporation and bylaws of HMI. Nonetheless, the parties entered a stipulation to the effect that Frank Clements was HMI's vice-president of manufacturing, a fact confirmed by Clements' own testimony. Beyond this, the only other difference between

As would seem to be characteristic of corporations having strong familial ties, emergence of HTS did not create differences in ultimate control, nor was the business objective of the overall venture altered materially. Thus, prior to the establishment of HTS, HMI was engaged in the manufacture of fire trucks on a fully integrated basis, including production, service, sales, and distribution. With the establishment of HTS, the service activity was splintered off from HMI and transferred to HTS. However, day-to-day supervision of those engaged in service operations remained unchanged. Harry Close was transferred from his former job as "service department" manager to become "general manager" of HTS. Six service department employees of HMI, formerly supervised by Close, were offered, accepted, and granted employment, without need for the filing of new employment applications. They continued under the direct, immediate supervision of Close.

As suggested, the move did not involve any real, substantive change in authority at the highest level. As president of both firms, Stavin's control continued. His domination of the affairs of HMI and HTS is evident from the fact that it was his decision to acquire the real property, to establish a separate corporation, to spin off the service function previously provided through HMI to the new corporation, and to retain Harry Close as general manager of this latter operation.

Stavin also had the final say in the area of labor relations.[7] He signed the collective-bargaining agreement covering the production and maintenance unit. Admittedly, it was his decision to offer the HMI service department employees jobs with HTS, and it was he who conceived the terms and conditions under which they would work, including the fact that neither the collective-bargaining agreement nor the Union's status as exclusive employee representative would be honored at HTS.

Common control is also manifested by the degree to which HMI and HTS are integrated in both administrative and operational areas. Thus, the service department of HMI historically was engaged in three basic functions. The first entailed inspection and predelivery repair work on newly manufactured fire trucks. The second involved servicing Hahn vehicles still under warranty. The third consisted of service and repair operations with respect to out-of-warranty fire trucks manufactured by HMI. Only on occasion would the HMI service department work on alien vehicles, i.e., fire trucks manufactured by a competitor.[8] Stavin testified that through HTS it was his intent to establish a complete truck service business, incorporating the operations formerly provided through HMI, but at a level expanded to include alien fire trucks and commercial tractor-trailer rigs. The latter would be solicited from an interstate highway and other routes proximate to the Shartlesville site.[9] However, Stavin admitted that, as of the date of the hearing, HTS had been engaged exclusively in the servicing of "fire equipment and apparatus."

Thus, HTS as established will carry on many services identical to those historically performed by HMI. Indeed, insofar as HMI clientele or potential customers are involved, HTS will continue to represent a vital link between HMI and the reputation in the market place for serviceability of HMI products. For example, final inspection of vehicles manufactured by HMI now is performed by HTS. In the course of those functions, service personnel of HTS, as was true at HMI, correct minor discrepancies themselves. As always, in the event that HTS discovers a major problem with the vehicle, it is returned to the HMI manufacturing department for correction. Thus, HTS continues to perform work which is a vital link in the overall manufacturing, inspection, and delivery activity of HMI. This, together with the postdelivery service provided by HTS on HMI warranties, would naturally tend to influence the "good will" of HMI and, indeed, involves work, the quality of which will likely impact on future HMI sales. At present, of the 340 customers serviced by HTS, 305 were customers of HMI and might well continue to be, at least in connection with the purchase of new fire trucks.

The relationship between HTS' performance and the success of HMI's marketing program is evidenced by several factors suggesting an intent to pass off HMI and HTS, in the eyes of the public, as related firms. This was reflected in the name given Hahn Truck Sales & Service (HTS), which, though incorporating the name "Hahn" and the term "Sales," was utilized to label a company not structured to perform truck sales. The need for common identification was carried further by the fact that HTS and HMI utilized the same basic trademark and letterhead. Finally, the business interest served by maintenance of an "association" between service and sales functions was acknowledged in the testimony of Stavin set forth below:

> [W]e're trying to . . . have a good reputation for a product, because sales and service—that's why we

the corporate officers of HMI and HTS is signified in the Respondent's brief, in which it is suggested that an individual named Phil Rossi is HMI's vice president in charge of engineering. Nowhere is this representation confirmed on the record.

[7] Stavin, in an unpersuasive attempt to mitigate his influence over dealings with the Union, testified that Clements and Hummer over the years had "a free hand in this area." He acknowledged that, as president, the "buck" stopped with him, but then attempted to turn this aside, indicating that he always went along with Hummer and Clements, never overriding them. Notwithstanding the Respondent's testimony to the contrary, from observation of Stavin, I was impressed with the relative strength of his presence and I stand convinced that he was the abiding, dominant influence within both HMI and HTS with respect to the economic destiny of employees of both firms.

[8] The limited amount of work on alien fire equipment impressed me as being a byproduct of space limitations rather than a shortfall in skills, equipment, or managerial ability at HMI.

[9] Any intent to broaden HTS operations to the competitive field of commercial tractor-trailer rigs, as of the date of the hearing, had not been implemented forcefully. There had been no formal advertising. HTS does not even appear in the yellow pages. Indeed, the signs erected on the facility are not subject to observation by vehicles on the adjacent interstate highway until they have passed the Shartlesville access ramp. In addition, HTS has neither tow truck nor a "tire buster," both of which would appear to be required equipment for full scale servicing of over-the-road carriers. Finally, provision had not been made for 24-hour service by a mechanic. As for the future, the Respondent did adduce testimony that steel poles had been purchased for the purpose of erecting signs that would be visible to trucks using the interstate highway.

> call it Hahn Trucks Sales and Service. I realize that they go hand in hand. And that's why we tried to disguise that as totally foreign from Hahn Motors.
> . . . .
> We try to give an association between the two companies so they felt they were dealing, even though it was a different company, we tried to make some association.

Other evidence reveals HTS' considerable operational dependence on HMI. For, in addition to parts obtained from vendors,[10] as was true of the HMI service department in existence prior to May 1, HTS routinely ordered from HMI parts manufactured in the latter's production department.[11]

Finally, it is my observation that HTS was an operating shell with little in the way of administrative autonomy. It had no accounting department, and was completely dependent on HMI for those services. Indeed, at one time, HMI employed a clerical who was primarily engaged in performing accounting functions on behalf of HTS. As for the processing of orders, when HTS invoices were received from vendors, they were checked by Close, and then forwarded to HMI for payment. Although HTS maintained its own savings and checking accounts in a bank different from that used by HMI, Close was not authorized to sign the checks.[12] In all cases, they were signed by either Stavin himself or Hummer.[13] Accounts receivable of HTS are maintained on the HMI computer. HMI provides Close with a weekly printout of the receivables balance. However, Close is responsible for collection of receivables and testimony indicated that he prepared billings, which he forwarded to HMI for entry on the computer.

Beyond the clerical work in connection with ordering, purchasing, invoice verification, and collection of accounts receivable, it does not appear that HTS performs or is capable of performing other administrative duties. Thus, it was not shown to have any independent sales representative, but, according to Close, utilizes Joe Zeller, a sales representative of HMI. Although HTS and HMI have separate phone numbers and are billed separately by the phone company, they have an interconnected system whereby a customer calling HMI for service would be switched automatically to HTS without the customer having to hang up and make a second call. It also appears that the personnel records of employees of HTS are maintained by HMI. Finally, employees of both HTS and HMI are covered by a single group policy for purposes of health and welfare.

Consistent with the foregoing, a number of factors belie the notion that HMI and HTS were operated in a fashion representative of separate firms pursuing distinct economic interests. Unlike the typical arm's-length business relationship, HMI made valuable concessions in substantial areas whereby it absorbed expenses for services rendered to HTS. For example, the means by which HTS compensated HMI for accounting services merely required that a HMI clerical employee tabulate the time spent when working on behalf of HTS. The hourly cost of those services was the sole charge levied against HTS. Thus, overhead costs, including those derived from office equipment, office materials, fair rental value of the premises, and the HMI computer were not defrayed by any charges levied against HTS. In the same category is the proportionate share of services rendered by Hummer in connection with HTS' operation. Hummer is paid no salary from HTS, but oversees the HMI accounting operation and apparently himself administers health and welfare programs on behalf of HTS personnel. HTS does not compensate HMI for Hummer's contribution to the discharge of its administrative responsibilities.

Beyond these privileges, additional monetary concessions on the part of HMI were associated with the establishment of HTS. Thus, in May, after an inventory, HTS removed HMI service parts to HTS. To compensate HMI in this respect, an unsecured, interest free note in the amount of $50,000 was given by HTS. These liberal terms, although clearly advantageous to HTS, appear less prejudicial to HMI than the circumstances surrounding the removal by HTS of HMI's equipment.[14] For it

[10] Since its inception, HTS has used many vendors formerly utilized by HMI. Thus, of the 136 vendors from whom HTS purchased goods and service, 106 had done business previously with HMI and continue to do so.

[11] Stavin testified that among the reasons prompting elimination of HMI's service operation and establishment of HTS was a rivalry between the service and production departments and a conflict between Service Manager Close and Production Manager Clements. This rift was apparently caused by the fact that parts requested by the service department would frequently be disruptive of production, while at the same time delays in providing the part requested would produce delays in the service department. Notwithstanding the corroborative testimony of Clements and Close as to this source of friction, because HTS continued to order parts from the HMI production department, while performing some assembly work, it is difficult to fathom just how the establishment of HTS eliminated or mitigated this problem.

[12] It is noted that the Respondent's witnesses, at various points in their testimony, seemed to imply that Harry Close possessed almost total autonomy in running the affairs of HTS. Any such view would be an exaggeration. Close was not on the board of directors, nor did he serve as an officer of HTS. It is found that he had been a "hired" manager at HMI, and that he had no higher status when employed at HTS.

[13] Hummer testified that HTS in the beginning had no credit reputation and no financial statement, and therefore certain vendors refused to sell direct to HTS. He hardly appeared resolute in responding to questions whether there were occasions when HMI was impelled to tell a vendor to bill HMI in order for HTS to obtain delivery of special parts. Hummer did concede, however, that on certain sales to HTS, HMI was billed. When this occurred, HMI processed the invoice but paid it, as far as Hummer could remember, on a HTS check.

[14] Close was evasive in testifying concerning the transfer of equipment. The attempt to downplay the matter first emerged when Close was asked by his own counsel to describe "the type and nature of equipment acquired from HMI." Close demeaned the quality of the equipment, and, in contrast to the more specific definition given about equipment that HTS acquired from other sources, Close barely identified that taken from HMI, testifying merely as follows:

> Most of the equipment was extremely old. In terms of service shops we were quite equipped. The newest thing we brought with us was the floor jack.
> . . . .
> And some other small air tools and equipment of that nature.

However, on cross-examination by counsel for the General Counsel, Close admitted that HTS also removed from HMI "two very old drill presses," an "old wood saw," "a very old hydraulic press," "very old homemade work benches," "several floor jacks," "one dipstick welder," and "one stick welding machine [of] questionable quality." Aside from the foregoing, it took three inquiries from me before Close was willing to admit that nothing was left behind that could be used. Although I have does not appear that HTS compensated HMI, even to the extent of paying salvage value for this equipment.[15] Moreover, because of the "good offices" of HMI, it has been unnecessary for HTS to acquire vehicles in its own behalf. Instead, HMI has provided a 1973 station wagon and a "Bronco," both of which possess dealer plates registered to and owned by HMI. In exchange, HTS is subject to a charge of $50 monthly, a fee which also licenses HTS to unmonitored and unlimited access to HMI's photocopying equipment.

The absence of cash exchanges between the two firms is also in keeping with the General Counsel's position. For, although valuable services and parts routinely are subject to exchange between HMI and HTS, cash is never involved in those transactions. Instead, an open-ended system of credit is utilized. Pursuant thereto, compensation for the warranty service provided by HTS and parts built by HMI for the account of HTS is accomplished through reciprocal bookkeeping entries, whereby the account founded on the $50,000 unsecured note payable from HTS to HMI is increased or reduced depending on which firm is providing the service.

By way of conclusion, it is considered that the foregoing fails to furnish a basis for regarding HTS as a distinct entity insulated from obligations which the Act imposes on the labor relations of HMI. Through HTS it appears that Stavin effectuated little more than the relocation of a department under the guise of a separate corporate veil. Thus, HTS, by having acquired additional equipment and additional employees, might well have broadened the scope of the market served. Nonetheless, it has continued to remain captive to the established business objectives of HMI. It is true that through HTS Stavin sought to expand the service market to include alien fire trucks and more comprehensive rehabilitation and maintenance work, but it does not appear that HTS had any independent marketing facility, and indeed, from all indications on this record, it appears that to a substantial extent it remained dependent on the market previously forged and developed by HMI.[16] In short, I am convinced that HTS, though a separate corporation, was created without sacrifice in control of labor relations and overall management or to the basic business objectives of HMI. The two firms continued as an interdependent and integrated family venture dominated by Robert Stavin. In such circumstances, the establishment of HTS and the concomitant withholding of representation rights of the service personnel was the equivalent of "an economic benefit at the expense of statutory employee rights, upsetting and undermining the balance of power between labor and management created to reflect national labor policy." Cf. Alkire v. NLRB, 716 F.2d 1014, 1021 (4th Cir. 1983). Accordingly, the criteria set forth by the Supreme Court in Radio Union Local 1264 v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255 (1965), have been substantiated and based thereon it is concluded that Respondents HMI and HTS constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

With respect to the issue of jurisdiction, the Respondent in the course and conduct of the business operations heretofore described, during the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, sold and shipped products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50.000 to points located directly outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and it is found that the Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

1. Quite independent of the single employer issue, the complaint alleges that the Respondent, through HMI's president, Robert Stavin, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by engaging in direct dealing with employees. This assertion is substantiated by undisputed evidence. For, shortly before May 1, Stavin met with HMI service department employees. The Union received no formal notification and was not invited or given the opportunity to participate in this meeting. At the meeting, Stavin informed the HMI service employees that as of May 1, 1982, HMI would no longer be engaged in service work, and that as of that date HTS would embark on a service operation in Shartlesville. All were offered positions at HTS by Stavin, who indicated that HTS would operate on a nonunion basis, but that employees were free to organize if they wished. The seven employees involved were told that they would lose their seniority and pension benefits if they accepted employment at HTS. Finally, it was indicated that those electing to remain with HMI would have a job, though the exact nature thereof was unspecified. That meeting left open the question of whether any service employee refusing to accept employment at HTS might have imperiled his job security in the event of possible future cutbacks at HMI. In any event, the offers articulated by Stavin represented an effort unilaterally to alter conditions of work of employees at the Hamburg facility in derogation of the Union's status as exclusive representative of the employees. The Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. See, e.g., Otis Elevator Co., 255 NLRB 235, 242, 247–248 (1981).

2. The complaint further alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by transferring employees to the Shartlesville facility and failing to abide by the governing collective-bargaining agree-

no doubt that the HMI service equipment was not in the best of shape, from all appearances it was still in use at the time of the hearing. In the circumstances, the effort by Close to mitigate the value and extent of the transfer was as understandable as it was unpersuasive. I believe that Close's sensitivity in this area was attributable to concern over the degree of HTS' dependence on equipment taken from HMI, which I infer to have been substantial.

[15] According to Hummer, after the removal of this equipment, it was not carried on the books of either HMI or HTS.

[16] Close made an attempt to differentiate between the services provided through HTS and the former service department at HMI. Basically, however, subject to one exception, the mechanical work involved did not appear to entail a difference in skills and was plainly related to other work performed historically by HMI. The exception relates to painting, sand blasting, and body work, none of which was available through HMI. However, in the period preceding the hearing, painting had been limited to two vehicles and the record fails to disclose the percentage of HTS' revenue what would be attributable to body work. In any event, the addition of these services would seem a normal adjunct of mechanical, maintenance, and repair work and, thus, was not unrelated to services traditionally available through the HMI service department.

ment covering these employees. Having found that the Respondent, for purposes of the Act, shall be treated as a single entity, its bargaining obligation is subject to scrutiny under two independent theories.

First is the line of cases exemplified by Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982).[17] By virtue thereof, an employer's transfer of unit work, during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement and without union assent, to another of its facilities where employees are not represented by a union has been deemed conduct inherently destructive of employee rights and violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. See, e.g., Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co., 235 NLRB 720 (1978), enfd. 602 F.2d 1302 (9th Cir. 1979); Brown Co., 243 NLRB 769 (1979); Milwaukee Spring Division, supra. The rationale underlying this line of precedent views the removal of unit work as a mid-term modification of a collective-bargaining agreement and, hence, absent concurrence of the employee representative, such action violates Section 8(d) and constitutes a refusal to bargain violative of Section 8(a)(5). Those cases stand for the further proposition that prejudice to employment terms sustained by unit employees in consequence of such a loss of work is "inherently destructive of employee interests" and violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967). This is so even in the absence of specific proof of union animus or, indeed, in the face of credited evidence that the employer pleaded an inability to afford terms of the contract and unsuccessfully sought relief therefrom through renegotiation.

With these considerations in mind, it is noted that here the relocation of the service function was unaccompanied by any claim of economic distress derived from the Hamburg contract. Instead, the removal of unit work does not appear to have been based on anything other than acquisition of a new facility and the Respondent's having seized on that acquisition as an opportunity to perform the service function at a nearby location on a nonunion basis.[18] It follows on the cited authority that by discontinuing the service function at Hamburg and by relocating that operation at Shartlesville, while refusing to recognize the exclusive employee representative and failing to extend the terms of the unexpired contract to that location, the Respondent, on authority of Milwaukee Spring, supra, violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

Second, and in the alternative, the same basic remedy on the instant facts would be warranted quite independent of the reasoning set forth in Milwaukee Spring, supra, and related decisions. For, under long-established Board policy, mere relocation of a segment of an established collective-bargaining unit will not necessarily alter the scope of the unit so as to relieve an employer of the obligation to recognize and apply the contract to the new site. See, e.g., Rittling Corp., 203 NLRB 355 (1973); Robertshaw Controls Co., 240 NLRB 1260 (1979); Westwood Import Co., 251 NLRB 1213 (1980), enfd. 681 F.2d 664 (9th Cir. 1982); Marine Optical, 255 NLRB 1241, 1244 (1981), affd. 671 F.2d 11 (1st Cir. 1982); NLRB v. Royal Oak Tool & Machine Co., 320 F.2d 77, 83 (6th Cir. 1963). Expanding on the policy reflected in these decisions, the Board in Westwood Import Co., supra at 1214, stated as follows:

> [A]n existing and effective collective-bargaining agreement remains in effect following a relocation, provided operations and equipment remain substantially the same at the new location, and a substantial percentage of the employees at the old plant transfer to the new location.

Here, the Shartlesville facility was located a mere 6–8 miles distant from the historic site of the appropriate unit.[19] Operations commenced at Shartlesville with equipment formerly utilized by the service department at Hamburg to an extent which on this record cannot be considered insubstantial.[20] Furthermore, six of the seven unit employees engaged in service work at Hamburg accepted transfers to Shartlesville and constituted a majority of the work force at that location until December 1982. Later, as of the date of the hearing, when the payroll of HTS had grown to 13 employees, the original transfers constituted no less than 46 percent of the overall work force.[21] Moreover, the Shartlesville service operation was initiated and continued without change in the identity of immediate management. In the circumstances, including the continued integration of the work performed by employees at both locations, the changes attendant in the relocation failed to create new and distinct business operations unrelated and distinct from those historically performed at Hamburg through HMI. Cf. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 174 NLRB 636 (1969). Instead, the relocation to Shartlesville entailed a mere expansion, amounting to a normal evolution within the framework of an established venture, which failed to produce a material change in the class of jobs, functions, or community of interests within the historic collective-bargaining unit. In the circumstances, as the relocation [17] On August 4, 1983, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, on request of the Board, remanded Milwaukee Spring for reconsideration. On September 20, 1983, oral argument was conducted before the Board in that case.

[18] The Respondent insists that Stavin acted on a legitimate business consideration in creating HTS, acquiring the Shartlesville site, leasing it to HTS, and in effect transferring HMI's service function to HTS. The assigned business justification related to past conflicts between manufacturing and service that had arisen because both functions were performed at the same facility. Although this defense might well support the removal and transfer of the service function, those actions were not incompatible with continued recognition. Hence, the economic defense fell short of excusing Stavin's further determination that recognition be withheld and the collective-bargaining agreement dishonored at Shartlesville.

[19] The Respondent makes no serious claim that the contract contains any language limiting the geographic scope of the established bargaining unit. Thus, the collective-bargaining unit in art. 3, sec. 2, of the contract is defined without qualifying language, in the following terms:

> The term "Employee," as hereinafter used in this agreement, refers to production and maintenance employees and watchmen who constitute the appropriate bargaining unit.

Thus, the contract on its face fails to limit the scope of the appropriate collective-bargaining unit to the Hamburg worksite. See Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 1302, 1306 (9th Cir. 1979).

[21] See Westwood Import Co., supra at 1214 fn. 8, and cases cited therein to the effect that the 46-percent figure satisfies the requirement that "a sufficiently large number of employees [be] transferred."

occurred at a time when the existing collective-bargaining agreement constituted a bar to an election, the Respondent was obligated to continue recognition of the Union at Shartlesville as a part of the established collective-bargaining unit,[22] and to honor the terms of the subsisting contract with the Union at the Shartlesville location as part of the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered thereby.[23] Accordingly, this alternative ground independently supports the conclusion that in each of these several respects the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Hahn Motors, Inc. and Hahn Truck Sales & Service Corp. collectively constitute a single employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Steel Workers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining is:

> All production and maintenance employees and watchmen, excluding professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all times material, United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By dealing directly with employees concerning terms and conditions of employment, and thereby bypassing their exclusive statutory representative, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By relocating its service operation to Shartlesville, Pennsylvania, by refusing to recognize United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC, as the exclusive representative of employees at that location, and by failing and refusing to apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to those employees, the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain in good faith in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it shall be recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Affirmatively, consistent with the General Counsel's request, the Respondent shall be ordered to recognize the Union as the representative of its employees engaged in the performance of unit work at its Shartlesville facility as part of the established appropriate collective-bargaining unit and to apply the current collective-bargaining agreement to those employees. It shall be further recommended that the Respondent make whole employees for any loss of benefits sustained by reason of the Respondent's repudiation of the subsisting collective-bargaining agreement at that location, and that the Respondent be ordered to make the Union whole for dues owing in the case of those Shartlesville employees who had executed checkoff authorizations prior to the commencement of operations at that location.[24] All monetary sums due shall include interest as prescribed by Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[25]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[26]

ORDER

The Respondent, Hahn Motors, Inc. and Hahn Truck Sales & Service Corp., Hamburg, and Shartlesville, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in a labor organization by abrogating contract benefits, withholding negotiated terms, or in any other manner discriminating with respect to wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment.

(b) Refusing to bargain collectively with United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC, as the exclusive bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit, by bypassing the Union and dealing directly with employees concerning terms and conditions of employment, by refusing to recognize the Union for a relocated segment of the appropriate unit, and by repudiating and refusing to apply the unexpired contract to employees in the appropriate unit at the new location. The appropriate collective-bargaining unit is as follows:

[22] See Hexton Furniture Co., 111 NLRB 342 (1955). The Respondent did not raise a doubt of majority status. On the facts, it was not free to do so, as, at times material, the collective-bargaining agreement would constitute a bar to the raising of a question concerning representation. See Sanson Hosiery Mills, 92 NLRB 1102, 1103 (1950), enfd. 195 F.2d 350 (5th Cir. 1952). See, e.g., Pioneer Inn, 228 NLRB 1263, 1265–1266 (1977), enfd. 578 F.2d 835 (9th Cir. 1978).

[24] It is noted in this connection that, even if precedent in line with Milwaukee Spring Division, supra, were to be rejected, the remedy here for the most part would not be affected. Thus, with the exception of the notice and additional language in the cease-and-desist portion of the remedy, the 8(a)(3) and (1) finding sanctioned by that case is dispensable. In short, such a finding is unnecessary to the terms of the affirmative remedy recommended here. Beyond that, as the relocation did not alter the scope of the appropriate unit, the Board's conventional remedy, applied most recently in similar circumstances in Westwood Import Co., supra at 1214 fn. 7, would warrant relief that would not be substantively different from that which would derive from Milwaukee Spring, supra.

[26] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

All production and maintenance employees and watchmen, excluding professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively with United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees employed in the above-defined appropriate collective-bargaining unit, including those employed at the Shartlesville, Pennsylvania facility.

(b) Apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to all employees employed in the aforesaid collective-bargaining unit, including those who are employed at the Shartlesville facility.

(c) Make whole employees for any loss of pay or benefits that would have accrued to them under the collective-bargaining agreement but for the failure to apply the terms and conditions of that agreement to all employees employed in the aforesaid collective-bargaining unit, including those located at the Shartlesville, Pennsylvania facility.

(d) Make whole United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC for dues not remitted on behalf of Shartlesville employees who had executed valid, unrevoked checkoff authorizations.

(e) Preserve and make available to the Board or its agents all payroll and other records necessary to compute the backpay or value of other benefits, including interest, due under the terms set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(f) Post at its Hamburg and Shartlesville, Pennsylvania facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[27] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.
Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the following appropriate unit:

All production and maintenance employees and watchmen, excluding professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT deal directly with any of the employees in the aforedescribed appropriate collective-bargaining unit under conditions bypassing United Steel Workers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC as their exclusive representative.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive representative of the employees in the aforedescribed unit, including those located at our Shartlesville, Pennsylvania facility.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to apply the terms and conditions of our collective-bargaining agreement with United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC to all the employees in the above-described bargaining unit, including those located at our Shartlesville, Pennsylvania facility, without the written consent of that Union.

WE WILL NOT deny benefits to you under the governing collective-bargaining agreement or in any manner discriminate against you for engaging in activities on behalf of United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL recognize and bargain collectively with United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described bargaining unit, including those located at our Shartlesville, Pennsylvania facility.

WE WILL apply the terms and conditions of our current collective- bargaining agreement with United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC to all employees in the above-described bargaining unit, including those employees at our Shartlesville, Pennsylvania facility.

WE WILL make whole all employees for any losses sustained by our failure to apply the terms and conditions of our collective-bargaining agreement with United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC to all employees in the appropriate collective-bargaining agreement set forth above, including those employees at our facility located in Shartlesville, Pennsylvania.

HAHN MOTORS, INC. AND HAHN TRUCK SALES & SERVICE CORP.

Decor Noel, Inc. and Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO. Case 26–CA–11307

6 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 18 November 1986 Administrative Law Judge Lawrence W. Cullen issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Decor Noel, Inc., Memphis, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Charging Party's motion to correct error in the date in sec. IV, par. 6 of the judge's decision is granted; the date is corrected to read 6 August 1985.

[2] The General Counsel seeks a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

The General Counsel excepted to the judge's failure to state affirmatively that the bargaining unit includes "all full-time and regular part-time maintenance and production employees." We agree with the judge's finding that neither the unit description nor the practice of the parties as described at the hearing shows a limitation which would exclude employees working less than 30 hours per week from the bargaining unit. We find it inappropriate to redefine the bargaining unit, however, because the General Counsel first requested this in posthearing exceptions and the matter was not fully litigated at the hearing.

William D. Levy, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Henry Shelton III, Esq., of Memphis Tennessee, for the Respondent.
Howard Paul, Esq., of Memphis Tennessee, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LAWRENCE W. CULLEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in Memphis, Tennessee, on 24 February 1986. The original charge was filed by Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) on 20 September 1985 against Decor Noel, Inc. and the original complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 26 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) in this case on 13 November 1985 and alleged that Respondent Decor Noel, Inc. had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by since about 6 August 1985 failing and refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees. On 18 December 1985 Respondent filed its answer to the complaint denying the commission of any violations of the Act and alleging that the Union did not represent a majority of the employees of Respondent. On 9 January 1986 the Regional Director amended the complaint by alleging that Creative Technology, Inc. and Decor Noel Corporation constituted a single employer within the meaning of the Act. Respondent filed its answer to this amendment on 22 January 1986 denying that Creative Technology, Inc., and Decor Noel Corporation were a single employer under the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent, I make the following[1]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, the evidence shows, and I find that Respondent Decor Noel, Inc. is a Tennessee corporation with an office and place of business in Memphis, Tennessee, where it has been engaged in the manufacture of Christmas decorations, and that since 29 March 1985 it sold and shipped from its place of business products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Tennessee and that Respondent Decor Noel, Inc. is now and has been at all times material an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE BARGAINING UNIT

The complaint alleges, and I find on the basis of the evidence presented at the hearing, including a stipulation

[1] The findings of fact include a composite of the testimony of the witnesses, admitted exhibits and stipulated facts, and admissions made by Respondent.

entered into by the parties, that the following employees of Decor Noel Corporation and its successor Decor Noel, Inc. constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.[2]

> All maintenance and production employees employed at the Employer's Memphis, Tennessee location, excluding all office clerical employees, supervisors and guards as defined in the Act.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The underlying facts in this case are largely undisputed. Decor Noel Corporation (DNC) had been engaged in the manufacture of Christmas tinsel products since at least 1974. Creative Technology Inc. (Creative) was wholly owned by and engaged in the manufacture of Christmas ornaments as an operating division of DNC. DNC and Creative shared common premises, provided services for each other, interchanged employees, maintained a common labor relations policy, and shared common management. I, accordingly, conclude that DNC and Creative constituted a single-integrated enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

On 18 October 1974 Local 19, Distributive Workers of America (DWA) (Local 19) was certified as the bargaining representative of employees of DNC in the following described unit in Case 26–RC–4825:

> All maintenance and production employees employed at the Employer's Memphis, Tennessee, location, excluding all office clerical employees, supervisors and guards as defined in the Act.

Local 19 and DNC were parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements covering the employees in the above-described unit, including an agreement that, by its terms, was effective from 18 January 1978 to 31 December 1980. In 1979 Local 19 became affiliated with the United Auto Workers (UAW), and the name of Local 19 was changed to Division 19, District 65, United Automobile Workers of America, UAW (the Union). DNC entered into a series of agreements with the Union covering the employees certified in Case 26–RC–4825, the first of which was, by its terms, effective from 5 March 1981 to 31 December 1983 and the second and most recent of which was entered into on 29 February 1984 to be effective until 31 December 1986 and thereafter to be continued from year to year unless terminated by the parties under the terms of agreement.

On 6 February 1985 DNC and Creative filed petitions for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code and on 8 March 1985 orders were issued by the bankruptcy court authorization Citicorp Industrial Credit, Inc. (Citicorp), the primary secured creditor of DNC and Creative, to repossess and foreclose on the assets of DNC and Creative, and to seek bids for the sale of the assets. On 22 March 1985 Citicorp and Irvin Kaplan, DNC's chairman of its board of directors, entered into a purchase agreement in which Kaplan agreed to acquire substantially all the assets of DNC and Creative. The sale was approved by the bankruptcy court on 28 March 1985. On the same day (28 March 1985) DNI, Inc. was incorporated. On 29 March 1985 Kaplan sold all the assets acquired by him under the terms of the purchase agreement to Decor Noel, Inc. (Respondent) and on 29 April 1985 the name of DNI, Inc. was changed to Decor Noel, Inc. On 22 April 1985 the board of directors of DNC had adopted a resolution waiving its rights to the use of the name of Decor Noel to DNI, Inc. and supporting the action of DNI, Inc., in changing its corporate name to Decor Noel, Inc.

The record also established that the ousiness of DNC and Creative had been seasonal and that DNC and Creative had an established practice of laying off its employes in December and recalling them in February or a later month of the following year and such a layoff had occurred in December 1984. In February 1985, employees in the glass ornament department of Creative were recalled to complete an order of glass ornaments for Hallmark, a customer of DNC and Creative. DNC and Creative also recalled employees in January and February to manufacture samples for display in their New York merchandise showroom, and in January 1985 DNC had recalled warehouse employees to transfer goods from one warehouse to another. Glass ornament employee Dorothy Lee worked in the glass ornament department during January, February, and March 1985. On 7 March 1985 the debtor-in-possession of bankruptcy trustee of DNC issued checks for wages to 12 employees for completion of glass ornaments for Campbell Soup, a customer of DNC.

Respondent continued to operate at the same facility as DNC and Creative, hired Mitchell Rice from Hallmark as its president, and hired Danny Stone who had been the vice president of DNC in January 1985 as its vice president of manufacturing. It also hired Nancy Todd, a former vice president of Creative, as its vice president of manufacturing, and Billy Williams, the former traffic manager of DNC, as its vice president and retained Gene Davis, DNC's vice president of sales, in that same capacity. Bill Daniel, the former president of DNC, was asked to serve as a consultant for Respondent and, according to the testimony of Daniel, was informally designated as chairman of the board but did not act in that capacity nor was he utilized in the capacity of consultant by Respondent's new management. Stone has been terminated by Respondent at the time of the hearing. Additionally, four former supervisors of DNC were hired as supervisors of Respondent and two mechanics formerly employed by DNC were hired as supervisors of Respondent. It is undisputed that Respondent continued in the same business of DNC in the manufacture of tinsel and Creative in the manufacture of ornaments although it served fewer customers in the tinsel area and its business operated on a diminished scale. Respondent engaged in operations on a preliminary basis as early as the week ending 9 May 1985 when it started to gear up for production according to the unrebutted testimony of Stone, which I credit. It also continued to employ production employees from May through August 1985 at the same premises and manufacturing the same products, utilizing the same equipment as had DNC and Creative. Respondent's records show that it had sales in the calendar year 1985 of which over 75 percent were made to the former customers of DNC and Creative.

It was stipulated that on 6 August 1986 Respondent received a written demand for recognition and bargaining from the Union and that Respondent did not respond to the demand. The payroll records of the week ending 11 August 1985 as designated at the hearing show that as of that week Respondent employed 94 production and maintenance employees, 57 of whom were former production and maintenance employees of DNC and Creative. Additionally, the payroll registers of Respondent and DNC and Creative showed that during the entire period from the week ending 2 June 1985 until the week ending 3 August 1985 a majority of the production and maintenance employees of Respondent were former production and maintenance employees of DNC and Creative.

Respondent made no response to the union demand for recognition. Michael Rice, Respondent's president, testified he based his decision to decline to recognize the Union because of his opinion that the "full-time permanent employees did not wish to be represented by the Union, based on conversations I had with them, and with certain administrative people who used to be members of the bargaining unit." He cited one conversation in August 1985 with employees Terry Scott (who had been promoted to supervisor from the bargaining unit in the summer of 1985) and Gary Powell in which they told him the Union had called an organizational meeting and that most of the employees had not attended. He also testified that Scott and Powell told him that the full-time employees prefered the working conditions and environment of Respondent to those of DNC. In the first week of December 1985 employee Ora Broome handed him a letter from the International Union, informing her of her nonpayment of dues and told him she was not going to pay her dues. He could cite no other specific instances of any employees allegedly expressing a lack of support for the Union. He made his decision in August 1985 not to recognize the Union based on his conversations with employees Scott and Powell and on recommendations from his line supervisors. Subsequently, after consultation with his attorney he conducted a poll of certain of the employees in February 1986 shortly before the hearing in this matter. The poll was limited to employees who were considered by him to be permanent full-time employees as opposed to temporary part-time employees although there had never been such a distinction drawn in the recognition clause of the bargaining unit of DNC and Creative. There were also no safeguards provided to assure that the person returning the ballot that was mailed to the employees was the employee to whom it was mailed. He contended at the hearing that many of the temporary part-time employees had been discharged in late 1985 prior to the time of the poll, although this was contradicted by Patricia Handy, Respondent's accounting manager and payroll clerk, who testified that the term "temporary employee" had never been used by Respondent and that no records existed in Respondent's files designating employees as "temporary employees," and that the employees had been laid off for lack of work in late 1985 and were never told that they were being discharged or that they would not be recalled. She made the determination to send the ballots only to those employees who worked 30 hours a week or more on an average as of the first month of their employment by Respondent. I credit Handy's testimony in this regard.[3]

Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel and the Charging Party contend that Respondent is a successor of DNC and Creative and that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union on behalf of the employees in the alleged appropriate unit. The Charging Party contends that a remedy of the assumption of the contract between the Union and the predecessor employers by the successor employer is appropriate. Respondent contends that the issues are whether it is a successor to DNC, whether Respondent's management entertained a good-faith doubt concerning the Union's majority status as of the date of demand, and whether the Union enjoys the support of a majority of Respondent's employees.

The General Counsel and the Charging Party contend that Respondent is a successor to previous employers DNC and Creative as demonstrated by the evidence showing that virtually no hiatus existed between the date that DNC and Creative ceased manufacturing products (January—March 1985) and the date on which Respondent began preparing materials for production (May 1985) and the initiation of full production in June 1985, noting that the employees of DNC and Creative were not informed directly by DNC or Creative of the filing of bankruptcy petitions or of any plans to cease operation of the business but rather were laid off in December 1984 for lack of work and that Respondent called experienced operators of DNC and Creative to return to work, thus demonstrating sufficient continuity in operation to establish a successor relationship, citing C. G. Conn Ltd., 197 NLRB 442 (1972).

The General Counsel also contends that successorship status should be accorded to Respondent as a result of the evidence that Respondent continued to manufacture the same goods as the predecessor employer at the same location, utilized the same equipment, machinery, and manufacturing processes, maintained the same job classifications, and that employees in these job classifications performed the same work functions under essentially the same supervision and that Respondent was dependent on former customer of DNC and Creative for more than three-fourths of its sales. The General Counsel also relies on records of Respondent that show that during each payroll week from the week ending 2 June 1985 to the week ending 11 August 1985 (the week in which Respondent received the Union's demand for recognition) Respondent employed as a majority of its production and maintenance employees who were former employees of DNC and Creative, citing Eastone of Ohio, 277 NLRB 1652 (1986).

The General Counsel further contends that Respondent's reliance on the poll taken by it in February 1986 is immaterial as the poll occurred 6 months after its initial declination of the Union's demand for recognition, citing Pre-Engineered Building Products, 228 NLRB 841 (1977), in which the Board held that the events occurring prior to the date of the demand for recognition are crucial in determining whether the employer has successfully rebutted the presumption of continued majority status accorded to the union and contends that Respondent's poll of its employees is immaterial to this determination as it occurred substantially after the date of the Union's demand for recognition. The General Counsel also contends that Respondent conducted its poll in an inappropriate grouping of employees and polled less than a majority in the established bargaining unit citing Crest Floors & Plastic, 274 NLRB 1230 (1985), and IMS Mfg. Co., 278 NLRB 538 (1986), as it limited the conduct of its poll to employees who had been employed on a regular basis for more than 30 hours per week during the first month of employment and excluded those employees employed for 20 to 30 hours per week on a regular basis, and who had been laid off due to lack of work rather than discharged. The General Counsel, thus, contends that Respondent, as successor to DNC and Creative, lacked valid objective considerations for contesting majority status and that Respondent thereby failed to rebut the presumption that the Union continued to enjoy majority status, citing Stratford Visiting Nurses Assn., 264 NLRB 1026 (1982).

In support of its contention that Respondent is a successor to Decor Noel Corporation and Creative, the Charging Party relies on Great Lakes Chemical Corp., 280 NLRB 1131 (1986), and Grico Corp., 265 NLRB 1344 (1982), which it contends concerned a situation almost identical to the instant case. The Charging Party also relies on Golden State Habilitation Convalescent Center, 224 NLRB 1618 (1976), in support of its contention that the various defenses raised by Respondent concerning the alleged loss of majority of the Union and good-faith doubt of Respondent of the Union's majority such as nonpayment of union dues, small participation in checkoff, and turnover among employees, did not establish a reasonable basis for Respondent to assert a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority. The Charging Party contends that Respondent should be required to remedy the unfair labor practices by assuming the collective-bargaining agreement. The Charging Party relies on article XIX, section 2, of the contract between DNC and Respondent, which provides, "This agreement shall be binding on the successors and assigns of the employer" and contends that Respondent is charged with knowledge of this provision as the employer representatives who signed the agreement are officers and management officials of Respondent.

Respondent contends the following: It is not a successor to DNC as it purchased the assets of DNC from a third party following a foreclosure on the assets of DNC by its creditor Citicorp in a bankruptcy proceeding and the subsequent sale of those assets to a third party individual pursuant to an order of the bankruptcy court for the sum of $2 million and that the third party subsequently assigned his interest in these assets to Respondent after it had received its charter from the State of Tennessee, all of which ensured that these transactions were of an arm's-length nature. It is owned by different parties, managed by different persons, and sells a greatly reduced volume of its products to a significantly smaller share of the market than did DNC. All the evidence available to management in August 1985 at the time of demand for recognition by the Union indicated a lack of union support among its employees. None of its hourly employees desire representation by the Union as shown by its poll of these employees conducted in February 1986.

Respondent, accordingly, contends in argument that the instant case is distinguishable from the case of NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972), and its progeny including Grico Corp., supra, both of which found the new employer to be a successor, as in the instant case there was a hiatus in production for resale (as opposed to isolated sample manufacturing or management of stock) of approximately 6 months; at the peak of production, on the demand date, there was barely a majority of employees and the volume of goods manufactured and sold by Respondent amounted to less than 40 percent of that manufactured and sold by Decor Noel Corporation in its last year of operation. In addition, Respondent contends that unlike Grico Corp., Respondent's management was new and substantially different from that of Decor Noel Corporation. Respondent further contends that because DNC formerly served all the wholesale customers in the continental United States, it must necessarily sell to a former customer of DNC's and accordingly this criteria should not be utilized in determining successorship. Respondent relies on Spencer Foods, 268 NLRB 1483 (1984), revd. 768 F.2d 1463 (D.C. Cir. 1986), for its position that it should not be found a successor as the assets of Respondent constitute only a part of the assets of DNC and were purchased from a third party who had purchased the assets from a third party. It also contends that entirely new high-level management and substantially new plant supervisory personnel were hired by Respondent, that the work force of Respondent is substantially smaller than that of DNC and organized along substantially different lines, and the volume of goods sold is substantially less than that sold by DNC.

Respondent also contends that it had operated its plant for 2 months without any indication of union support, and management had been advised of the employees' lack of interest in the Union and of the Union's futile efforts to organize the new shop. It contends that in similar circumstances the Board and courts have found sufficient objective circumstances to justify a good-faith doubt of majority support of the Union, citing Houston Shopping News Co., 233 NLRB 105 (1977); White Castle System, 224 NLRB 1089 (1976); and Landmark Trucks, 272 NLRB 675 (1984).

Discussion

I find that Respondent is a successor of DNC and Creative as I find that it is substantially the same enterprise as DNC and Creative, and that the continuity of the business operation has been demonstrated in C. G. Conn Ltd., supra, citing Alamo White Truck Service, 273 F.2d 238, 240 (5th Cir. 1959); and citing NLRB v. Zayre Corp., 424 F.2d 1159, 1162 (5th Cir. 1970).

As set out above the material facts of this case are largely undisputed. The crux of the differences between the parties rest on the weight to be accorded the fact as applied to the cases cited by the parties. I find the General Counsel's argument in this case compelling as supported by its cited cases, supra. I also find applicable the cases cited, supra, by the Charging Party. I find the Spencer case, supra, cited by Respondent does not equate with the instant case in certain of the facts, notably the length of the hiatus and other factors including the shutdown of facilities and elimination of a product line all of which make this case factually distinguishable from the instant case that involves a much shorter hiatus in operations and the continuation of both of its former product lines. Initially, I find that the evidence demonstrates that there was virtually no hiatus existing between the cessation of production between January and March 1985 and the preparation by Respondent for new production in May 1985. During this period of time several of Respondent's management officials remained on duty and sample runs of Christmas ornaments were run by calling in previously laid-off employees to operate certain of these machines. Respondent operated the same equipment and manufacturing processes in the same plant. It maintained the same job classifications, recalled its skilled employees, and although it advertised in a general circulation newspaper for unskilled employees, it hired its former unskilled employees who applied. Respondent employed as a majority of its production and maintenance employees the former employees of DNC and Creative. It is undisputed that Respondent remained in the same business and sold to the same customers as its predecessor. Although this may have been inevitable as contended by Respondent because the predecessor had previously sold to all wholesale customers in the continental United States according to the unrebutted testimony of the predecessor's former president, Daniel, these facts should not be ignored in determining whether the employing enterprise is substantially the same as its predecessors. Respondent employed the former employees of DNC and Creative as a majority of its production and maintenance employees at the time of the Union's demand for recognition. It is well settled that the date of the demand for recognition is the critical date to consider in determining whether the request for recognition could properly have been refused or ignored by Respondent. Thus, the poll conducted 6 months after the demand for recognition and the refusal by Respondent to recognize and bargain with the Union has no relevancy to the majority status of the Union at the time of the demand Pre-Engineered Building Products, supra.[4] Nor were the conversations of Respondent's president, Rice, with two employees or the other unspecified conversations with Respondent's employees and supervisors sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of the Union's continued majority status. I also find that the cases cited by Respondent in support of its position that it has sufficient objective circumstances to justify good-faith doubt as to majority support of the Union are not controlling in this case as they involved substantially different fact situations from these presented in the instant case. Houston Shopping, supra, involved a situation in which a substantial number of the employees in the unit (12 out of a unit of 31) expressed their own sentiments against the Union and a long-term employee expressed the sentiment "that nobody back there wants the Union." In White Castle System, supra, 224 NLRB at 1092, the administrative law judge relied on factors other than those present in the instant case. He specifically cited the following as "valid objective considerations: only one grievance in 10 years; no union stewards; no employees on the bargaining committee; statements of union representatives in bargaining supportive of an inference that the Union lacked majority support . . . and expressions of employee dissatisfaction with the Union, communicated to Respondent by a majority of the employees." In Landmark Truck, the Board found that "the withdrawal of recognition was unlawful because it was predicated upon information obtained in an unlawful manner.' The information in question consisted of the receipt by the employer of resignation and revocation letters from the Union from 13 of the 18 department employees.

It should also be noted that the advent of a bankruptcy of a predecessor and the purchase of assets under court order by a third party does not bar a finding of successorship. Rather, the Board looks at all the circumstances to determine whether the employing entity is the same. Lloyd Flanders, 280 NLRB 1216 (1986), citing Premium Foods v. NLRB, 709 F.2d 623 (9th Cir. 1984). It is thus clear that under all the circumstances Respondent is a new employer conducting substantially the same business as DNC and Creative, employing the former employees of DNC and Creative as a majority of its employees, operating at the same plant and utilizing the same equipment, job classifications, and selling to substantially the same customers as DNC and Creative. Respondent is clearly a successor employer to DNC and Creative. The Union thus enjoyed the presumption of continued majority status and Respondent has failed to establish that it had a sufficient basis for a reasonable doubt of the majority status. Its refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union on its demand constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

With respect to the Charging Party's contention that Respondent should be required to assume the collective-bargaining agreement of the predecesser employer, I find that such a remedy is precluded by the Burns case in which the Supreme Court expressly held that a successor is not obligated to assume nor is it bound by the substantive terms of the labor agreement of its predecessor. Accordingly, I decline to recommend such a remedy.

[4] In view of this finding, I find it unnecessary to determine whether the poll was a valid one. However, assuming arguendo, I would find the relevancy of the poll invalid for the reasons cited by the General Counsel as outlined above.

V. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices of Respondent, as found herein in section IV, above, in connection with the business of Respondent as found in section I above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes obstructing the free flow of commerce.

On the above findings of fact, and on the entire record, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Decor Noel, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and is a successor of Decor Noel Corporation and Creative Technology, Inc.

2. Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act and is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees in the following described bargaining unit:

> All maintenance and production employees employed at the Employer's Memphis, Tennessee location, excluding all office clerical employees, supervisors and guards as defined in the Act.

3. By its refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union on demand, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, it will be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the purpose and policies of the Act, and to post the appropriate notice. I recommend that Respondent bargain, on request, with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an agreement is reached, embody it in a signed contract.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Decor Noel, Inc., Memphis, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain in good faith with Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO as exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following bargaining unit:

> All maintenance and production employees employed at the Employer's Memphis, Tennessee location, excluding all office clerical employees, supervisors and guards as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain in good faith with Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an agreement is reached, embody it in a signed contract.

(b) Post at its Memphis, Tennessee facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
> To form, join, or assist any union
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and, on request, bargain in good faith with Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

All maintenance and production employees employed at the Employer's Memphis, Tennessee location, excluding all office clerical employees, supervisors and guards as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively with Division 19, District 65, United Auto Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of employees in the appropriate bargaining unit described above with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed contract.

DECOR NOEL, INC.

Local Union No. 133, Laborers International Union of North America and A. P. Whitaker & Sons, Inc. Case 1–CP–348

7 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Upon unfair labor practice charges filed by A. P. Whitaker & Sons, Inc. (Whitaker) on 8 March 1985, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on 5 April 1985, against Local Union No. 133, Laborers International Union of North America, the Respondent, alleging that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the National Labor Relations Act. Thereafter the Respondent filed a timely answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices.

On 23 May 1986 the parties jointly moved the Board to transfer the proceeding to the Board without benefit of hearing before an administrative law judge, and submitted a proposed record consisting of the formal papers and the parties' stipulation of facts with attached exhibits. On 7 August 1986 the Deputy Executive Secretary of the Board, by direction of the Board, issued an order granting the motion, approving the stipulation, and transferring the proceeding to the Board. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Respondent filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case, including the briefs of the parties. For the reasons set forth below, the Board finds that the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act as alleged by the complaint.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Whitaker is a corporation engaged in the construction industry as a general contractor, with an office and place of business in Bridgewater, Massachusetts (Bridgewater facility). Whitaker annually purchases and receives at its Bridgewater facility products and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. We find that Whitaker is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. We further find that the Respondent, Local Union No. 133, Laborers International Union of North America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

On 21 January 1985[1] Whitaker began work on a construction project for the New England Telephone Company in Weymouth, Massachusetts. On 23 January the Respondent Union demanded that Whitaker recognize and bargain with it as the exclusive representative of Whitaker's employees employed as laborers at its Weymouth project. The Respondent is not currently certified as the representative of any of Whitaker's employees, and until 11 February only one employee was employed by Whitaker as a laborer at the Weymouth project. On 28 January the Respondent began picketing in furtherance of its recognitional demand. That picketing continued until 15 March, for a total of 47 days.

The Respondent filed a petition seeking to represent Whitaker's laborers at the Weymouth project on 22 February, when Whitaker employed more than one laborer at that jobsite, but the petition was not supported by a showing of interest indicating that a substantial number of employees at the Weymouth project wished to be represented by the Respondent.[2] Because no charge alleging a violation of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act that would have dispensed with the necessity of a showing of interest on the part of the labor organization had been filed, and the Respondent failed to submit the showing of interest required by the Board in support of its representation petition, the Acting Regional Director dismissed the petition on 4 March. Upon the Respondent's request for review, the Board thereafter, on 30 April, affirmed the dismissal.

On 8 March, subsequent to the Acting Regional Director's dismissal of the representation petition, Whitaker filed a charge alleging that the Respondent's picketing violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the

[2] The Board investigates any petition filed by a labor organization that alleges that a "substantial number" of employees wish to be represented by the petitioner and the petitioner desires to be certified as their representative. The Board has adopted the administrative rule, documented in its Statements of Procedure at Sec. 101.18(a), that 30 percent constitutes a "substantial number." The purpose of this requirement is to enable the Board to determine whether the filing of a petition warrants the holding of an election without the needless expenditure of Government time, efforts, and funds. S. H. Kress & Co., 137 NLRB 1244, 1248 (1962). It has been the Board's administrative experience that the conduct of an election serves no purpose under the statute unless the petitioner has been designated by at least 30 percent of the employees.

Act. The Respondent ceased its picketing after 15 March.

B. Contentions of the Parties

In the complaint, the General Counsel alleges that the Respondent picketed for more than 30 days to force or require Whitaker to recognize or bargain with the Respondent as the representative of its laborer employees, notwithstanding that the Respondent is not currently certified as the representative of such employees and a question concerning the representation of such employees has not appropriately been raised under Section 9(c) of the Act. The General Counsel asserts that, although filed within 30 days of the commencement of recognitional picketing, a petition that does not raise a valid question concerning representation does not preclude the finding of a violation of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act based on a charge filed following the petition's dismissal.

The Respondent argues that the clear statutory language of Section 8(b)(7)(C) directs the Board to expedite election procedures when a petition is filed within a reasonable time after the commencement of recognitional picketing, without regard to the provisions of Section 9(c)(1) or the absence of a showing of substantial interest on the part of the labor organization. Accordingly, the Respondent submits, by filing its petition within 30 days of the commencement of picketing, it satisfied the requirements of Section 8(b)(7)(C) and its recognitional picketing was protected under the Act. Alternatively, the Respondent contends that its picketing did not violate Section 8(b)(7)(C) because the time during which its election petition was pending, and the time during which only one laborer was employed at the Weymouth project, should not be counted in calculating a reasonable period not to exceed 30 days during which its recognitional picketing would be lawful.

C. Discussion

We agree with the General Counsel that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act by picketing for more than 30 days without the filing of a valid petition, under Section 9(c) of the Act, for a Board election where an object of the Respondent's picketing was to force or require Whitaker to recognize the Respondent as the representative of its employees employed as laborers at its Weymouth project jobsite. As the Board long ago noted in the seminal case of Hod Carriers Local 840 (C. A. Blinne), 135 NLRB 1153 (1962), the expedited election procedure contemplated by Section 8(b)(7)(C) is applicable only in an 8(b)(7)(C) proceeding where an 8(b)(7)(C) unfair labor practice charge has been filed. "In the absence of an 8(b)(7)(C) unfair labor practice charge," the Board stated, "a union will not be enabled to obtain an expedited election by the mere device of engaging in recognition or organization picketing and filing a representation petition." Blinne, supra at 1157.[3] In this situation, the normal representation procedures are applicable; the showing of a substantial interest will be required, and the preelection hearing directed in Section 9(c)(1) will be held.

This approach has been incorporated in the Board's Rules and Regulations. Thus, Section 102.76 provides that when an employer has been picketed for an object proscribed by Section 8(b)(7) of the Act, a petition for the determination of a question concerning representation of the employees of that employer may be filed in accordance with the procedures under Section 9(c) of the Act, but if an 8(b)(7) charge has been filed against the labor organization that is picketing, the petition shall not be required to contain a statement that the employer declines to recognize the petitioner as the representative within the meaning of Section 9(a). Section 102.77(b) conditions an expedited election on the prior filing of a charge of an unfair labor practice under Section 8(b)(7)(C). (See also Board Statements of Procedure, Sec. 101.23.)

As the necessary proof that a substantial number of the employees desire to be represented by the petitioner was lacking to sustain the petition, dismissal of the petition was warranted. If an 8(b)(7) charge is filed before the petition is dismissed, then the expedited procedure is invoked, but in the present case no such charge was filed before the petition's dismissal. As the Board explained in Blinne, Congress did not intend to allow unions to circumvent 9(c) requirements by the mere device of engaging in picketing and filing a petition. Absent a charge that its picketing violated the law, there is no justification for allowing the Union to avail itself of the expedited election procedure and dispensing with normal showing-of-interest requirements. The proposition that the first proviso to Section 8(b)(7)(C) must be interpreted literally, rather than construed within the total context of the Act, has previously been urged and found deficient. See Reed v. Roumell, 185 F.Supp. 4 (D.C.E.D. Mich. 1960), discussed in Blinne at 1157–1158.

[3] Congress plainly did not intend such a result, the Board opined, citing Congressman Barden's statement in the Conference Report on the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 to the effect that the expedited election proviso to Sec. 8(b)(7)(C) was not intended to be used as a device or subterfuge by a picketing union to bring about a prehearing or quickie election. (105 Daily Cong. Rec. A8062, September 4, 1959; 2 Leg. Hist. 1813). Id.

We also reject the Respondent's argument that the 11 days during which its unsupported petition was pending prior to the Regional Director's dismissal should not be counted in computing the number of days in which it engaged in recognitional picketing. The Union's petition here did not raise a question concerning representation because of the Union's failure to obtain or submit any showing of interest. The Board has held that a petition that does not raise a valid question concerning representation does not preclude the finding of a violation under Section 8(b)(7)(C). Teamsters Local 639 (Dunbar Armored Express), 211 NLRB 687, 690 (1974).[4] Similarly, here, in the absence of an 8(b)(7) charge that would have triggered the expedited election procedure, a petition that may not otherwise lead to an election in no way protects a union's picketing for recognitional purposes beyond the period allowed by Section 8(b)(7)(C). Nor does it insulate the offending union from liability for its picketing in excess of that allowed by Section 8(b)(7)(C) for recognitional purposes.

Finally, we find it unnecessary to address the Respondent's additional contention based on Vila-Barr, supra, that the 14 days during which only one laborer was employed at the Weymouth project should not be counted against the limitation period on recognitional picketing. Since the Respondent picketed for 33 days without including that time period, that determination cannot affect the result in this case.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. A. P. Whitaker & Sons, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent, Local Union No. 133, Laborers International Union of North America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By picketing or causing to be picketed A. P. Whitaker & Sons, Inc. for more than 30 days without the filing of a valid petition, under Section 9(c) of the Act, for a Board election, and with an object of forcing or requiring the Company to recognize or bargain with the Respondent as the representative of its employees employed as laborers at its Weymouth, Massachusetts jobsite, the Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practice is an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Local Union No. 133, Laborers International Union of North America, Weymouth, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from picketing, or causing to be picketed, A. P. Whitaker & Sons, Inc., where an object thereof is forcing or requiring the Company to recognize or bargain with the Respondent as the representative of its employees employed as laborers at its Weymouth, Massachusetts jobsite, in violation of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its business office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Furnish the Regional Director for Region 1 signed copies of the notice for posting by A. P. Whitaker & Sons, Inc., if willing, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

[4] The Board distinguished the situation in Dunbar, where the union was unable to obtain a Board certification because of its decision to admit both guards and nonguards to membership from the situation in Teamsters Local 115 (Vila-Barr Co.), 157 NLRB 588 (1966), where the union was unable to obtain an election because the Board will not entertain an election petition for a one-man unit. In Vila-Barr, the Board stated, the union was disabled through no fault of its own from invoking the Board's processes, whereas in Dunbar the union was unable to obtain a certification because of its own voluntary choice to admit nonguard employees to membership.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT picket or cause to be picketed A. P. DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 14 January 1987 Administrative Law Judge David L. Evans issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the Charging Party filed a brief in opposition, and the General Counsel filed a cross-exception and supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondents, Local 851, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, and Local 295, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We deny as unnecessary the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial provision.

[2] We do not rely on the judge's finding that because the Respondents permitted the Charging Party to review the contracts, they had admitted the relevancy of the documents.

We need not decide whether the information requested is presumptively relevant, because the evidence here establishes the information is relevant.

Elliot J. Mandel, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Stephen H. Kahn, Esq., of New York, New York, for the Respondents.
Bonnie Glatzer and Eric Rosenfeld, Esqs., of New York, New York, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID L. EVANS, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried before me on 15 September 1986 in Brooklyn, New York. On 4 April 1986 Northern Air Freight, Inc. (Northern, the Employer, or Charging Party), filed the charge in Case 29–CB–6277 against Local 851, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 851). Also on 4 April Northern filed the charge in Case 29–CB–6278 against Local 295, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 295) (collectively the Respondents). On 21 May, the Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint, and notice of hearing (the complaint). The complaint alleges that Respondents have refused to furnish the Employer with information necessary for the defense against grievances in violation of Section 8(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondents filed an answer that, as amended, admits jurisdiction but denies the commission of any unfair labor practices. On the entire record and careful consideration of the briefs filed by Respondents, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, the Employer has been, and is, a corporation whose principal office and place of business is in Seattle, Washington. It has also maintained offices and facilities throughout New Jersey, New York, and Connecticut, including a facility at Inwood, New York, where it has been engaged in the business of providing air freight services at John F. Kennedy Airport. During the year preceding issuance of the complaint, the Employer, in the course and conduct of its New York metropolitan area operations, performed services valued in excess of $50,000, which services were the transportation of goods across state lines and, as such, is an instrumentality or link of interstate commerce. Therefore, the Employer is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

Locals 851 and 295 are now, and have been at all times material, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The ultimate legal issue in this case is whether Respondents must provide photocopies (or allow photocopying) of certain documents that were requested by the Employer. The facts are not in dispute.

Northern and Local 295 were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement that was, by its terms, effective from 2 April 1984 through 31 August 1985; that agreement covered "all truckdrivers, heipers, switcher," etc., employed by Northern in the New York City area. Northern and Local 851 were parties to another collective-bargaining agreement that was, by its terms, effective from 1 November 1984 through 31 August 1985; that agreement covered Northern's office clerical employees in the New York area. Both of these agreements were drafted by completing form agreements entitled "1982–1985 Master Agreement," and were referred to by the parties as the "1982–1985 Agreements," even though they were not actually effective until 1984. Both of those agreements had "guaranteed work force" provisions that required the Employer, throughout each contract's effective period, "maintain the existing number of employees" employed at the beginning of each contract's effective term.

In July 1985 both Respondents sent Northern notices of contract termination together with a complete set of contract proposals for new agreements. The letter incorporated separate proposals, which provided:

> 2. The undersigned employer, in lieu of engaging in protracted negotiations with the Union, does hereby agree that it will accept uniform terms and conditions of employment which may hereafter be negotiated with other firms in the Air Freight Industry.
> 4. The Employer agrees immediately to sign to the attached copy of the [Local 295 or Local 851] Joint Grievance Settlement Board Agreement and agrees to be bound by its terms.
> 5. The agreement between the parties effective from September 1, 1982 to August 31, 1985 shall remain in force and effect until the execution of the succeeding agreement which shall commence on September 1, 1985.

These proposals were referred to at the hearing as "me too" proposals or agreements. The Joint Grievance Settlement Board agreements provided for a panel, which was composed of an equal number of employer and union representatives, to hear and decide disputes and further provided, in the event of a tie vote by those representatives, for binding arbitration by a named permanent umpire.

Charles Nelson, vice president of operations at Northern, testified that at a negotiation session on 29 August 1985 representatives of Respondents presented the "me too" proposals as quoted above. The representatives told Nelson that, among the organized air freight services at JFK airport, only Emery Air Freight was then negotiating for a new agreement and that Northern could sign the "me too" proposals as presented or be struck. After receiving this threat, Nelson signed the "me too" agreements with Locals 851 and 295 on behalf of Northern.[1]

By letters dated 24 December 1985 Nelson notified representatives of both Respondents: "This is to advise you that Northern Air Freight, Inc., will close our New York (JKF) office effective January 15, 1986. Let us know if you wish to discuss this."

By letters dated 16 January 1986, by their attorney, Stephen H. Kahn, both Respondents notified Nelson that

> A dispute has arisen under the terms of the 1985–1988 [sic] collective-bargaining agreement between your company and the Union. That dispute concerns your company's termination of its operations at Kennedy Airport. The Union contends that such termination violates, inter alia, [section numbers] of the collective-bargaining agreement, including the guaranteed work force provisions.

The letter further stated that the disputes were being simultaneously submitted to the Joint Grievance Settlement Board for resolution and that body was being asked to convene promptly to resolve the dispute. By the date of Kahn's letter, and continuing to the date of the hearing, there has been no document purporting to be the "1985–1988 collective-bargaining agreement" between Northern and either of the Unions. As will be discussed, infra, Kahn later informed Northern that the reference to the "1985–1988 collective-bargaining agreement" was an error and that Respondents were actually referring to the agreements, which expire 31 August 1985 but were extended by the "me too" agreements.

On 28 February an article appeared in the Journal of Commerce that recited that Local 295 and Emery Air Freight had reached a contract, which settled a long strike. By letters dated 7 March, Northern, by its Attorney Eric Rosenfeld, notified the Unions that dates previously requested by Kahn for a meeting before the Joint Grievance Settlement Board were unacceptable and proposed other dates. Rosenfeld's letters concluded: "By copy of this letter to Mr. Kahn I am requesting him to furnish me with a copy of the 1986 Emery Agreement, in advance of the hearing to be scheduled in this case."

On 8 March Kahn and Rosenfeld had a telephone conversation in which, according to Rosenfeld:

> We discussed two subjects. One, the rescheduling or the scheduling of the Joint Grievance Settlement Board proceeding and, two, at my insistence of course, the company's need to have a copy of the [Emery] agreement since I told Mr. Kahn in this conversation, and have said it more than once, [that] Northern understood that it was "me too" in regard to Emery and that's why it needed and was demanding that the Emery agreement. It needed it in advance of the arbitration of the Joint Grievance Settlement Board proceeding whenever they were going to be held in order to prepare for those hearings.

Further, according to Rosenfeld, Kahn refused to supply the agreements, citing as the reason the insistence of his clients. Kahn did not testify.

On 11 April Kahn sent Rosenfeld a draft agreement, which he proposed as a settlement of the 16 January grievances.

By letter dated 15 April Rosenfeld replied with counterproposals stating that the counterproposals assumed > no change in guaranteed work force or other pertinent provisions of 1986 Emery Agreement. You must give us that Agreement so we can assess the > situation before we can either sign the settlement agreement, or, of course, proceed before the Joint Boards.

[1] There is no testimony that either 8(b)(1)B) or 8(b)(3) charges were filed over this incident.

At the bottom of the letter Rosenfeld subscripted:

> I am using the term "1986 Emery Agreement" to refer to whatever agreement(s) is (are) comprehended by the term "the 1985–1988 collective bargaining agreement" in the two 1/16/86 notices of disputes, and by the term "uniform terms and conditions of employment which may hereafter may be negotiated with other firms" in the 8/29/85 "me too" agreements (par. 2) and by the term "succeeding agreement" in para. 4 [sic] of said agreements.

(As quoted above, the term "succeeding agreement" appears in par. 5, not 4, of the "me too" agreement; no issue was made of this error.)

On 29 April Rosenfeld sent another letter to Kahn, copies to members of the Joint Grievance Settlement Board, asking for a postponement of the grievance hearings pending disposition of the NLRB charges filed herein, pending suit in Federal court for injunctive relief against the Joint Board Grievance proceedings, and further > pending Northern's timely receipt and review of all agreements negotiated by Locals 295 and 851 with Emery and other employers in the air freight industry since August 29, 1985 (the date of the "me-too" agreements between Northern and Local 295 and 851) and of all agreements comprising the "1985–1988 collective bargaining agreement" referenced in the January 16, 1986 notices of dispute.

Rosenfeld testified that several times he repeated his request for these contractual agreements to Kahn in telephone conversations. In addition, on 8 May, Rosenfeld wrote Kahn:

> In [sic] behalf of Northern Air Freight, we request, again, copies of the Emery and all other agreements negotiated by Locals 295 and/or 851 after August 29, 1985 (the date of the "me-too" agreements with Northern) "with other firms in the Air Freight industry," and of all agreements and/or other documents constituting "the 1985–1988 collective bargaining agreement between your company and the Union" referenced in the Local 851 and Local 295 notices of dispute dated January 16, 1986.

On 12 May Kahn replied to Rosenfeld by letter stating:

> As I advised you the last time that we met, the Unions are willing to permit your client to inspect the Airbone agreements. The Unions will not voluntarily permit inspection of other collective bargaining agreement[s]. It is the Union's position that these agreements are irrelevant both because Northern's "me-too" agreements relate to Airborne and because Northern closed its business prior to the negotiations of any master collective bargaining agreement for the 1985–1988 term.

By letter dated 19 May, Kahn further advised Rosenfeld:

> I have previously advised you that the January 16, 1986 demands for arbitration from both Locals were in error insofar as they referred to the "1985–1988 Collective Bargaining Agreement . . . ." Of course, there never was such an agreement. The Unions' claims arise under the "me-too" agreements and the 1982–1985 Collective Bargaining Agreements insofar as they were extended by the "me-too" agreements. Please correct both arbitration notices accordingly.

By letter dated 2 June, Kahn notified Rosenfeld that Respondents "will consent to the inspection of all documents which you have requested." Kahn further indicated the places where such inspections could be conducted and asked Rosenfeld to contact Kahn to set up a time for the inspections.

By letter dated 11 June Kahn reaffirmed that he was willing to arrange for inspection of the requested documents and added:

> My clients will also provide you with blank copies of the 1985–88 Master Collective Bargaining Agreement[s] for both unions. The vast majority of air freight employers under contract with Locals 295 and 851 have signed the Master without modification. Any addendum or modifications tend to reflect particular company-specific issues. Such changes from the Master Agreements are uncommon, not voluminous and not relevant to the dispute between our clients. You inspect such modifications, but the unions will not provide photocopies.

By letter dated 16 June, Attorney Bonnie Glatzer, an associate of Rosenfeld's replied to Kahn's 11 June letter accepting the offer to inspect whatever contracts Respondents would produce, but stated that she was doing so without waiving the right to make copies of the documents. On 18 June Attorney Glatzer went to the office of Local 851 where she was presented with the contracts that Union had negotiated with 10 air freight employers in the area and was further presented with a blank "1985–1988 Master Agreement" for the employers in the area. On 19 June Glatzer was presented with 130 collective-bargaining agreements and another blank "1985–1988 Master Agreement" by Local 295.

By letter dated 23 June, Glatzer notified Kahn:

> Following my review last week at the Union's offices of certain contracts with employers in the air freight industry entered into since August 20, 1985 by Local 295 and 851, I.B.T., we must again request copies of the non-printed provisions of these contracts, i.e., all side letters and/or addenda, which modify the printed 1985–1988 master agreements, as well as complete copies of all Emery contracts, side letters and addenda entered into since January 1, 1979, which together constitute the Emery agreement.

The reason for this request is that, in light of the size and complexity of these various agreements, my two-day review was inadequate for the thorough analysis of these documents needed to prepare our position for the arbitration and to evaluate the Company's and Unions' respective rights and obligations during the 1985–1988 period. Moreover, there was insufficient time to hand copy many relevant provisions, let alone discuss those provisions in confidence with my associates and our client.

As discussed in my letter to you on June 16, 1986, we stand ready and willing to provide the confidentiality assurances outlined therein.

Each "Master Agreement" consists of 12 pages of small type and 4 pages of addenda that were composed on a standard typewriter. Both contain "guaranteed work force" provision identical to those in the 1982–1985 agreements. No other 1985–1988 contracts were received by the Employer, and the precise volume of documents reviewed by Glatzer on 18 and 19 June is not in evidence.

Respondents presented no evidence. How Respondents determined that for the 1985–1988 period that Northern was "me too" to Airborne, and not Emery (or "me too" to Airborne and not any other employer in the New York area) is not suggested by the record.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

The complaint, paragraphs 9, 10, and 11, alleges as violations of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act:

> 9. On or about March 7, 1986, March 8, 1986, April 15, 1986 and May 8, 1986 and at all times material herein since said dates, Northern, by its attorneys, agents and representatives has requested Respondent Local 851 and Respondent Local 295, respectively, to furnish Northern with the following information:
> Copies of the Emery Air Freight agreement, and all other agreements with other firms in the air freight industry, negotiated by Local 295 and/or 851 after August 29, 1985, and all agreements and/or other documents constituting the 1985–88 collective bargaining agreement between the Employer and Locals 295 and 851.
> 10. The information requested by Northern, as described above in paragraph 9 is necessary for and relevant to Northern's ability to administer the collective bargaining agreements with Respondent Local 295 and Respondent Local 851, respectively, and to determine which collective bargaining agreements, if any, it is bound by, and to prepare its defenses to the grievances filed by Respondent Local 295 and Respondent Local 851, respectively, on January 16, 1986.
> 11. Since on or about March 8, 1986, Respondents have failed and refused to furnish to Northern the information requested by it, as described above in paragraphs 9 and 10.

Respondents admit the refusals to furnish copies of the specified[2] information or to allow Northern to copy it. Respondents defend their refusals to furnish copies, or permit making of copies, of the contracts on the following bases:

> The Consolidated Complaint should be dismissed because: (1) the documents are not relevant; (2) Northern has already inspected all of the documents: and (3) there has been no showing that the documents were so voluminous as to give Northern the legal right to copies of the documents. (Br. p. 2.)

Under Section 8(b)(3) of the Act the duty of labor organizations to bargain collectively, in good faith, is equal in scope to that of employers under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Carpenters of Will County (Mid-America Bargaining Assn.), 225 NLRB 530 (1981). Specifically, a labor organization's duty to furnish relevant information is parallel to that of an employer's. Plasterers Local 346 (Brawner Plastering), 273 NLRB 1143 (1984). Therefore, the first defense to be addressed is Respondents' assertion that the requested 1985–1988 collective-bargaining agreements are not relevant.

The law on the issue is plainly stated in Westinghouse Electric Corp., 239 NLRB 106, 107 (1978):

> The test of the [requesting party's] need for such information is simply a showing of "probability that the desired information was relevant, and that it would be of use to the [requesting party] in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities.[8] The [requesting party] need not demonstrate that the information sought is certainly relevant or clearly dispositive of the basic negotiation or arbitration issues between the parties. The fact that the information is of probable or potential relevance is sufficient to give rise to an obligation on the part of [in this case, the Unions] to provide it.[9] The appropriate standard in determining the potential relevance of information sought in aid of the bargaining agent's responsibility is a liberal discovery-type standard.[10]

[10] Acme Industrial Co., supra.

Respondents argue that because as amended by Kahn's letter of 19 May, the grievances were filed under the 1982–1985 Northern contracts, the 1985–1988 contracts with other employers are not relevant to the processing of those grievances, even under the liberal discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The answer to this argument is that the "me too" agreements provide for retroactive application (to 1 September 1985) of the terms of the 1985–1988 agreements that were negotiated by other area employers; Respondents may argue before an arbitrator, and an arbitrator may conclude, that Northern is bound by the terms of the 1985–1988 agreements, just if it had executed agreements for that period, as it had promised to do in the "me too" agreements. The effect would be, of course, that Northern would be liable, under the guaranteed work force provisions, to make whole the employees who were employed between 1 September 1985 and, at least, the date when Northern closed its JFK terminal operations; and the "make whole" remedy would be under the terms and conditions of employment contained in the 1985–1988 agreements with the other area employers.

[2] Not specified in the complaint were the Emery agreement "entered into since January 1, 1979" as additionally requested in Glatzer's letter of 23 June. Neither the relevance of the materials encompassed in the expanded request, nor the legality of Respondents' refusals to provide those materials, was litigated.

Respondents, in effect, have conceded the validity of this reasoning by their actions by permitting visual inspection and handcopying of the 1985–1988 agreements negotiated with other employers, the Unions necessarily were admitting that they intend to contend that Northern is to be held liable under those agreements in the grievance/arbitration process that Respondents had invoked. There could have been no other reason for presenting them for Northern's inspection on 18 and 19 June. Because this is Respondents' claim (or potential claim) in the grievance/arbitration process, they cannot simultaneously argue that Northern has no right to examine and photocopy the contracts.

Also, Respondents' production of the documents on 18 and 19 June is the answer to Respondents' second argument, that the documents need not be produced for reproduction because they have already been seen. As stated by the Third Circuit in Communications Workers Local 1051 v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 923 (1981), a case in which the employer had produced documents for review and handcopying, but would not allow photocopies: "[T]he Company, having provided for handcopying all of the information requested by the Union, may not now argue that it had no duty at all to disclose the requested material."

That is, rather than weigh against ordering production for copying, Respondents' production for visual inspection and note-taking by hand is further compelling evidence that production for duplication should be ordered.

I further find unpersuasive Respondents' third argument, that there has been no showing that the documents are voluminous enough to require Respondents to produce them for photocopying. In making this argument, Respondents rely on cases involving only the production of one page, Roadway Express, 275 NLRB 1107 (1985), or just a few pages and notes, Abercrombie & Fitch Co., 206 NLRB 464 (1973). In both cases the Board noted that there was no claim of difficulty in handcopying or understanding and held that there was no necessity for production of photocopies. Here, there is such a claim of difficulty in handcopying, and, although Respondents did not produce the contracts to demonstrate just how voluminous they were, it is safe to say that the documents that were produced are quite voluminous. For example, the expiring 1982–1985 agreements each were 12 pages long; the 1985–1988 Master Agreements given to the Company on 18 and 19 June (and placed in evidence) were each 16 pages long; and it is safe to assume that the other 140 contracts furnished on 18 and 19 June are of similar length. Therefore, even without a counting of the pages of the documents, which I have not seen, I find no difficulty in concluding that there are enough of them, and that they are assuredly long enough to justify requiring Respondents to produce them for the purposes of photocopying.

Finally, although not mentioned in their brief, in their answer Respondents claim that this matter should be deferred to arbitration. Such contention was rejected in General Dynamics Corp., 268 NLRB 1432 (1984), in which the Board held that it will not require the party seeking relevant information to invoke separate arbitrations, one for the purposes of production of relevant information and another for the disposition of the substance of a grievance.

Accordingly, I find and conclude that by refusing to provide photocopies, or by refusing to permit photocopying, of information relevant and necessary to the processing of grievances filed by Respondents, Respondents have violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Northern Air Freight, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

3. (a) The following employees of Northern Air Freight, Inc. have at all times material constituted a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All office clerical employees, including lead agents, dispatchers, agents, entry clerks and clerks of Northern employed in the New York metropolitan area, exclusive of all other employees, and guards, and supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

(b) The following employees of Northern Air Freight, Inc. have at all times material constituted a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All truckdrivers, helpers, switchers, platform men, motor lift truck operators, mechanics, garage employees and fuelers of Northern employed in the New York metropolitan area, exclusive of all office clerical employees, and guards, and supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

4. At all times material to this proceeding Respondent Local 851 and Respondent Local 295 have been the exclusive representatives of the employees in the appropriate units described, in paragraphs 3(a) and (b), above for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. Respondents have violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by failing and refusing to supply, pursuant to demands by Northern Air Freight, Inc. photocopies of information relevant, or presumptively relevant, and necessary to the processing of grievances filed on behalf of employees.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The actions of Respondents set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with their relationship with Northern Air Freight, Inc., have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondents, Local 851, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, and Local 295, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Northern Air Freight, Inc. by refusing to furnish that Employer with photocopies of information relevant, or presumptively relevant, and necessary to the processing of grievances filed on behalf of its employees.

(b) Engaging in any like or related conduct in derogation of Respondent's statutory duties to bargain.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Furnish, on request by Northern Air Freight, Inc., photocopies of Respondents' 1985–1988 contracts with other New York City area employers in the air freight industry, which information is relevant, or presumptively relevant, and necessary to the processing of grievances filed on behalf of employees. Respondents shall provide, or allow Northern Air Freight, Inc. to make, the photocopies, and shall bargain over the reasonable additional costs for furnishing the requested information, which costs shall be assumed by Northern Air Freight, Inc.

(b) Post at their business offices and meeting places copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A" in the case of Respondent Local 851, or "Appendix B" in the case of Respondent Local 295.[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representatives, shall be posted by them for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Sign and return to the Regional Director for Region 29 sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A" in the case of the Respondent Local 851, or sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B" in the case of Respondent Local 295, for posting by Northern Air Freight, Inc. if willing, in conspicuous places at the New York City area facilities, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondents has taken to comply.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 12 July 1985 Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board had delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found that the Respondent unilaterally decreased employees' hourly wages and abrogated the health and welfare, pension, and holiday and vacation provisions of the existing collective-bargaining agreements and thereafter refused to furnish the Union (sometimes referred to herein as the Locals) with employees' names, addresses, dates of hire, and wage rates, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1). We agree.[3] We also agree with the judge's findings that the Respondent coercively interrogated James Poda about a grievance that the Union had filed on his behalf and threatened him with discharge in violation of Section 8(a)(1), but that it did not unlawfully interrogate employees when it attempted to obtain affidavits from them in preparation of its defense against charges in Case 32–CA–6566.[4] Further, we agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent's advising employees that they would be permanently replaced if they participated in a strike constituted a threat violative of Section 8(a)(1). For the reasons that follow, however, we reverse his finding that this threat also violated Section 8(a)(5). Similarly, we reverse the judge's finding that the Respondent's communicating its bargaining position to employees and explaining in detail its proposals constitutes unlawful direct dealing with them.

The facts of this case are fully set forth in the judge's decision. The Respondent is a glass installation company that employs 17 auto glass installers in 9 shops in northern California. These employees are represented by Locals 169, 718, and 1621. Locals 169 and 1621 are joint parties to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent effective from 1 July 1982 through 30 June 1985. The collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and Local 718 was effective for the same term.

Pursuant to wage reopener provisions in the contracts, the Locals and the Respondent met jointly in June and July 1984[5] to negotiate wages for the final year of the contracts. During these negotiations, we have found, the Respondent insisted on modifying certain terms of the contracts, not all of which were covered by the reopener provisions, and ultimately unlawfully implemented these modifications as well as others on 18 July. Immediately

[2] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt the judge's findings that the Respondent did not unlawfully transfer employee James Poda, solicit employees to resign from the Union, or threaten to close its facilities.

[3] In affirming the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Secs. 8(a)(5) and (1) and 8(d) by insisting on terms that were beyond the scope of the reopener clauses of the existing collective-bargaining agreements and thereafter instituting midterm modifications of the agreements based on its proposals, we disavow any implication that holiday and vacation deductions were nonbargainable subjects. As the evidence relating to the parties' past practice in midterm bargaining negotiations is inconclusive on this point and inasmuch as vacations and holiday deductions are included in the wage schedules appended to the contracts, contributions to those funds (i.e., deductions from employees' net wages therefor) arguably are negotiable under the wage reopener provisions. Nevertheless we agree with the judge that even if the Respondent genuinely believed that it could modify the agreement after reaching a bona fide impasse, no such impasse was possible because the Respondent additionally insisted on changing noneconomic terms of the holiday and vacation provisions. Although it did not expressly condition acceptance of its 13 June offer on a change in actual holidays, the imposition of eligibility requirements for holidays and alteration of eligibility for vacations and their length, as well as the proposal itself and the restatement of the proposal in the Respondent's 18 July telegram to the Union announcing the unilateral changes, make it clear that the noneconomic items were so integral to the remaining economic proposals as to make one contingent on the acceptance of the other.

[4] Contrary to his colleagues, Member Babson does not adopt the judge's dismissal of the allegation that the Respondent, through its attorney, violated Sec. 8(a)(1) based on the interrogation of employees for the purpose of preparing its defense to Local 1621's unfair labor practice charge. Local 1621's charge alleged that the Respondent engaged in direct dealing in certain meetings with employees in violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1). The judge concluded that Johnnie's Poultry Co., 146 NLRB 770 (1964), applies only to situations where an employer interrogates employees about matters involving their Sec. 7 rights and that the questions here, concerning what statements were made by the Respondent's representatives and its attorney at the previous meetings, did not pertain to the employees' involvement in conduct protected by Sec. 7. In Member Babson's view, such a reading of Johnnie's Poultry may be unduly restrictive, particularly in light of the circumstances of this case. Before passing on this issue, however, Member Babson would remand this portion of the case to the judge to resolve the conflicts in testimony whether the Respondent's attorney, in fact, provided adequate safeguards to the employees.

following the 13 and 23 June negotiation sessions, the Respondent's chief negotiator and attorney, William Haynes, Vice President of Industrial Relations Robert Courtney, and Division Manager Kenneth Anderson conducted group meetings at the shops. At these meetings Courtney told employees about the status of negotiations, outlined the features of the Respondent's 13 June proposal in detail, and told employees it had three options: (1) continuing operations and losing money; (2) closing; or (3) operating profitably under its proposals. In setting forth these options, Courtney told employees that while the Union had not stated its intent to strike, it could do so under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreements. He explained that in the event of a strike, the Respondent would permanently replace strikers and that the Union could fine employees who refused to strike. In response to questions, Courtney promised to provide employees with sample language they could use in letters resigning from the Union and subsequently did so.[6]

The judge found that by outlining proposals to the employees that were beyond the scope of the reopener provisions, with a view toward unilaterally implementing them, the Respondent engaged in direct dealing with the employees in contravention of Section 8(a)(5). In this connection, the judge reasoned that because of the Respondent's unlawful conduct both at the bargaining table and away from it, any strike called as a result of the parties' failure to reach an agreement would be an unfair labor practice strike rather than an economic one, and he found that the Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees that they would be permanently replaced. He found that this threat also violated Section 8(a)(5) inasmuch as it was "part and parcel" of the Respondent's direct dealing with the employees. We find merit in the Respondent's exception that it was privileged to communicate its bargaining position to the employees, and we reverse the judge's finding that it thereby violated Section 8(a)(5). Additionally, although we affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent's striker replacement statement runs afoul of Section 8(a)(1) as it constitutes a threat permanently to replace unfair labor practice strikers, we reverse his finding that the statement violates Section 8(a)(5).

[6] The judge found that option 2 was a viable prediction in view of the Respondent's financial condition and not an unlawful threat. The judge also found that because the sample resignation letters it distributed to employees made it clear that resigning from membership was their choice, the Respondent did not unlawfully solicit employees to resign. As noted at fn. 2, above, we have adopted these findings in the absence of exceptions.

In analyzing the Respondent's conduct, the judge distinguished United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 609 (1985), and 274 NLRB 1069 (1985). In the latter decision the Board stated (274 NLRB at 1074):

> In our view, an employer has a fundamental right, protected by Section 8(c) of the Act, to communicate with its employees concerning its position in collective-bargaining negotiations and the course of those negotiations. . . . [W]e believe that free and open discussion by all parties to the collective-bargaining process affords the best chance for successful conclusion of negotiations and creates the most favorable climate for successful bargaining. Indeed, employees ought to be fully informed as to all issues relevant to collective-bargaining negotiations and the parties' positions as to those issues. We believe employees are fully capable of evaluating the relative merits of those positions for themselves. As in United Technologies (274 NLRB 609) there is nothing in the Respondent's communications here which indicates an effort by the Respondent to bargain directly with the employees or an invitation to them to abandon their representative to achieve better terms directly from the Respondent. Indeed, all the Respondent's substantive proposals were submitted to the Union prior to their disclosure to the employees.

The same is true in the instant case. The Respondent had a right to communicate its position to the employees. That the proposals were beyond the scope of the reopener provisions does not, without more, compel a different finding. Though not within the purview of the reopeners, the Respondent did submit its proposals to the Locals before disclosing them to the employees. The Respondent's disclosure of its bargaining position to the employees occurred before it unlawfully insisted on and implemented its proposals. The evidence does not establish that communication with the employees was tactically part of an unlawful bargaining strategy.[7] Further, it has been found that the Respondent did not attempt to undermine the Locals by soliciting employees to resign from the Union. Hence, there is no evidence that the Respondent bypassed the Union and dealt directly with the employees. Inasmuch as the Respondent's telling employees they would be replaced in the event of a strike was not a function of any unlawful direct dealing with them, we find that the admonition did not independently violate Section 8(a)(5).

Having found that the Respondent did not bypass the Union and deal directly with the employees or threaten them with replacement in violation of Section 8(a)(5), we shall modify the judge's recommended Order accordingly.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Lear Siegler, Inc., d/b/a Safelite Glass, San Mateo, San Francisco, Richmond, Oakland, San Jose, Pleasant Hill, San Leandro, Hayward, and Fremont, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(e).

"(e) Threatening to permanently replace employees if they support a strike caused by the Respondent's insistence that the Unions accept nonbargainable items as a part of the Respondent's contract proposal."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glassworkers Union, Local Nos. 169, 718, and 1621, International Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, AFL-CIO, by refusing to furnish the Unions with names, addresses, dates of hire, and wage rates of our employees in the appropriate bargaining units as follows:

(i) All our employees, excluding supervisors as defined in the Act, employed in the job classifications covered by our contract with Local Unions 169 and 1621 effective from 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985, and who are employed at our facilities located in California in the cities of Richmond, Oakland, San Jose, Pleasant Hill, San Leandro, Hayward and Fremont.

(ii) All our employees, excluding supervisors as defined in the Act, employed in the job classifications covered by our contract with Local Union 718 effective from 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985, and who are employed at our San Mateo, California and San Francisco, California facilities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with the above-named Unions by unilaterally ceasing to make contributions on behalf of our unit employees to the health and welfare, pension, and holiday and vacation funds as provided for in our collective-bargaining contracts with the Unions, which were effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985, during the term of those contracts.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with the above-named Unions by unilaterally instituting during the term of our contracts with the Unions our own health and welfare and pension plans for the plans provided for in our contracts with the Unions with respect to our unit employees.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with the above-named Unions by unilaterally during the term of our contracts with the Unions decreasing the vacation and holiday benefits and wage rates established by our contracts with the Unions with respect to unit employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten to permanently replace employees if they support a strike caused by our insistence that the Unions accept nonbargainable items as part of our contract proposal.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees about grievances they file against us with the above-named Unions and WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge for filing such grievances.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on written request of the above-named Unions, furnish the Unions with the names, addresses, dates of hire, and wage rates of our unit employees.

WE WILL, on written request of the above-named Unions, restore making payments on behalf of the unit employees to the health and welfare, pension, and vacation and holiday funds established by our contracts with the Unions effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985.

WE WILL, on written request of the above-named Unions, restore the holiday and vacation benefits and wage rates of the unit employees so as to conform to the provisions contained in our contracts with the Unions effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985.

WE WILL, on written request of the above-named Unions, rescind the health and welfare and pension plans that we instituted in July 1984 and reestablish the health and welfare and pension plans that were in existence under our contracts with the Unions effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985.

WE WILL make whole the employees in the above-described units by making the contributions to the health and welfare, pension, and vacation and holdiay funds, as provided in the above-described applicable collective-bargaining agreements, which were not paid and which would have been paid absent our unilateral discontinuance of such contributions during the term of the agreements, and by reimbursing the unit employees for any expenses ensuing from our failure to make such contributions, with interest.

WE WILL make whole the employees in the above-described units for any losses or expenses they may have suffered as a result of our unilateral conduct during the term of our contracts with the above-named Unions in decreasing the employees' holiday and vacation benefits, decreasing their wages, and substituting our own health and welfare and pension plans for the plans established by the Unions' contracts, with interest.

LEAR SIEGLER, INC., D/B/A SAFELITE GLASS

William O'Connor and Rony Clements, Esqs., for the General Counsel.
William Haynes, Esq. (Edison, Lewis, Porter & Haynes), for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JERROLD H. SHAPIRO, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated proceeding in which a hearing was held 12 through 14 March 1985 is based on unfair labor practice charges filed against Lear Siegler, Inc., d/b/a Safelite Glass (the Respondent), by the Unions named in the case caption (collectively called the Unions and separately called Locals 169, 718, and 1621),[1] and a consolidated amended complaint issued 26 February 1985 against Respondent, by the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board, on behalf of the Board's General Counsel, alleging that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

More specifically the amended consolidated complaint alleges in substance that Respondent violated the Act, as follows: Section 8(a)(1) by interrogating employee Poda about a grievance filed against Respondent on his behalf by Local 718 and threatening him with discharge and other unspecified reprisals because of the filing of the grievance, and by coercively interrogating employees in connection with preparing its defense to the unfair labor practice charges in this proceeding; Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by transferring employee Poda from one facility to another because of his union or other protected concerted activities; Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment of employees represented by the Unions during the term of existing collective-bargaining agreements, by dealing directly with employees represented by the Unions, by engaging in conduct calculated to undermine the employees' support of the Unions, and by refusing to furnish to the Unions certain requested information needed by the Unions to perform their duties as the employees' collective-bargaining representative. Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.[2]

On the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the posthearing briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Changes in Employees' Terms and Conditions of Employment

1. The evidence

Respondent is a corporation whose headquarters are in Wichita, Kansas. Its sells and installs automobile glass throughout the United States. The facilities involved in this case are its nine northern California shops: Richmond, Oakland, San Jose, San Mateo, San Francisco, Pleasant Hill, San Leandro, Hayward, and Fremont. During the time material these shops employed approximately 17 auto glass installers. Before 1 July 1982 these auto glass installers were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement between the Unions and an employer association, the Glass Management Association, effective from 1 July 1979 to 30 June 1982. This agreement encompassed a multiemployer bargaining unit comprised of

[1] The charge in Case 32-CA-6566 was filed 21 June 1984 by Local 1621 and amended charges in that case were filed by Locals 1621 and 718 on 12 July 1984 and by the Unions on 18 July 1984. On 25 October 1984 the Unions filed the charge in Case 32-CA-6864.

[2] In its answer Respondent admits that it meets one of the Board's applicable discretionary jurisdictional standards and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Also in its answer Respondent admits that the Unions are labor organizations within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

Respondent and the other employers who were members of the Glass Management Association. Respondent withdrew timely from this unit prior to the expiration of the 1979–1982 Association agreement. Subsequently, it negotiated successor contracts on a single employer basis with Local 718, and with Locals 169 and 1621. The contract with Local 718 covered Respondent's San Mateo and San Francisco shops, and the contract with Locals 169 and 1621 covered its remaining seven shops in northern California.[3] Each of these contracts were for 3 years' duration, effective from 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985. Each contained a grievance procedure ending in binding impartial arbitration.

The pertinent provisions of the the 1982–1985 contract between Respondent and Locals 169 and 1621 covering Respondent's auto glass installers are as follows. The contract contains health and welfare, pension, vacation, and holiday benefits for the covered employees, including specified health and welfare and pension plans. Pursuant to the contract's terms, Respondent agreed to pay $1.60 an hour for each employee to the contractual trust funds to finance the employees' health and welfare benefits, and $2.53 an hour to finance the employees' pension benefits. Also Respondent agreed to pay 4 cents an hour to finance an industry promotional fund. Regarding vacation and holiday benefits, Respondent agreed to deduct $1.97 an hour from employees' net hourly pay and transmit these moneys to a vacation and holiday fund. The contract provides that employees are entitled to seven holidays a year and if they work 40 weeks a year they are entitled to 3 weeks' vacation. Respondent did not pay the employees for the aforesaid holiday and vacation benefits. Rather, the money Respondent was required to deduct from their wages for the vacation and holiday fund was paid to the employees by the fund twice yearly. Regarding the employees' union dues, the contract provides for Respondent to deduct 30 cents an hour from an employee's net pay and transmit this money either to the Unions or to an agent designated by the Unions.

Regarding employees' wages, the section of Respondent's 1982–1985 contract with Locals 169 and 1621 entitled, "Wages for Auto Glass Mechanics"[4] reads as follows:

> (i) Hourly Wage Rates
> The minimum straight time hourly rate of wages for Auto Glass Mechanics shall be as follows:
> Effective 1 July 1982—$15.17
> Total Package 1 July 1982—$19.34[5]
> (ii) Effective 1 October 1982 there will be a fifty cent (.50 cent) an hour increase to the total package to be distributed as the Union determines.
> (iii) Effective 1 May 1983 it is agreed that the Union and [Respondent] shall meet to determine the wage increase for the remaining two (2) years of this Agreement.
> (iv) It will not be a violation of Article 35, Work Stoppage, if the union strikes or the Employer locks out because there has been no agreement of the amount of wage increase for the following two years.

Continuing, the section of the contract dealing with wages contains a subsection entitled, "Transfer of Money from Wages to Benefit Funds" that reads as follows:

> During the term of this Agreement the Union may request in writing an increase in the contributions required by the Employers to the Group Health and Welfare Plan, Pension Plan . . . and a corresponding reduction in the minimum hourly wage rates set forth in Section A. Such request shall be made in writing 30 days prior to the proposed effective date requested by the Union. As of such date the hourly minimum wage rates set forth in section A of this Article shall be reduced in an amount equal to the increase required of individual Employers to the particular benefit fund or funds.
> Any increase in the required contribution by the Employers to the particular benefit fund or funds and the corresponding reduction in the minimum hourly wage rate shall be set forth in a Memorandum of Understanding by the Employer and Union.

The Locals 169 and 1621 contract also contains a "Supplementary Understanding" agreed to by the parties that provides:

> 1. The Employer and the Union have today executed a Collective Bargaining Agreement effective 1 July 1982 and extending through 30 June 1985. The parties agreed that because of the extended period covered by this Agreement conditions may change within the industry, and that it maybe desirable to both parties to institute changes in the Agreement that will reflect a recognition of the differing conditions. Rather than delay action until the expiration of the contract, the parties have agreed that discussion and negotiation may be carried out through the medium of the Joint Conference Committee set up under the Collective Bargaining Agreement between Glass Management Association and the Union.
> 2. Any additions or amendments to the Collective Bargaining Agreement agreed to by the Joint Conference Committee pursuant to said discussions and negotiations shall become a part of the Collective Bargaining Agreement, provided, however, that any such additions or amendments must be ratified by both the members of the Employers and the Union, in accordance with the rules of the Employer and the Union.
> 3. In the event the members of the Joint Conference Committee cannot reach agreement on proposed additions or amendments pursuant to the discussions and negotiations provided herein or in the event of lack of ratification by either side, such disagreement shall not be subject to arbitration under Article 37.

[3] The record reveals that Respondent's San Mateo and San Francisco shops are within the territorial jurisdiction of Local 718 and the remaining seven shops are within the territorial jurisdictions of either Locals 169 or 1621.

[4] The contract refers to the auto glass installers as auto glass mechanics.

[5] The reference to "Total Package" refers to the $15.17 net wage, the $1.60-an-hour contribution for the health and welfare benefits, the $2.53 contribution for the pension benefits, and the 4-cent contribution to the industry trust fund.

The pertinent provisions of Respondent's contract with Local 718 covering Respondent's auto glass installers are the same as the above-described provisions in the Locals 169 and 1621 contract, except as follows. In that portion of the Local 718 contract dealing with "Wages For Auto Glass Mechanics" the parties agreed that effective 16 October 1982 the employees' net wages would be increased from $15.17 to $15.45 per hour and Respondent's pension contributions would be increased from $2.53 to $2.75 an hour and that Respondent would deduct for the vacation and holiday fund $2 an hour from an employee's net pay rather than $1.97, and deduct for union dues 31 cents an hour rather than 30 cents. In other words, the Local 178 agreement, like the Locals 169 and 1621 agreement, called for an increase of 50 cents an hour in the total package effective October 1982, but the parties agreed to distribute the 50-cent increase (28 cents to wages and 22 cents to pension benefits) at the time the contract was negotiated. Under the Locals 169 and 1621 contract, the Unions distributed the 50-cent-an-hour increase by raising net wages from $15.17 to $15.61 an hour and raising pension contributions from $2.53 to $2.59 an hour. The other pertinent difference between the Locals 169 and 1621 contract and the Local 178 contract is that whereas the Locals 169 and 1621 contract provided that effective 1 May 1983 the parties would meet to determine "the wage increase for the remaining 2 years of this Agreement," the Local 178 contract provided that: "1 July 1983 . . . Wages to be Negotiated" and "1 July 1984 . . . Wages to be Negotiated."

The 1979–1982 Glass Management Association contract, to which Respondent and the Unions were previously bound, did not include a wage reopener provision. This contract provided for wage increases at 6-month intervals during the term of the contract, based on an increase in the cost of living. The formula for these pay raises was contained in the contract. The Unions, pursuant to this formula, determined the amount of the increase that was due to the covered employees. It is undisputed that the Unions, without bargaining with the employers, covered by the Association contract, allotted part of these cost-of-living increases to the employers' contractual health and welfare and pension benefit contributions.

The Local 718 contract effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985 was negotiated by the parties separate and apart from the negotiations between Respondent and Locals 169 and 1621, which resulted in the Locals 169 and 1621 contract of the same duration. However, the negotiation meetings on 3 and 29 June 1983, described in detail infra, held pursuant to the wage reopener provisions of those contracts, was conducted jointly. The representatives of all three Local Unions met together jointly with Respondent's representatives. The business manager of Local 1621, William Brown, acted as the Unions' spokesperson.

On 3 June 1983 representatives from all three Unions met with Robert Courtney, the Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, and Ken Anderson, Respondent's division manager. After informing Courtney and Anderson that the Unions were negotiating together and that Brown was the chairman and Carl Dahl of Local 718 was the secretary of the Unions' negotiating committee, Brown stated that they were there to negotiate for a total package only and that the Unions would decide how this package was divided. Brown also stated that, as set forth in the Local 718 agreement, they were there to negotiate for 1 year only and would meet again in 1984 to negotiate for that year. Respondent's negotiators agreed to this. Brown proposed that effective 1 July 1983 the total package for Respondent's auto glass installers be increased by 99 cents an hour to $20.83 and that 24 cents of this amount be used for health and welfare. Courtney replied that this was not acceptable because, among other things, since January 1983 Respondent had lost over $200,000 doing business in the area mainly because of high labor costs. The parties agreed to meet 29 June 1983, at which time Courtney stated Respondent would have its proposal for the Unions. Before leaving there was a brief discussion initiated by Courtney or Anderson concerning a staggered workweek. During this discussion, Brown pointed out to the Company's negotiators that "at this time we [are] only talking wages for the three local unions."[6]

On 29 June 1983, when the negotiations resumed, Respondent offered to increase the contractual total package by 24 cents an hour, an amount sufficient to cover the increase that Brown had previously stated the Unions needed for Respondent's contractual health and welfare contributions. The Unions' negotiators rejected this offer and countered with an offer of 70 cents a hour, 29 cents lower than their previous offer. Respondent's negotiators then raised their offer from 24 to 44 cents an hour, and before the meeting ended the parties agreed on a 50-cent-an-hour increase in the total package.

On approximately 1 July 1983 Local 718, in writing, notified Respondent that effective 1 July 1983 the contractual wage schedule for the employees covered by the Local 718 contract would be as follows: net wages—$15.71; H & W—$1.84; pension—$2.65; IBPAT pension—10 cents; industry fund—4 cents; total—$20.34. When this wage schedule is compared with the one in effect since October 1982, it reveals that Local 718 used the 50-cent-an-hour increase in the total package that it received from Respondent at the 29 June 1983 negotiation meeting to raise the net wage of an employee by 26 cents an hour, and to raise the Respondent's health and welfare contributions by 24 cents an hour.

[6] The description of what occurred during the 3 June negotiation meeting is based on the Unions' minutes of this meeting, introduced into evidence by Respondent without objection, and Brown's and Courtney's testimony. The only conflict between Brown's and Courtney's testimony is Courtney's testimony that when Brown proposed increasing the total package by 99 cents, Brown stated 24 cents of this increase would be for health and welfare, whereas Brown testified that without stating any specific amount he told Respondent's negotiators that a portion of the 99 cents would be allotted by the Unions to health and welfare. I have credited Courtney's testimony in this respect.

Likewise, on approximately 1 July 1983 Locals 169 and 1621, in writing, notified Respondent that effective 1 July 1983 the contractual wage schedule for the auto glass installers covered by Locals 169 and 1621 contract would be as follows: net wage—$15.84; H & W—$1.84; pension—$2.37; IBPAT pension—$25 cents; industry fund—4 cents; total—$20.34. When this wage schedule is compared to the one in effect since October 1982 it reveals that Locals 169 and 1621 used the 50-cent-an-hour increase in the total package that they received from Respondent at the 29 June 1983 negotiating meeting, to raise employees' net wages by 23 cents an hour, the Respondent's health and welfare contributions by 24 cents an hour, and the Respondent's pension contributions by 3 cents an hour.

On 16 April 1984 William Brown, Local 1621's business manager, wrote Robert Courtney, Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, as follows:

> This is to advise you that pursuant to Article 16 Section A (iv) of the current Bargaining Agreement in effect between you and the undersigned Union, this letter shall serve as a written notice to you, from the undersigned Union of its request to negotiate an amendment to said Collective Bargaining Agreement in order to determine the wage increase for the remaining year of the Agreement.
> This letter will further serve as notice that in the event agreement is not reached to modify the Agreement by midnight 30 June 1984, the Union may exercise its rights under Article 16 Section A (v) of the Agreement unless both parties mutually agree to extend the negotiations because of progress in good faith negotiations.
> It is the desire of the Local to enter into negotiations per Article 16, before the date of 3 June 1984 and hopefully reach an amicable settlement.

In response to Brown's 16 April 1984 letter, Courtney on 14 May 1984 wrote identical letters to Brown and to A. F. Sanzo, the business manager of Local 169, which read as follows:

> This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated 16 April 1984, advising that prusuant to Article 16, Section A (IV) of the current bargaining agreement in effect between your local union and Safelite, you are giving notice to negotiate an amendment to said collective bargaining agreement.
> It is understood that the notice to reopen the agreement includes wages as well as fringe benefits which are also a part of the wage package.
> We will be available to meet with you at a mutually agreeable place, date and time. Please contact me at your earliest convenience so that arrangements may be made for our first meeting.

In late May 1984 or early June 1984 Courtney telephoned Brown and asked that they schedule a negotiation meeting. Courtney also suggested that the three Local Unions negotiate with Respondent jointly in the same manner as during the June 1983 reopener negotiations and asked if Brown intended to act as the spokesperson for the three Local Unions during the 1984 reopener negotiations. Brown stated that he would be acting as the spokesperson for each of the three Local Unions and agreed with Courtney to commence these negotiations on 13 June 1984. As a matter of fact the negotiation meetings held during June and July 1984, described in detail infra, were conducted jointly. The representatives of all three Local Unions met jointly with Respondent's representatives. Brown acted as the spokesperson for the Unions during the negotiations.

On 13 June 1984 the first negotiation session took place. It lasted approximately 1-1/2 hours. There were two representatives present for each of the three Local Unions. Brown acted as spokesperson for the negotiation committee and Russell Young of Local 718 acted as secretary for the negotiation committee and took notes of the meeting. Present for Respondent were Division Manager Anderson, Vice President of Industrial Relations Courtney, and Respondent's lawyer, William Haynes. Haynes was the spokesperson for Respondent's negotiating committee.

The meeting began with Brown, in response to Haynes' request that the Local Unions present a proposal, stating that "economic issues are open" and proposing a 5.5-percent increase in wages that was equivalent to a $1.12-an-hour increase for the auto glass installers. Brown stated that included in this increase was approximately 20 to 30 cents an hour in increased employer contributions to the contractual health and welfare fund that was needed to maintain the current benefits provided by the current medical plan. Haynes rejected this proposal. He stated that due to the Company's financial condition they were there to ask the Unions to "hold the line" on wages. He also objected to the construction industry-type of fringe benefits that the employees were receiving, and stated that Respondent wanted to pay vacation and holiday pay directly to the employees, rather than to a vacation and holiday fund as required by the contract. Brown responded by stating, "We're open for wages only" and told Haynes the payment of vacation and holiday pay was separate from wages and the Unions were there to negotiate a "dollar amount" and not any contractual language. Haynes stated Respondent wanted to discuss vacations and holidays. He explained Respondent was not in the construction industry and, unlike an employer in the construction industry, its employees were employed on a permanent basis, rather than on a transient basis, thus the contracts' vacation and holiday provisions were not appropriate for Respondent's operation.

After the Unions' negotiating committee caucused, Brown informed Haynes, "We're open for economic issues only," but pointed out that under the section of the contracts entitled, "Supplementary Understanding," the Unions were willing to discuss anything and would be happy to schedule such meetings with Haynes. Haynes stated that Respondent was losing money and needed some kind of relief and, in particular, needed a new agreement that related to the service industry rather than the construction industry. In this regard, Haynes stated that Respondent wanted to pay the vacation and holiday pay directly to the employees rather than into a fund. Brown stated that the Unions' negotiating committee was not prepared to discuss this subject and pointed out that as far back as 1978 Local 1621 had offered Respondent a service agreement that Respondent rejected. Brown stated that the Unions' negotiating committee was "not here to throw out Appendix C of the Agreement," i.e., referring to the appendix contained in the Unions' current contracts with Respondent that covers the auto glass installers. After a brief discussion of why the Unions' contracts contained the present holiday and vacation pay provisions and why Respondent was opposed to those provisions, Brown asked Haynes for Respondent's contract proposal. Haynes presented Respondent's contract proposal, which was as follows: seven paid holidays, one of which was the employees' employment anniversary instead of Washington's Birthday as in the current contracts, with eligibility determined by working the workday before and after the holiday; 2 weeks of paid vacation after 1 year of employment and 3 weeks after 10 years, with eligibility determined by working at least 1800 hours during the 12 months prior to the employee's anniversary date; the elimination of the present holiday and vacation fund with Respondent paying the employees' holiday and vacation benefits directly to the employees; the elimination of the Unions' pension and medical plans that would be replaced by the Respondent's pension and medical plans; the elimination of the Respondent's contributions to the industry fund; and auto glass installers to be paid an hourly rate of $15.[7]

On receipt of Respondent's proposal, the Unions' negotiating committee caucused and, after the caucus, Brown told Haynes that the Company's proposal had taken the Unions by surprise and stated, "We feel that we are willing to discuss anything you want excepting the change of the fringe package. If you feel that this was the problem, why did you wait until [this date] to discuss your difficulties?" Haynes stated that Respondent was having financial difficulties and that there was no way that it could afford the 5.5-percent increase the Unions were proposing and that it needed a reduction in the total package. The meeting then ended with the parties agreeing to meet again on 21 and 26 June 1984.[8]

The next negotiation session, which was held 26 June 1984, lasted approximately 1-1/2 hours.[9] Haynes began the meeting by asking whether Brown had received a copy of the Company's pension and medical plans that Respondent had mailed to him. Brown acknowledged receipt of these plans, but stated that he had not read them because the Unions were present "to open the agreement for wages only." He also stated that if Respondent wanted to discuss other things, they would meet with Respondent at another time to discuss those other items. Haynes replied that the Unions' proposal included an increase not just in wages, but in other economic items. Brown stated that the Unions' contracts with Respondent by their terms stated that they were only open for wages. Haynes repeated that the Unions were proposing something other than simply a raise in pay. Brown responded by stating, "no we're not . . . when we negotiate, it's for the entire wage package." After more argument about the purpose of the negotiations, Haynes pointed out to Brown that the Unions had not as yet responded to Respondent's 13 June proposal. Brown replied, "We're here to talk money only," whereupon, Respondent's negotiating committee caucused.

After the caucus, Haynes presented what he called an "Alternative Proposal," which provided for the elimination of the industry trust fund, the continuation of the current health and welfare, and pension and holiday and vacation benefits and for seven paid holidays and 2 weeks' vacation after 1 year employment and 3 weeks after 10 years and further provided for a total package of $16.95 an hour to be apportioned as follows: $15 an hour for wages; 58 cents an hour for Respondent's contribution to the holiday and vacation fund for vacations; and 40 cents an hour to the holiday and vacation fund for holidays; 53 cents an hour for the Respondent's contribution to the health and welfare fund; and 44 cents an hour for the Respondent's contribution to the pension fund.

On receipt of the "Alternative Proposal" the Unions' negotiating committee caucused. When the negotiations resumed, Brown stated to Haynes, "First of all, we want to make it very clear that we are not discussing language" and made a counteroffer of a 5-percent increase in the total wage package, which was equivalent to $1.02 an hour for the auto glass installers. Brown also told Haynes that the manner in which the Unions distributed this $1.02-an-hour increase was not bargainable as it was a matter for the Unions to unilaterally determine. Haynes stated that Respondent wanted to determine how the $1.02 was apportioned. Brown stated that the Unions' position was consistent with what had been done in the past. Haynes at this point stated, "We seem to agree to disagree" and that there did not seem to be anything left to discuss. Brown suggested that the parties leave their telephone lines open so they could communicate in case there was any change in the parties' bargaining position.

The negotiating committees then caucused and, when the negotiations resumed, Haynes stated to Brown that in an effort to show Respondent's good faith that even [7] I note that the current net wage in the Local 718 contract was $15.71 an hour and in the Locals 169 and 1621 contract was $15.84 an hour. I also note that $2.04 an hour was being deducted for vacation and holiday benefits under the Local 718 contract and $2.05 an hour under the Locals 169 and 162' contract, whereas under the Respondent's proposal these moneys would no longer be deducted from the employees' pay and Respondent would pay the holiday and vacation benefits directly to the employees.

[8] The above description of the 13 June negotiation meeting is based on the minutes of the meeting taken by the secretary of the Unions' negotiating committee. These minutes, which were introduced into evidence by Respondent without objection by the other parties, were submitted to Respondent's negotiation committee by the Unions' negotiation committee at the outset of the next negotiation meeting held 26 June 1984 and accepted by Respondent's negotiators without change. The minutes, taken contemporaneously with the negotiation meeting, are more reliable evidence of what took place at this meeting than either Brown's or Courtney's testimony presented 9 months after the meeting. Accordingly, in describing what took place at this meeting, I have supplemented the account set forth in the Unions' minutes with Courtney's and Brown's testimony, only in those instances when I felt that their testimony was consistent with what was contained in the minutes.

though Respondent had an economic problem, if the Unions accepted Respondent's total package of $16.95 an hour, Respondent would agree to discuss with the Unions the distribution of that package. Brown rejected this proposal. He explained that the total package contained in both the current Local 718 contract and the current Locals 169 and 1621 contract was $20.34 an hour, substantially more than Respondent's proposed total package, and stated that the Unions would not accept this decrease, but would take the Respondent's $15-an-hour wage proposal to the membership and determine what the membership's position was on that proposal. Brown stated that the contracts expired 1 July 1985 and proposed that whatever agreement was reached be made retroactive to 1 July 1984 and suggested that they extend the contract on a day-by-day basis until they reached agreement. Haynes stated that this was unacceptable because the contracts gave the Unions the right to strike if no agreement was reached by 1 July 1984, and that Respondent wanted a more substantial extension of the contract inasmuch as it wanted more notice if the Unions engaged in a strike. Brown stated that because it was only 26 June there was plenty of time to reach agreement before the 1 July 1984 deadline and that in order to do this the Unions were willing to meet anytime and place within reason. The meeting ended with Haynes stating that Respondent would use whatever means it could to reach agreement with the Unions prior to 1 July 1984 and would consider any new proposal from the Unions, but unless there was an agreement the contract would expire 1 July 1984.[10]

On 28 June 1984 Haynes sent a telegram to Brown in which, after indicating that the parties were deadlocked in their negotiations, he stated, "The company does not intend to continue the current health and welfare; pension; vacation; holiday; and industry fund contributions beyond June 30, 1984" and that "[i]f the Union does not accept the Company's final offer and if no agreement is reached by June 30 the Company will implement its offer, as the cost of the current wage and benefit program exceeds that which the Company can justify economically." Brown responded to this telegram by sending a telegram to Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, Courtney, dated 28 June 1984, which acknowledged receipt of Haynes' telegram and stated that the Unions "disagree with your position of impasse. We have another proposal and will meet with you . . . July 2, 1984. We will present it to you then. We will hold you fully responsible for unilaterally putting your last proposal into effect prior to Local 169, 718 and 1621 and [Respondent] reaching an impasse."

On 29 June 1984 Haynes telegrammed Brown that "[i]f your last proposal was not your final proposal please furnish final proposal immediately by telegram. Will arrange meeting after receipt of your proposal." On 2 July Brown telegrammed Haynes requesting that Haynes advise the Unions when he would be available to meet so that the Unions could present him with their proposal. On 3 July Haynes telegrammed Brown that Respondent's district manager Anderson would be at Brown's office 5 July "to accept any written counter proposal which you intended to make available."

On 5 July 1984 Anderson met with the Unions' negotiating committee. The meeting began with the committee's spokesperson Brown asking whether Anderson was authorized to negotiate on Respondent's behalf. Anderson stated that he was present to pick up the Unions' proposal. When Brown continued to ask Anderson whether he was authorized to negotiate on Respondent's behalf, Anderson stated he had authority to make decisions and, if he needed assistance, there were other people standing by on the telephone to assist him. However, Anderson pointed out that during the past year Respondent had lost approximately $350,000 doing business in the area covered by the Unions' contracts and because of this could not agree to any increase, but that if Brown had a new proposal that Anderson would talk with him. Brown stated that the Unions did not have a new proposal to offer Respondent, but from what Anderson had stated it appeared Respondent was claiming financial hardship and because of this the Unions wanted to examine Respondent's profit-and-loss statements to verify this claim. Brown explained to Anderson that the Unions would take a hard look at Respondent's profit-and-loss statements and, if they supported Respondent's claim of an inability to pay, the Unions, after explaining this to their membership, might accept a freeze or a reduction or whatever was necessary to assist Respondent. The meeting ended with Brown reminding Anderson that the Unions were there to negotiate wages only and requested that Respondent furnish them with its profit-and-loss statements. Anderson stated that he did not see any problem with furnishing the Unions with this information, but Respondent's attorney would have to authorize the release of the information.[11]

On 5 July 1984, immediately after the 5 July meeting between Anderson and the Unions' negotiating committee, Haynes telegrammed Brown stating, among other things, that the most recent profit-and-loss statements for Respondent's shops covered by the Unions' contracts would be furnished immediately and that additional supporting records, if desired, would also be made available. As a matter of fact, some time between 5 and 8 July 1984, Respondent hand-delivered these financial statements to Brown's office. These statements showed a pretax loss of $385,837. Thereafter the parties agreed to hold a negotiation meeting 16 July 1984.

The next and final negotiation meeting took place 16 July 1984 and lasted approximately 2-1/4 hours. Haynes began the meeting by stating that Respondent had not received a written notice from Local 718 reopening its contract with Respondent for negotiations. Brown or one of the Local 718 representatives stated they thought Local 718 had sent Respondent a reopener notice. Haynes stated that Respondent would not negotiate with Local 718 without the receipt of a written notice from that Union reopening its contract and that he would investigate to determine whether, as claimed, Local 718 sent Respondent such a notice. Brown stated that if Local 718 had not sent a written notice to Respondent reopening its contract that it would mean that the status quo existed for another year insofar as that contract was concerned and that the current negotiations would only cover Respondent's contract with Locals 169 and 1621.

[10] As was the case with the previous negotiation meeting, the above description of the 26 June 1984 meeting was based on the Unions' contemporaneous minutes, which were introduced into evidence by Respondent without objection by any of the other parties. I have supplemented the description contained in these minutes with the testimony of Courtney and Brown only in those instances when I felt that their testimony was consistent with the minutes.

[11] As was the case with the previous negotiation meetings, the description herein of the 5 July meeting is based on the Unions' contemporaneous minutes of the meeting that were offered into evidence by Respondent without objection by any of the other parties. I have supplemented the description contained in these minutes with the testimony of Brown and Anderson only in those instances when I felt that their testimony was consistent with the minutes.

Brown then brought up the subject of Respondent's profit-and-loss statement. He stated that the Unions examined this statement and had turned it over to the Unions' auditor who needed to see the supporting records for some of the items listed. While understanding that Respondent had suffered operating losses as stated in the profit-and-loss statement, Brown stated that the Unions had the right to know what these losses were. Brown then proposed a 75-cent-an-hour increase in the total wage package, which contrasted with the Unions' last proposal of $1.02 an hour. Haynes rejected this proposal and stated that as long as the Unions continued to propose an increase in the current contractual wage package, the parties were at an impasse. Brown replied that the reopener provision in Respondent's contract with Locals 169 and 1621 called for negotiations for a wage increase and that the Unions were there to negotiate an increase. Haynes told Brown that due to Respondent's financial losses it needed a decrease in the current contractual wage package, not an increase. Brown stated that the Unions' auditor was in the hospital and the Unions wanted his opinion about the "what and why" of the losses evidenced in Respondent's profit-and-loss statement. Haynes stated that due to its financial situation Respondent was not able to negotiate an increase in the wage package and, if it was Brown's position that the Unions could not negotiate a decrease, then there was no where to go in the negotiations. Brown replied that the Unions would not negotiate a decrease in the wage package and asked for another proposal from Haynes to counter the Unions' proposed 75-cent-an-hour increase in their wage package. Haynes responded by offering a wage package of $16.50 an hour. This was rejected by Brown, who pointed out that it was less than Respondent's previous $16.95 offer. Haynes stated that Respondent believed that it could provide the employees with the same fringes and give them more money to take home each week in their paychecks with Respondent's proposed package that included Respondent's benefit plans. Brown replied that the Unions would not change trust funds, and explained that the Unions were trying to negotiate a total package and felt they had the right to distribute the moneys in this package to the health and welfare and pension funds as they saw fit. Haynes repeated that Respondent's economic condition, as shown by the $350,000 loss in the profit-and-loss statement, made it impossible for Respondent to meet the Unions' demands and that Respondent needed a decrease in the current wage package. Brown replied that pursuant to the reopener provisions in the governing contract between Respondent and Locals 169 and 1621, the Unions were there to negotiate a wage increase. Anderson then went through the profit-and-loss statement line by line and explained in detail the losses reflected by that statement. Brown stated that the Unions' representatives did not understand the profit-and-loss statement and had given it to the Unions' auditor for his opinion. Haynes at this point stated Respondent was unable to wait any longer, that it intended to decrease its labor costs, and that effective the next payroll period Respondent would institute the $15-an-hour wage rate and the Respondent's insurance package previously offered to the Unions. Brown responded by stating that the Unions would turn the matter over to their attorney.[12]

On 18 July 1984 Haynes addressed a telegram to all three Local Unions in care of William J. Brown, Local 1621's business manager.[13] The telegram reads as follows:

> IN VIEW OF THE UNIONS CONTINUED INSISTENCE FOR AN INCREASE IN THE TOTAL ECONOMIC PASSAGE AND REFUSAL TO AGREE TO EITHER OF SAFELITES FINAL ALTERNATE PROPOSALS, SAFELITE INTENDS TO IMPLEMENT THE FOLLOWING:
> HOURLY WAGE RATE $15.00; SAFELITES PROPOSED MEDICAL AND PENSION PLAN; SAFELITES PROPOSED VACATION AND HOLIDAY PAYMENT PLAN; NO PAYMENT TO THE UNIONS HEALTH AND WELFARE, PENSION, VACATION OR HOLIDAY FUNDS; NO FURTHER PAYMENTS TO THE INDUSTRY FUND. UNION DUES OF .32 CENTS PER HOUR WILL CONTINUE TO BE DEDUCTED FROM BARGAINING UNIT EMPLOYEES PAY AND PAID TO THE UNIONS.

[12] The above description of the 16 July 1984 negotiation meeting is based on the contemporaneous notes of this meeting taken by Respondent's office manager, which were placed into evidence without objection. I have supplemented the description contained in those notes with Brown's and Courtney's testimony only in those instances when I felt that their testimony was consistent with the notes.

[13] I recognize that the telegram is addressed to William J. Graham, rather than William J. Brown; however, it is clear from the record that this was a clerical error, there is no such person as William J. Graham, and the telegram was intended for Brown and, in fact, was received by Brown.

Also on 18 July Attorney Haynes telegrammed Carl Dahl, a Local 718 representative, who was a member of the Unions' negotiating committee, as follows:

> WE HAVE THIS DATE DISCOVERED THAT YOUR UNION DID GIVE THE APPROPRIATE WRITTEN NOTICES REQUIRED BY THE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENT AND SECTION 8 (D) OF THE LMRA BEFORE THESE NEGOTIATIONS BEGAN, SINCE YOU DID REOPEN THE AGREEMENT BEFORE NEGOTIATIONS COMMENCED, THE TELEGRAM SENT BY ME THIS DATE TO BILL BROWN, YOUR SPOKESMAN IN THE NEGOTIATIONS, APPLIES TO YOUR UNION AS WELL AS LOCAL UNIONS 1621 AND 169.

As a matter of fact on 18 July 1984 Respondent, in all nine of its northern California shops, implemented the terms and conditions of employment as set forth in Haynes' 18 July 1984 telegram to Brown, and on that date posted in each one of its shops a memo addressed "To All Auto Glass Installers" from District Manager Anderson, which stated in pertinent part:

> Safelite is making available to you its Medical Benefit Plan and Pension Plan. The Company is discontinuing its contributions to Union Plans.
> If you wish to participate in Company Plans you may obtain a Card which you must complete and return to the Store Manager.
> You will not be covered by the Company Plans until these cards are completed and returned.
> The Journeyman hourly rate, effective Thursday 7/19/84, will be $15.00 per hour.
> Vacations and Holidays will be paid directly to you rather than to your Union funds. You will be paid vacation and holiday pay at your regular rate. Paid holidays are:
> New Years
> Memorial Day
> Independence Day
> Labor Day
> Thanksgiving Day
> Christmas Day
> Employment Anniversary Day
> To be eligible for holiday pay, you must work the scheduled day before and following the holiday.
> Vacation pay will equal 80 hours pay after one year of continuous employment and 120 hours after ten years continuous employment. You will be eligible for paid vacation following your next Anniversary date.

2. Analysis and conclusions

As the Board in Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601, 602 (1984) stated:

> Section 8(a)(5) and 8(d) establish an employer's obligation to bargain in good faith with respect to "wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." Generally an employer may not unilaterally institute changes regarding these mandatory subjects before reaching a good faith impasse in bargaining (case cited). Section 8(d) imposes an additional requirement when a collective bargaining agreement is in effect and an employer seeks to "modify . . . the terms and conditions contained in" the contract: The employer must obtain the union's consent before implementing the change.

Section 8(d) of the Act, which defines the obligation to bargain, is intended to stabilize the agreed-on conditions of employment during the term of a collective-bargaining contract. Steelworkers v. Gulf Navigation, 363 U.S. 574 fn. 3, 578 (1960); NLRB v. General Electric Co., 418 F.2d 736, 747 (2d Cir. 1969). Accordingly, that section not only imposes an obligation on each party to a contract to refrain from modifying the contract in the absence of compliance with the statutory notice and waiting period requirements, but also expressly provides that the "duties so imposed shall not be construed as requiring either party to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions contained in a contract for a fixed period, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract." In line with that provision, as stated by the Board in Milwaukee Spring, it has been consistently held that an employer acts in derogation of its bargaining obligation under Section 8(d), and thereby violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when, during the effective period of the contract and without the consent of the union, it modifies contractually determined benefits or other employment conditions that are mandatory bargaining subjects. Chemical Workers Local 10 v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 183–188 (1971), citing with approval NLRB v. Scam Instrument Corp., 394 F.2d 884, 886–887 (7th Cir. 1968); Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 1302, 1307 (9th Cir. 1979). Unless a union consents to the midterm modification, employer defenses, such as that the modification was made in good faith or out of economic necessity, will not bar an 8(a)(5) finding. Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co. v. NLRB, supra at 1306–1307 (9th Cir. 1979); Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 202 NLRB 614 (1973), enfd. 505 F.2d 1302 (5th Cir. 1974); NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743 (1962).

An unlawful midterm modification may take several forms, including an announced change in a contract provision (NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 423–425 (1967)) or a refusal to honor an obligation imposed by a collective-bargaining agreement. Northeast Oklahoma City Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 631 F.2d 669, 675 (10th Cir. 1980). Because the question of whether an unlawful modification has occurred may depend on the interpretation given to contract language, the Board may be called on to decide the threshold issue regarding the meaning of a particular provision of the agreement. Thus, the Board in cases of this nature is empowered to interpret the provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement, if necessary, to the adjudication of the alleged unfair labor practice. NLRB v. Strong, 393 U.S. 357, 361 (1969); C & C Plywood Corp., supra at 428; Northeast Oklahoma Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, supra; Buck Brown Contracting Co., 272 NLRB 951 (1984). However, when the Board finds that a party to a contract charged with unilaterally changing its terms during midterm, "has a sound arguable basis for ascribing a particular meaning to his contract and his action is in accordance with the terms of the contract as he construes it, the Board will not enter the dispute to serve the function of arbitrator in determining which party's interpretation is correct." NCR Corp., 271 NLRB 1212 (1984), quoting Vickers, Inc., 153 NLRB 561, 570 (1965); see also Plasterers Local 627 (Hart Concrete), 274 NLRB 1286 (1985).

In the instant case, as described in detail supra, on 18 July 1984 Respondent modified or abolished several of the economic provisions contained in its contracts with Local 718 and Locals 169 and 1621, as follows: It substituted for Washington's Birthday the employees' employment anniversary dates as one of the contracts' seven paid holidays and, whereas the contracts contained no eligibility requirements, Respondent instituted a requirement that the employees work the day before and after a holiday to be eligible for holiday pay. The contracts' vacation provisions provide 3 weeks of paid vacation for employees employed at least 1600 hours during the period 1 July through 30 June of the preceding year, whereas Respondent substituted 2 weeks of paid vacation after 1 year of employment and 3 weeks after 10 years, with eligibility determined by working at least 1800 hours during the 12 months prior to the employees' employment anniversary dates. Instead of deducting approximately $2.05 an hour from each employee's net hourly wage and transmitting the money to the contracts' vacation and holiday fund, as required by the contracts, for eventual distribution twice yearly to the employees for their vacation and holiday pay, Respondent stopped making these deductions and instead directly paid the employees their hourly rate of pay for their holiday and vacation pay. Instead of contributing to the contracts' health and welfare and pension funds to finance the medical and pension plans designated by the contracts, Respondent stopped making these contributions and substituted Respondent's medical and pension plans for the plans designated by the contracts.[14] Respondent stopped making contributions to the industry promotional fund as required by the contracts; Respondent paid a minimum net hourly wage of $15 to its auto glass installers instead of the $15.71 net hourly wage called for by the Local 718 contract and the $15.84 net hourly wage called for by the Locals 169 and 1621 contract.

In summation, the record establishes that during the term of its contracts with the Unions, Respondent abrogated the health and welfare, holiday and vacation, and pension fund provisions contained in the contracts, and significantly modified the contracts' provisions dealing with holiday and vacation benefits and decreased the employees' net hourly minimum wage rates established by the contracts. Each of these changes, by their very nature, presumably significantly affected the employees' terms and conditions of employment, thus they are mandatory subjects of bargaining. Respondent does not contend that any one of these changes was not a mandatory bargaining subject. Rather Respondent takes the position that it was privileged on 18 July 1984 to make these midterm changes in its contracts with the Unions without the Unions' consent because it had sound reasons to believe that the reopener clauses in the contracts allowed it to place on the bargaining table the contract proposals that it implemented on 18 July 1984 and to implement them after an impasse in the negotiations.[15] I have rejected Respondent's contention for the reasons set forth hereinafter.

The record establishes that Respondent did not have "a sound arguable basis" (NCR Corp., supra) for interpreting the reopener provisions in its contracts with the Unions to allow it during the term of the contracts to place into effect without the Unions' consent its proposal to abrogate the holiday and vacation fund established by the contracts and to significantly modify the contracts' other provisions dealing with the employees' vacation and holiday benefits. The plain and unambiguous language of the contracts' reopener provisions limit reopener negotiations to the employees' minimum hourly wage rate.[16] However, the past practice of the parties in applying the reopener provisions during the 1983 reopener negotiations reveals that they interpreted the provisions as applying to not just the employees' minimum hourly rate of pay, but also to Respondent's level of contributions to the contracts' health and welfare and pension and industry funds, and that the parties considered the level of these contributions plus the employees' hourly rate of pay as a total wage package.[17] This application

[14] The difference between the pension and medical benefits under Respondent's plans and the contracts' plans was not litigated. However, in connection with the complaint's allegation that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by dealing directly with employees, Respondent's vice president of industrial relations Courtney testified that he told employees that the coverage of the Company's medical plan differed in at least two respects from the coverage of the contracts' medical plan; the contracts' plan provides optical coverage and the employees have the option to use a health maintenance organization such as Kaiser, whereas Respondent's plan did not provide such coverage.

[15] Respondent's contract with Local 718 contains a wage reopener providing for wage negotiations to be conducted in both 1983 and 1984 on 1 July, whereas Respondent's contract with Locals 169 and 1621 contains a wage reopener providing for "wage increase" negotiations to be conducted 1 May 1983 for the remaining 2 years of the contract. The 1983 negotiations conducted pursuant to the aforesaid reopener provisions were joint negotiations. The negotiators for Locals 718, 169, and 1621 met together with Respondent's negotiators. During the initial negotiating meeting held 3 June 1983, Respondent and Locals 169 and 1621 agreed that whatever agreement was reached during the negotiations would be effective for 1 year and that Respondent's contract with Locals 169 and 1621, like Respondent's contract with Local 718, would be reopened for renegotiations again in 1984 pursuant to the reopener provision in the Locals 169 and 1621 contract.

[16] The section of the Local 718 contract entitled, "Minimum Wage Rate," which establishes the "minimum straight time hourly rate of pay for wages" and the amount of the contributions that Respondent is obligated to make to the several contractual funds, further provides that at the end of the first and second years of the contract, "wages to be negotiated." The section of the Locals 169 and 1621 contract entitled, "Wages For Auto Glass Mechanics," which established the "minimum straight time hourly rate of wages" and the amount of contributions that Respondent is obligated to make to the several contractual funds, further provided that effective 1 May 1983 the parties to the contract would meet "to determine the wage increase for the remaining two years of this agreement."

of the contracts' reopener provisions in 1983 was consistent with the manner in which Respondent and the Unions conducted themselves under the COLA provisions of the predecessor Glass Management Association contract. The 1979–1982 Glass Management Association contract did not include a wage reopener provision, but instead provided for cost-of-living wage increases at 6-month intervals based on a formula set forth in the contract. The parties to the contract, including Respondent and the Unions, interpreted this provision as meaning that COLA increases would be divided as the Unions determined between the employees' hourly rates of pay and the Respondent's contributions to the health and welfare and pension funds.

As described above, the express language of the contracts' reopener provisions and the way the parties interpreted these provisions in the past and the way the parties applied the COLA provisions in the predecessor Glass Management Association contract, undermine Respondent's contention that it had sound reasons for believing the contracts' wage reopeners were intended to open up the contracts for renegotiations concerning the contracts' holiday and vacation provisions and Respondent's contributions to the contracts' holiday and vacation fund. As a matter of fact, there is no evidence that Respondent had any reason for believing that the contracts' wage reopeners encompassed these matters.[18] Quite the opposite, the composition of the total wage package encompassed by the contracts' reopener provisions must have placed Respondent on notice that the wage reopener provisions did not contemplate the renegotiation of the contracts' holiday and vacation provisions. Thus, it is undisputed that the contracts' total wage package consisted of only the employees' net wages and the Respondent's contributions to the contracts' health and welfare and pension and industry funds. Respondent's contributions to the contracts' vacation and holiday fund, which like Respondent's Unions' dues contributions was deducted by Respondent from the employees' net hourly wages, was not a part of the contracts' total wage package.

It is for all the aforesaid reasons that I find that the contracts' wage reopener provisions did not contemplate bargaining about Respondent's contributions to the contracts' vacation and holiday fund or bargaining to change the terms of the contracts' other holiday and vacation provisions, and that Respondent did not have an arguable basis for interpreting the reopener clauses in either the Local 718 contract or the Locals 169 and 1621 contract as permitting it to renegotiate these matters during the term of the contracts. Accordingly, when Respondent on 18 July 1984, during the term of the contracts and without the consent of the Unions, stopped making the contributions to the holiday and vacation fund required by the contracts, and in other respects significantly modified the holiday and vacation provisions of the contracts, I find that Respondent acted in derogation of its bargaining obligation under Section 8(d) of the Act, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[19] See Campo Slacks, Inc., 266 NLRB 492, 497 (1983).

I further find that when Respondent on 18 July 1984 stopped making contributions to the contracts' health and welfare and pension funds, and substituted its own medical and pension plans for the plans designated by the contracts, and decreased the auto glass installers' hourly rate of pay established by the contracts, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act inasmuch as this conduct, which substantially modified the terms of its contracts with the Unions, was engaged in during the term of the contracts and without the Unions' consent.[20] In making this finding I have assumed that Respondent had sound reasons for believing that the contracts' reopener provisions permitted it to make these changes after bargaining to an impasse with the Unions, inasmuch as the contracts' total wage package included the employees' health and welfare and pension benefits, as well as wages. However, it is settled that "[o]nly a the employees' minimum hourly rates of pay, but for an amount of money that the Unions could divide as they saw fit between wage increases and increases in Respondent's contributions to the health and welfare and pension and industry funds.

[18] My search of the record, Respondent's posthearing brief, and the transcript and exhibits, reveal that the sole argument advanced by Respondent in support of its claim that it had a reasonable basis for believing that the contracts' reopener provisions contemplated the renegotiation of the contracts' holiday and vacation provisions is its argument that at the end of the 1983 negotiations held pursuant to the reopener provisions that "the parties verbally said we'll be back next year to negotiate the economic package" (Tr. 868–869). This argument is based on Vice President of Industrial Relations Courtney's testimony that he telephoned Union Negotiator Brown at some point in time after the last 1983 reopener negotiation meeting, and that during the telephone conversation they decided how much of an increase Respondent's glaziers would receive and, as Courtney further testified, "it was my understanding that there would be an economic reopener the following year" (Tr. 586). It is significant that Courtney failed to describe what, if anything, Brown said to him that led to Courtney's understanding. Moreover, Courtney's understanding that there would be "an economic reopener" in 1984 is consistent with the way in which the parties applied the reopener provisions in 1983, namely, to encompass not just wages, but a total wage package that included the Respondent's health and welfare and pension contributions, besides wages. That Courtney did not in fact believe Brown had said anything to him that could have been reasonably construed as an agreement to reopen the contracts for all economic matters in 1984 is demonstrated by Courtney's failure to bring such an agreement to Brown's attention during the 1984 reopener negotiations when Brown took the position that the contracts' reopener provisions did not allow Respondent to reopen the contracts to renegotiate the economic provisions to the extent that it was attempting. I find it difficult to believe that if Brown had said something to Courtney that could have been reasonably construed as sanctioning Respondent's proposal to renegotiate the vacation and holiday provisions and abrogate the vacation and holiday trust fund provision, Courtney, during the 1984 negotiations, would not have reminded Brown of this.

[19] This is not a situation where, despite the language of the contracts' reopener provisions, the Unions agreed during the 1984 negotiations to reopen the contracts in midterm to renegotiate the contracts' holiday and vacation provisions. Quite the opposite, when Respondent's negotiator during the first negotiating meeting told the Unions' negotiator that Respondent was proposing to renegotiate these matters, the Unions' negotiator objected vigorously and, in effect, told the Respondent's negotiator that the Unions did not intend to negotiate about these matters because the Unions believed that they were not encompassed by the contracts' reopener provisions. The Unions maintained this position throughout the negotiations.

[20] Respondent's contributions on behalf of the unit employees to the Glass and Glazing Industry Trust Fund, an industry promotional fund, does not constitute a mandatory subject of bargaining. Therefore, Respondent was not obligated under Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act to comply with Sec. 8(d) of the Act before it abrogated that contractual provision. Finger Lakes Plumbing Co., 254 NLRB 1399 (1981); F.M.L. Supply, 258 NLRB 604 fn. 3 (1981).

genuine impasse, one not caused by the failure of one of the parties to bargain in good faith, permits an employer to take unilateral action on a mandatory subject without violating the Act." Newspaper Printing Corp. v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 956,966 (10th Cir. 1980). No such genuine impasse was possible here, for a substantial cause of the parties' bargaining impasse that would normally have privileged Respondent on 18 July 1984 to implement its 13 June 1984 package of contract proposals was Respondent's insistence that the Unions, as a condition of accepting the 13 June 1984 package of proposals, accept as a part of that package a significant modification in the contracts' holiday and vacation provisions and the abrogation of the contracts' holiday and vacation trust fund provisions. In this regard it is plain that Respondent's aforesaid vacation and holiday proposals, in particular its proposal to stop contributing to the contracts' holiday and vacation fund, were an integral part of Respondent's 13 June 1984 package of proposals that Respondent implemented on 18 July 1984, and that the other proposals in this package were dependent on Respondent's proposal to change the contracts' holiday and vacation provisions and to abrogate the contracts' holiday and vacation fund.[21] By, in effect, conditioning the Unions' acceptance of its 13 June 1984 package of proposals on the Unions' acceptance of that part of the package that changed the contracts' vacation and holiday provisions, despite the Unions' vigorous objections, Respondent engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, which precluded the existence of a genuine impasse on the remainder of the proposals contained in Respondent's 13 June 1984 package of proposals. Hence, when it unilaterally implemented the remainder of these proposals on 18 July 1984, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, even though it may have had a sound basis for believing that these proposals were encompassed by the contracts' wage reopener provisions. Cf. Newspaper Printing Corp. v. NLRB, supra at 966–967 (10th Cir. 1980).

In concluding that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when Respondent on 18 July 1984 stopped making contributions to the contracts' health and welfare and pension funds and substituted its own medical and pension plans for the plans designated in the contracts, and decreased the rate of pay established in the contracts, I have assumed that Respondent had sound reasons for believing that the contracts' wage reopener provisions permitted it to make these changes in the employees' terms and conditions of employment after bargaining to an impasse with the Unions. This assumption, however, is without any basis in the case of the wage reopener contained in Respondent's contract with Locals 169 and 1621, which provided, in pertinent part, for the parties to reopen the contract, "to determine the wage increase" (emphasis added) for the remainder of the contract's term. In agreement with the General Counsel, I am persuaded that when viewed in a light most favorable to Respondent, this reopener provision can be interpreted as only encompassing an increase, not a decrease, in the contract's total wage package.[22] But, as described in detail supra, Respondent, despite the vigorous objections expressed by Locals 169 and 1621, insisted to impasse and eventually implemented its 13 June 1984 package of proposals that called for a substantial decrease in the contract's total wage package. Neither during the 1984 reopener negotiations, nor during the hearing in this case, nor in its posthearing brief, has Respondent advanced a basis for its contention that it had sound reasons for believing that the reopener provision in the Locals 169 and 1621 contract, which was phrased in terms of negotiating a "wage increase," did not mean what it said. Under the circumstances, I find, in the alternative, that insofar as the employees represented by Locals 169 and 1621 are concerned, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally instituting its 13 June 1984 package of proposals on 18 July 1984 inasmuch as this conduct took place without the Unions' consent during the term of their contract with Respondent, and Respondent did not have a sound arguable basis for believing that the wage reopener provision in the applicable contract permitted it to engage in this conduct, which decreased the contract's total wage package.

In view of the basis for my decision herein, I have not considered the General Counsel's further contention that because the totality of Respondent's conduct at and away from the bargaining table established that it was bargaining with the Union in bad faith, no genuine impasse existed when Respondent on 18 July 1984 implemented its 13 June 1984 bargaining proposal. Nor have I considered the General Counsel's contention that even if a genuine impasse existed in the case of Respondent's negotiations with Locals 169 and 1621, no such impasse existed with respect to its negotiations with Local 718 because at the outset of the 16 July 1984 negotiation meeting Respondent broke off negotiations with Local 718 pending its investigation of whether that Union had sent a reopener letter to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Services.

B. Respondent Deals Directly with Employees

1. The evidence

As described in detail supra, on 13 June 1984 Respondent's and the Unions' negotiators held their first negotiation meeting pursuant to the wage reopener provisions contained in the parties 1982–1985 contracts at which time they exchanged bargaining proposals. On 14–15 June 1984 Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, Courtney, accompanied by Respondent's district manager Anderson and Respondent's attorney Haynes, visited each of Respondent's nine shops covered by the Unions' contracts, except for the San Leandro shop. The Unions were not notified about these meetings, and no representative from the Unions was in attendance.

[21] Included in Respondent's 13 June 1984 package of proposals was a $15-an-hour minimum wage proposal that constituted a substantial decrease in the minimum hourly rate of pay established in both the Local 718 contract and Locals 169 and 1621 contract. Respondent's additional proposal to cease deducting the approximately $2.05 an hour from the employees' wages for their holiday and vacation benefits, as required by the contracts, and instead to pay the employees directly for their holidays and vacations, in effect increased the employees' net pay, before taxes and union dues deductions, from what it was under the terms of the contracts. Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, Courtney, very carefully explained this in detail to the Respondent's employees when on 14 and 15 June 1984 he explained Respondent's 13 June proposal to them.

[22] As noted previously, the total wage package included Respondent's contributions to the health and welfare and pension funds as well as wages.

During his 14–15 June meetings with the employees, Courtney did most of the talking. Attorney Haynes, however, answered some of the employees' questions. Although the employees' questions differed from shop to shop, Courtney's presentation to the employees was basically the same at each shop.

Courtney introduced himself, Anderson, and Haynes, and explained that they were there to speak to the employees because Respondent's contracts with the Unions had been reopened for negotiations about economic items and that because Respondent was losing money, the negotiations were very important, and Courtney felt it was essential that the employees be kept informed about the state of the negotiations and that Courtney planned to meet with the employees after each of the negotiation meetings to keep them informed. Courtney stated that Respondent's shops in the district had lost over $350,000 during the past year, that Respondent could no longer afford to subsidize the shops, and the financial losses were occurring not because employees were loafing on the job, but because of Respondent's labor costs. In view of this, Courtney told the employees that Respondent had three options: "One, continue to operate and continue to lose money; two, close the division; or three, propose changes [in the Unions' contracts] that would allow us to operate without losing money." Courtney stated that Respondent had decided "to continue to operate without losing money."

Regarding the 13 June 1984 negotiation meeting, Courtney told the employees that the Unions proposed a 5.5-percent increase that Respondent rejected because it could not even afford the current rate established by the contracts, let alone an increase, and that it was ridiculous for the Unions to think that Respondent could afford a 5.5-percent increase. Courtney explained to the employees that the Unions, like Respondent, had certain options that Courtney told the employees were to either accept or reject Respondent's proposal or do nothing or show their displeasure with Respondent's proposal by striking Respondent. Courtney, with respect to this last option, stated that the Unions had not mentioned the word "strike," but Courtney mentioned this possibility to point out to the employees one of the Unions' options.

Regarding the proposal that Respondent submitted to the Unions during the 13 June 1984 negotiation meeting, Courtney explained the proposal thoroughly, and in detail compared the economic benefits that the employees received under the terms of the current contracts with those they would receive under Respondent's proposal, and answered employees' questions on this subject.

During at least one of the meetings when an employee asked, "What if the union goes on strike and I don't want to go on strike," Courtney responded by stating that "employees would have a choice of striking or not striking." Attorney Haynes during the 14–15 June employee meetings also informed the employees that they had the choice of striking or not striking, and further stated to them that as Respondent understood the Unions' constitution and bylaws and the law of the State of California, if an employee decided not to strike after the unions called the strike, the unions could possibly fine the employee for not striking.

Following the 26 June 1984 negotiation meeting, which has been described in detail supra, Respondent held meetings with its employees on 27–28 June 1984 similar to the above-described 14–15 June employee meetings. The record establishes that at the meeting held at the San Mateo shop on either 27 or 28 June that Courtney, in response to an employee's question about whether Respondent intended to continue to operate if there was a strike, stated that Respondent intended to continue to operate and to do so it would perhaps be required to hire replacements. Also during this meeting when questions were asked by employees about the employees' rights to strike or work if the Unions called a strike, Attorney Haynes stated that the employees were free to strike or not to strike and that this was the employees' decision, not the Respondent's or the Unions'. When employees asked how to go about resigning their union membership and how they should word their letters of resignation, Attorney Haynes told them that Respondent would post on the shops' bulletin boards a sample of how a resignation letter might be worded, but that if the employees wanted to resign it would be up to the employees.

On 27 June 1984 Respondent either distributed to its employees or posted at its shops the following "Notice To All Employees" signed by District Manager Anderson:

> We have been asked to furnish employees with information as to how they can resign from the Union to avoid being fined by the Union in the event of a strike.
> The Company has no way of knowing whether a strike will be called. No agreement has been reached. The Union is free to strike at Midnight June 30, 1984.
> Under California law, Union employees who continue to work across the picket line may be fined.
> Under Federal law, employees are free to strike or are free to work during a strike. The Constitution and By-Laws of the Union, as we understand them, allow employees to submit a resignation anytime before a strike begins.
> Any employee that wants to resign to avoid the possibility of a Union fine (if a strike is called) may notify the Union in writing as follows:
> "I hereby resign my membership as a member of Local #_____, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades AFL–CIO, effective immediately. I fully understand that I will be required to continue paying my Union dues as long as I remain employed by Safelite."
> SIGNATURE:

> The decision to resign Union membership to avoid being fined for crossing a picket line, is the decision of each employee.
> Employees rights to participate in a strike or not to participate in a strike is protected by the National Labor Relations Act. An Employer has the right to permanently replace Economic strikers to continue its business operation in the event of a strike.
> Safelite intends to continue operating if a strike is called.

The above description of what occurred at the meetings held by Respondent with its employees on 14–15 June 1984 and at the San Mateo shop on 27–28 June 1984 is based on the testimony of Courtney whose demeanor was good when he testified about these meetings.

Arthur Garcia, an installer employed at the San Jose shop, testified that when Courtney spoke to the employees at this shop on 15 June 1984, he told them, among other things, that if no collective-bargaining agreement was reached between the Unions and Respondent, after 30 June 1984 the Unions could strike, that Courtney did not know if there would be a strike, but if there was one that the employees could cross the picket line or would be permanently replaced and if the employees crossed the picket line the Unions could possibly fine them, but that was a decision the employees themselves would have to make. Garcia also testified that Courtney stated that the contract between Respondent and the Unions was going "to be up" and that if the Unions did strike, Respondent intended to remain open with or without the employees. Courtney did not specifically controvert Garcia's above-described testimony, and I credit it.

James Poda, an installer employed at the San Francisco shop, testified that when Courtney spoke to the employees at this shop on 14 June 1984, he told them that the Respondent's proposal called for a total package of $16.95 an hour with $15 going for wages and the remainder divided up among the employees' fringe benefits and advised the employees that this proposal was the best Respondent could do and it was the "bottom line." Poda further testified that at this point employee Spencer, another installer employed at the San Francisco shop, told Courtney he thought the Union would not accept this proposal but would strike, and asked what would happen if there was a strike. According to Poda, Courtney replied by telling Spencer that Respondent "plans to continue with business as usual, and the men who strike will be replaced," and that Courtney at this point ended his answer and asked if there were any other questions. The General Counsel contends that Courtney responded to Spencer's question by stating that should a strike be successful, Respondent would close down. In support of this contention, the General Counsel apparently relies on Poda's testimony given during direct examination that, in response to Spencer's question that Courtney stated: "[T]he company is going to carry on business as usual. Those who strike will be replaced. That frame of thought went into if the strike did work and the company lost then at that result everybody would be out of work." It is unclear whether the last part of this testimony was meant by Poda to be the words Courtney used or what Poda inferred from Courtney's words. Any doubt about this, however, was removed by Poda's description of this conversation given during cross-examination when he testified in effect that all Courtney stated to Spencer, in response to Spencer's question, was that Respondent "plans to continue with business as usual, and the men who strike will be replaced." I also note that Poda's testimony that Courtney's above-described comments were made during the 14 June meeting of employees at the San Francisco shop is inherently implausible because the Respondent's contract proposal, which Poda testified Courtney explained to the employees, was Respondent's alternative proposal offered to the Unions for the first time during the 26 June negotiation meeting. Courtney, in effect, testified that during the 14–15 June employee meetings he explained to the employees the Respondent's 13 June proposal. None of the several employees who testified about the 14–15 June employee meetings corroborated Poda's testimony that the alternative proposal was explained to them.

Britt Elmore, an installer at the San Mateo shop, testified about Courtney's 14–15 June meeting with the employees at that shop. Elmore had absolutely no memory of what Courtney stated at this meeting. His contemporaneous notes of the meeting by themselves have no intelligible meaning, and Elmore was unable to place the notes in any kind of intelligible context. In short Elmore's testimony was worthless.

2. Analysis and conclusions

The complaint, paragraphs 11(a) and (c), alleges that in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act the Respondent on 14–15 June 1984, during the employee meetings, bypassed the Unions, dealt directly with employees represented by the Unions, and sought to undermine the employees' support of the Unions by "discussing with employees proposals made to the Unions concerning non-mandatory subjects of bargaining" and by "threatening employees that they would be permanently replaced in the event the Unions called a strike and they chose to support such a strike." The evidence pertinent to these allegations, which has been set out in detail supra, can be briefly summarized as follows.

During the 1984 reopener negotiations with the Unions, the Respondent on 18 July instituted its 13 June 1984 bargaining offer, which significantly changed the employees' economic terms and conditions of employment established by the Unions' contracts. As I have found supra, by engaging in this conduct Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act because the 13 June offer was instituted during the term of the Respondent's contracts with the Unions, without the consent of the Unions, and despite the fact that the terms of the offer were beyond the scope of the contracts' reopener provisions and for this reason were not mandatory subjects of bargaining. On 14–15 June, immediately after the Unions' negotiators had informed Respondent's negotiators that they would not negotiate with Respondent about the 13 June offer because it was not encompassed by the contracts' reopener provisions, Respondent met with the employees represented by the Unions and described Respondent's 13 June offer and answered the employees' questions about the offer. During these series of employee meetings, Vice President of Industrial Relations Courtney explained the 13 June offer to the employees and compared the benefits that the employees were receiving under the terms of the current contracts with those they would receive under Respondent's proposal, and answered questions from the employees' on this subject. Courtney also told the employees that Respondent could not afford to pay the 5.5-percent increase proposed by the Unions and could not even afford to pay the labor costs established by the terms of the current collective-bargaining contract. He told the employees that because of Respondent's severe financial losses incurred due to high labor costs, Respondent, in order to remain in business, would have to cut its labor costs and that in order to do this Respondent had made its 13 June offer to the Unions and that the Unions had the option of accepting Respondent's 13 June offer or rejecting it and showing their displeasure by striking. Also during the 15 June employee meeting held at the San Jose shop, Courtney further advised employees if in fact there was a strike and if the employees did not cross the picket line and come to work, they would be permanently replaced.

As the Board has recently stated, "an employer has a fundamental right, protected by Section 8(c) of the Act, to communicate with its employees concerning its position in collective-bargaining negotiations and the course of those negotiations." United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 1069, 1074 (1985), citing United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 609 (1985). The Board explained that this right is based on the following consideration:

> The goal of the Federal labor policy has always been to create a favorable climate in which a healthy and stable bargaining process can be established and maintained. We believe that permitting the fullest freedom of expression by each party to that process offers the best hope of nuturing that environment. (United Technologies, supra at 610.)

In the United Technologies cases the Board held that the employer's communications to the union-represented employees concerning the employer's midterm contract proposals, which were beyond the scope of the contract's reopener clause, did not constitute unlawful direct dealing with the employees and bypassing of the union, even though the employer discussed its proposals with the employees after the union objected to the employer's offer and made it clear to the employer that it would only bargain concerning matters encompassed by the reopener clause. The instant case, however, is significantly different from the United Technologies cases where the employer did not institute its offer over the union's objection but instead acknowledged to the union that it was offering proposals that were outside the scope of the contract's reopener clause and that it was not mandatory for the union to bargain about the proposals. Here Respondent took the position that its 13 June offer was within the scope of the contracts' reopener clauses and that the offer was a mandatory subject of bargaining; Respondent told the employees during the 14–15 June series of meetings that the employees had the option of accepting Respondent's 13 June offer or striking; and, thereafter, in derogation of Section 8(d) of the Act, Respondent unilaterally instituted the terms of the 13 June offer over the Unions' vigorous objections.

Respondent's 14–15 June communication to the employees that they would have to accept Respondent's 13 June offer or strike can hardly be said to have furthered the "goal of the Federal labor policy . . . to create a favorable climate in which a healthy and stable bargaining process can be . . . maintained," where, as here, Respondent attempted to persuade the employees to accept the 13 June offer even though it knew that the employees' bargaining representatives regarded that offer as a nonbargainable matter outside the scope of the contracts' reopener provisions; the 13 June offer was in fact a nonmandatory subject of bargaining inasmuch as it was outside the scope of the contracts' reopener provision; and Respondent's conduct on 14–15 June in communicating the 13 June offer to the employees was inextricably bound together with its further conduct of unilaterally instituting the terms of that offer without the consent of the Unions in derogation of Section 8(d) of the Act and in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Respondent's direct communications with the employees, in view of the aforesaid circumstances, was reasonably calculated to undermine the right of the Unions under Section 8(d) of the Act and the contracts' reopener clauses to renegotiate only those items included in its contracts with Respondent that were within the scope of the contracts' reopener clauses. It is for this reason I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when on 14–15 June 1984 it bypassed the Unions and communicated directly with the employees represented by the Unions about those portions of its 13 June 1984 contract offer, which constituted nonmandatory subjects of bargaining.

I further find that as alleged in paragraph 11(c) of the complaint Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by telling the employees during the 15 June 1984 employee meeting at the San Jose shop, as described in detail supra, that they had the option of accepting Respondent's 13 June offer or striking, and the employees who supported such a strike would be permanently replaced. A strike by the employees caused in part by Respondent's insistence over the Unions' objections that the Unions accept Respondent's 13 June offer would have been an unfair labor practice strike inasmuch as Respondent's offer was a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. By threatening to permanently replace the employees if they supported such a strike, Respondent was threatening to permanently replace unfair labor practice strikers, which constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Redway Carriers, 274 NLRB 1359 (1985). Also by making this threat, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act because the threat was a part and parcel of Respondent's other conduct engaged in during the 15 June employee meeting of bypassing the Unions and communicating directly with the employees about those portions of the 13 June 1984 offer that were nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, which conduct, I have found, supra, by its very nature tends to destabilize and subvert the collective-bargaining process.

The complaint, paragraph 11(e), alleges that in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, the Respondent on 14–15 June 1984, during the employee meetings, bypassed the Unions, dealt directly with the employees represented by the Unions, and sought to undermine the employees' support of the Unions by "threatening employees with closure of Respondent's facilities if the Unions did not accept Respondent's bargaining proposals presented to the Unions." The evidence that is pertinent to this allegation and has been set out in detail supra can be briefly summarized.

During his 14–15 June employee meetings Courtney stated to the employees that Respondent's facilities covered by the Unions' contracts had lost over $350,000 during the past year due to the high cost of labor necessitated by the terms of the Unions' contracts and that Respondent could no longer afford to subsidize those facilities. In view of this, Courtney told the employees that Respondent had decided that instead of closing these facilities that it would propose changes in its contracts with the Unions, which would permit Respondent to operate the facilities without losing money. It was in this context that Courtney informed the employees about Respondent's 13 June 1984 contract proposal that had been offered to the Unions and gave the employees a detailed explanation of this proposal.

Based on the foregoing, I find Courtney's statements to the employees carried the implicit warning that unless the Unions and the employees represented by the Unions accepted Respondent's 13 June contract proposal that Respondent would be forced to close the facilities covered by the contracts on account of the high labor costs of Respondent's contracts with the Unions that had caused Respondent to lose approximately $350,000 in the past year. It is undisputed, however, that as a matter of fact, as Courtney explained to the employees, Respondent had lost approximately $350,000 during the past year operating these facilities. I therefore find that Courtney's statement constitutes a reasonable prediction based on objective facts and, as such, was protected by Section 8(c) of the Act. See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618–619 (1969). Accordingly, I shall recommend the dismissal of this allegation.

The complaint, paragraphs 11(b) and (d), alleges that in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act that Respondent during the employee meetings held on 14–15 June bypassed the Unions, dealt directly with employees represented by the Unions, and sought to undermine the employees' support of the Unions by, "informing employees of the possibility that the Unions would call a strike and fine employees who failed to support such a strike, at a time when the Unions were not considering any such course of action" and by "soliciting employees to resign their membership in the Unions." The evidence pertinent to these allegations, which has been set out in detail supra, can be briefly summarized.

During the 14–15 June employee meetings, Courtney told the employees that the Unions had the option of accepting Respondent's 13 June contract offer or rejecting it and striking. He clarified this remark by explaining to the employees that the Unions had not mentioned the possibility of a strike, but that Courtney had brought the subject up because it was one of the options available to the Unions. Respondent's attorney Haynes, who was also present at these meetings, told the employees that in the case of a strike they had the choice of striking or not striking and explained to them that, as Respondent understood the Unions' constitutions, bylaws, and the law of the State of California, if an employee decided not to support the Unions' strike the Unions could possibly fine them for not striking. Also during the 15 June employee meeting held at Respondent's San Jose shop, Courtney stated that if the Unions did strike Respondent in support of their contract demands that the Respondent would permanently replace employees who did not cross the picket line to work and the Unions could possibly fine those employees who crossed the picket line to work. There is no evidence that during the 14–15 June employee meetings any of Respondent's representatives mentioned anything about employees resigning from the Unions. However, during an employee meeting held on either 27 or 28 June at the San Mateo shop to inform the employees about the 26 June negotiation session, it is undisputed that in response to employees' questions about their right to strike or work during a strike called by the Unions, that Attorney Haynes told the employees that they were free to strike or not to strike. When employees asked Haynes how to go about resigning their union membership and how they should phrase their letters of resignations, Haynes told them that Respondent would post on the bulletin boards of its shops a sample resignation letter, but stated that the decision to resign was for the employees to make for themselves.

As summarized above, it is plain that all Respondent did in this case was to bring to the employees' attention the fact that the Unions, pursuant to the Unions' constitution and bylaws, might fine them if they failed to support a strike called by the Unions against Respondent, and in response to employees' request for information on how to go about resigning from the Unions in the case of a strike, Respondent informed the employees that it would provide them with a sample resignation letter, but that the decision to resign was for the employees to make for themselves. Considered by itself and in the context of what else was stated to the employees by Respondent during the employee meetings, this conduct was not reasonably calculated to interfere with employees' Section 7 rights. Consequently, I shall recommend dismissal of these allegations.

C. Respondent's Refusal to Provide the Unions with Information

1. The evidence

On 29 August 1984 Special Representative Edward Jones wrote Respondent's division manager, Ken Anderson, on behalf of the Unions, requesting an up-to-date list of the names, addresses, dates of hire, and current wage rates of all Respondent's employees represented by Locals 1621, 718, and 169. Jones, who was employed as an organizer by Local 1621, further advised Anderson at he had been given permission by Locals 169 and 718 receive this information. Jones testified that the reaons the Unions wanted Respondent to furnish them with is information was so the Unions could administer the nion-security provision in their contracts with Respondt and to update the Unions' files with current informaon so they could administer their contracts with Reondent in other respects.

Respondent did not answer Jones' 29 August letter, so nes on 21 September 1984 wrote Anderson repeating s request for the names, addresses, and dates of hire of employees in the units represented by Locals 169, 8, and 1621, and warned Anderson that if this informaon was not received by 27 September the Unions ould file unfair labor practice charges. In reply, on 25 eptember Anderson telegrammed Jones that "these cords are kept in our Kansas Corporation office; they e enroute to you." Respondent, however, never furshed this information to Jones, as Anderson promised, stead on 8 October 1984 Attorney Haynes wrote Jones:

> This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter to Ken Anderson requesting an up-to-date list of all employees employed within the bargaining unit represented by Glaziers Local Nos. 1621, 718 and 169. Requests for names, addresses, date of hire, and current wage rates of employees represented by Local Nos. 718 and 169 should be made by each Union.
> As you know, Safelite presently has pending unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board concerning Local No. 1621's intimidation, threat and coercion of Safelite employees in violation of Subsection 8(b)(1)(A) and Subsection 8(b)(2). We have been informed that the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board has determined that those charges have merit and until the violations of the act have been remedied, Safelite is reluctant to provide Local No. 1621 with the names, addresses, date of hire and current wage rates of its employees as you request.
> As soon as the unfair labor practice charges have been remedied, please renew your request.

y letter dated 22 October 1984 Jones wrote Haynes acowledging his 8 October letter and told Haynes that, indicated previously in Jones' 29 August letter to Anrson, Jones was requesting the information on behalf all three local unions with their knowledge and connt and repeated his request that Respondent provide m with the requested information.

On 28 February 1985 Carl Dahl, Local 718's business anager, telegrammed Respondent's division manager, nderson, that he was reaffirming the previous requests ade by Jones for the names, addresses, and wage rates Respondent's employees represented by Local 718. In sponse, on 8 March 1985, Anderson telegrammed ocals 169, 718, and 1621 that the names of all Respondt's employees were being continuously furnished to ocals 169, 718 and 1621 on the monthly dues forms rsuant to Respondent's contracts with the Unions, and ked the unions to review those forms and advise Reondent "if the requested information is necessary."

Respondent, as of the date of the hearing in this case, had not furnished the Unions, as requested, with the names, addresses, dates of hire, and wage rates of its employees represented by the Unions. Courtney testified that he was the company official who made the decision, on receipt of the Unions' 29 August 1984 request for this information, not to furnish the information. He further testified that his reason for making this decision was that he learned from talking with Respondent's attorney Haynes that the evidence submitted by Attorney Haynes to the National Labor Relations Board in support of the Respondent's charges against the Unions filed 9 July 1984 revealed that > the Unions had harassed and intimidated the employees, and that they were continuing to do so. They sent letters to employees, indicating that if they did not pay their strike assessment, the Union was going to get them fired or get their job terminated with the company. The employees had been required to . . . join the Union before the contract called for it . . . one individual, I think, indicated that he had to pay three months in advance.

The record shows that in Case 32–CB–1821 on 9 July 1984 Attorney Haynes, on behalf of Respondent, filed an unfair labor practice charge with the National Labor Relations Board alleging, among other things, that Locals 169, 718, and 1621 violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by "causing or attempting to cause employers to discriminate against an employee in violation of Section 8(a)(3) or to discriminate against an employee with respect to whom membership in such organization has been denied or terminated on some grounds other than his failure to tender periodic dues and initiation fees uniformally required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership," and "by requiring employees by an agreement authorized under subsection (a)(3), the payment, as a condition precedent to becoming a member of such organization, a fee in an amount which is excessive under all the circumstances." These allegations were found to be meritorious by the Board's Regional Office only insofar as they involved Local 169.[23] On 30 October the Board's Regional Office entered into an agreement with Local 169 settling this case, in which Local 169, without admitting that it violated the Act, agreed not to cause or attempt to cause Respondent to discriminate against employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act and not to attempt to force Respondent to require employees to become members of Local 169 or pay an initiation fee prior to the time they completed 30 days of employment. It was further agreed that for 60 consecutive days it would post a notice addressed to its members embodying the aforesaid settlement agreement. Respondent was not a party to this settlement agreement, which it viewed as being inadequate. However, the General Counsel by letter dated 7 February 1985 rejected Respondent's appeal and affirmed the settlement. Because compliance with the settlement was presumably held in abeyance pending Respondent's appeal, Local 169, as of the date of the hearing in this case, 12–14 March 1985, had not posted the notice to its members for the 60 days required by the settlement, thus its alleged unfair labor practices had not been remedied.

2. Analysis and conclusions

On 29 August 1984 the Unions requested Respondent to provide them with an up-to-date list of the names, addresses, dates of hire, and current wage rates of employees in the bargaining units represented by the Unions. Because this information was presumptively relevant to the Unions' role as the bargaining agents of Respondent's unit employees, no showing of particularized need was necessary. Bozzuto's, Inc., 275 NLRB 353 (1985); Georgetown Holiday Inn, 235 NLRB 485, 486 (1978). As described in detail supra, Respondent refused to comply with the Unions' request.

Respondent did not advance any reason for its refusal to provide the Unions with the dates of hire and current wage rates of the employees employed in the units represented by the Unions. In view of the relevance of this type of information to the Unions as the employees' bargaining agent, I find Respondent's refusal to provide this information violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Respondent justifies its refusal to furnish the Unions with the names of the employees represented by the Unions by taking the position that Respondent was already furnishing the Unions this information on a monthly basis in the form of monthly union dues payment-remittance statements received by the Unions with the moneys that Respondent deducts from the employees' wages for union dues.[24] There is a serious doubt, however, whether these monthly statements in fact contain the names of all the employees employed in the units represented by the Unions (compare Tr. 536 with Tr. 572–573). In any event, assuming these monthly statements include the names of all the employees, Respondent still was required to provide the names of the employees to the Unions in connection with Respondent's further statutory obligation to provide the Unions with the employees' current wage rates and dates of hire, for otherwise that information would make no sense to the Unions.

Regarding the Unions' request for the employees' addresses, Respondent, in its posthearing brief, argues that it "did not provide the addresses of employees because of a belief that one reason for the Unions' request was a desire to continue to harass employees with regard to dues payments and/or initiation fees which exceeded that which was required by the contract, i.e., payments of dues and/or fees prior to 30 days of employment and payments which exceeded the dues which, were deducted from the employees' pay."[25] However, Respondent did not present any evidence that the Unions harassed employees. Not one employee testified to this effect, nor did a single supervisor or managerial employee testify that employees had stated they were being harassed. The only evidence introduced by Respondent to support its contention that the Unions were harassing employees is the fact that Local 169 in Case 32–CB–1821, as described in detail supra, entered into a settlement agreement in which it agreed that it would not cause or attempt to cause Respondent to discriminate against employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act and would not attempt to force Respondent to require employees to become members of Local 169 or pay an initiation fee prior to the time they had completed 30 days of employment. This settlement agreement has absolutely nothing to do with the bargaining unit represented by Local 718. Therefore, it did not justify Respondent's refusal to provide Local 718 with the addresses of the employees employed in Local 718 unit. And with respect to the employees employed in the unit jointly represented by Locals 169 and 1621, the settlement agreement does not warrant the inference that Local 169 engaged in the misconduct encompassed by the agreement because unions and employers enter into such settlement agreements for a multitude of reasons having nothing to do with whether they have engaged in the illegal conduct they have been charged with. Indeed, this settlement agreement states that by entering into it that Local 169 was not admitting it violated the Act. In any event, the terms of the settlement agreement do not warrant the inference that during the time material there was a "clear and present danger of harassment and violence" to justify Respondent's refusal to furnish Locals 169 and 1621 with the names of the employees in the unit jointly represented by those local unions.[26] The settlement agreement does not establish that Local 169 harassed employees as contended by Respondent, or even if, as Respondent contends, the settlement agreement warrants the inference that Local 169 in fact harassed employees in connection with its illegal enforcement of the contractual union-security [24] Respondent's good faith in raising this defense is doubtful. It was not until the complaint in this case was issued and shortly before the start of the scheduled hearing that Respondent for the first time informed the Unions that they were not entitled to the names of the employees because Respondent was regularly furnishing the names in the form of the monthly union dues statements. Also previously, on 25 September, District Manager Anderson had assured the Unions that all the requested information, including the employees' names, was "enroute to you." Anderson's promise and the Respondent's subsequent repudiation of that promise insofar as it pertains to the employees' names was never explained. Under the circumstances Respondent's belated contention that it was not obligated to provide the Unions with the employees' names because they were already being furnished to the Unions does not appear to have been raised in good faith.

[25] Respondent's defense that it decided not to provide the Unions with the employees' addresses because it thought that the Unions intended to use this information to illegally harass the employees is based on the testimony of Courtney that Attorney Haynes told him that the evidence Haynes submitted to the Board's Regional Office in support of Respondent's charge in Case 32–CB–1821 showed that the Unions had harassed and intimidated employees in enforcing the union-security provisions in their contracts with Respondent in an illegal manner. I note that this testimony was received for the sole purpose of shedding light on the state of Courtney's mind when, as he testified, he decided not to provide the Unions with the requested information. It was not received for the truth of the matters contained therein.

[26] It is well established that there must be more than a speculative concern on the part of an employer: there must be a "clear and present danger of harassment and violence" to justify a refusal to furnish a union with relevant information. See Shell Oil Co. v. NLRB, 457 F.2d 615, 618–620 (9th Cir. 1972). Accord: NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., 517 F.2d 1108, 1113–1114 (1st Cir. 1975); United Aircraft Corp. v. NLRB, 434 F.2d 1198, 1207 (2d Cir. 1970).

clause, it does not establish that the extent of this misconduct was sufficient to justify Respondent's refusal to furnish the Unions with the addresses of the bargaining unit employees. It is for all the foregoing reasons that I find Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its refusal to provide the Unions with the addresses of the employees employed in the units represented by the Unions.

D. Respondent's Attorney Interviews Employees

1. The evidence

As described in detail supra, on 14–15 and 27–28 June 1984, Courtney, accompanied by Anderson and Haynes, conducted a series of meetings with Respondent's employees at which time Courtney informed them about the state of Respondent's reopener negotiations with the Unions and explained Respondent's bargaining proposals to them. I have found, supra, that during the employee meetings held 14–15 June 1984 Respondent engaged in certain conduct that violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. On 21 June 1984 Local 1621 in Case 32–CA–6566 filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board, alleging in substance that since 13 June 1984 Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by conducting itself in such a coercive manner as to have interfered with its employees' Section 7 rights and by failing to bargain in good faith with Locals 1621 and 169. It is undisputed that following Respondent's receipt of this charge that Attorney Haynes in order to defend Respondent against the charge's allegations interviewed Respondent's employees on 27–28 June 1984 and questioned them about what was stated to them by Respondent's representatives at the 14–15 and 27–28 June employee meetings. The complaint, paragraph 6(a), alleges that Respondent through Haynes on approximately 27 June 1984 "coercively interrogated [Respondent's] employees in connection with preparing its defense to an unfair labor practice charge filed against Respondent," thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Five witnesses—Haynes and employees Poda, Lenz, Elmore, and Garcia—testified about Haynes' interviews with employees. The significant portions of their testimony are set forth hereinafter.

William Haynes, Respondent's attorney, testified as follows. On 27–28 June 1984 he visited Respondent's several shops in northern California and interviewed several of the Company's employees who attended the 14–15 and 27–28 June employee meetings conducted by Courtney. Haynes testified that as he did not speak from a prepared script or from notes or take notes of the interviews, he was unable to recall his exact words, but that each of the interviews was conducted in the following manner. He spoke to the employees outside the presence of management. He showed the employees a copy of the charge filed by Local 1621 in Case 32–CA–6566, gave them an opportunity to read it, and explained to them that he wanted to interview them about what was stated to them by management during the employee meetings held 14–15 and 27–28 June. Haynes stated that the purpose of his interview was to take a statement from them in preparing Respondent's defense to the allegations made in Local 1621's charge. Haynes also told the employees that they did not have to cooperate with him and were free to leave and not answer his questions, but that he would appreciate it if they cooperated. He also advised them that they had the right to engage or refrain from engaging in union activities, and the Respondent respected those rights, and that they were protected by Federal law. The employees who chose to remain were then questioned by Attorney Haynes about what was stated by Respondent's representatives during the employee meetings that they attended on 14–15 and 27–28 June. Haynes wrote down what the employees told him on a sheet of legal paper, wrote that the employees giving the statements had been assured that Respondent would take no reprisals against them, and asked the employees to sign the statement at the conclusion of the interview.

Britt Elmore, an employee at Respondent's San Mateo shop, testified that sometime in June 1984 Attorney Haynes visited him at the shop and asked him if he would give Haynes a written statement about what Courtney had stated to the employees at the employee meeting held by the Company earlier in June. Haynes told him that since the Union was claiming that Respondent had threatened the employees at this meeting Respondent wanted the employees to submit written statements saying that they were not threatened and to sign the statements. Attorney Haynes showed Elmore written statements signed by some of the Company's other employees and asked him to read them. When Elmore advised Haynes that he would not furnish him with such a statement, Haynes asked the reason for his refusal, and Elmore replied by stating that he just did not want to write anything down and sign it. This ended the conversation. Elmore testified that Haynes did not state to him that his participation in the interview was voluntary or that Respondent would not retalitate against him if he did not provide it with a statement as requested by Haynes and that Haynes did not advise him of his rights under the Act.

Arthur Garcia, an employee at the San Jose shop, testified that Attorney Haynes visited him and employee Ballin on 27 June at the San Jose shop, told them there had been an unfair labor practice charge filed by the union against Respondent. He then gave them a copy of the charge to read and also told them that his purpose in speaking to them was to prepare a defense for Respondent against the allegations in the charge. Haynes told the employees that he wanted to take a written statement from them about what had actually occurred during the company employee meeting they attended 15 June and have them sign it. Ballin stated he would not sign such a statement. Garcia indicated that he would sign a statement only if he was given a copy of what he was signing. Haynes, using leading questions, then took a statement from Garcia about what had taken place during the 15 June meeting and asked Garcia to sign it. Garcia responded by stating he would only sign it if he was given a copy of the statement for his personal records. Haynes responded by leaving with the unsigned statement. Garcia testified that Haynes did not state that Garcia's participation in the interview was voluntary or that there would be no reprisals taken against him if he refused to sign the statement or advise Garcia that he was free to engage in or refrain from engaging in union activities or that his rights in this respect were protected by the Act.

James Poda, an employee at Respondent's San Francisco shop, testified that Attorney Haynes visited him and employee Spencer at that shop on 27 June and told them that the union had filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Company and that the Company needed the employees to make written statements explaining that Respondent did not coerce them at the 14 June company meeting. Spencer told Haynes that the employees were not coerced and that he would be happy to state this in writing. Poda stayed silent. Haynes stated that although a statement signed by Poda and Spencer would be good, Spencer's signature was just as good. Spencer then told Haynes what he remembered as having occurred during the 14 June meeting and, as he spoke, Haynes wrote down what he said on a piece of paper. Poda left the room stating that he did not intend to sign the statement Haynes was writing. Poda testified that Haynes did not tell him his participation at this meeting was voluntary, or that there would be no reprisals taken against him, nor did Haynes explain his rights under the Act.

Randolph Lenz, an employee at Respondent's Pleasant Hill shop, testified that Attorney Haynes visited Lenz and employees Lopez and Meahan at the shop and, in the presence of Courtney, showed them a copy of the unfair labor practice charge filed against Respondent by Local 1621. He read them what the charge alleged and told them he wanted to talk to them about the allegations in the charge, but that they had the choice of staying or leaving and if they chose not to participate in the interview, no reprisals would be taken against them. When all three employees stated that they wanted to stay and listen to what Haynes had to say, Haynes told them he would like them in their own words "to give a rebuttal" to what was alleged in the unfair labor practice charge and to sign the statement they gave. The result was an affidavit dated 28 June 1984 in Haynes' handwriting, which all three employees jointly signed, setting forth what allegedly occurred during the employee meetings conducted by the Respondent. The affidavit ends with the declaration: "I have been informed of the purpose of this statement and assured no reprisals will be taken against me."

2. Analysis and conclusions

The complaint, paragraph 6(a), alleges that Respondent through its Attorney Haynes about 27 June 1984, "coercively interrogated [Respondent's] employees in connection with preparing its defense to an unfair labor practice charge filed against Respondent," thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In support of this allegation the General Counsel argues that in questioning employees Poda, Garcia, and Elmore for the purpose of preparing Respondent's defense to Local 1621's unfair labor practice charge, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) because it did not observe the principles of Johnnie's Poultry Co., 146 NLRB 770 (1964), in that Respondent's attorney, when he questioned the employees, did not advise them that their participation in furnishing Respondent with the requested information was on a voluntary basis, nor did he assure them they would not suffer any reprisals, and the questioning occurred in the context of Respondent's illegal direct dealings with the employees. Respondent argues that assuming it failed to comply with the Johnnie's Poultry rules, it did not matter because the alleged illegal interrogation did not pertain to any conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act. Respondent's contention is meritorious.

In Johnnie's Poultry the Board outlined the permissible manner in which an employer may interrogate an employee concerning matters likely to arise in an unfair labor practice proceeding. The Board held that to render such questioning privileged, an employer (id. at 774–775):

> must communicate to the employee the purpose of the questioning, assure him that no reprisal will take place and obtain his participation on a voluntary basis; the questioning must occur in a context free from employer hostility to union organization and must not be itself coercive in nature; and the questions must not exceed the necessities of the legitimate purpose by prying into other union matters, eliciting information concerning an employee's subjective state of mind, or otherwise interfering with the statutory rights of employees.

It is clear, however, that in formulating the Johnnie's Poultry standards for those situations where an employer is engaged in questioning employees in order to defend itself against unfair labor practice charges, that the Board assumed that the standards would be applicable only to those situations that involved an employer's interrogation of employees about matters involving their Section 7 rights. For in all cases arising under the Act, which involve allegations of illegal employee interrogation, the Board evaluates the legality of the interrogation according to "whether under all of the circumstances the interrogation reasonably tends to restrain, coerce, or interfere with rights guaranteed by the Act" (emphasis added). Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984).

In the instant case it makes no sense to apply the Johnnie's Poultry rules because the employees were not questioned about their union sympathies or activities or about any other activities guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act. Nor was their interrogation reasonably calculated to interfere with the Board's statutory obligation to carry out the Act's mandate to protect the employees' Section 7 rights inasmuch as Respondent did not ask the employees if they had spoken to a Board agent or whether they had submitted affidavits to the Board. The employees were only asked to furnish a statement to Respondent's attorney that would inform him of what had been stated to the employees by representatives of management and Respondent's attorney during the meetings previously held by management, which the employees attended. This interrogation was not reasonably calculated to inhibit the employees from engaging in any of the types of protected concerted activity encompassed by Section 7 of the Act, nor was it reasonably calculated to interfere with the Board's investigatorial and prosecutorial processes. In other words the alleged illegal interrogation by Respondent's attorney in preparing a defense to Local 1621's unfair labor practice charge did not pertain to the employees' involvement in conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act.[27] Accordingly, I shall recommend the dismissal of this allegation in the complaint. See Mineola Ford Sales, 258 NLRB 406 (1981).

E. Respondent's Transfer of Employee James Poda

1. The evidence

James Poda worked for Respondent at its San Francisco shop as an auto glass installer trainee. He is a member of Local 718, the Union that represents the installers employed by Respondent at that shop. Poda's terms and conditions of employment were established by Local 718's contract with Respondent, which provides that auto glass installer trainees during their first 6 months of employment earn 60 percent of the journeyman hourly rate of pay; 70 percent during their second 6 months; 80 percent during their third 6 months; 90 percent during their fourth 6 months; and at the end of their second year of employment would receive the journeyman hourly rate. Poda having started to work for Respondent on 16 July 1982 normally would not have received his journeyman rate of pay until approximately 16 July 1984. Poda apparently had some prior experience when hired by Respondent and received at least one of his scheduled pay raises at the end of 3 rather than 6 months as called for by the contract. Poda believed that his pay should have been raised to the journeyman rate prior to the conclusion of his second year of employment. In 1984, prior to 27 June, he mentioned this to District Manager Anderson on more than one occasion. Anderson told him that he would check into it.[28] When Anderson failed to do anything about Poda's complaint, on 27 June, Poda spoke to Anderson again as described below.

On 27 June Anderson and Respondent's vice president of industrial relations Courtney accompanied Attorney Haynes to the San Francisco shop, described in detail supra, Haynes interviewed Poda and employee Spencer in the shop's office and Poda left the office after having refused to sign a statement for Haynes. When Poda reentered the shop, he initiated a conversation with Anderson by asking what was happening about his pay raise. Anderson told him that he would not receive the raise because he had not been employed for 2 years, which he stated was the time period a trainee must work before being eligible to be paid journeyman's wages. Poda explained why he felt that he was eligible at the end of his first year of employment to receive journeyman's wages. Anderson then called Courtney over and asked Poda to explain his complaint to Courtney. After listening to Poda's complaint, Courtney told him that he was not familar with the matter and would check into it and speak to Poda about it at a later date. Poda replied by telling Anderson and Courtney that he was months late in receiving his journeyman rate of pay, that he had complained to Respondent a long time ago about this, and that now he intended to go to the Union with his complaint and let the Union handle it. Anderson told Poda, "Do what you have to do" and this concluded the conversation.[29]

A few days following his 27 June conversation with Anderson and Courtney, Poda went to Local 718's offices and brought his grievance to the Union's attention. Subsequently, on Friday, 6 July, Local 718 Business Manager Carl Dahl wrote Anderson stating, among other things, that Respondent was in violation of its contract with Local 718 by failing to increase Poda's pay as required by that contract and asked for an immediate meeting with Respondent to "grieve this matter."

On Monday, 9 July, at approximately 9 a.m., Anderson telephoned Poda at Respondent's San Francisco shop. He began the conversation by asking, "What's this union stuff?" Poda answered, "You know what it is." Anderson asked, "What are you trying to do to me?" Poda answered by asking, "What can I do to you?" Anderson stated, "Okay Poda I'll be—," at which point Poda interrupted Anderson and told him, "don't threaten me," whereupon, Anderson stated, "This is not a threat, this is a promise. I'll be watching you and you make one mistake and you're gone." Poda then changed the topic and asked Anderson about his paycheck, which had been late in arriving, and this ended the conversation.[30]

Later during 9 July, at approximately 12 p.m., Anderson, accompanied by his assistant, Cecil Green, who is Respondent's operations manager, visited the San Francisco shop, and Green, in the presence of Shop Manger Young and Anderson, notified Poda that effective the next workday Poda was being transferred from the San Francisco shop to the Richmond shop. Green told Poda that the Richmond shop was having a difficulty or a problem and that Respondent needed another man there and that effective 10 July Poda was being transferred there to work, where Poda would be working for his "old buddy" Steve Apple. Green made this last remark in a sarcastic tone of voice. Green asked whether the transfer would pose any problem for Poda, and Poda an-

[27] In view of this conclusion, I have not considered the General Counsel's contention that Respondent's attorney in questioning employees Poda, Garcia, and Elmore failed to comply with the criteria set forth in Johnnie's Poultry.

[28] Anderson testified that when Poda asked why his pay had not been raised to that of a journeyman's Anderson explained the reason. Poda, as described above, testified that prior to 27 June on those occasions when he casually mentioned the matter to Anderson, Anderson told him he would check into it. I have credited Poda's testimony because his testimonial demeanor was better than Anderson's.

[29] Poda and Anderson testified about the above-described 27 June conversation, which is based on Poda's testimony. Anderson's version did not contradict Poda's. I realize that Anderson did not testify that Poda stated he intended to take his complaint to the Union and let the Union handle it. Anderson did not, however, specifically deny that Poda made this statement and Poda's testimonial demeanor when he testified about this conversation was good.

[30] Anderson testified that the above-described 9 July telephone conversation between himself and Poda did not take place. In fact, Anderson testified that he has never spoken to Poda over the telephone about anything. I have credited Poda's testimony because his testimonial demeanor was good, and Anderson's was poor when they testified about this telephone conversation. I also note that Respondent's shop manager, Young, who Poda testified was the one who notified him about his 9 July telephone call from Anderson, did not corroborate Anderson's denial that he had spoken to Poda over the telephone that day.

swered, "No." Because Poda had never been to the Richmond shop, Green gave him directions on how to get there.[31]

Poda in fact began work at the Richmond shop on 10 July and worked there until he left Respondent's employment on a date not disclosed by the record. The manager of the Richmond shop was Steve Apple, who Poda had worked for in San Francisco when Apple managed that shop.

Depending on the traffic and Poda's speed, it took him between 20 to 25 minutes to drive to the San Francisco shop from his residence and between 45 minutes to an hour to drive to the Richmond shop.

2. Analysis and conclusions

The complaint alleges in substance that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when District Manager Anderson on 9 July 1984 interrogated Poda about a grievance filed against Respondent by Local 718 and threatened him with discharge because he filed a grievance against Respondent. As I have found supra, on 9 July Anderson telephoned Poda and asked, "What's this union stuff?" and "What are you trying to do to me?" and in almost the same breath promised Poda that he would keep his work under surveillance and discharge him if he made a single mistake. Viewed in context, it is clear that in asking these questions and threatening Poda with discharge Anderson was referring to the grievance that Local 718 filed against Respondent on Poda's behalf. It is also clear that Anderson's questions about the grievance were reasonably calculated to elicit a response from Poda concerning his reasons for filing the grievance with Local 718. Likewise, when viewed in context, it is clear that Anderson's promise to keep Poda's work under surveillance and discharge him if he made a mistake was reasonably calculated to be construed by Poda as a threat to discharge him because Local 718 had filed a grievance on his behalf. I therefore find that by threatening Poda with discharge because his bargaining representative, Local 718, had filed a grievance against Respondent on his behalf Respondent engaged in conduct reasonably calculated to coerce Poda from exercising his rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, and that by engaging in this conduct Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I also find that because Anderson's above-described interrogation of Poda about the grievance filed by Local 718 on his behalf occurred in the context of Anderson's illegal threat to discharge him on account of that grievance, the interrogation was coercive and constituted a separate additional violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The complaint alleges that Respondent's transfer of Poda on 10 July 1984 from its San Francisco to its Richmond shop violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act because it was motivated by Poda's union or protected concerted activities. Considering Poda's transfer occurred almost simultaneously with Respondent's knowledge that Local 718 had filed a grievance against Respondent on Poda's behalf concerning his wage complaint;[32] considering Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening to discharge Poda because Local 718 filed this grievance on his behalf and by coercively questioning Poda about the grievance; considering Poda was notified about his transfer on the same day that Respondent first learned that Local 718 had filed a grievance against it on Poda's behalf and within 4 hours after Respondent's threat to discharge Poda because of this grievance, I am persuaded that these considerations in their totality warrant a finding that the General Counsel has established that Respondent was hostile toward Poda because Local 718 had filed a grievance against Respondent on his behalf and that this hostility was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to transfer Poda from its San Francisco to its Richmond shop.

The remaining question for decision is whether Respondent has established by a preponderance of the evidence that Poda's transfer would have taken place even in the absence of Local 718's grievance on Poda's behalf. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 403 (1983), affirming the standard announced in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). An evaluation of the pertinent evidence follows.

During the time material, Respondent's nine northern California stores, the stores involved in this case, employed approximately 17 auto glass installers. Respondent's West Coast division manager Ken Anderson was responsible for the operation of these stores.

Immediately before Poda's 10 July transfer from the San Francisco to the Richmond shop, the San Francisco shop employed three workers: Young, Poda, and Spencer. Young, a journeyman auto glass installer, was the shop manager and spent all of his time in the shop answering the telephone and making sales. Poda, a trainee auto glass installer, spent most his time away from the shop doing mobile work; he went to the homes and/or businesses of customers to install auto glass. Spencer, a journeyman auto glass installer, was the assistant manager and spent most of his time working in the shop and doing Young's work in his absence. The shop had insufficient work to keep both Poda and Spencer busy and prior to Poda's transfer Anderson expressed his concern to Young about this.

[31] This description of Green's 9 July conversation with Poda is based on Poda's testimony. Green did not testify. Anderson testified that he was unable to remember whether he visited the San Francisco shop on 9 July with Green, but denied that he was present when Poda was notified of his transfer. Anderson also testified initially that it was either Green or Young who told Poda about his transfer, then later testified that Young was the person who told Poda about his transfer. Young testified that he was present when Poda was notified about his transfer, but was unable to recall whether it was himself or Green who told Poda about the transfer, nor could he remember whether Anderson was present when Poda was notified. I credited Poda's testimony because his testimonial demeanor was good when he testified about this matter.

[32] Anderson's testimony that it was not until some date after Poda's transfer, a date he was unable to remember, that he received Local 718's 6 July letter about Poda's grievance, has been rejected because: (1) his testimonial demeanor was poor when he gave this testimony; (2) the letter was mailed from Local 718's office in San Francisco, California, which is located geographically in close proximity to Anderson's office, which is located in Oakland, California, thus there is a strong likelihood that during the normal course of mailing the letter would have been delivered on 9 July to Anderson's office; (3) the content of Anderson's 9 July telephone conversation with Poda, supra, warrants the inference that Anderson was speaking to Poda about Local 718's 6 July letter.

Immediately before Poda's 10 July transfer to the Richmond shop, that shop employed two workers, Steve Apple and Kent Wright. Apple, the shop's manager, was a journeyman auto glass installer and spent most of his time away from the shop doing all of the shop's mobile work. Wright, who was a sales representative and not an auto glass installer, spent all of his time in the shop answering the telephone and making sales. The Richmond shop was a low volume shop. Between 80 and 90 percent of its work was mobile work.

Poda worked under Apple's supervision initially when Apple managed the San Francisco shop. Anderson knew that at times there had been ill will between Apple and Poda and, on one occasion, they had a dispute about Poda's overtime, which was resolved by the State of California. However, Anderson also knew that Poda's relationship with the shop's current manager, Young, was not good. For in April 1984 Young issued Poda a final written disciplinary warning that threatened Young with discharge.[33]

When it transferred Poda from its San Francisco shop to its Richmond shop on 10 July, Respondent did not replace him with another worker, thus leaving two workers in that shop. However in September Respondent employed a third worker there, a trainee installer, for 2 weeks and then sometime in October again employed a third worker there, another trainee installer, who worked until late December. Since then Respondent has only employed two workers at its San Francisco shop.

In the 3-year period immediately prior to Poda's transfer, Respondent transferred approximately 15 installers between the shops involved in this case. As was the case with Poda's transfer, Respondent's practice was not to consult with the transferred employee about the transfer or give the employee advance notice of the transfer.

Division Manager Anderson made the decision to transfer Poda. He testified that he concluded that it did not make sense to have Richmond Store Manager Apple spend virtually all of his work time away from the shop doing mobile work, especially since Sales Representative Wright was not doing a good job working at the desk, so about 1 June 1984 Anderson decided that the make up of the Richmond shop's staff would have to be changed by having Apple work in the shop, just as Young did in San Francisco and, because Wright was not an installer, to terminate him and replace him with an installer from one of Respondent's other shops.[34] Anderson further testified that when Respondent's telephone bill showed that Wright had made unauthorized telephone calls, about 9 July 1984 Anderson decided to implement the above decision to terminate Wright and have Manager Apple do all the Richmond shop's inside work and to transfer an installer from one of Respondent's other shops to do all the Richmond shop's mobile work.

Regarding Poda's selection as the installer who was transferred to the Richmond shop, Anderson testified that he considered transferring an installer from one of the shops located nearest to Richmond, the San Francisco and Oakland shops, and concluded that in the Oakland shop there was sufficient work to keep all the employees employed there busy, whereas in San Francisco there was not enough work to keep installers Spencer and Poda busy. He further testified that in selecting Poda, rather than Spencer, for transfer, he relied on the following considerations: Poda had worked under Apple's supervision previously; Poda did most of the San Francisco shop's mobile work, thus was more experienced in performing this type of work that constituted virtually all the work performed by the installer at the Richmond shop; the Richmond shop was a low volume shop, thus Anderson did not want to transfer a good and experienced worker such as Spencer there because Anderson felt that Spencer would not have enough work to keep him busy and would become bored.

Anderson's above-described testimony establishes that during the normal course of business Poda was transferred as an integral part of Respondent's decision to have the manager of its Richmond shop, like the manager of its San Francisco shop, spend his working time in the shop rather than away from the shop doing installation work, and further establishes that Poda's selection to be transferred to do the Richmond shop's installation work, rather than one of Respondent's other installers, was based on legitimate business considerations and occurred during the normal course of business. I am persuaded that Anderson's testimony is credible because, unlike his testimony concerning other matters, when he testified about his reasons for transferring Poda his testimonial demeanor was good, and viewed in the light of the whole record, his testimony is not inherently incredible nor was it impugned in significant respects either by internal inconsistencies or by the testimony of Shop Manager Young whom the General Counsel called as an adverse witness. Furthermore Anderson's testimony is bolstered by the fact that when Respondent transferred Poda from its San Francisco shop, it did not replace him with another installer.[35] I also find it difficult to believe that Respondent would go to the trouble of discharging Sales Representative Wright, reassigning Shop Manager Apple from doing outside installation work to working solely in the shop, and decreasing the number of its San Francisco shop installers from two to one in order to create a situation that it could use as a pretext for transferring Poda to the Richmond shop because of its antagonism toward him for having authorized Local 718 to file a grievance against Respondent. In this regard, I note that although during normal traffic conditions Poda's transfer added 50 minutes a day to his work commute, [33] The record does not reveal what Poda did to warrant Young's disciplinary warning. Young testified that although at times Poda was a good worker, at other times he was not a good worker and took an inordinate amount of time to finish his work assignments.

[34] I note that Young testified that sometime prior to Poda's transfer, Anderson discussed with Young his concern about the lack of work in the San Francisco shop for the amount of workers employed there and the fact that he needed another installer at the Richmond shop.

[35] I recognize that Rspondent employed other trainee installers for various periods of time in San Francisco to take Poda's place whenever the volume of work at that location made this necessary. However, since Poda's transfer Respondent for the most part has operated the San Francisco shop with only two workers, and as of the date of the hearing in this case, 15 March 1985, this has been the situation since late December 1984.

when Poda was notified about the transfer and asked by Operations Manager Green whether it posed any problems for him, Poda answered, "No"; there is no evidence the working conditions Poda would expect to encounter at the Richmond shop would be more onerous than at the San Francisco shop; and, while Poda had his differences with Richmond Shop Manager Apple when Apple managed the San Francisco shop, the record reveals that Poda's relationship with the current San Francisco Shop Manager Young was not good inasmuch as only 3 months before the transfer Young had issued a written disciplinary warning to Poda threatening him with discharge.

Based on the foregoing, I find Respondent has established that even absent Poda's grievance against Respondent filed by Local 718, Respondent during the normal course of business would have transferred him on 10 July 1984 from its San Francisco to its Richmond shop. I therefore shall recommend the dismissal of this allegation.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Lear Siegler, Inc., d/b/a Safelite Glass, the Respondent, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Glaziers, Architectural Metal & Glassworkers Union, Local Nos. 169, 718, and 1621, International Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, the Unions, are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. (a) Respondent's employees, excluding supervisors as defined in the Act, employed in the job classifications covered by the Respondent's contract with Glaziers Union Local 718 effective from 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985, and employed by Respondent at its San Mateo, California and San Francisco, California facilities, constitute an appropriate bargaining unit.

(b) Respondent's employees, excluding supervisors as defined in the Act, employed in the job classifications covered by the Respondent's contract with Glaziers Union Locals 169 and 1621 effective from 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985, and employed by Respondent at its California facilities located in the cities of Richmond, Oakland, San Jose, Pleasant Hill, San Leandro, Hayward, and Fremont, constitute an appropriate bargaining unit.

4. During all times material, Glaziers Local Union 718 has been the collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the bargaining unit in paragraph 3(a) above for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act, and Glaziers Local Unions 169 and 1621 have jointly been the collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the bargaining unit in paragraph 3(b) above for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By unilaterally ceasing payments to the health and welfare and pension and vacation and holiday funds established by its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions, and by unilaterally substituting new medical and pension plans for the medical and pension plans required by its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions, and by unilaterally changing employees' vacation and holiday benefits established by its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions, and by unilaterally decreasing the employees' minimum hourly rates of pay established by its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions, and by engaging in the aforesaid conduct during the term of its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions and without the Unions' consent, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By bypassing the Unions and dealing directly with employees represented by the Unions concerning nonmandatory subjects of bargaining previously rejected by the Unions as subjects of bargaining and by threatening to permanently replace the employees if they supported a strike caused by Respondent's insistence that the Unions' accept such nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. By refusing to furnish the Unions with unit members' names, addresses, dates of hire, and wage rates, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. By interrogating employee James Poda about a grievance filed on his behalf by his bargaining representative Glaziers Local 718, and by threatening Poda with discharge because Local 718 filed this grievance on his behalf, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

9. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

10. Respondent has not otherwise violated the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I have found that since 18 July 1984 Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by, during the term of its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions, ceasing to make contributions on behalf of the unit employees to the health and welfare and pension and holiday and vacation funds established by those contracts. In order to dissipate the effects of these unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent commence making the required contributions to the respective funds and make the unit employees whole by paying all the aforesaid contributions, as provided in the applicable collective-bargaining contracts, which have not been paid and which would have been paid absent the Respondent's unlawful discontinuance of such contributions.[36] In addition, I shall also recommend that Respondent make whole the unit employees for any losses or expenses they may have suffered from Respondent's failure to make the aforesaid contributions.[37] Such sums shall be computed in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682, 683 (1970), with interest, as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

I have found that about 18 July 1984 during the term of its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally substituting new health and welfare and pension plans for the health and welfare and pension plans required by its contracts with the Unions, and which had previously covered the unit employees. In order to dissipate the effects of these unfair labor practices I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to restore, on the Unions' written request, the health and welfare and pension plans established by the contracts.[38] I shall recommend that Respondent make whole the unit employees for any expenses or loss of benefits they may have incurred as the result of Respondent's substitution of the new health and welfare and pension plans for the previous plans.[39] Such sums shall be computed in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Service, supra, with interest, as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., supra, see generally Isis Plumbing Co., supra.

Having found that during the terms of its 1982–1985 contracts with the Unions since 18 July 1984 Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally changing the unit employees' holiday and vacation benefits established by the contracts and by unilaterally decreasing the unit employees' minimum hourly rates of pay established by the contracts, I shall recommend that Respondent make the unit employees whole for any losses they have suffered as a result of this conduct. Such sums shall be computed in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Service, supra, with interest, as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., supra, see generally Isis Plumbing Co., supra.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[40]

ORDER

The Respondent, Lear Siegler, Inc., d/b/a Safelite Glass, Wichita, Kansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Glaziers, Architectual Metal & Glassworkers Union, Local Nos. 169, 718, and 1621, International Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, by refusing to furnish the Unions with the names, addresses, dates of hire, and wage rates of its employees in the appropriate bargaining units described as follows:

> (i) All employees of Respondent, excluding supervisors as defined in the Act, employed in the job classifications covered by the Respondent's contract with Local Unions 169 and 1621 effective from 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985, and employed at Respondent's facilities located in California in the cities of Richmond, Oakland, San Jose, Pleasant Hill, San Leandro, Hayward and Fremont.
> (ii) All employees of Respondent, excluding supervisors as defined in the Act, employed in the job classifications covered by the Respondent's contract with Local Union 718 effective from 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985, and employed at Respondent's California facilities located in San Mateo and San Francisco.

(b) Refusing to bargain collectively with the above-named Unions by unilaterally ceasing to make contributions on behalf of its employees in the above-described units to the health and welfare and pension and holiday and vacation funds as provided for in the collective-bargaining contracts between Respondent and the Unions effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985 during the term of those contracts.

(c) Refusing to bargain collectively with the above-named Unions by unilaterally instituting during the term of its contracts with the Unions its own health and welfare and pension plans for the plans provided for in the Unions' contracts with Respondent with respect to the employees in the above-described units.

(d) Refusing to bargain collectively with the above-named Unions by unilaterally during the term of its contracts with the Unions decreasing the vacation and holiday benefits and wage rates established by the Unions' contracts with Respondent with respect to the above-described unit employees.

(e) Refusing to bargain collectively with the above-named Unions by bypassing the Unions and dealing directly with the employees in the above-described units which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

[37] In measuring actual damages, employees should be reimbursed for their actual costs. For example, with respect to health and welfare expenses the employees shall be reimbursed for only those costs that would have been paid by the health and welfare plan in existence under the 1982–1985 collective-bargaining contract, minus costs that were actually paid by Respondent's insurer pursuant to the health and welfare plan Respondent substituted for the contractual plan.

[38] In order to allow the Unions ample opportunity to consider whether to request the reinstatement of the previous health and welfare and pension plans, while not leaving the matter open indefinitely, I shall recommend that the Unions be required to make their decision within 60 days of the date of the Board's decision. If the Unions do not request the reinstatement of the health and welfare and pension plans that were in effect prior to 18 July 1984, the plans Respondent substituted for them will remain in effect. Respondent will have 40 days after the receipt of the Unions' written request to replace its company plans with the previous plans.

[39] As noted supra, the employees should be reimbursed only for their actual costs.

[40] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

concerning nonmandatory subjects of bargaining rejected by the Unions as subjects of bargaining and by threatening to permanently replace employees if they support a strike caused by Respondent's insistence that the Unions' accept such nonmandatory subjects of bargainining as a part of Respondent's contract proposal.

(f) Interrogating employees about grievances they file with the above-described Unions against Respondent and threatening employees with discharge for filing such grievances.

(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On written request, furnish the above-described Unions with the names, addresses, dates of hire, and wage rates of its employees in the above-described appropriate bargaining units.

(b) On written request of the above-named Unions, restore making payment on behalf of the employees in the above-described units to the health and welfare and pension and vacation and holiday funds established by its contracts with the Unions effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985.

(c) On written request of the above-named Unions, restore the holiday and vacation benefits and wage rates of the employees in the above-described units so as to conform to the provisions contained in its contracts with the Unions effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985.

(d) On written request of the above-named Unions, and in the same manner as set forth in the remedy section of this decision, rescind the health and welfare and pension plans that it instituted in July 1984 and reestablish the health and welfare and pension plans that were in existence under its contracts with the Unions effective 1 July 1982 to 30 June 1985.

(e) Make whole the employees in the above-described units by making the contributions to the health and welfare and pension and holiday and vacation funds, as provided in the above-described applicable collective-bargaining agreements, which were not paid and would have been paid absent the Respondent's unilateral discontinuance of such contributions during the term of the agreements, and by reimbursing unit employees for any expenses ensuing from the Respondent's failure to make such contributions, as set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(f) Make whole the employees in the above-described units, as set forth in the remedy section of this decision, for any losses or expenses they may have suffered as a result of the unilateral conduct of Respondent during the term of its contracts with the Unions in decreasing the employees' holiday and vacation benefits, decreasing their wages, and substituting its own health and welfare and pension plans for the plans established by the Unions' contracts.

(g) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amounts due under the terms of this Order.

(h) Post at each of its places of business in Northern California copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[41] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(i) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint allegations not specifically found herein be dismissed.

[41] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO (A T & T Information Services) and Sharon M. Jones. Case 21–CB–9693

12 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 12 February 1987 Administrative Law Judge Joan Wieder issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO, San Diego, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We deny the General Counsel's motion to strike the Union's exceptions to the judge's decision on the grounds that they failed to comport with the form required in Sec. 102.46 (b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

Theodore R. Scott, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Donald A. Hon, Esq., for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOAN WIEDER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in San Diego, California, on 21 November 1986.[1] This proceeding commenced with a charge filed by Sharon M. Jones, an individual, on 21 August. A complaint was issued on 16 September alleging that Communications Workers of America, Local 11509 (Respondent or the Union) has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act by notifying Jones that she had been charged with violating the Union's internal rules by working during a strike; and she would be subsequently informed of the trial date on these charges. The Union admits the Employer, A T & T Information Services (Employer or AT&T) meets one or more of the Board's jurisdictional standards and I so find. The Union acknowledges that it is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. Respondent admits notifying Jones as alleged in the complaint but denies it violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

The parties appeared by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to adduce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue, and file briefs. Briefs were timely filed and were considered in my review of the record. After consideration of the record and the demeanor of the witnesses, I find, for the reasons stated below, that the Union did violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

Facts

The facts are primarily undisputed. Jones had sporadic employment with AT&T. As here pertinent, she was hired as a temporary employee about April 1979. At that time she executed a dues-checkoff form after being told it was a condition of employment.[2] After a short layoff, Jones returned to work about 5 March 1980 and, as here pertinent, continues as an AT&T employee. She executed another dues-checkoff form when she was rehired on 5 March 1980 under a similar understanding it was a condition of employment. Jones never executed a membership application, took an oath of membership or gave any other indicia of membership in Respondent or any other Union.[3] The mere tendering of dues does not make an employee a member of the Union and Respondent does not so argue. Respondent admits in its brief that Jones was not a member.

In June the Union engaged in a strike against AT&T. Jones worked during the strike. Two union members, Jennifer M. Miller and Ann Naughton, observed Jones crossing the picket line and independently filed charges against her with the Union. Respondent, on 11 August, processed these charges and sent Jones the following letter:

> You have been charged with violating the Union Constitution, Article XIX, Section 1
> d. Disobeying or willfully failing to comply with any lawful decision or order of the Union or Local.
> e. Working without proper Union authorization, during the period of a properly approved strike (AT&T, June 1, 1986 through June 26, 1986) in or for an establishment which is being struck by the Union or Local.
> You will be notified of your trial date and time at a later date.

[1] All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] There was no evidence adduced why dues checkoff was a condition of employment but the General Counsel indicated on the record, without refutation, that the condition arose from a union-security clause in the operative collective-bargaining agreement.

[3] The Respondent argued on brief that Jones cast a ballot in a certified union election in March 1982. This is a bare assertion not raised at hearing or the subject of any probative evidence. On the contrary, Jones testified, without dispute or refutation, that she never attended any union meeting or voted in any union sponsored election. Based on demeanor and the unrefuted testimony of Jones, I find that she did not do anything to indicate union membership. The Union failed to adduce any evidence that it considered Jones a member or had any basis for such a conclusion. Jones did use the union dental insurance program but under conditions obtaining for nonmembers that were described as less favorable than those available to members.

> You have the right to select a member of the Local as counsel, the right to produce and cross examine witnesses, present documentary evidence and to be heard on your own behalf. If you have any questions you may contact this office.

The letter was signed by Robert B. Sarsfield, the Respondent's secretary-treasurer.

The day after she received the letter Jones called the Union and was referred to Carol Stegall, whom the parties stipulated held the office of executive vice president with the Union. Jones informed Stegall that she was not a union member and requested she be sent any documents she executed reflecting she was a member. Stegall refused saying it was not necessary because "I was receiving CWA literature, as a matter of fact, made me a member." About 21 August, Jones again telephoned Stegall and they had a similar conversation and Stegall told Jones to "wait for my summons and appear in [Union] court." Neither Stegall or any other representative of Respondent appeared and testified. Jones' testimony is totally unrefuted, and this factor, cojoined with her forthright demeanor, leads me to credit Jones' testimony.

Jones did not receive any further communications from Respondent. Stegall informed both Miller and Naughton that the Union dismissed the charges against Jones. The date(s) of these communications is not a matter of record. The Union did write a letter to the Board's Regional Office informing a field examiner that the Union would drop the charges against Jones. The letter was dated 13 November, about a week before the trial herein. Jones was informed by the Region at some unspecified date. When Jones learned of the Union's representation to the Region is not a matter of record. The record clearly indicates that Respondent has never informed Jones that the charges have been dropped and all union records on the matter expunged from its files. There was no testimony from any of Respondent's representatives or any documentation that the Union did in fact take such action and/or expunged the charges from its files.

Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act has been consistently found to provide that it is an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to "restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act." Included in these Section 7 rights is the right to refrain from engaging in protected concerted activities, including strikes. Machinists (Boeing Co.), 185 NLRB 380, 381 (1970); Communications Workers Local 1170 (Rochester Telephone), 194 NLRB 872 (1972).

The Supreme Court in Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423 (1969), listed the requirements for the lawful imposition of union discipline under the Act as follows:

> Section 8(b)(1)(A) leaves a union free to enforce a properly adopted rule which reflects a legitimate union interest, impairs no policy which Congress has imbedded in the labor laws, and is reasonably enforced against union members who are free to leave the union and escape the rule.

Respondent argues that the matter is moot and the Board is estopped from pursuing Jones' charge for the Board has previously dropped charges against the Union when similar union processes had been initiated then "summarily dropped, upon a showing of nonmembership in the Union." Patterson v. Stage Employees IATSE, 323 F.2d 368 (10th Cir. 1963), and Lanigan v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local, 327 F.2d 627 (7th Cir. 1964). The cited cases are found inapplicable to this proceeding for they involved actions where no remedy could be afforded at the time the proceedings were before the courts. In this case, the Board can require that the Union cease and desist from such actions and post a notice informing employees that their public rights are protected. Also, the cited cases do not involve the Respondent's practice of sending charges to nonmembers. No proceedings involving charging nonmembers for working during a strike were cited by Respondent. The Respondent's actions are clearly beyond the ambit described by the court in its Scofield decision, supra. Cf. Textile Workers UTWA Local 1029, Granite State Joint Board v. AFL–CIO, 409 U.S. 213, 217 (1972); Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984). That the Union's charges did not mention a fine is not an exculpating factor. As the General Counsel notes in her brief, the Board's decision in Oil Workers Local 6–578 (Gordy's Inc.), 238 NLRB 1227, 1231 (1978), enfd. 619 F.2d 708 (8th Cir. 1980), found:

> Threatening to file charges constitutes "restraint" and "coercion" within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1) without requiring a showing that the notice of the potential penalty was explicitly brought to the attention of the charged employee. Communications Workers of America, AFL–CIO (Rochester Telephone Corp.), 194 NLRB 872, 873 (1972) (written charges filed against a nonmember).
> The Board also held in the Gordy's decision, id., ". . . fines are implicit when disciplinary proceedings are initiated or threatened without an express limitation as to the range of sanctions available; this is most obviously true in the case of a resigned member who ipso facto cannot be expelled.

This same logic applies to nonmembers who also cannot resign to escape any discipline nor be expelled in lieu of monetary penalties.

Respondent's assertion of estoppel is without any support in the record. The Board has not been shown to have waived its obligations under the Act previously or acted in any manner that would have estopped it from investigating Jones' charge and issuing a complaint based thereon. Respondent's argument that the Board is estopped is found to be without merit. To adopt their argument would inappropriately relieve the Union of its recordkeeping obligations, and the Board would be its surrogate in determining that employees are members. In this case, the representation of nonmembership by the employee the day after being informed charges had been filed against her and she would be subjected to a trial did not even stir the Union to commence an investigation. Instead, the aggrieved person was informed that she would be subjected to a trial before the union would even consider her representation of nonmembership. To adopt Respondent's arguments would eviscerate the Act, and leave the Union free to continue to coerce and intimidate nonmember employees. I find that the Respondent's letter in this case was a coercive and restraining missive.

The Respondent also argues that it dropped the charges at some unspecified time, rendering this proceeding moot. Its action was never related to Jones, the one person restrained and coerced by the charges. As the Board held in Gordy's, id.:

> Faced with the possibility of action against him, the employee may well be, for practical purposes, impelled to forego his statutory right not to honor the unions' picket line rather than risk involvement in a lawsuit whose outcome he cannot predict.

The Union's action could coerce Jones and other nonmembers who learn of the event, or are similarly treated into foregoing their statutory right to cross a picket line and work in the future.

Other factors mitigate in favor of finding a violation in this case. For example, Jones was not notified the charges were dropped, notice was only given to the Regional Director. The Respondent did not admit that it violated the Act. On the contrary, its defense indicates that it has an established practice of charging employees who cross picket lines without regard to their status as nonmembers and awaits some outside parties' intervention to prove that the employees were not properly the subject of internal union disciplinary measures. Thus, there was an erroneous understanding that its actions did not violate the Act. The Respondent did not promise to refrain from similar coercion in the future. Rather, its argument indicates that it intends to continue the practice of relying on the Board or others to inform it if the employees it charges are nonmembers. Finally, there was no evidence adduced by Respondent that indicates the charges have in fact been dropped and its records expunged.

Considering the circumstances of this case, I find that the unfair labor practice is not de minimis. An important Section 7 right has been infringed, the right of a nonunion member to refrain from engaging in protected concerted activity in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

CONCLUSION OF LAW

By processing internal union charges against Sharon M. Jones, who is not and never was a union member, for failing to honor a Union picket line and working during a strike, the Union restrained and coerced an employee in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Union engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, I recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. The General Counsel seeks the imposition of a visitatorial clause but has not shown that it is warranted in the circumstances of this case; therefore, the request is denied.

The Respondent will be required to post a remedial notice to employees and members because the object of Respondent's unfair labor practice was a nonmember, a notice to members would fail to provide the needed reassurance and information to nonmembers that they can exercise their Section 7 rights. Steelworkers (Newport News Shipbuilding), 239 NLRB 82 (1978).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL-CIO, San Deigo, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Restraining or coercing Sharon M. Jones, or any other employee who is not a member of the Union, in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, by processing charges against them because they exercised their right to cross a picket line and refrained from engaging in a work stoppage called by the Union.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Expunge from its records any references to the filing of internal union charges against Sharon M. Jones.

(b) Dismiss any pending charges against Sharon M. Jones.

(c) Notify Sharon M. Jones, in writing, that it has taken these actions.

(d) Post at its San Diego, California facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Deliver to the Regional Director for Region 21 signed copies of the Appendix for posting by AT&T Information Services, the Company willing, at its San Diego, California facility, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce Sharon M. Jones or any other employee who is not a member of the Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO, in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, by processing union charges against them because they exercised their right to cross a picket line and refused to honor a work stoppage called by the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL expunge from our records all references to the filing of internal union charges against Sharon M. Jones.

WE WILL dismiss any such internal union charges pending against Sharon M. Jones.

WE WILL notify Sharon M. Jones, in writing, that we have taken the ordered actions.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 30 January 1987 Administrative Law Judge Irwin Kaplan issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in opposition.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Charging Party has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Dennis F. Fountain, Esq. (Belleville & Aspinwall, P.A.), of Longwood, Florida, for the Respondent.
Travis E. Woodham, of Orlando, Florida, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

IRWIN KAPLAN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Orlando, Florida, on 15 September 1986. The underlying charges were filed by the International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 673, AFL–CIO (Charging Party or Union) on 20 May 1986 and gave rise to a complaint and notice of hearing dated 29 July 1986 (amended at the hearing).[1]

In essence, it is alleged that Yusuf Mohamad Excavation, Inc.[2] (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by laying off seven employees on 14 May 1986 because of their union activities. Further, it is alleged that Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by a statement to one of the laid-off employees linking the layoffs to the union activities.

The Respondent filed an answer conceding, inter alia, jurisdictional facts and the supervisory and agency status of certain individuals but denying that it committed any unfair labor practices. According to the Respondent, the decision to lay off employees was predicated solely on business considerations unrelated to union activities. The Respondent noted, inter alia, that the alleged discriminatees were separated "contemporaneously with the discharge of other employees as a result of a work slow down."

Based on the entire record, including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified, and after careful consideration of the posttrial briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, Yusuf Mohamad Excavation, Inc., is a Florida corporation engaged in the building and construction industry as a road building and land development contractor and maintains an office and place of business in Orlando, Florida. During the past 12 months, the Respondent, in connection with its aforenoted business operations, purchased and received at its Orlando place of business products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Florida. It is admitted, the record supports, and I find, that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

It is admitted, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Sequence of Events

The Respondent has been engaged in the business of land clearing and general excavation in the Orlando, Florida area for the past 12 years. Yusuf Mohamad is Respondent's owner and president. According to Mohamad, because a major customer, the Anden Group of Florida (Anden) had instructed him to hold off further excavation work on a property known as the "Lindfield job," he decided to lay off a number of employees, mostly heavy equipment operators on 14 May 1986.[3]

Mohamad testified that after working on the Lindfield job for about 2 days, he was called by Ralph Spano, an owner of Anden, and told: "[W]e've got problems, please stop. Remove the equipment from the job." A followup letter dated 9 May from Spano to the attention of Nick Luxon, Mohamad's assistant in charge of contract negotiations stated as follows:

[1] At the hearing, par. 5 of the complaint was deleted.
[2] The name of the Employer appears as amended at the hearing.

[3] All dates hereinafter refer to the year 1986, unless otherwise indicated.

> I regret to inform you that the subdivision known as Lindfield P.U.D. scheduled to start on or before April 30, 1986, has been rescheduled to a later date.
> Per our discussion, and my discussion with Mr. Mohamad, I have elected not to continue any site work until all the situations that are troubling this project are resolved. [R. Exh. 2.]

The Lindfield job involved a substantial amount of "dirt work" and, as such, the use of operators and heavy equipment, i.e., dozers. According to Mohamad, he had planned to employ his operators from his Lake Buena Vista project (Buena Vista) where, assertedly, the bulk of the clearing and dirt work was completed, on the Lindfield job. Thus, when the Lindfield project was put on hold, Mohamad, assertedly, did not have enough work to maintain those operators and instructed James Long, the general superintendent, to lay them off. Long testified that he in turn told his several area superintendents, on a one-to-one basis, that they had to reduce their crews and to select employees for layoffs where the work was least needed.[4] Patrick Crowe, the area superintendent at the Buena Vista location, Respondent's largest project, selected the employees (majority of the alleged discriminatees) laid off from that job.[5]

The union activity began in early May, approximately 2 weeks before the layoffs. Then, some eight employees had expressed among themselves their unhappiness with working conditions, which led one of them, Keith Dominy, on 2 May, to contact the Union and arrange a meeting. The meeting was held on 5 May after work about 5:30 p.m. at the Waffle House, across the street from the Buena Vista jobsite. There, Dominy, along with fellow operators Donald Graham and Richard Uber met with Union Business Agent Travis (Ed) Woodham and they discussed union representation. Dominy testified that over the next few days he obtained signed union authorization cards from eight employees across the street from the jobsite at a Texaco station.[6]

On 12 May, a second meeting with Business Agent Woodham was held at a 7-Eleven store, a half mile from the jobsite. At this meeting, Dominy, Graham, and Uber were joined by employees Walter Whitebirch, Roger Owens, and Michale Desmondez. All of them with the exception of Desmondez were laid off on 14 May.[7]

According to the General Counsel, on 15 May, Superintendent Crowe acknowledged that the employee layoffs were linked to their union activities. Whitebirch testified that he met Crowe on 15 May (1 day after the layoffs), around 4:30 p.m., at the 7-Eleven store and initiated a brief conversation. As further testified by Whitebirch, he told Crowe that he knew the employees were fired because of the union cards and the latter in response stated, "Yes, if I knew about the Union before anybody else in the Company, that I could have straightened it out and everybody would have kept their jobs." Whitebirch then assertedly asked Crowe whether he would hire him back, to which the latter responded, "No, there wasn't no [sic] work." Crowe denied any such conversation with Whitebirch or ever having made any reference to the Union. Crowe acknowledged, however, that on a number of occasions after the layoffs, he and Whitebirch passed each other going in and out of the 7-Eleven store, where they "probably" exchanged greetings.

After Whitebirch was laid off, he obtained other employment immediately next to his former jobsite. He was laid off from that job on 30 May. According to Whitebirch, that same day he had a conversation with Mohamad's brother, Shake, who told him that Respondent had obtained two new accounts and would be rehiring employees. Whitebirch testified that Shake asked him whether he had signed a union and, when Whitebirch denied that he had, Shake suggested that Whitebirch approach Long or Crowe about getting his job back.[8] Later that day, Whitebirch approached Long at the Buena Vista project and asked him if the Company was hiring. Long assertedly asked Whitebirch his name and whether he signed a union card. Whitebirch testified that when he answered in the negative, Long reached into a truck and pulled out a piece of paper and inquired of Whitebirch why he had signed a union card. According to Whitebirch, although he did not see the contents on the piece of paper, he had guessed that his name was listed as a union card signer and, as such, he explained to Long that he signed because he had not received a wage increase. Whitebirch was assertedly told by Long that the Company was not hiring. According to Long, on the occasion in question, Whitebirch asked him whether he could get a job but as he, Long, did not then know whether the Company could use Whitebirch, he referred Whitebirch to Crowe.[9]

B. Discussion and Conclusions

The General Counsel, citing the Board's causation test in discriminatory 8(a)(3) discharge cases, as set forth in Wright Line,[10] contends that he had made a prima facie showing to support an inference that the "employees' union activities were a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to lay them off." This, assertedly having been accomplished, the General Counsel also contends that the Respondent failed to meet its burden by showing that the disputed layoffs would have occurred notwithstand-

[4] Respondent employed approximately 100 employees on some 8 or 9 projects.

[5] The record disclosed that 10 employees had been laid off between 14 and 17 May including the 7 alleged discriminatees and 2 other employees had resigned (Jt. Exh. 1).

[6] Dominy named only seven of the card signers: himself, Donald Graham, Gordon Martin, Roger Owens, Richard Uber, Wally Whitebirch Jr., and an employee named Roy. Dominy may have inadvertently omitted the name of Gregory Nelson, an alleged discriminatee. The record is silent otherwise regarding Nelson's union activity. As for the employee named Roy, the record disclosed that this individual had to be Roy Brunner. (See Jt. Exh. 1.)

[7] It also appears that all of them with the exception of Desmondez, had signed union authorization cards and are alleged discriminatees. (See fn. 6, supra.) Although Brunner also signed a union card and was laid off on 14 May, he is not an alleged discriminatee.

[8] Mohamad's brother "Shake" is not alleged to be a statutory supervisor or agent of Respondent. The individual referred to as "Shake," did not appear as a witness.

[9] It is not alleged that Long's comments to Whitebirch on the occasion in question, independently constituted a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1).

[10] 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

ing the protected or union activity, as required under Wright Line.[11]

In assessing whether the General Counsel has established a prima facie case as a threshold matter, it is noted that the record disclosed certain critical elements tending to support the allegations. Thus, the record clearly revealed that at least six of the seven alleged discriminatees had engaged in union activities shortly before they were laid off. These same employees, inter alia, had signed union authorization cards and attended a union meeting near the jobsite only 2 days earlier. Although Respondent informed these employees that they were laid off for lack of work, it is noted, that they had worked overtime each of the preceding 3 weeks.

As for other critical elements, "knowledge" and "animus," the General Counsel relies almost entirely on statements assertedly made by Crowe and Long to Whitebirch, after the layoffs had occurred. It is noted, however, that the testimony of Crowe and Long, if credited, reflect that the statements ascribed to them could not have been made. For example, Crowe denied having a conversation with anyone about the Union. In particular, Crowe denied that he had any conversation with Whitebirch after the layoffs. According to Crowe, he first learned about the Union in preparation for the instant trial. Long, for his part, admitted that Whitebirch approached him for a job subsequent to the layoffs, but asserted that he merely referred him to Crowe.

As noted previously, Whitebirch testified that he met Crowe at the 7-Eleven store the day after the layoffs and that Crowe confirmed that the employees were discharged because of their union activities. According to Whitebirch, Crowe told him that if he knew about the Union before the others (presumably, Mohamad and Long), "he could have straightened it out and everybody would have kept their jobs." I find it implausible and highly unlikely that Crowe made this statement, noting particularly that Whitebirch also testified that immediately following Crowe's statement he, Whitebirch, asked about a job and was told by Crowe that he could not hire him because there was not any work. In rejecting Whitebirch's testimony, it is noted that it is somewhat incongruous for Crowe to confirm that the Union was the core of the problem and in the next breath state that there was not any work. Contrary to the General Counsel, I also fail to discern how "Whitebirch's testimony is corroborated by Crowe's admission that he had seen Whitebirch at the 7-Eleven store many times after May 14." Crowe admitted only that he saw Whitebirch at the store on a number of occasions and that they had exchanged greetings; he denied that he conversed with Whitebirch. The fact that Crowe saw Whitebirch frequently at the 7-Eleven store, without more, does not mean that Crowe would confide in Whitebirch or that his testimony corroborated Whitebirch's in any meaningful sense. Such chance meetings between them could be anticipated particularly where, as here, Respondent's jobsite as well as Whitebirch's home and work location were all in the same immediate area of the 7-Eleven store in question.

On 30 May, Whitebirch was laid off from his new job. According to Whitebirch's uncorroborated testimony, at some unspecified time that day, he learned from Mohamad's brother Shake, that Respondent had obtained two new accounts and would rehire employees. Shake assertedly asked Whitebirch if he had signed a union card, which the latter denied, and Shake then assertedly referred Whitebirch to Long or Crowe.

As noted previously, Shake is not alleged to be a statutory supervisor or agent. In fact, the record is devoid of any evidence regarding Shake's connection with the Respondent. Still, the General Counsel urges that an adverse inference is warranted against the Respondent for its unexplained failure to call Shake as a witness, citing NLRB v. Cornell of California, 577 F.2d 513, (9th Cir. 1978), enfg. 222 NLRB 303 (1976), and KBMS, Inc., 278 NLRB 826, 848–849 (1986). These cases are factually distinguishable and inapposite. In both cases, the Respondent relied on employee statements of disaffection as a basis for withdrawing recognition from an incumbent union. Here, unlike the cited cases, the General Counsel relies on the uncalled witness' statement as binding against Respondent. In these circumstances, in which the General Counsel has not made an effort to explain his own failure to call Shake as a corroborative witness, and noting particularly an absence of any supervisory or agency allegation, I find that an adverse inference is improper. Compare Wayne Construction, 259 NLRB 571, fn. 1, par. 2 (1981), in which the Board refused to draw an adverse inference noting that there was no basis for inferring that a co-owner was not equally available to both the Respondent and the General Counsel.

Having rejected Whitebirch's testimony regarding his conversation with Shake on 30 May, as binding against Respondent, I also find little reason to credit his account of his subsequent conversation with Long that same day. Although it is undisputed that Whitebirch approached Long about his job, the testimony regarding what transpired between them on that occasion in virtually all other respects is in conflict.

In rejecting Whitebirch's version in material respects, it is noted that the General Counsel has largely substituted opinion, conjecture, and speculation for probative evidence. For example, according to Whitebirch, after he denied signing a union card (in response to Long's inquiry), Long asked Whitebirch his name and pulled out a sheet of paper and questioned Whitebirch why he had signed a union card despite the aforesaid denial. The General Counsel characterized the sheet of paper as a "hit list" of union supporters. In support thereof, the General Counsel noted that Crowe had compiled a list of names of employees to be laid off. However, as noted previously, the record is devoid of any credible evidence of Crowe's knowledge of union activity.[12] I also find plausible and credible Crowe's explanation for delineating at that time the best and needed employees from those less needed to meet Respondent's exigencies. In any event, there was no showing that the piece of paper assertedly referred to by Long was the same list compiled by Crowe. Significantly, in terms of discounting Whitebirch's testimony as probative evidence is that he admittedly never saw what was on the piece of paper in question.

[12] Respondent's "Employment Termination" forms indicate that each of the alleged discriminatees was recommended to be rehired (R. Exhs. 1(a)–(g)). Most of these employees were supervised by Crowe. These records tend to cast further doubt on the General Counsel's claim that Crowe prepared a "hit list" of union supporters who were not to be recalled.

According to Long's testimony (implicitly), he did not have to refer to any list of names because he had recognized Whitebirch from his earlier employment. In these circumstances, noting also an absence of any other animus or knowledge ascribed to Long, I find no cogent basis to reject his assertion that he recognized Whitebirch, particularly because the latter had left Respondent's employ only 2 weeks earlier.

In the instant case, it is noted, that virtually all the union activity took place off the jobsite. Although the Board has not hesitated to infer Respondent's knowledge of employees' protected activities from the surrounding circumstances in appropriate cases, the evidence does not support such an inference. Compare, Dr. Frederick Davidowitz, D.D.S., 277 NLRB 1046, 1049 (1985) (the respondent, conducted a series of "coercive meetings" on the first working day after the discharge to prevent the union from organizing); Matai (U.S.A.) Inc., 281 NLRB 327, 332 (1986) (while the respondent's supervisors had denied that they were told about the alleged discriminatee's union activities, they admitted that they were told that union cards were passed around and that union supporters were identified).[13]

Aside from the General Counsel's failure to demonstrate by credible evidence that Respondent harbored antiunion sentiments or that Respondent had knowledge of the employees' union activities, the record disclosed still other factors tending to militate against a prima facie case. Thus, in addition to the seven alleged discriminatees laid off on 14 May, two other employees, Roy Brunner and Randy Ellis were also laid off for lack of work that same day and five other employees left Respondent's employ shortly thereafter. (Jt. Exhs. 1(a)–(e)). Collectively, this group represented Respondent's largest reduction in force; the vast majority of them, including the alleged discriminatees, were operators. In this regard, it is noted, that the Respondent did not hire or rehire another operator until 2 June when Brunner, a union card signer, was rehired. Ellis, on the other hand, was not involved in union activities and has not been recalled. Operator Gregory Nelson was also laid off on 14 May and has not been recalled. Nelson, an alleged discriminatee did not testify nor is there any evidence that he engaged in union activities.

The record disclosed that Respondent hired or rehired 17 equipment operators between 4 June and 3 September, but did not recall any of the alleged discriminatees. However, the record is largely silent regarding their overall qualifications or for which of Respondent's eight or nine projects they were assigned to work. Further, the record disclosed that after the layoffs, relatively little work was performed by equipment operators at the Buena Vista jobsite, where the alleged discriminatees had been hired primarily to work. In any event, the record is far from clear that Responent maintained any formal or consistent policy regarding recalling laid-off employees.

Although Respondent's reasons for its actions are not free of doubt,[14] the Board has observed that even when the record raises "substantial suspicions" regarding employee discharges, the General Counsel is not relieved of "the burden of proving that Respondent acted with an illegal motive." Affiliated Hospital Products, 245 NLRB 703 fn. 1 (1979). Here, the record failed to establish any animus or knowledge of union activities on the part of Respondent. This, as well as the other factors noted above, persuades me that the General Counsel has failed to prove, prima facie, that Respondent acted with an "illegal motive." Accordingly, I shall recommend that the allegations be dismissed in their entirety.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Yusuf Mohamad Excavation, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local No. 673, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel has not proved by a preponderance of the credible evidence that Respondent laid off employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. The General Counsel has not established that Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[15]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[13] In Davidowitz, the Board also noted an active "rumor mill" or "grapevine" so that hardly anything of significance escaped management's attention.

[14] The timing of the layoffs, inter alia, is not free of suspicion coming 2 days after a union meeting. On the other hand, the layoffs followed the shutdown of the Lindfield project, as ordered by Respondent's customer (Anden) and this project has not resumed operations. According to Mohamad, he had planned on using the Buena Vista operators (the laid-off employees) on the Lindfield project.

[15] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 23 January 1987 Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

A. Bradley Howell, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Joseph A. Schwachter, Esq. (Littler, Mendelson, Fastiff and Tichy), of San Francisco, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. The charges in the instant proceeding were filed by Charles William Antonopulos (7–CA–25346) on 30 December 1985, Sidney Boonstra (7–CA–25358) on 6 January 1986, Peter H. Advocaat (7–CA–25381) on 10 January 1986, and Wilbert A. Hofstra (7–CA–25559) on 28 February 1986 (Charging Parties). The order consolidating cases, consolidated amended complaint, and notice of hearing issued 15 April 1986 alleging that P.I.E. Nationwide, Inc. (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, by threatening the Charging Parties with harassment by other employees and with closure of the Grand Rapids and Kalamazoo terminals unless they agreed to participate in a proposed employee stock investment plan and by coercing the Charging Parties into joining the plan.

The case was tried before me on 20 and 21 May 1986 at Grand Rapids, Michigan. The parties were represented by counsel at the hearing and were afforded opportunity to be heard and to present evidence and argument. The General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs. On the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after giving due consideration to the briefs, I make the following[1]

FINDINGS OF FACT

In 1984 Respondent lost $16 million. In 1985 through September it was losing approximately $5 to $6 million per month. In the accounting period September 1984/September 1985 the Company lost $50 million. At the meeting in Atlanta in July 1985[2] top members of Respondent's management met. At this meeting it was announced that I.U., Respondent's parent company, could no longer justify putting money into Respondent; that something had to be done about the Company's financial condition. Three options were considered: First, the Company could continue to operate as it had and go out of business by the end of the year; second, it could downsize by selling certain portions of its business; and third, it could launch an Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP). It was determined that the third option was the best alternative; if organized properly, implementation of the ESOP program would result in a reduction in the Company's operating cost by $54 million. This could be done, however, only if there were 100-percent participation in the ESOP program.

Subsequent to the Atlanta meeting, officials of Respondent described the plan to the Union. The Union gave the Company its blessing and advised Respondent's management that it preferred to see efforts at stabilization rather than closure.

In August, in Chicago, another meeting was held. This one was attended by management personnel of the Company's 11th region. Basically, the same matters were discussed at the Chicago meeting as had been considered earlier in Atlanta. Jack Shang, president and chief executive officer of the Company, and Brian Kulman, its vice president of traffic described the Company's economic plight to those present and advised them that Respondent was on the brink of going out of business and had to do something desperate to reduce operating costs. Those present were then told about the ESOP plan and that its implementation was a must; that 90-percent participation by both management and rank-and-file employees would be necessary to success while 70-percent participation was necessary for SEC approval. The members of management from the various terminals were told that they were to go back and relay what they had heard to the employees at those terminals. Both the voluntary aspect of the plan and the desperate financial plight of the Company were to be relayed.

During the period following the Chicago meeting, the various members of management at the terminals in the Company's region 11 tried to sell the ESOP program to the rank-and-file employees. At the Grand Rapids terminal the sales manager, Gordon Wolters, was concerned because only about half of the employees initially agreed to sign up. A meeting of all Grand Rapids employees was scheduled.

On the morning of 30 September the meeting was held. It was attended by 10 or 12 employees of the Grand Rapids terminal, whether on duty or not. At the beginning of the meeting, Gordon Wolters and Steve Borkowski, the Grand Rapids terminal manager, addressed the employees briefly. They described to the employees the financial difficulties the Company was suffering and necessitated the implementation of the ESOP program. They stated that the plan was voluntary, but they were concerned for their jobs. They told the employees that they were all in the situation together and if the program did not succeed they, management, and rank-and-file employees were all facing a loss of employment. They then introduced John Rogers, the Regional Sales Director, who was visiting the Grand Rapids terminal for the specific purpose of addressing the employees with regard to the importance of the ESOP program.

Rogers played a video tape for the employees, which featured Jack Shang explaining the pros and cons of the ESOP program. According to the taped presentation, employees volunteering to participate in the ESOP program would be required to give up 15 percent of their pay in exchange for stock in the Company. The purpose of the ESOP was to afford financial relief to the Company to enable it to continue to operate. Shang urged the employees to take the 15-percent cut and to sign up for the program. He noted that management personnel as well as rank-and-file employees would be participating; that this was necessary because the Company was losing money. He said that although participation was voluntary, 90-percent participation by everyone was necessary for success.

Following the Shang presentation Rogers addressed the employees. He told them that the ESOP program was an absolute must; that the Company could not go on the way it was going; that as Jack Shang had said in the video presentation, the Company had to have 90-percent participation but would like 100 percent; that it was a time when everybody had to reach back and not only contribute, to work for the Company, but to protect everybody's job. He reiterated what Shang had said in the earlier presentation that the Company was losing large amounts of money and that the reason the Company was introducing the ESOP was to turn the Company around financially, but that its future was uncertain at that time.

In addition to the various speeches by management personnel and the video presentation, several pieces of written material were distributed. There was a prospectus that noted that participation was voluntary with a 4 October deadline,[3] a pamphlet, describing the Stock Investment Plan, a beneficiary election form, a question and answer pamphlet, and an election to participate form. Employees were told to take the application forms, read the material, and think about it. Each employee who received the election to participate form had his name already filled in at the top. Charging Parties Boonstra and Hofstra wrote "no" on their applications, but did not turn them in at the meeting. Charging Parties Antonopulos and Advocaat wrote "no" on their application forms and turned them back to management after the meeting.

After the meeting and after Antonopulos returned his application to Borkowski, the latter engaged him in conversation. Borkowski said, "So you think the plan is a bunch of bullshit!" Antonopulos replied that he did not feel that way at all; that he just did not feel that he could afford to commit 15 percent of his wages over 5 years and raise a family of four children. Borkowski then told Antonopulos that if the Company folded, he, Antonopulos, would be personally responsible for over 11,000 jobs.[4] Borkowski asked Antonopulos if he could live with that.

About noon on 30 September Borkowski engaged Advocaat in conversation about the ESOP program. Borkowski asked Advocaat what it would take to change his mind. Advocaat replied that he would be willing to participate, but that his financial situation at the present made it impractical.

On the evening of 30 September, Hofstra turned in his application form with the work "no" on it. Hofstra explained that he did not want to participate because he was anticipating retiring in the near future. Borkowski said that he did not like the looks of the "no" on Hofstra's application and added that he wished that Hofstra would reconsider. Hofstra replied that he felt that he would not be able to do much good for the short time that he had left working. Borkowski said that the Company would like to have Hofstra as part of the team; that he would like to have Hofstra sign up.

The week of 30 September–4 October was a very emotional week for both rank-and-file employees and for management personnel. There was a lot of talk between the two groups about the ESOP and also among the rank-and-file employees themselves. Debate was heated about the pros and cons of the plan. On 1 October Borkowski called Boonstra into his office and asked him if he had made up his mind yet as far as the ESOP program was concerned. Boonstra replied that he had not. The same day, about noon, Borkowski engaged Advocaat in conversation. Borkowski asked Advocaat if he had changed his mind about participating in the ESOP program. Advocaat replied in the negative, adding that it was impractical for him to participate. He suggested that perhaps he could sign up at a later date, like May 1986. Borkowski stated that that would be impossible, that Friday, 4 October was the deadline.

About 5:30 or 6 p.m. on 1 October, Advocaat had a conversation with two other employees, Dick Christianson and Bob Pearson, in the drivers' room. He was asked by one or both of them why he had not signed up for the ESOP program. Advocaat replied that he thought that the program was supposed to be voluntary. The reply was that the program was voluntary, but that it was like the army: "You don't volunteer 'no,' you only volunteer 'yes.'" An argument followed, there was some [3] The deadline was established by the SEC.

[4] Borkowski denied making this statement but admitted telling Antonopulos that he would be partially responsible. I credit Antonopulos' version.

name-calling, and the discussion became heated. Advocaat was told that if he thought he could get another job, why didn't he go find one and make room for others who wanted to work. Advocaat replied, "Don't steal from me! Shut the place down then." His adversaries answered, "That would be just fine. Then we would all be out of a job." Advocaat slammed the door angrily and left.

On the evening of 1 October, a conversation occurred in the drivers' room between Wolters and Advocaat. Wolters told Advocaat to give serious consideration to signing up with the ESOP plan. He stressed that it was very important for him to do so, commenting that Advocaat was considered a leader among the employees, and urged him to show leadership by signing up. Once again Advocaat stated that it was impractical for him to sign up at that time. Wolters said, "Well, you know they are going to shut the place down, and I am 52 years old, and damn it, I am too old to go looking for other work."[5]

On 1 or 2 October Borkowski approached Antonopulos while at work and asked him if he had thought anymore about the ESOP. Antonopulos replied that he had been looking through the prospectus, but still could not see how he could afford the plan without refinancing his house. He added that interest rates and closing costs were too high. Borkowski said that Antonopulos might have to sell his property up North.

On 2 October another conversation took place in Borkowski's office between Advocaat and Borkowski. Borkowski asked Advocaat if he had changed his mind and was ready to sign up for the stock plan. Advocaat replied negatively stating that he did not intend to change his mind. Borkowski reminded Advocaat that if there was not a high enough participation, there was a possibility that the terminal would be shut down.[6] Advocaat then advised Borkowski that he had been in a heated argument the night before in the driver's room, referring to his discussion with Christianson and Pearson about the ESOP. He added that he did not appreciate the treatment he had been getting from fellow employees. Borkowski stated that it was a very emotional situation; that there were a lot of people concerned for their jobs. He added that if Advocaat did not sign up for the ESOP program, he could expect more of the same.

On the afternoon of 2 October, a conversation took place in the drivers' room between Borkowski and employee Edward Klinge. Borkowski asked Klinge if he was ready to sign his ESOP application. Klinge replied that he was not; that he would do some thinking about it. Borkowski said, "We sure could use your help on this. We need it." Klinge then asked how they were doing at the Kalamazoo terminal. Borkowski answered that they did not yet have anyone signed up there. When Klinge asked what they were going to do there, Borkowski replied that if the Kalamazoo employees did not sign up to participate in the ESOP, the Company would probably close the terminal and run it out of Grand Rapids.

On the evening of 2 October Borkowski again asked Advocaat if he had reconsidered and was willing to sign up for the ESOP. He added that he felt that Advocaat was one of the leaders of the men and that it was of paramount importance that he show that leadership by signing up and preserving the Company.

On 2 or 3 October Borkowski invited Antonopulos into his office and again asked him if he had changed his mind about participating in the stock plan. Antonopulos replied that he had not; that he could not afford it. Borkowski stated that it would be rough on everybody financially; that he, himself, was trying to think of ways to earn money around the house to make up the difference. Antonopulos asked Borkowski if he knew anyone at the terminal who was participating in the plan and who was raising a large family. Borkowski supplied the name of another employee.

According to the testimony of employee Sid Boonstra, on the morning of 3 October a meeting was held at the Grand Rapids terminal. Rogers, Wolters, and Borkowski were present as were the drivers. Rogers told those present that none of the employees at the Kalamazoo terminal had signed up for ESOP and because of that the Company would probably close that terminal and run its business out of the Grand Rapids terminal.[7] Employee Robert Pearson testified, "I do not know if it was at that meeting or not but I do remember some discussion on Kalamazoo. That [it] could possibly be serviced out of Grand Rapids." Pearson could not recall if he heard this from Rogers or from one of the other employees.

Also on 3 October, in an incident that occurred in the drivers' room in the presence of several drivers, Wolters addressed Sid Boonstra.[8] He said that he probably would regret saying it, but was going to say it anyway. He then reminded Boonstra of an earlier time when Boonstra had been ill, when Wolters and other employees had come to his aid. He then said that he and the others now needed Boonstra's help. Boonstra said that the situations were not the same. Wolters stated that he, Boonstra, would be leaving for the Netherlands in a couple of weeks to start up an export business. He suggested that Boonstra "quit being the leader [of opposition to the ESOP] and do them all a favor"; quit right then and "get the hell out" if he did not like the Company. Wolters, by the accounts of witnesses, appeared very sincere and had tears in his eyes. To those present the impression was that Wolters was afraid of losing his job. The tension at this meeting was great. Half an hour later Wolters apologized for his earlier remarks.

Borkoski, that day, called Boonstra into his office and asked him if he had made up his mind on the ESOP program. Boonstra replied that he had and that it was "No!" Borkowski stated that that would be very detrimental to [5] Wolters testified that he made remarks concerning these matters during a meeting in the breakroom on 2 October.

[6] To the extent that Borkowski's testimony appears to be in conflict with that of Advocaat concerning this conversation, I credit Advocaat.

[7] Rogers denied making this statement. I credit Boonstra. Employee DeGroot's testimony on the subject was inconclusive.

[8] Wolters basically admitted the statements attributed to him by Boonstra, but stated that they were made at a different time at a group meeting.

the Company and added that they probably would lose their jobs.[9]

Also on 3 October employees Antonopulos and Hofstra received letters from Borkowski dated 2 October stating:

> Dear Employee;
> Re: Ryder/P.I.E. Stock Investment Plan
> We have one more day to enlist your participation in the Stock Investment Plan.
>
> Our records indicate that you have not signed up to participate. I know this is a serious matter that you and your family must consider carefully. I would urge you to decide promptly. The future of your Company and your job depends on the active support of this program by everyone involved.
> A majority of the employees have signed cards and more are participating every day. But we need about 1200 more cards signed before midnight on Friday. Every Participant Counts.
> We all need to pull together and make this happen now. Help your fellow employees by signing up today.
> Sincerely yours,
> /s/Steve Borkowski
> Terminal Manager

On the evening of 3 October, Klinge, after giving serious consideration to the conversation between Boonstra and Wolters that had occurred several hours earlier, called Wolters at his home and advised him that he intended to sign his application to participate in the ESOP program the following afternoon.

Meanwhile, the same evening, Borkowski again called Advocaat into his office and asked him if he changed his mind and was ready to participate in the ESOP plan. Advocaat replied that he had not changed his mind and did not foresee himself changing it. While he was either on his way into or out of Borkowski's office, on this occasion, Wolters took the opportunity to remind him of the great importance of participating in the plan because of the financial condition of the Company. He added that (without sufficient participation) there would probably be some closings, if not of the entire system, then perhaps of individual terminals.

Also on the evening of 3 October, Borkowski called Hofstra at his home and told him to reconsider and join the plan. Hofstra replied that he did not feel that he should because he would need the money for his anticipated retirement and he was only working 2 or 3 days a week at the time. Borkowski stated that he sure would like to have Hofstra join and be a part of the plan.

Later in the evening of 3 October, Advocaat had lengthy conversations on the telephone with his family about his possible participation in the ESOP program. In one conversation with his oldest son, he was advised to sign up to avoid harassment and in order to protect his job while he looked for another one. He decided to sign up the following day and did so.

At 8 a.m. on 4 October, a meeting was called at the Grand Rapids terminal. Present for management were Rogers, Wolters, and Borkowski. Drivers were in attendance. Rogers read a progress report on the percentage of participation in the ESOP program at various terminals. He noted that Kalamazoo had signed up 100 percent while certain other stations had signed up 85 percent. Shortly after the meeting, about 9:30 a.m., Boonstra and Borkowski discussed the ESOP issue. Boonstra commented that he had never experienced so much pressure as during that week. Borkowski offered that he had been under a lot of pressure himself the day before. Boonstra assumed that Borkowski meant that his pressure came from the men. He noticed a tear trickle down from Borkowski's eye as he, Boonstra, turned away to go to work. Borkowski said, "Well, I hope you are on our side," and added that if the employees did not sign up for the plan, both Boonstra and Borkowski would lose their jobs.

Also, shortly after the 8 a.m. meeting Hofstra was called into the office. John Rogers was present, later to be joined by Wolters and Borkowski. Rogers asked Hofstra how old he was when the Company hired him. Hofstra replied that he had been hired in 1981 when he was 49 years old. Rogers opined that it was awfully good of the Company to give Hofstra a job at that age, then added, "You know, if you don't join up [in the ESOP], the rest of the employees are going to treat you like shit. They are going to shun you and not talk to you."[10] Wolters said that he would like Hofstra to sign up as a favor to him. Borkowski then added that he wished that Hofstra would sign because he wanted him to be a member of the team, to help the Company out so that it could make a go of it. Rogers then went to the telex and read something off a message about an employee in Chicago who said he was planning to retire in January, wished Rogers all the luck in the world, was behind Rogers all the way, and was going to sign up for the program. Hofstra, who felt that if he did not sign up, the Company would go under, signed a few minutes later.

Later in the morning of 4 October, Borkowski and Klinge had a conversation in the drivers' room about the ESOP. Klinge told Borkowski that he was not ready to sign. Borkowski replied, "We need your help bad, and it is getting close to the deadline." The deadline was, in fact, that day. That afternoon Klinge signed the application to participate in the ESOP, based on his witnessing of the Boonstra/Wolters conversation of the day before.

[9] Borkowski admitted stating that if the Company did not get the required amount of participation in the ESOP plan, both Boonstra and he stood possibly to lose their jobs.

[10] Rogers testified how he tried to convince Hofstra that although the latter would soon be retiring and would not need the ESOP program, the other employees would still need it to keep their jobs. When Hofstra offered to sign up for the ESOP program in return for a guaranteed 5-day week, Rogers stated that he could not do so because of bargaining rules. This description of the conversation is credited. However, Rogers denied telling Hostra that the rest of the employees would shun him if he did not sign up for the ESOP program. With regard to this statement, I credit Hofstra. Although Wolters and Borkowski testified that Rogers did not say anything to Hofstra, during this conversation, about the attitude of other employees, it is clear that they were not present during the entire conversation and could not have heard everything that was said. (See Tr. vol. II, p. 15.)

About 4 p.m. on 4 October, Antonopulos punched in and was shortly thereafter called into Borkowski's office. Borkowski unfolded a computer printout and showed it to Antonopulos explaining that the printout indicated the terminals throughout the country that had turned in 100-percent participation in the ESOP program. He stated that Grand Rapids had achieved only 90-percent participation and had to do better. Antonopulos asked Borkowski if he was trying to imply that if Grand Rapids did not turn in 100-percent participation the Company would close that terminal. Borkowski replied, "I don't know, they might," and added that, at that time, only Antonopulos and Mike Victor had not agreed to participate in the ESOP program and that Victor was being unreasonable. Borkowski then stated that he did not mean it to be a threat; however, it would be rough for Antonopulos to work alongside employees who had joined the plan; that it could get ugly; and that he had already seen it.[11] Antonopulos asked if it would be possible to sign up at some future date but Borkowski said that the signatures would have to be in by that weekend. That evening, about 6 p.m., Christianson came into the drivers' room during Antonopulos' break and asked if he had signed up. When Antonopulos replied that he had not, Christianson said that he had no respect for anyone who had not signed up and that as far as he was concerned the Company would be better off as soon as Mike Victor and Antonopulos were gone. He added that he would be watching for Antonopulos every chance that he got.

On the evening of 4 October, Hofstra and Antonopulos signed up for participation in the ESOP program. Boonstra also signed his application on 4 October and returned it to John Rogers.

The Respondent's terminals maintain a telex system for business purposes. They are not to be used for personal messages and at the Grand Rapids terminal rank-and-file unit personnel are not permitted to use the telex.

During the week of 29 September through 4 October, a large number of telex messages were received at the Grand Rapids terminal, sent from other terminals, asking people to sign up for the ESOP plan. A few came in early in the week, many more by 3 and 4 October. After receipt of these telex messages, Borkowski and perhaps other members of management posted a number of them on the bulletin board next to the timeclock where the employees checked in and placed others on the table in the drivers' room where the drivers hung up their coats, had lunch, and took their breaks.

Charles Antonopulos testified that he saw a number of these telex messages on 2, 3, and 4 October. One such message referred to the low percentage of participation in the ESOP program at Grand Rapids and stated: "We vote to close." Antonopulos did not notice who had signed this telex message. He saw another that read: "What is wrong with you employees who have not signed up for the plan? Don't you know jobs are hard to come by?" Still another that Antonopulos testified to seeing read: "85 percent of something is better than 100 percent of nothing."

Boonstra credibly testified to seeing telex messages on the table in the drivers' room, one of which read, "Grand Rapids had 43 percent. We vote to close."[12] Others he saw read, "Please sign up for this plan. I need my job." Boonstra testified that the only other times that he noticed telex messages in the drivers' room was when the terminal received some congratulatory message from management concerning how well the terminal was doing.

Advocaat testified to seeing one telex message posted, which was an ESOP update listing the terminals in the region and showing the number and percentage of employees who had signed up for the ESOP program. This message also said that if certain terminals did not show a high enough percentage, some terminals could be closed down, especially end-of-the-line terminals. Grand Rapids[13] is an end-of-the-line terminal. Advocaat saw this message on 3 October. Advocaat saw other messages that read, "Please sign up for the plan and save our jobs."

After catching sight of these telex messages, Advocaat called the 800 number provided for employees who had questions concerning the ESOP program. He asked the individual who answered the call[14] if the information contained in the telex was true. He was told that the machinery was in place to close down the system, that participation was not high enough.

Management personnel testified concerning the telex messages. Borkowski agreed that normally rank-and-file office employees did not use the telex but stated that they did so occasionally. He admitted that regardless of who had sent the messages, management or nonmanagement, it was he who placed the telex messages on the table in the drivers' room and posted them, or some of them, on the bulletin board. Borkowski testified that he did this in order to show the drivers what the extent of participation was at other terminals inasmuch as he had been asked questions on the subject by various employees.

Rogers testified that the various terminals were using the telex messages to campaign on behalf of the ESOP program but he did not personally know who was sending the messages. He testified that the regional manager eventually sent out a message himself stating that the ESOP messages must stop. Before the messages were stopped, however, during that week, the region was updated twice a day, once at noon and once at 6 p.m. These updates showed how many people were employed at each terminal in the region, how many of them had signed up for the ESOP program, and what percentage of employees had signed up. Rogers could not recall [11] Borkowski admitted telling Antonopulos that he could expect some friction or disagreements if he did not sign up for the plan but denied using the terminology ascribed to him by Antonopulos. I credit Antonopulos.

[12] Boonstra testified that he did not see who signed this message or did not recognize the signature.

[13] Rogers testified that he could recall no such message and that none could have issued from the regional office. However, Rogers also testified that he did not see the telex messages in the breakroom. I credit Advocaat that he did, indeed, see such a message and that it probably originated from outside Grand Rapids.

[14] This person was unidentified.

seeing the message concerning end-of-the-line terminals but admitted that he had been told at the time that one existed. Rogers denied that there had been any messages concerning the closing of terminals if participation was not great enough.[15] On the other hand, he also testified that he did not see but did hear about the messages concerning Grand Rapids having only 43-percent participation, "We vote to close."

Gordon Wolters testified to seeing 100 to 150 telex messages on the table in the drivers' room, but saw none concerning end-of-the-line terminals. He did recall seeing one that mentioned a low percentage of participation at Grand Rapids, which was signed by someone other than a managerial person. Wolters testified that rank-and-file employees have access to the telex equipment. He did not take the message seriously.[16]

Like the other members of management, Borkowski denied that he ever saw the end-of-the-line telex message concerning which Advocaat testified. He also could not recall such a message being mentioned by any of the drivers.

Analysis and Conclusion

There is no dispute that Respondent in 1984 and 1985 was in dire financial difficulty and that the planned implementation of an ESOP plan was the only alternative to closing down some of its terminals or going out of business altogether. After obtaining the agreement of the Union, Respondent's top management told its regional officers to relay to their terminal employees the company's financial condition and the need for 100-percent participation in the ESOP program.

At the September 30 meeting at the Grand Rapids terminal, management emphasized to the rank-and-file employees that if the ESOP program did not succeed, both management personnel and rank-and-file employees would be facing loss of employment. Management explained at this meeting that the ESOP program required all management and rank-and-file personnel to sacrifice 15 percent of their salary or wages in exchange for stock in the Company and that this would enable the Company to continue to operate. To succeed, it was stated, 90-percent participation was necessary.

Subsequent to this initial meeting at the Grand Rapids terminal other meetings followed. Sometimes these meetings were attended by several members of management and a number of drivers and sometimes these meetings took the form of one-on-one confrontations. It was during these subsequent meetings where, the complaint alleges, incidents of 8(a)(1) threats occurred, which resulted in the Charging Parties being coerced into joining the stock plan.

Thus, in the consolidated amended complaint, paragraph 10 alleges that Steve Borkowski, on 2 October, threatened an employee (Advocaat) with continued harassment by other employees if he refused to participate in the Stock Investment Plan. In my estimation, however, there was no threat involved in this incident. Both participants were aware that emotions were high among those employees who were in favor of the ESOP program and those who were against it. Indeed, Advocaat had just had an argument with Christianson and Pearson about the ESOP program the night before and it was his reporting of this argument to Borkowski that elicited the latter's remarks that the situation was an emotional one; that there were a lot of people concerned for their jobs; and that if Advocaat did not sign up for the ESOP program, he could expect more of the same.

In my opinion, Borkowski's remarks were not meant as a threat but an expression of a well-founded opinion based on his observation of the conditions around him as well as on Advocaat's report of the incident that had occurred the night before. Such expressed opinions by supervisors concerning possible harassment of one employee by fellow employee's taking opposite positions on labor-related problems have not been found to be violative of the Act where there is no evidence of involvement by the supervisor in the harassment or any ratification or adoption of the harassing acts of rank-and-file employees by an employer or its supervisors.[17]

Paragraph 15 of the complaint contains a similar allegation, namely that Borkowski, Wolters, and Rogers threatened employees (Antonopulos and Hofstra) with harassment by other employees if they refused to participate in the Stock Investment Plan. Again, I find Rogers' statement to Hofstra and Borkowski's statement to Antonopulos concerning the attitude of other employees towards them if they should fail to sign up for ESOP merely expressions of their opinions; predictions rather than threats, and not violative of the Act.[18]

Paragraphs 11 through 14 contain allegations of threats to close terminals if enough employees employed at these terminals did not agree to participate in the ESOP program. Paragraph 11 alleges that Borkowski and Wolters made such threats concerning the Grand Rapids terminal on 2 October to Advocaat. The record indicates that Borkowski told Advocaat on that date that if there was not a high enough participation in the ESOP program, there was a possibility that the Grand Rapids terminal would be shut down. The record also indicates that Borkowski also told Klinge on that date that if the Kalamazoo terminal employees did not sign up to participate in the ESOP program, the Company would probably close the terminal and run it out of Grand Rapids.

Paragraph 12 alleges that Respondent posted notices in the drivers' room threatening closure of the Grand Rapids terminal if the employees refused to participate in the Stock Investment Plan. The record indicates that a large number of telex messages were received at the Grand Rapids terminal during the first week of October. A number of these telex messages, all having to do with the ESOP program, were posted or placed on the table located in the drivers' room by management personnel.

[15] In particular, Rogers denied that the regional offices have authority to close or even recommend the closing of terminals. This fact does not, however, preclude the possibility that such a message was, nevertheless, received.

[16] Wolters testified that although he was initially angered by this message, he and certain rank-and-file employees later laughed about it.

[18] Ibid.

One such message referred to the low percentage of participation of Grand Rapids employees and stated: "We vote to close." Another message, seen posted on 3 October, stated that if certain terminals did not show a high enough participation, that some terminals could be closed down, especially end-of-the-line terminals. When Advocaat called the 800 telephone number listed on the SIP[19] prospectus and asked if the posted message was true, he was told that the machinery was in place to close down the system, that participation was not high enough. I conclude that regardless of who sent these messages, management was responsible for bringing them to the attention of rank-and-file employees.

Paragraph 13 alleges that John Rogers, on 3 October, threatened employees with the closure of the Kalamazoo terminal if enough employees at the Kalamazoo terminal refused to participate in the Stock Investment Plan. Record evidence indicates that Rogers told employees at a group meeting that none of the employees at the Kalamazoo terminal had signed up for the ESOP program and that the Company would probably close that terminal and run its business out of the Grand Rapids terminal.

As noted supra, while Advocaat was either on the way into or out of Borkowski's office, on the evening of 3 October, Wolters told him that (without sufficient participation) there would probably be some closings, if not of the entire system, then, perhaps, of individual terminals. Although paragraph 13 of the complaint does not mention this alleged threat, paragraph 11 alleges that Wolters made this threat on 2 October. I find that the statement was made on 3 October.

Paragraph 14 of the complaint alleges that Borkowski, on 4 October, threatened an employee (Antonopulos) with closure of the Grand Rapids terminal if he did not participate in the Stock Investment Plan. The record reflects that on that day Borkowski, in answer to Antonopulos' question about the possible closure of the Grand Rapids terminal if there were not 100-percent participation in the ESOP program, replied, "I don't know, they might."

Though paragraphs 11 through 14 allege that Respondent threatened closure of terminals unless the allegedly threatened employees joined the ESOP program, I do not consider the statement made to be threats at all. Given the context in which the statements were made, I find them merely forecasts of things to come based on the reality of the situation. Thus, it is clear that the Company was faced with a financial crisis that allowed it just so many options: First, to go out of business; second, to reduce operations; third, to implement a successful ESOP program. The Company chose the implementation of the ESOP program as its course of action.

To be successful the ESOP program would require the participation of 90 to 100 percent of all personnel, both management and rank-and-file. If the ESOP program failed due to lack of participation, the result would have to be one of the other two alternatives. Managerial personnel did their best to explain the situation to all employees including the Charging Parties by advising them of the critical nature of the problem. In short, they predicted that unless everyone was willing to give up 15 percent of his salary or wages toward stock investments to make the ESOP program a success, they would all be out of work. Through some verbal arm-twisting, cooperation was acheived and all the Charging Parties agreed to join the program. In some cases the Charging Parties and other employees agreed to sign up for ESOP because of peer pressure and fear for personal safety, in other cases because they actually feared that the entire system or their terminal would close down if they did not participate in the program, and in still other cases because they were sympathetic towards the expressed concern of others that they might lose their jobs. For whatever reason the Charging Parties signed, it was not because of any activity on the part of management that could remotely be considered in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act for the statements made by managerial personnel concerning closure were not made as threats of retaliation but as forecasts of the consequences of the failure of employees to participate in the program designed to save the Company and the jobs of all concerned.

In a case[20] that clearly is not on all fours with the instant case, but that is, nevertheless, instructively parallel, the Board found no violation with respect to the comparable portions of that case. Thus, in the Raskin case, as here, the employer was faced with somewhat sudden and acute financial setbacks that required relatively immediate operational changes. Unlike Respondent herein, Raskin closed down its operation rather than first approach the union or its employees to discuss alternatives to closure. Shortly after closure, however, Raskin advised the union that it would be able to reopen its plant if it obtained certain concessions from the employees in the unit represented by the union. The union refused the employer's overtures stating that it would not be willing to settle for less than that for which the contract provided. As noted supra, in the instant case the Union agreed to the Company's obtaining concessions from the unit employees in order to stay in business.

Despite the Union's objections in the Raskin case, the employer in that case went to the employees directly and offered an ESOP plan whereby the employees would become owners of the company in return for giving up certain wages and fringe benefits to which they were entitled under the existing contract. Raskin told the employees that if they accepted the Respondent's proposal, it would reopen the plant under somewhat changed business conditions,[21] but if they refused it would stay closed or would sell the plant to a third party.

In the instant case, as noted, the Respondent told the employees that if they accepted the ESOP proposal the Company would continue in business but if they refused the proposal, the entire system or certain terminals would close. Thus, in the Raskin case the employer "promised" employees that the plant would be reopened if there were contract concessions while in the instant case the Employer "threatened" employees that the plant would be closed if there were no contract concessions. One situation is the obverse of the other.

In the Raskin case the Board agreed with the reasoning of the administrative law judge that the respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by these discussions between management and its employees. If there were no violations in the Raskin case, I can find no basis for finding a violation here.

Having found that the allegations of threats are without merit, I consequently find that the Charging Parties were not coerced into joining the Stock Investment Plan and shall recommend dismissal of the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, P.I.E. Nationwide, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act. I issue the following recommended[22]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

---

[22] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 9 December 1983 Administrative Law Judge Bruce C. Nasdor issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent had the right to relocate work, actually bargained in good faith over the relocation decisions, and had the discretion to discharge employees not in good standing with the Union. We disagree.

The Work Relocation

The judge found that the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, effective from 1 October 1979 to 31 October 1982, included a broad management-rights clause[3] that permitted the Respondent's unilateral relocation of its international and commercial lines from Plymouth, Minnesota, to Sioux Falls, South Dakota. He found that pursuant to this clause the Respondent had previously moved its countertop oven production from Minneapolis to Sioux Falls. According to the judge, the Union's failure to file Board or civil charges, or to request bargaining over the countertop relocation decision, indicated its belief that the Respondent had the right to transfer work. He found further support for this position in Union Financial Secretary Rocco DeMaio's statement during 1982 contract negotiations that the Respondent did not need a new management-rights clause because, under the current contract, the Respondent "had the right to do anything it wanted."

The clause does not reserve to the Respondent the right unilaterally to relocate work.[4] Indeed, 13 distinct issues are reserved to the Respondent's sole discretion, but work relocation is not among them. "While the Board acknowledges that a labor organization may waive the statutory rights granted to it and to the employees it represents, we will not lightly infer such a waiver, which must be in 'clear and unmistakable' language."[5] Work relocation is not clearly and unmistakably included in the management-rights clause.

Nor does the Union's failure to challenge the Respondent's earlier conduct concerning the countertop work prove the Union's acquiescence to the relocations we are considering. From 1977 until 1981, the bargaining unit experienced several layoffs. In response to DeMaio's inquiries regarding the reasons for the series of layoffs, however, the Respondent's representative consistently assured DeMaio that the layoffs were due to lack of work. In contrast, when the Respondent sought to relocate the international and commercial lines from Plymouth to Sioux Falls, it formally notified the Union in writing, as well as orally, of its plans to transfer the production operations to the Sioux Falls facility within a particular time frame. Immediately on receipt of the notification, DeMaio requested bargaining over the decisions and effects. Contrary to our dissenting colleague, we conclude that the events surrounding the earlier layoffs do not indicate union acquiescence, forever waiving its bargaining rights.[6]

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Because we cannot identify a specific contract term that the Respondent's relocation decisions modified, we conclude that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(d). See Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601, 602 (1984), affd. sub nom. Auto Workers v. NLRB, 765 F.2d 175 (D.C. Cir. 1985).

[3] The full text of the clause is as follows:

> Management Rights
> 3A. All of the customary rights of management are reserved to the Company except as they are modified by the terms of this Agreement. These rights include, but are not limited to the right to direct the working force, to hire, to discipline, to discharge for cause, to schedule work, to establish reasonable rules, to classify, to assign, to promote, to transfer, and to determine size of work force, layoffs, product and production methods.

DeMaio's statement during the 1982 negotiations does not support the judge's conclusion. The statement, made in the context of the already completed countertop work relocation, did not refer to possible future relocations. It can hardly constitute a conscious, unequivocal waiver of the Union's right to bargain over future relocations.[7] Moreover, if, as the judge found, the earlier contract clearly reserved this right to the Respondent, the Respondent would not have needed to propose a more detailed clause in 1982.

In sum, there is nothing in the management-rights clause that affirmatively authorizes the Respondent to transfer bargaining unit work outside the unit nor is there sufficient evidence in the parties' bargaining history that would justify such an interpretation.

Having determined that the Union did not waive the right to bargain about relocation decisions, we must decide whether the Respondent's decisions constitute mandatory bargaining subjects. We find that the Respondent was obligated to bargain about the decisions. In pre-relocation conversations with DeMaio, the Respondent's vice president of human resources Phillips and its vice president of manufacturing Dowling repeatedly emphasized that the most significant factor in the relocation decision was the wage differential between the Sioux Falls and Plymouth facilities.

No party seriously disputes that labor costs were the most important consideration in the Company's decisions. Consequently, we find that under Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984), the Respondent's decisions to relocate the international and commercial lines turned on labor costs and therefore were mandatory bargaining subjects.[8] By failing to bargain in good faith with the Union over those relocations, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).[9]

As the Respondent's relocation decisions were mandatory bargaining subjects, it follows that the Respondent was obligated to provide information the Union requested, which was relevant to the relocations and necessary for and relevant to the Union's role as collective-bargaining representative.[10] The judge found that the Union's information requests were "vague generalizations" seeking nonexistent or irrelevant material and, further, that the Respondent was unaware of or did not rely on any information not provided to the Union. The record convincingly demonstrates, however, that the Respondent failed to provide relevant, available information.

The Union's frequent requests for studies were not so vague that the Respondent could escape its obligation to provide relevant, available information which would have allowed the Union to understand and discuss intelligently the relocation issues. In fact, the record indicates that the Union's requests were highly specific. Thus, in its 5 November 1981 letter to the Respondent, the Union requested, inter alia, the following information about the proposed international line relocation:

> 1. On June 11, 1981, Tom Phillips, in a phone conversation, stated to me, Rocky DeMaio, that Litton was losing three million dollars a year on the Range operation at the Minneapolis plant. He also said Litton was studying the feasibility of the continuous operation of the line at the Minneapolis plant and the possible relocation of that operation.
> Based on this conversation, the U.E. requests that Litton supply the Union with the Financial Data which documents that the Range line was operating at a three million dollar a year loss.
> 2. In Tom Phillip's [sic] letter of October 30, 1981, Litton indicated that it has completed one phase of an analysis of production requirements and based on that analysis concluded that it is more economical to manufacture certain models in the Sioux Falls plant.
> From this letter it appears that Litton is now engaged in a wide ranging analysis of cost comparison[s] which go beyond the operations of the Range line. The cost comparisons are between the Sioux Falls and Minneapolis plants. Based on this fact, the Union requests Litton to provide the Union with a copy of the analysis referred to in Tom Phillip's [sic] letter of October 30, 1981. This information is necessary to enable the Union to intelligently

---

The burden of proving waiver is on the party alleging it, and the Respondent has not met that burden. The record in this case does not contain enough evidence about the Respondent's gradual elimination of countertop work from the Minneapolis area to prove that the series of layoffs due to lack of countertop work was so similar to the Respondent's relocations of the international and commercial lines that the Union's failure to challenge the countertop layoffs would constitute a waiver of the Union's right to challenge future work relocations.

[7] Although the Chairman correctly states that, in the context of labor arbitration, a party's failure to object to another party's contract interpretation may prevent future challenges to that interpretation, he mistakenly applies that arbitration waiver standard to the statutory waiver at issue in this case. The waiver of a statutorily protected right must be clear and unmistakable. Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, supra.

[8] We find that, under any of the views expressed in Otis Elevator, supra, the Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union over its decisions to relocate unit work.

[9] Contrary to the judge's findings, the Respondent never bargained about the decisions with the Union. The "various meetings" to which the judge alludes did not satisfy the Respondent's bargaining obligation because those meetings concerned primarily the information the Union requested, which the Respondent refused to provide.

bargain over the impact and the Company decision to transfer the work to Sioux Falls.

3. The Union also requests that Litton provide it with a copy of any cost analysis considered in making the decision to transfer work from Minneapolis to Sioux Falls. The Union also requests all other analyses, surveys, or studies referred to in Tom Phillip's [sic] October 30, 1981 letter which deals with the relocation or transfers of other work now being performed at the Minneapolis plant.

The Union letter also requested details concerning how and why the Respondent made its decision, the decision's effects on employees, what would be necessary to keep the work in Minneapolis, and the Respondent's financial condition, including market share and profit-and-loss information.

Regarding the commercial line, the Union reiterated the above request and asked for "a complete breakdown on variable overhead, complete breakdown on labor, copies of all studies made, [and] copies of all analysis made."

Before relocating the two lines, the Respondent provided the Union only with comparative wage data, general statements that relocating was necessary due to "hourly wage rates, commonality of products and production methods, and . . . duplication of line support personnel, etc.," and variable overhead information and a cost-per-unit projection based entirely on wages and hours. At various times, the Respondent claimed that the rest of the requested information was either nonexistent, privileged, or irrelevant. Although the Union repeated and clarified its requests on several occasions, indicating that it could not offer concessions without the information, the Respondent never provided it.

The Union's need for information is demonstrated merely by showing the "probability that the desired information was relevant, and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities."[11] The Union's requests for studies and analyses were not fishing expeditions. Rather, the Union sought additional relevant information with which it could determine the meaning of the information already provided and develop reasonable bargaining proposals.

Although the Respondent at times denied the information existed, we find it difficult to believe that such a large and complex corporation would decide on and implement a major plant relocation without considerable studying and analysis.[12] Furthermore, the Respondent's testimony calls into doubt the asserted nonexistence of the information. The 5 November 1981 information request referred to specific studies and analyses the Respondent mentioned to DeMaio. On 19 March 1982 in a discussion with union officials, including DeMaio, the Respondent's vice president Phillips said that the requested information must have been gathered somewhere and considered, and that he would try to get it.

Furnishing information is fundamental to the duty to bargain in good faith. By failing to furnish the requested information, the Respondent refused to bargain in good faith and thus violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The Refusal to Discharge Pursuant to the Union-Security Clause

We also disagree with the judge's dismissal of the complaint allegation that the Respondent failed to honor the union-security clause. Although the judge correctly stated the Board's deferral policy,[13] he misunderstood the substance of the charge concerning the Company's failure to enforce the union-security clause.[14] The arbitrator's award, issued 6 December 1980, sustained the Union's grievance over the Company's memorandum advising employees that it would not discharge them for failing to pay union dues. The arbitrator essentially found that the word "may," as used in the union-security clause, requires the Company to discharge employees failing to pay dues.

Rather than seeking enforcement of that award, the General Counsel and the Union are asking us to consider an unfair labor practice charge based on events that occurred after the arbitrator's award issued. The Union charged that the Respondent

[12] See Safeway Stores, supra at 686.

[13] The judge, citing Malrite of Wisconsin, 198 NLRB 241, 241–242 (1972), enfd. in relevant part sub nom. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 715 v. NLRB, 494 F.2d 1136 (D.C. Cir. 1974), also stated that parties seeking to enforce an arbitration award are best served in a judicial proceeding.

[14] The union-security provision states:

> 2A. All employees shall, as a continuing condition of employment with the Company, become members in good standing of the Union on or before the forty-fifth (45th) calendar day following the beginning of their employment, or on or before forty-five (45) calendar days after the effective date of this Agreement, whichever is later, and shall maintain such membership in good standing in Union during the life of this Agreement.
> 2B. When the Union notifies the Company that an employee covered by this agreement has failed to pay the monthly Union dues that are uniformly levied against all members and by reason thereof is no longer in good standing in the Union, the Company may discharge such employee. The Company need not reinstate such employee if he subsequently pays his dues and regains good standing in the Union, after being discharged. The Union will save the Company harmless from any loss, cost, or damage resulting from the discharge of any employee under the terms of this SECTION. In no case shall the Company be required to discharge an employee where such discharge would be in violation of State or Federal Law.

violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing in June 1981 to discharge certain delinquent employees pursuant to the contract's union-security clause. Under similar circumstances involving "events which occurred after the arbitration hearing,"[15] the court in Malrite held that "deferral is not appropriate with respect to an issue not considered by the arbitration panel."[16] Because the events underlying the instant charge occurred after the arbitration hearing, indeed after the arbitrator's award issued, the arbitrator could not have considered them in making his award. Accordingly, we find deferral inappropriate.[17]

In so finding, we rely on the evidence that the arbitrator had considered only whether the Company's interpretation of its obligations under the contract's union-security provision, as published in a memo, was correct. Following the Union's request that certain named employees be discharged for failure to comply with the terms of the union-security provision, the Company expressly rescinded the memo that the arbitrator had ruled was an incorrect interpretation of the contract. The Company nevertheless continued to refuse to honor the Union's request to comply with the terms of the union-security provision, without supplying any other reasons for doing so. Whatever new, unexpressed reasons it had for failing to comply with the provision could not have been considered in the arbitration proceeding.

Although deferral is inappropriate, the arbitrator's special expertise in interpreting the contract is useful to our resolution of the unfair labor practice issue. As stated above, the arbitrator determined that the parties' collective-bargaining agreement requires the Respondent to discharge employees who have not paid their union dues. We find the arbitrator's decision reasonable because any other interpretation of the language would conflict with the employees' contractual membership requirement and render the union-security provision meaningless. The word "may" simply allows the Company not to discharge an employee if that discharge would violate the law.

After the Union presented a list of delinquent employees and requested their discharge pursuant to the union-security clause, the Respondent refused to do so and, thereby, refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[18]

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 3.

"3. By failing and refusing to bargain with the Union in good faith over the decision to relocate the international and commercial lines work from Plymouth, Minnesota, to Sioux Falls, South Dakota, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act."

2. Substitute the following for Conclusions of Law 6, 7, and 8.

"6. By failing and refusing to provide the Union with requested available information necessary for and relevant to its function as exclusive collective-bargaining representative, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

"7. By failing and refusing to honor the union-security clause, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

"8. The above-described violations of the Act constitute unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act."

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, and post an appropriate notice. We shall order the Respondent to bargain with the Union concerning its decision to relocate the international and commercial lines from Plymouth to Sioux Falls, furnish the Union with the requested information, and honor the union-security provision of its 1979–1982 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

We shall also order the Respondent to restore the status quo ante by transferring back to Plymouth the work of the international and commercial

On remand from the court to consider the postarbitration hearing charges, the Board found the employer violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by engaging in individual bargaining. Malrite of Wisconsin, 213 NLRB 830 (1974).

[17] Regarding the Chairman's position that the Board is compelled to defer to the prior arbitration award here, we acknowledge that there are strong considerations in favor of following prior awards as precedent when, as here, a new incident gives rise to the same issue covered by a prior award; and in fact we have given substantial weight, below, to the arbitrator's interpretation of the union-security clause. Since, however, it is possible for there to be inconsistent arbitration awards interpreting the same contractual provision, it cannot be that the Board must reflexively defer to an arbitrator's contractual interpretation in a case like this involving subsequent events. For a discussion of the use by arbitrators of prior awards as precedent, see Elkouri & Elkouri, How Arbitration Works, 365–388 (3d ed. 1973). Having refused even to respond to the Union's request that it honor the contractual union-security clause, the Respondent cannot now claim that the Union's notice to employees was defective in defense of its own unlawful conduct. See Independent Stave Co., 248 NLRB 219, 220 (1980); California Blowpipe & Steel Co., 218 NLRB 736, 751 (1975). ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Litton Microwave Cooking Products Division, Litton Systems, Inc., Plymouth, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing or refusing to bargain collectively in good faith with United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE), and its Local 1139, with respect to the decisions to relocate the international and commercial lines work from its Plymouth, Minnesota facility to Sioux Falls, South Dakota.

(b) Failing or refusing to furnish the Union with available information necessary for and relevant to its function as bargaining representative.

(c) Failing or refusing to bargain with the Union by failing and refusing to comply with the union-security provision of its 1979–1982 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Bargain collectively in good faith with the Union concerning any decision to relocate the international and commercial lines from Plymouth to Sioux Falls.

(b) Promptly furnish the Union with the studies, analyses, and other information requested which will enable the Union to engage in intelligent bargaining.

(c) Transfer back to the Plymouth plant the international and commercial lines work previously performed at that facility by bargaining unit employees represented by the Union.

(d) Offer to those employees discharged, laid off, or suspended as a result of the work relocation from Plymouth to Sioux Falls immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make those employees whole by providing them with backpay dating from the time of their discharge, layoff, or suspension, in the manner set forth above in the remedy section of this decision.

(e) Honor the union-security clause in the 1979–1982 collective-bargaining agreement.

(f) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at its Plymouth, Minnesota facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[19] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting in part and concurring in part.

I must disagree with my colleagues' reversal of the judge's finding that the broad management-rights clause in the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, along with the past practice of the Union in dealing with work relocation and the union business representative's comments during negotiations, permitted the Respondent's unilateral relocation of its international and commercial lines from Minnesota to South Dakota. Contrary to the majority's assertion, the Union's failure to challenge the relocation of the countertop stove work was not a "single incident," but rather represented a significant pattern established from 1977 through 1981, and included at least three separate layoffs of employees from the Minnesota plant due to the transfer of work. As the judge noted, although the Union was aware of the situation, it failed to file charges against the Respondent or to even request bargaining over the gradual transfer of all the countertop work to the South Dakota plant. In the labor arbitration area, which deals almost exclusively with contract interpretation, when one party repeatedly fails to object to the other party's interpretation of a contract clause, such lack of protest has been held to represent acceptance of the interpretation and to prevent a later challenge to the course of action undertaken.[1] In the circumstances here, I think the Union's prior silence is no less significant and its "acceptance" of the Employer's interpretation no less persuasive.

In addition to the Union's lack of action concerning the transfer of the countertop work, the comments made by business representative DeMaio during the 1982 contract negotiations between the Respondent and the Union are significant. During the negotiations, the Respondent proposed a management-rights clause which specifically gave it the right to unilaterally transfer work. DeMaio rejected the proposed clause, stating that it "covers what they [the Respondent] do now, they don't need anything more." The Respondent evidently withdrew its proposal at that time. In the context of the above-mentioned past practice of the Union and the broadly worded management-rights clause in the contract, DeMaio's admission as to the breadth of the existing management-rights clause supports the judge's conclusion.

The majority asserts that DeMaio's statement did not refer to possible future relocations, but rather referred to the already completed countertop work relocation. Such an argument is puzzling, since in the normal course of contract negotiations, what has happened in the past is generally an indication of how the parties will interpret a contract clause in the future. In addition, at the time of the negotiations, the Respondent had already decided to relocate the international and commercial lines and had made clear that although it was willing to bargain over the effects of the moves, it felt it had no obligation to bargain about the moves themselves. If DeMaio's comment had referred only to past incidents, as argued by the majority, one would think it applied to the Respondent's decisions concerning the international and domestic lines as well as the countertop work.

Finally, the majority maintains that if the existing management-rights clause had clearly reserved the right of relocation to the Respondent, there would not have been a need for the Respondent to propose a more detailed clause. In view of the two unfair labor practice charges filed by the Union over the international and domestic lines relocations however, it is understandable that the Respondent would wish to more clearly detail the exact nature of its rights. In fact, one can forcefully argue that the Respondent's withdrawal of its proposal after hearing DeMaio's remark indicates that the Respondent believed that the Union was conceding that relocation was already covered within the existing clause. Accordingly, in light of these factors, I would adopt the judge's dismissal of this allegation in the complaint.

I agree with my colleague's adoption of the judge's dismissal, for the reasons set forth in his decision, of the allegations concerning the assignment of overtime and the processing of grievances. I also agree with my colleagues' conclusion, contrary to the judge, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to honor the union-security clause, but in doing so, would find that the Board should defer to the arbitrator's interpretation of that clause.

The majority states that deferral to the arbitrator's decision is inappropriate here because rather than seeking enforcement of the arbitration award, the Union is asking us to consider an unfair labor practice charge based on events which occurred after the arbitrator's decision had issued. Relying on the D.C. Circuit's opinion in Malrite,[2] they note that "deferral is not appropriate with respect to an issue not considered by the arbitration panel." Rather than deferring, the majority states that the arbitrator's special expertise in contract interpretation is useful, that the arbitrator's interpretation of the clause is reasonable, and that based on this interpretation the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to comply with the Union's request that certain delinquent employees be discharged. In my view, the majority is misreading Malrite.

Malrite involved two issues, one concerning the interpretation of a contract provision as to whether more than one employee could work certain shifts as "combo operators" and the other concerning an allegation that the employer unlawfully engaged in individual bargaining with certain employees in order to convince them to work as combo operators. The employer sought and received from two of its employees an agreement to work in this capacity. The union protested, and the matter was submitted to arbitration. The arbitration panel determined that the employer violated the contract by assigning employees to work as combo operators on the shifts at issue. After the arbitration hearing closed, but prior to the issuance of the arbitration award, three more employees were assigned combo operator duties. When the arbitration decision issued, the employer refused to comply with the award. Rather than seek judicial enforcement of the award, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board, alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) through the employer's unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment.

The Board, in Malrite of Wisconsin, 198 NLRB 241 (1972) (Malrite I), dismissed the complaint in its entirety, stating that it was deferring to the arbitration panel's decision in the case. On review, the D.C. Court of Appeals found that deferral was appropriate only with respect to the contractual issue concerning the assignment of combo operators to the shifts at issue. With respect to the unfair labor practice charge over the individual bargaining, the court found that deferral was inappropriate, since all three of the individual bargaining charges related to events which occurred after the arbitration hearing,[3] and therefore could not have been considered by the arbitration panel. Thus, the court remanded this aspect of the case to the Board for a determination on the merits.

In Malrite of Wisconsin, 213 NLRB 830 (1974) (Malrite II), the Board found that the employer had violated Section 8(a)(5) by engaging in individual bargaining with the three employees in question. The Board also expressly noted that it made no finding as to whether the employer violated the Act by changing from single employees to combo operators on the shifts at issue, since that aspect of the case had been deferred to the arbitral award.

The present case also involves two issues: the proper interpretation of the union-security clause in the contract and the application of that clause to certain employees as requested by the Union. The first of these issues was considered and resolved by the arbitrator, who found that the clause required, rather than permitted, the Employer to discharge employees who did not comply with the union-security provisions. The second issue, which involves the Employer's refusal to comply with the clause, was not presented to the arbitrator because at that time the Union had not requested that any employees be discharged. Relying on Malrite, the majority finds deferral to the arbitrator's decision inappropriate because the events underlying the instant charge occurred after the arbitration hearing and thus could not have been considered by the arbitrator. While I agree that deferral is not appropriate with respect to the discharge of the specific employees at issue in the instant charge,[4] Malrite compels us to defer to the arbitrator's interpretation of the union-security clause, the resolution of which is an essential aspect of the case now before us.

Since Spielberg Mfg. Co.,[5] the Board has consistently held that it will defer to an arbitration award where the proceedings have been fair and regular, all parties have agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitrator is not clearly repugnant to the Act. In addition, the Board has required that the issue involved in the unfair labor practice proceeding must have been fully presented to, and considered by, the arbitrator.[6] Here, as in Malrite, the Spielberg requirements have been met. In both cases, one of the two issues presented to the Board was not considered by the arbitrator because the events giving rise to the issue occurred after the arbitration hearing concluded. However, the majority has articulated no reason why this case should differ from Malrite in deferring to that issue which was fully presented to, considered, and resolved by the arbitrator.

The resolution of the contract clause in this case is fundamental to the resolution of the unfair labor practice charge on which we are ruling. The arbitrator resolved the contractual issue by interpreting the union-security clause as requiring the Respondent to discharge employees who are not in compliance with union membership provisions. In so finding, he did not determine whether the Respondent had violated the Act. This failure to address the statutory issue, however, does not preclude deferral. In Bay Shipbuilding Corp., 251 NLRB 809, 810 (1980), the Board stated that it will defer to an arbitrator's interpretation of the contract even where the arbitrator does not address the Act, so long as the factual findings made in the course of resolving the contractual issue resolve the unfair labor practice at issue as well. Here, by engaging in their own interpretation of the contract prior to addressing the merits of the application of clause, the majority implicitly recognizes that the contract interpretation issue has been presented to us as part of the unfair labor practice charge. The other aspect of the unfair labor practice charge, involving the application of the union-security clause to specific employees, was not presented to, or addressed by, the arbitrator. In light of the fact that the contract interpretation issue has been determined by the arbitrator in a way which resolves this aspect of the unfair labor practice charge, I do not understand why my colleagues would not agree to defer to the arbitrator's contract interpretation and then make their determination as to the application of the clause based on the facts before us. Indeed, this is the very outcome of the holding in Malrite, on which the majority purports to rely.

[3] The events concerning the two employees who had been approached by the employer prior to the arbitration hearing were deemed untimely in the unfair labor practice case.

[4] As no party has requested it, deferral pursuant to the Board's policy articulated in Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), and United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 570 (1984), is inappropriate. See NCR Corp., 271 NLRB 1212, 1213 fn. 7 (1984), and cases cited therein.

Based on the foregoing consideration, I would defer to the arbitrator's interpretation of the contract and then proceed to resolve the application of this clause to specific employees on the merits. In so doing, I would reach the same conclusion as my colleagues and find the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by its refusal to honor the union-security clause.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to bargain collectively in good faith with United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE), and its Local 1139, with respect to any decision to relocate the international and commercial lines work from Plymouth, Minnesota, to Sioux Falls, South Dakota.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to furnish the Union available information necessary for and relevant to its function as bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to bargain with the Union by failing and refusing to comply with the union-security provision of our 1979–1982 bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL bargain collectively in good faith with the Union concerning any decision to relocate the international and commercial lines work from Plymouth to Sioux Falls.

WE WILL promptly furnish the Union with the studies, analyses, and other information requested which will enable the Union to engage in intelligent bargaining.

WE WILL transfer back to the Plymouth plant the international and commercial lines work previously performed at that facility by bargaining unit employees represented by the Union.

WE WILL offer those employees discharged, laid off, or suspended as a result of the work relocation from Plymouth to Sioux Falls immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make them whole for any resultant loss of earnings and other benefits, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL honor the union-security clause in the 1979–1982 collective-bargaining agreement.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BRUCE C. NASDOR, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Minneapolis, Minnesota, on April 25, 26, 27, and 28, 1983, and June 7 and 8, 1983. The consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent violated Sections 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) and 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act).

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by all of the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, a Delaware corporation with offices and places of business in Plymouth, Minnesota and has been engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of microwave cooking products. During the 12-month period ending December 31, 1981, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, sold and shipped from its Plymouth, Minnesota facility, products, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Minnesota.

The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) and its Local 1139[1] (the Union), have been at all times material herein, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] The Local is included as amended at the hearing.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The Issues

1. Whether the Respondent relocated certain bargaining unit work in repudiation of its bargaining obligations under the Act.

2. Whether Respondent modified or repudiated the collective-bargaining agreement by refusing to respond and/or unduly delaying responses to grievances filed at the third step of the grievance procedure.

3. Whether Respondent repudiated or modified the collective-bargaining agreement by refusing to comply with an arbitrator's award concerning the assignment of overtime work.

4. Whether Respondent repudiated or modified the collective-bargaining agreement by refusing to discharge employees pursuant to the union-security clause of the contract.

Background

As of 1972, Respondent was producing microwave ovens at four facilities located in the Minneapolis, Minnesota metropolitan area, and had been a party to successive collective-bargaining agreements with the Union covering employees at those facilities. The violations are alleged to have occurred during the term of the collective-bargaining agreement effective from October 1, 1979, to October 31, 1982. In late 1976, Respondent operated a countertop microwave oven assembly plant in Minneapolis for domestic use. In early 1977, Respondent commenced to operate a new plant in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, and began producing countertop microwave ovens for domestic use in this new plant. Eventually Respondent stopped building the countertop microwave ovens for domestic use in Minneapolis entirely, and produced all of these particular ovens in Sioux Falls. The transfer of this work was completed by November 1981, when the Union and Respondent commenced to discuss the transfer of the international line from Minneapolis to Sioux Falls.

In 1977, 1978, and 1979, Respondent laid off a large number of employees. Prior to the inception of the Sioux Falls plant, there were over 1200 employees in the Minneapolis bargaining unit. As the number of employees at the Sioux Falls plant increased, the number of employees in the Minneapolis plant decreased. By the time the parties began to negotiate in 1979, there were less than 700 employees in the Minneapolis bargaining unit, and by November 1981, there were only 300 to 350 bargaining unit jobs left in Minneapolis. In 1980, the Union organized Respondent's employees at the Sioux Falls plant, but as of the time of the instant hearing, the parties had not entered into a collective-bargaining agreement covering these employees.

The Relocation of the International Line

Rocco DeMaio, financial secretary of Local 1139, and Thomas Phillips, vice president of Human Resources both testified with respect to the bargaining concerning the relocation of the international and commercial lines from Minneapolis to Sioux Falls. In the main, there are few discrepancies in their testimony and where such exist, they will be pointed out.

Phillips testified that he called DeMaio on March 3, 1981, although DeMaio remembers the date as June 1981, and told him that Respondent was commencing a process to determine where it could most effectively manufacture its product. He advised DeMaio that Respondent was losing $3 million per year on its range business and this loss triggered the study.

The dates of the telephone call, and telephone calls to follow, are not critical to the outcome of this case.

According to DeMaio during the course of the first telephone calls he told Phillips that the Union wanted to be kept informed of the progress of the study and requested bargaining concerning any decision that was made. Phillips testified that DeMaio also asked whether the international line was being moved to Sioux Falls and that he replied all options were being studied, and Respondent would advise the Union when the studies were completed.

On June 11, 1981, Phillips returned a call to DeMaio. DeMaio asked if Respondent was moving its range and international lines to Sioux Falls, and why it was installing a 50-cycle generator in Sioux Falls. Phillips responded that the 50-cycle generator had been planned for some time, and Respondent was moving one of the two generators in Minneapolis to the Sioux Falls plant. Phillips told DeMaio there were no definite plans to move the international range line to Sioux Falls but the operations people were still looking at alternative ways to manufacture. Phillips said he would let DeMaio know when the Company was getting serious and DeMaio responded that if they decide to move it, "we are going to bargain over it."

On either June 20 or 22, 1981, Phillips again called DeMaio and told him that a couple of models were going to be manufactured in Sioux Falls until the Company could catch up on a back order situation. Phillips advised DeMaio that Respondent was continuing with its study but no decision had yet been reached. The testimony of Phillips and DeMaio is consistent that the next conversation took place by telephone on October 20, 1981, when Phillips called DeMaio and told him that Respondent was having some problems with A.E.G., its representative in Germany. He requested DeMaio keep it confidential, to which DeMaio agreed. Phillips advised DeMaio that Respondent was still looking at the alternatives for manufacturing its products. Phillips advised DeMaio that no decision had been reached as a result of any study.

DeMaio testified that Phillips called him on October 29, 1981, and told him that the study was continuing, that no decisions had been made, and that he would let DeMaio know as soon as he learned anything further. Phillips wrote to DeMaio on October 30, 1981, advising DeMaio that Respondent had completed one phase of its analysis of production requirements; Respondent had determined it would be more economical to produce certain international line models in Sioux Falls, that, as a consequence, there would be a "substantial reduction in force" of Minneapolis bargaining unit employees, and Respondent was willing to discuss the effect of the work transfer with the Union.

DeMaio received and read the letter as he was talking to Phillips and Director of Human Resources Bates. This conversation between DeMaio, Phillips, and Bates was over the telephone speaker in Phillips' office. After Bates and DeMaio discussed the layoff, Phillips asked DeMaio if he had received the October 30 letter. DeMaio responded that he was just reading it and asked where the Company would build the models in Sioux Falls. Phillips explained they had four lines and one would be devoted to the international models. DeMaio suggested that they meet to discuss the matters to which Phillips agreed and a meeting was set for November 5, 1981.

Apparently during the same telephone conversation, DeMaio asked Bates what it would take to keep the jobs in Minneapolis and Bates replied that it was an economic issue and that such factors as unemployment compensation and workmen's compensation entered into it and there was not much control that the Union had over those types of things.

Although the meeting on November 5, 1981, was attended by several representatives for both parties, the chief spokesmen were DeMaio and Phillips.

DeMaio and Bates initially discussed an arbitration award by arbitrator Miller. Bates said the Respondent would follow the award as he understood it. Bates further told DeMaio that Respondent would be willing to go to an expedited arbitration if the Union did not agree with Respondent's position, but DeMaio refused, stating that the Union would do everything it could to enforce the award.

DeMaio gave Phillips a letter dated November 5, 1981, containing 11 questions which Phillips began to answer. DeMaio then read and gave to Phillips the remainder of this letter denoted "formal request." Addressing himself to the first part of the formal request, Phillips told DeMaio he had never said that Respondent was losing money. Phillips stated the Company was not bankrupt and was a money making business. Phillips continued by telling DeMaio there was no study or analysis, and that the Respondent's proposal to transfer the International Model to Sioux Falls was based on a comparison of the cost of building units in Sioux Falls, vis-a-vis Minneapolis. Dowling, vice president of manufacturing, delineated the microwave market and pointed out measures which Respondent had taken to reduce costs. DeMaio responded that the union had to have all of the information described in the November 5 letter. Dowling explained there was an $8 to $10 per unit difference between manufacturing in Sioux Falls compared to Minneapolis, and DeMaio requested a breakdown of those figures. Dowling was not prepared at that time to give a detailed breakdown. Phillips then responded to the remainder of the information in the formal request, advising DeMaio it was irrelevant. DeMaio stated it was relevant, Phillips maintaining otherwise, and that he, Phillips, did not think the Respondent had an obligation to bargain over the decision to transfer the work. Phillips maintained that Respondent was there to discuss the effects of the decision to transfer the work. After a caucus, Phillips replied to DeMaio's request that the Union have all of the information set forth in its November 5 letter, that Respondent would provide the information it had looked at in formulating its proposal. While Phillips recalled DeMaio making a proposal on "effects" the following day, DeMaio in his testimony remembered that he gave Phillips a proposal on the "impact" during the November 5 meeting. Phillips stated he would respond to the "effects" proposal in writing. After the November 5 meeting, at approximately 5:30 p.m., Phillips called DeMaio and told him he had been reading the "formal request." Phillips said the information requested was not relevant but there were some relevant items the Respondent was willing to make available. Phillips said he would like a response from the Union. They agreed to meet on November 6 the next day.

On November 6, 1981, Phillips reviewed the 11 questions on page 1 of DeMaio's November 5 letter, summarizing his answers. Dowling then went over some information on the cost comparison between Sioux Falls and Minneapolis. He stated the major difference was the wage rates, although he indicated there was a difference in workmen's compensation rates and unemployment compensation rates. Dowling explained the average hourly rate in Minneapolis was $6.89 an hour, whereas in Sioux Falls it was $4.55 an hour. The difference was $2.34 an hour for each unit employee, or 34 percent. Dowling stated that he had used the same standard hours to manufacture a unit in Minneapolis and in Sioux Falls. He said the labor costs were about $27 per unit in Minneapolis, whereas in Sioux Falls it was a little over $18 per unit. Accordingly, it costs $9.58 per unit more in Minneapolis than in Sioux Falls. He also pointed out that the consumer model being produced in Sioux Falls and the international model in Minneapolis had a common cavity, i.e., the inside of the oven, and that by consolidating the two operations, the Respondent would only need to carry one inventory of raw goods rather than two. DeMaio asked if the Minneapolis rate included the rate paid in the fabrication or paint shops, and Dowling explained the rate was an assembly rate. Phillips pressed DeMaio for a proposal, and DeMaio told Phillips he would get back to him by Monday or Tuesday of the following week at the latest. The meeting that day, November 6, occurred on a Friday. Either Dowling or Phillips told DeMaio that if the Union came back with a proposal in the area of $4 to $4.20 per hour Respondent would look at it. Phillips told DeMaio the only information the Company was looking at was the wage differential between Sioux Falls and Minneapolis. DeMaio continued to take the position that in order to make a proposal it needed all of the requested information. Phillips told DeMaio that some of the information requested was not relevant, but Respondent would provide the union with that information which was relevant.

On Wednesday, November 11, 1981, Phillips reached DeMaio by telephone at DeMaio's office. He asked DeMaio if the Union had a proposal to which DeMaio responded that he had mailed a letter to Phillips stating that the Union was renewing its request for information set forth in its November 5 letter. Phillips replied that the Respondent had already made available to the Union all of the information relevant to the Company's proposal. In a letter dated November 11, 1981, Phillips advised DeMaio that Respondent had made a preliminary decision to transfer line 1 to Sioux Falls, but it was still willing to discuss the entire situation. Subsequently DeMaio hand-delivered his letter of November 11 to Phillips, and Phillips responded with another letter dated November 13 stating that Respondent would transfer the international line, and that the Union had been given the relevant information Respondent considered when reaching its tentative decision.

The parties met again on November 17, 1981. DeMaio requested that the international line not be moved. Phillips again asked DeMaio if the Union had a proposal and DeMaio responded that the Union needed information. DeMaio stated that Respondent was asking the Union "to buy a pig in a poke," and that it was not fair to the employees not to have the information. Phillips told DeMaio that Respondent had already given the Union all of the information that Dowling and his operations group had looked at, DeMaio had all of the relevant information and there was nothing else Phillips could give him. DeMaio again requested studies and analyses. Phillips advised him that there were no formal studies that had been conducted by the operations people, and any analyses that had been done were the ones that had been shared with the Union, that the Union had all of the relevant costs. Dowling advised DeMaio that the unit cost difference included fringes such as unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation insurance, and DeMaio responded that the Union had no control over those items. DeMaio and the union representatives caucused. When they came back, DeMaio stated that the Union could not make a proposal and that it needed all of the information described in his letter of November 5, 1981. Dowling told DeMaio that the Union was aware of all of the information he and his group had used in an effort to decide where the work should be produced. Phillips told DeMaio he was reasonably sure that without a union proposal, the final decision would be made to move the work from Minneapolis to Sioux Falls. Apparently at the conclusion of the meeting DeMaio told Phillips that the ball was in his court. Phillips understood this to mean that it was up to the Respondent to make the decision.

On November 19, 1981, Phillips wrote to DeMaio stating that a decision had been made to transfer the international models to Sioux Falls. On the same day, DeMaio wrote a letter to Phillips restating his request for the information referred to in his November 5, 1981 letter.

DeMaio's testimony reflects that on November 6, 1981, the layoff occurred.

Relocation of the Commercial Line

In early March 1982, Phillips called DeMaio and told him that the studies regarding the relocation of the commercial line were underway and it was time to make a decision.

On March 9, 1982, Phillips met with DeMaio and other representatives of Respondent and the Union. Phillips explained that the studies of the various alternatives as to where Respondent should manufacture its product had been ongoing. He stated further that Respondent was now in a position in which Dowling and his operations group were prepared to make a proposal about moving line 2 to Sioux Falls. He stated that the reason was basically the same as that for transferring the international line, there was a significant cost difference between manufacturing in Minneapolis and Sioux Falls. DeMaio requested the same information he had earlier requested in his November 5, 1981, letter. Phillips advised DeMaio that some of the information requested was relevant and some was not, but Respondent would share with the Union the data it had looked at when examining the feasibility of moving work to Sioux Falls. Phillips said the Company wanted to make its decision by March 19, 1982. Dowling stated there was a $9 to $11 cost differential between manufacturing in Minneapolis and Sioux Falls, and that there were about 20 different models. Dowling said the figures were based on an average rate of about $6.80 an hour in Minneapolis and $4.50 to $4.55 in Sioux Falls. He also said there would be other savings by reason of "economies of scale," i.e., Respondent could save money by bringing all of its manufacturing together in one place. Onasch, a member of the union committee, and DeMaio asked a few questions to which Dowling responded. Committee member Wacker asked if the wage difference was the big thing, and Dowling replied affirmatively. Union representatives wanted to know if the range line was moving to Sioux Falls, and the Respondent replied it had no plans to move the range line, but it could not guarantee the range line would never be moved in the future. DeMaio stated that the rate for "A" assemblers was higher than $6.89 per hour, and Bates replied that if a higher rate had been used in the calculations there would be an even greater difference than the $9 to $11 which Respondent was relying on in its calculations. DeMaio requested a seniority list for Sioux Falls, and Phillips said he would get one for him. During this meeting, Phillips gave DeMaio a draft of a memorandum which Bledsoe, the division president, was preparing to distribute. At the conclusion of the meeting, union representatives asked some questions about new products and Respondent stated it was not considering any new product.

Later that day, DeMaio wrote to Phillips requesting cost information, seniority lists for Sioux Falls and Minneapolis, and the same information he had requested in his letter dated November 5, 1981. On March 10, 1982, prior to the receipt of DeMaio's letter of March 9, Phillips wrote to DeMaio setting forth the cost differentials discussed during the meeting of March 9 and reiterating the necessity for making a decision by March 19, 1982. After receiving DeMaio's March 9 letter, Phillips wrote a letter dated March 12, 1982, to DeMaio, pointing out the cost data had already been provided, together with the seniority lists for Minneapolis and stating that a Sioux Falls list would be provided as soon as one was available. In this letter Phillips mistakenly stated that Respondent wanted to make a decision by April 19, 1982. On March 17, 1982, letters were again exchanged by the parties. DeMaio wrote Phillips making a formal request for information as stated in his November 5, 1981 letter. DeMaio concluding by stating that the sooner the Respondent gives the Union all of the requested information the sooner the Union could look at it. On March 17, 1982, Phillips called DeMaio to inquire about a response because March 19 was drawing close. During the call, DeMaio said he had until April 19 and Phillips checked his March 12 letter, saw the error, called DeMaio back and told him of the mistake and wrote a confirming letter which was hand delivered on March 17, 1982.

The parties met again on March 19, 1982. At the outset DeMaio repeated his demands for more information. He wanted a breakdown on "variable overhead" and all of the information described in his November 5, 1981 letter. DeMaio asked for "studies" and Phillips said the Union had received all the relevant information. Phillips advised DeMaio there were no formal studies, booklets, or anything of that character and that the Union had the analysis Phillips had made reference to in his letters. Onasch asked about "transportation costs," and Phillips said he did not know such costs but assumed the information had been gathered and he would try to get it. Phillips said he would check to make sure that the $6.89 per hour rate was the correct assembly rate. DeMaio wanted to know if the "office people" were in the "variable overhead" figure, and Phillips replied negatively. At the conclusion of the meeting DeMaio requested that Respondent not transfer the work and stated that the Union needed all of the information it had requested. Phillips stated he would get back to the Union with the two items, the transportation costs and verification of the $6.89 per hour assembly rate.

On March 23, 1982, Phillips wrote a detailed letter to DeMaio explaining how standard labor hours were calculated, how the average hourly rate was established, what was included in the variable overhead rate, and how the wage differential between Sioux Falls and Minneapolis had been computed. The letter further extended the date for a decision to move to March 26, 1982, and was hand delivered to DeMaio on March 23. DeMaio wrote a letter to Phillips, dated March 25, 1982, and presented it to Phillips at the next meeting which was held on March 26, 1982.

At the March 26, 1982 meeting the Union had no proposal. DeMaio gave Phillips a letter requesting more information. Phillips responded to some of the requests. He told DeMaio the transportation costs amounted to $1.50 per unit, and that the personal time, fatigue and delay calculations were timestudy numbers. Phillips stated further that no increases were anticipated for either Minneapolis or Sioux Falls. He explained that his prior reference to seniority referred to increases which would be given as the employees progressed through the various steps. DeMaio again requested studies and any analysis. Phillips told DeMaio the Union had all of the relevant information and that their were no analyses or studies, and that there was nothing Respondent could show the Union that it had not already made available. Phillips testified in detail as to why he did not respond to the balance of the items requested by DeMaio. In some instances the information simply did not exist. For example, total production costs for each type of unit, a breakdown for Sioux Falls and Minneapolis. Respondent does not keep such costs. In other instances DeMaio's requests were ambiguous. For example, the selling price for each item. There are three selling prices, the prices to a distributor, a dealer, and the customer. Other questions Phillips testified he found impossible to answer unless each unit was followed through the plant. DeMaio stated he was not prepared to go ahead until he received the information described in both letters. Phillips advised DeMaio that the date for a decision had been extended 1 week and that he was certain that Dowling would make a decision unless a union proposal was forthcoming.

Later that day, on March 26, 1982, Phillips called DeMaio and told him the decision had been made to transfer the commercial line to Sioux Falls. Phillips also sent a letter to DeMaio confirming the conversation and stating, "as I indicated to you at our meeting this morning, the Company has provided you all the relevant information on which the proposal to you was based."

The Arbitration Award Relative to the Assignment of Overtime

The Union filed a grievance regarding the assignment of overtime in the fabrication shop. On August 21, 1981, the arbitrator, Richard J. Miller, rendered his decision. DeMaio concedes that he did not understand any part of the arbitrator's decision–not one paragraph. In this regard he wrote to Miller asking for clarification. Thereafter, the arbitrator and the parties exchanged a series of eight letters in an effort to clarify the award. Finally, the arbitrator wrote a letter apologizing for the confusion and expressing the hope that any future arbitration will not need clarification because of "this sort of confusion." Without detailing the various letters, suffice it to say that the parties each felt that its respective position was sustained by Miller.

When the parties met on November 5, 1981, the first subject of discussion was Miller's arbitration decision. According to the testimony of DeMaio, Bates stated that the decision was a split one and Respondent was not going to abide by it, rather it would follow the prior system unless the Union would agree to pick another arbitrator and hear the case again. DeMaio allegedly responded to Bates that the Union was not going to pick arbitrators until Respondent gets a decision they like, and that the Union would do everything necessary to enforce the award including going to the National Labor Relations Board. DeMaio testified further that Bates responded the National Labor Relations Board would only tell the parties to go back to arbitration. According to Phillips, Bates told DeMaio that Respondent was going to follow the arbitrator's award as it was originally rendered. Phillips testified that Bates told DeMaio that in order to get the matter resolved as quickly as possible, Respondent was willing to proceed to an expedited arbitration. DeMaio refused this offer and took the position that the Union wanted Respondent to follow the last letter of clarification issued by arbitrator Miller.

On July 19, 1982, DeMaio wrote Bates asking why the Respondent would not abide by Miller's decision. Bates responded that he had explained the Respondent's position to the Union on November 5, 1981. In his letter, Bates restated the Respondent's position, that it remains as it was at the arbitration hearing, as summarized in its brief. Bates further states that Respondent believes its position was affirmed by Miller's award. Moreover, according to Bates, Miller's clarifications served only to confuse, and are at odds with his original decision. Bates' letter continues that the Respondent offered an expedited arbitration before another arbitrator and that this offer stands. He also referred to the fact that the Union had subsequently filed another grievance on the same issue.

Refusal to Process Grievances

The complaint alleges that the violation occurred during the time period from August 2, 1981, through June 29, 1982. In 1976 and 1979, the Union proposed changes in the grievance and arbitration procedures of the expiring collective-bargaining agreement. The Union wanted a resolution of a grievance in favor of the grievant, in the event that the Respondent did not respond to a grievance in a timely matter. The Respondent consistently rejected the Union's proposal and the matter was ultimately resolved by an agreement that the failure of the Respondent to answer a grievance within the time limits prescribed in the contract would cause the grievance to automatically move to the next step. The parties ultimately agreed that a failure on the part of the Respondent to answer a grievance within 10 days after a third-step meeting would give the Union the right to take the grievance to arbitration. The parties agreed subsequently to deviate from the 10 days and rather, allow a 30-day period within which the Respondent must answer, in order to grant it more leeway.

The contract which is applicable specifically provides inter alia,"failure on the part of the Company to answer a grievance within 10 working days after a third step meeting . . . may cause the grievance to be moved to step 4 at the discretion of the Union."

DeMaio testified that he and Joe Miller, field organizer, prepared two lists, one reflecting the grievances filed during the critical period and the second list reflecting those grievances where no written response had been received by the Union within 30 days of the third-step meeting. General Counsel's Exhibit 29 captioned "List of Grievances with no response or other explanation" contains several errors and omissions. Testimony by DeMaio reveals that during the critical period, Respondent was actively engaged in meeting with union representatives over many grievances and that second-step replies and many third-step written replies were provided by the Respondent and many grievances were being disposed of by being dropped, honored, or resolved in some other manner.

Testimony by DeMaio reflects that the parties were engaged, during the period August 2, 1981, through June 29, 1982, in administering the grievance procedure. It is evident, however, that Respondent failed to observe its contractual obligations by failing to respond to some grievances and by delaying beyond 30 days some of its responses.

Failure to Honor the Union-Security Clause

The duration of the applicable collective-bargaining agreement is from October 1, 1979, to October 31, 1982. During negotiations for this contract the Union engaged in an economic strike. Apparently it is the strike replacements who continued in Respondent's employ after the cessation of the strike, who the Union seeks to have discharged. The record is not explicit in this regard because of DeMaio's evasive responses and his memory gaps. As the matter stands, it is not critical to the resolution of this allegation of the complaint.

The germane part of the union-security clause states "when the Union notifies the Company that an employee covered by this agreement has failed to pay the monthly dues that are uniformaly levied against all members and by reason thereof is no longer in good standing in the Union, the Company may discharge such employee. . . ." (Emphasis added.)

The Respondent issued a memorandum on December 7, 1979, stating in essence that the decision to pay or not to pay monthly union dues was one for each new employee to make, and that the Respondent takes no position regarding that decision. Moreover, Respondent concludes that it may terminate employees for failure to pay monthly dues if it elects to do so but it has no obligation to discharge new employees. Therefore Respondent decides in that memorandum that it will not discharge new employees who make the decision not to pay monthly union dues.

Thereafter on December 12, 1979, the Union filed a grievance that resulted in an arbitration decision dated December 6, 1980. Arbitrator Lindquist interpreting section 2 of the collective-bargaining agreement sustained the Union's grievance concerning the 1979 memorandum. The arbitrator did not address the question of whether the employees involved should be discharged, based on the Union's contention and advice that this question was not before the arbitrator and he was not to confront any issue of discharge of the particular employees.

It was not until May 12, 1981,[2] that DeMaio allegedly sent letters to a group of employees advising them that they were delinquent in not paying their union dues.

On June 17, 1981, DeMaio met with Phillips, and requested that Respondent discharge the 14 employees in question. Phillips responded that he would have to do some checking and get back to him. DeMaio then confirmed his oral request with a letter dated June 18, 1981. The letter states inter alia "this is to confirm our conversation on June 17, 1981, where the Union requested the Company to enforce the union-security clause with respect to the following employees who have refused to join or maintain their membership in the Union after being properly notified of their delinquency of [sic] the Union." The letter also states that the Union expects the Company to enforce the union-security clause of the agreement with respect to these employees. DeMaio gave Phillips copies of the letters the Union has sent to the individual employees.

On June 22, 1981, Phillips and DeMaio spoke by telephone. Phillips told DeMaio that he was being "cagey" in that he did not state in the letter that he wanted the employees terminated. DeMaio advised Phillips that he did not want to see anybody get terminated but "they failed to pay their union dues, they [sic] were ample time, they refused to pay, therefore, they got to be terminated." Phillips responded that if DeMaio really wanted these people terminated he would have to do some checking again. Phillips allegedly also stated that perhaps in the next contract they would have to change that language. At the end of the conversation Phillips said that he would check and see what has to be done and get back to DeMaio.

By memorandum dated July 17, 1981, Respondent rescinded its December 7, 1979 memorandum. The July 1981 memorandum states "on December 7, 1979 the company sent a letter to all bargaining unit employees stating it was the company's opinion that based on the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union there was no obligation for the company to discharge an employee for failure to pay monthly dues to the Union. This became a matter of arbitration between the Company and the Union and as a result of that arbitration, the Company now rescinds the letter of December 7, 1979." The document was signed by Tom Phillips.

Thereafter, prior to any response from Phillips, on July 7, 1981, the Union filed the charge which is the subject of this proceeding.

Some of the delinquencies included initiation fees although the union security-clause does not require payment of initiation fees.

Apparently, the General Counsel takes the position that in order to determine what "a member in good standing" means one would have to read the International constitution and bylaws. There is no evidence that the employees were afforded access to the International constitution or the local bylaws nor is there any evidence that they had copies of the collective-bargaining agreement or the arbitrator's decision.

On January 6, 1982, DeMaio sent Respondent a letter requesting that it enforce the union-security clause with regard to the two employees who were notified of their delinquencies in the November 24, 1981 letters.

Conclusion and Analysis

The Relocation of the International and Commercial Lines

Counsel for the General Counsel relies heavily, if not entirely on Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982), to support its position.[3] In Milwaukee Spring the employer relocated work due solely to comparatively high labor costs. The Board found a midterm modification of the contract within the meaning of Section 8(d) and thus violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

Recently the Board requested and obtained a remand of the Milwaukee Spring case from the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. Oral argument was held on September 20, 1983. Therefore, neither Milwaukee Spring nor Los Angeles Marine Hardware offers much in the way of direction at this juncture.

In my opinion, the broad management rights clause in the pertinent contract and the pattern and history of layoffs establishes that Respondent reserved onto itself the right to relocate work from Minneapolis to Sioux Falls.

During the 1982 negotiations, Respondent proposed a management-rights clause which DeMaio rejected while acknowledging that Respondent did not need such a clause because it "covers what they [Respondent] do now, they don't need anything more." Thus DeMaio recognized that Respondent "had the right to do anything it wanted under the current language."

The history of Respondent's past actions reflect that it began to produce countertop ovens in Sioux Falls, gradually decreasing employment in Minneapolis, until finally there was no countertop production in Minneapolis, it was all in Sioux Falls. It is evident from the record that the Union was aware of this.[4]

The local union disseminated various written letters and documents ascribing layoffs at Minneapolis to the transfer of work and the buildup of the complement of employees to Sioux Falls. The attempt by DeMaio to disavow the Union's connection to the various newsletters and shop papers was, suffice it to say, most unconvincing. There is no question in my mind that these were authored by someone in the Union and disseminated by the Union. Shop chairperson Onasch conceded that he had written a number of the articles.

In my opinion Respondent bargained for and acquired the right to transfer work and layoff employees. Thus, in my view, under the circumstances of this case, the layoffs that were necessitated by the transfer of work are not rendered illegal. The record evidence is replete with past layoffs and no objection by the Union.

Past practice, the tenure of prior negotiations, and the overall conduct of the parties convince me that they believed the Respondent had the right to transfer the work. Indeed, not only did the Union fail to file charges or commence civil actions, it never even requested bargaining over the decision to gradually transfer work (countertop) and staff Sioux Falls.

As counsel for the Respondent points out, Onasch, the Union's local president at the time, allowed that the only thing the Union could do was "to make sure that the layoffs, bumping and recalls are administered properly under the terms of the contract.

Examination of the very detailed dynamics of various meetings between DeMaio and Phillips demonstrates to me that Respondent bargained in good faith as regards the decision to transfer the two lines. DeMaio maintained throughout that he wanted to bargain if a decision is made to move, i.e., after not before. I believe Respondent gave him ample opportunity to both influence the decision and bargain over same before it was made, and to bargain over the effects of such a decision.

[3] Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co., 235 NLRB 720 (1978), also serves as a basis for his contentions.

[4] These events occurred prior to November 1981.

Throughout the meetings, DeMaio insisted that he be made privy to "studies," which Respondent continued to maintain were nonexistent. At one point he even took the position that the Union would not bargain until it received the "studies." Moreover, DeMaio never explained the relevancy of some of the requested information although Phillips questioned same.

Phillips testified, and I was impressed with his demeanor and credibility, that he was not aware of any information that had been considered by Respondent which was not provided to the Union. As Respondent's chief negotiator, he certainly knew what was, and was not, available.

In my opinion Respondent provided the Union with all relevant information. Respondent never advanced an "inability to pay." To the contrary, it maintained it was solvent and making money.

When pressed for the basis or need for the information which Respondent considered irrelevant, DeMaio's responses fell into the realm of vague generalization. See Southwestern Bell Telephone Co, 173 NLRB 172 (1968). In that case, cost was not asserted as the reason for subcontracting, thus detailed cost information would not have made subcontracting any more or less permissible, so there was no probability of relevance. Cases cited by the General Counsel, Teleprompter Corp., 227 NLRB 705 (1977), and Goodyear Atomic Corp., 266 NLRB 890 (1983), are inapposite. In Teleprompter the Respondent advanced a "plea of poverty." Accordingly, respondent was found to have violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to furnish the union with financial records regarding its local facilities for examination, in order to substantiate its claim that it was financially unable to grant wage increases. In Goodyear, Respondent had three defenses none of which was that the information was unavailable. The major defense was raised against releasing requested information to the union that involved medical confidentiality and the applicability of the Privacy Act. DeMaio's generalizations applied as equally to the hearing as at the bargaining table. "To bargain intelligently" are buzz words. His responses that he did not know how the Union was going to use the information until they got it (the information) speaks for itself. It is meaningless and without substance. As of March 26, 1982, when the decision to relocate the work to Sioux Falls was communicated to DeMaio, he was still insisting upon receiving nonexistent "studies" and information which he could not, or would not demonstrate as relevant.

When there is any conflict in the testimony of DeMaio and Phillips, I fully credit Phillips who testified precisely, unequivocally, and unambiguously. By way of contrast, DeMaio, who destroyed his notes of the bargaining sessions, was evasive and clearly bent on making his case. I vividly recall the inordinate delays between questions and answers. Based on my observations he would not hesitate to contrive and I therefore discredit him.

Accordingly, I recommend that the allegations that Respondent relocated bargaining unit work in derogation and repudiation of its bargaining obligations under the Act be dismissed.

The Arbitration Award Relative to the Assignment of Overtime

After the arbitrator's decision issued there was a torrent of letters between the Union, Respondent and the arbitrator, giving rise to a complete muddle as to just what the arbitrator had decided. DeMaio testified that the award was so confusing to him he could not understand a single paragraph in it. The Respondent maintained that it would follow the award pursuant to its interpretation of same. The arbitrator stated in one of his many letters that his letter of clarification should "not be construed as a reversal, modification or being at odds with the arbitration award."

Respondent did agree to an expedited arbitration to allay the confusion but the Union was not willing to do this. After reading the exchange of documents between the parties I can readily understand why no one really understood what the arbitrator had concluded. I therefore would not hold the Respondent liable under this set of circumstances. What this issue boils down to is Respondent choosing to follow the arbitrator's original award and the Union choosing to pursue subsequent perceived modifications. Moreover, the Board has always encouraged the utilization of the collective-bargaining process. An error in contract interpretations does not automatically violate Board law. At most there is a possible violation of the collective-bargaining agreement, but in view of the history of bargaining, which is of some duration and in good faith, I recommend dismissal of this allegation. See Bemis Bros. Bag Co., 143 NLRB 1311 (1963).

Refusal to Process Grievances

The parties negotiated a contract speficially providing what the result would be when the Union does not receive a written answer within 10 days after a third-step meeting. The solution is that this may cause the grievance to be moved to step 4 at the discretion of the Union. What the Union and the General Counsel are seeking is police action over the collective-bargaining agreement by the Board. In my view, the proper forum would be for the Union to bring an action under Section 301 of the Act.

The evidence establishes that the parties were actively engaged in meetings to resolve a large number of grievances, and as a matter of fact Respondent did give written replies in many instances and there were grievances that were disposed of. In my opinion the parties have agreed to a means for remedying the problem, and they should be left to their own devices without Board intrusion. I therefore will recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

Failure to Honor the Union's Security Clause

The language in the union-security clause specifically uses the word "may." If the parties had intended that discharge was dictated they would have employed obligative rather than permissive language. The word "may" simply does not occasion a mandate.

If the General Counsel and the Union are seeking to enforce the arbitrator's award they are in the wrong forum. Noncompliance with an arbitrator's award is not a matter for the Board. Thus, the parties should not be permitted to invoke intervention by the Board. The parties would best be served if left to proceed to the usual conclusion after having resorted to arbitration to seek judicial enforcement. See Malrite of Wisconsin, 198 NLRB 241 (1972).

The consequences in discharging employees because of their failure to conform to a union-security clause has been addressed before. Thus an administrative law judge stated with Board approval in Jack Watkins, G.M.C., 203 NLRB 632, 635 (1973), "Moreover, the Board has for many years had a policy that the union security provisions relied upon in justification for discharge must be expressed in clear and unmistakeable language." The administrative law judge continues that this is not asking too much because of the extreme consequences that can legally be imposed on a nonconforming employee.

Moreover, the Union has a fiduciary obligation to the employees. See Western Publishing Co., 263 NLRB 110 (1982)

The General Counsel has not proved by substantial evidence that the Union has met its fiduciary obligations. The union secretary who allegedly mailed the delinquent notices to employees was never called as a witness, nor were any employees produced. It appears in some instances that the Union was trying to collect dues retroactively, thus ignoring the grace period. There is also evidence of improper notification to employees and errors by the Union in the computation of arrearages.

Based on the foregoing it is my recommendation that this allegation of the complaint be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By transferring the work from the international and commercial lines to Sioux Falls, Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

4. Respondent did not fail to respond, or unduly delay responses to grievances in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

5. Respondent did not refuse to comply with an arbitration award concerning the assignment of overtime in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

6. Respondent did not refuse to provide available information to the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

7. By failing to discharge employees pursuant to the union-security clause, Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

W. B. Skinner, Inc. and Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 3. Case 32–CA–5053

15 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 24 April 1984 Administrative Law Judge Timothy D. Nelson issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party each filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed a brief in response to the exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge correctly concluded, at footnote 10 of his decision, that the pleadings and the record show that the Respondent is "an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry" within the meaning of Section 8(f) of the Act.

In John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), the Board overruled R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973), abandoned the conversion doctrine, and modified unit scope rules in 8(f) cases. The Board decided to apply the following principles:

> (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3); (2) such agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

The Board also held at footnote 41: "[W]e will require the party asserting the existence of a 9(a) relationship to prove it." Because, as found by the judge in the instant case, the General Counsel failed to demonstrate a 9(a) relationship, we find that Section 8(f) applies and that Deklewa is controlling.

Applying Deklewa to the instant case, we reverse the judge and conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to provide certain information requested by the Union on 28 September 1982. The contractual history shows that in 1973 the Respondent signed an agreement binding it to certain provisions of a master agreement between the Union and an employers' association. In 1978 the Respondent signed another agreement, which likewise incorporated a master agreement and contained a provision binding the Respondent to future master agreements absent action by either party to terminate the agreement prior to its 15 June 1980 expiration. There was no evidence that either party took that action. A successor master agreement was in effect between 16 June 1980 and 15 June 1983 during which time the alleged unfair labor practice occurred.

Under the first Deklewa principle, the 1980–1983 collective-bargaining agreement is enforceable under Section 8(a)(5). Under the fourth principle, however, the Union enjoyed no presumption of majority status following the contract's expiration date, and at that point the Respondent was free to repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship. Because the Union's request for information occurred during the contract term, the issue before us is whether the Respondent had a duty to provide the requested information: specifically, an audit of certain of the Respondent's books and ledgers necessary to ascertain whether the Respondent was complying with its contractual obligation to make fringe benefit contributions on behalf of unit employees.

We briefly summarize the facts set forth by the judge. The 1980–1983 master agreement contained a provision obligating the Respondent to provide payroll and other records to the Union "in the event of a specific dispute regarding time, wages or fringe benefit payment of its Employees, regardless of classification, or a dispute regarding owner operators." During January through April 1982 the Respondent reported to the benefit trust that it employed no persons for whom reports should be filed or trust contributions made. However, in May 1982 the Union began to suspect that the Respondent was not honoring its contractual obligation to make fringe benefit payments. A union agent had visited a jobsite of the Respondent and learned from two employees that they had been employed by the Respondent for some time. The Respondent's owner later told the union agent that hours "should have been" reported for the two operators. In early July 1982, the Union informed the Respondent that it wished to audit its employment records with respect to possible contract violations.

On 28 September 1982 the Union specifically requested access to the Respondent's timecards for operating engineers, payroll records, ledgers on cash disbursements and accounts payable, and selected invoices for the period since June 1977. On 4 November 1982 the Respondent, without challenging the Union's contractual entitlement to the requested information, refused to allow the audit and stated that "we are not planning to cooperate or adhere to any of your contract agreements."

It is well settled that a labor organization, in its capacity as a collective-bargaining representative, is entitled, on appropriate request, to information from the employer that is needed for the proper performance of its duty to police compliance with a collective-bargaining agreement. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967). Certain data, such as wage and related information pertaining to employees in the bargaining unit, is presumptively relevant because such data "concerns the core of the employer-employee relationship." Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1965). In addition, if requested information relates to an existing contract provision it thus is "information that is demonstrably necessary" to the union "if it is to perform its duty to enforce the agreement." A. S. Abell Co., 230 NLRB 1112–1113 (1977).

In this case, the Union received information from two employees and from the Respondent itself that reasonably led it to believe that the Respondent was avoiding a contractual obligation to contribute to benefit funds. On that basis, the Union sought to examine the timecards of all employees who were either operating engineers or who were performing operating engineer work. Such an examination would enable the Union to determine whether individuals in that category were paid the contractual amounts as a basis for determining the proper contributions due the trust funds. Such information directly relating to unit personnel is presumptively relevant.

The Union also requested information pertaining to certain of the Respondent's ledgers as well as access to any invoices which may have generated payments recorded in those ledgers. An examination of the ledgers might reveal payments to individuals, including owner-operators, performing operating engineer work, and the requested invoices could reflect the hours worked by owner-operators generating such payments. In L. M. Settles Construction Co., 259 NLRB 379, 382 (1981), such ledger information was found presumptively relevant.

As the Union had reasonable grounds to believe that the Respondent was not adhering to a contractual commitment, its 28 September 1982 request for an audit met the tests of necessity and relevance. Moreover, as noted above, the collective-bargaining agreement contains a specific provision requiring the Respondent to provide payroll and other records to the Union "in the event of a specific dispute regarding time, wages or fringe benefit payment of its Employees, regardless of classification, or a dispute regarding owner operators," a provision which the Respondent does not contest applies to the present dispute. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by breaching an obligation enforceable under Deklewa principles when it refused to supply requested information under either the independent statutory test of necessity and relevance for policing collective-bargaining agreements or under the specific terms of the contract.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing, during the term of its 1980–1983 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, to supply the Union with relevant information which was required under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement and necessary for it to administer the collective-bargaining agreement properly, the Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice, we shall order that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to provide, on request, the information requested in the Union's letter of 28 September 1982.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, W. B. Skinner, Inc., Pleasanton, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing, during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement with Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 3, to supply the Union, on request, relevant information required under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement and necessary for the Union to administer the collective-bargaining agreement properly.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, furnish the Union with the information sought by the Union in its letter of 28 September 1982.

(b) Post at its Pleasanton, California office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[1] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 3, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse, during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement with Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 3, to supply the Union, on request, relevant information required under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement and which is necessary for the Union to administer the collective-bargaining agreement properly.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, furnish the Union with the information sought by it in its letter to us dated 28 September 1982.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

TIMOTHY D. NELSON, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case in trial at Oakland, California, on February 13, 1984. It arose when Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 3 (Union) filed unfair labor practice charges against W. B. Skinner, Inc. (Respondent) on November 22, 1982.

After an administrative investigation, the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) issued a complaint against Respondent on February 8, 1983. That complaint alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and, derivatively, Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) by refusing to furnish information requested by the Union in July and September 1982 that was relevant and necessary to the Union's function as the exclusive bargaining representative in a certain unit of Respondent's employees.

Respondent duly answered the complaint, denying material allegations. On July 28, 1983, however, the Regional Director approved an informal settlement agreement with Respondent in which Respondent did not admit having committed any unfair labor practices but promised nevertheless, (a) to furnish the information at issue to the Union, and (b) not to "refuse to bargain collectively . . . by refusing to supply relevant information . . . which is necessary . . . to properly administer the collective bargaining agreement in effect between [Respondent] and the Union." In accordance with the terms of the settlement, the Regional Director withdrew the first complaint.

Subsequently, for reasons not explained or defended in this proceeding, Respondent reneged on the settlement commitment to furnish the disputed information. This caused the Regional Director to issue and "Order Withdrawing Approval of and Setting Aside Settlement Agreement and [new] Complaint and Notice of Hearing." The second complaint is materially the same as the first one.

Respondent's answer to the second complaint, like its initial answer, admits that its operations are properly subject to the jurisdiction of the Board, and that it refused to provide the information in question to the Union. Respondent has denied everything else of consequence, including that the Union ever occupied majority representative status under Section 9(a) of the Act in an appropriate unit of Respondent's employees, and that the information sought by the Union was relevant and necessary to its representative function.

The trial was brief, consisting of the General Counsel's introduction of mostly documentary and stipulative evidence, supplemented by the Union's introduction of some additional records and testimony. Respondent did not come forward with additional evidence after the General Counsel and the Union had rested.

All parties filed posttrial briefs which I have fully considered.

The Issues

There are two broad issues:

1. Did the General Counsel[1] introduce enough evidence to show, prima facie, that the Union occupied 9(a) majority representative status at any time before the alleged unfair practices? As narrowed by this litigation, this question subsumes at least two others:

(a) Does a presumption of the Union's 9(a) status derive simply from proof that Respondent, construction employer, signed "short-form" agreements with the Union in 1973 and/or in 1978?

(b) If not, is there independent evidence in the record that the Union achieved 9(a) majority status at some relevant point in its relationship with Respondent?

2. If the Union was the 9(a) representative of Respondent's employees at some relevant point, was Respondent statutorily obliged to turn over the specific information at issue?

I conclude below that the first question must be answered in the negative; accordingly, I do not reach the second question.

On the whole record, I make these

I. THRESHOLD FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Introduction

Respondent installs underground conduits in a northern California territory that is not more specifically defined in the record.[2] It operates from offices in the greater San Francisco Bay area city of Pleasanton. The business uses heavy excavation equipment, such as backhoes, but it is not clear whether Respondent owns any such pieces of equipment or, alternatively, whether it relies on owner/operators to furnish the same. The record sketchily reveals that some kind of employment relationship existed during certain periods between Respondent and certain named individuals, but it is not at all clear whether in any given case those individuals were owner/operators, or were, instead, merely operators. Similarly, to the extent that some or all of the individuals were owner/operators, the record will not permit a finding whether they were "employees" within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act or were, alternatively, "independent contractors" within the meaning of the same section.

I return to those—and other—unclear matters later after setting forth what the General Counsel views as the dispositive facts of the case relating to the threshold issue of the Union's 9(a) status.

B. The Labor Agreements

On April 19, 1973, Respondent's owner, W. B. Skinner, signed a "short-form" document captioned "Northern California Construction Agreement," which provided, inter alia, that Respondent would be bound to certain terms contained in a then-current "master Agreement" between the Union and Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. At that time, Skinner reported that he employed one "engineer." We do not know from the record whether, if at all, Respondent ever engaged additional workers in the contract unit during the 3-year term of that first short-form agreement or, if so, whether Respondent complied with the substantive terms of the agreement. We do not know any other circumstances surrounding the initial contracting on April 19, 1973.

On February 8, 1978, under similarly unclear circumstances, W. B. Skinner signed another such short-form agreement, this time indicating on that document that he employed three "engineers." That short-form agreement likewise incorporated by reference most terms in a then-current Master Agreement. It also contained an "evergreen" provision, in substance, that Respondent would be bound by "future Master Agreements" unless either party were to take steps to terminate the current agreement within 60 to 90 days of its scheduled expiration on June 15, 1980.

The record contains no indication that either party ever used contractually specified means to "terminate" the 1978 short-form contract before its scheduled expiration. There was a successor Master Agreement in effect between June 16, 1980, and June 15, 1983, the period during which the alleged unfair practices occurred.

The 1980–1983 Master Agreement contains no comprehensive description of the unit it covers. It purports, at section 1.00.00, et seq., to cover literally hundreds of construction and related offsite job classifications. It contains union-security provisions at section 4.02.00 and 4.02.01 which require covered employees doing jobsite construction work to join the Union "within 8 days" after they begin working. It has a separate provision, not applicable to the construction unit involved herein,[3] requiring offsite employees to join "within 31 days" after they begin working. It makes special reference to "Owner-Operators" in a variety of provisions within section 4.04.00, exempting them from some provisions (e.g., section 4.04.03), and stipulating at section 4.04.06 that

[1] References here and below to the General Counsel generally include the Charging Party Union; the exceptions are self-evident.

[2] In the 12 months before the complaint issued Respondent performed more than $50,000 worth of services for customers in California whose operations are within the "direct" jurisdictional guidelines promulgated by the Board.

[3] For reasons which are not evident, the General Counsel has vaguely put into issue whether or not Respondent is a construction industry employer. For reasons more fully explicated at fn. 10, I find that Respondent is such a construction employer.

they "shall be carried on the payroll of the Individual Employer as an Operating Engineer, and Employee, and, as such employee, all the terms and conditions of this Master Agreement . . . shall be applicable to him, except as provided elsewhere in this Section." Another provision in that section (4.04.17) provides, however:

> No Owner-Operator shall have any right to enforce this Agreement by grievance, arbitration, or otherwise until he has been placed on the payroll of an Individual Employer as an Employee.

The Master Agreement also contains a provision at section 3.02.00 for the furnishing by the Employer of payroll and other records to the Union "in the event of a specific dispute regarding time, wages or fringe benefit payment of its Employees, regardless of classification, or a dispute regarding owner-operators."

C. The Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

The Union began to suspect in late May 1982 that Respondent was not honoring the Master Agreement by failing to make accurate monthly reports to the fringe benefit trust about the number of unit personnel it employed and the hours they worked and by not making fringe trust contributions for persons who should have been reported on but were not. In the 4 months before May 1982, Respondent had sent regular report forms to the trust, but had indicated that it employed no persons for whom reports should be filed or trust contributions made.

The Union's suspicions were originally aroused after one of its agents, Datson, made two visits in late May to a construction project at Candlestick Park near San Francisco and was led to believe from conversations there with two operators (Norwood and Clifton) that they had been employed by Skinner at that job for some time (in the case of Norwood purportedly as an owner-operator). Subsequent conversations between Datson and W. B. Skinner, in which Skinner admitted that hours "should have been" reported for each of these individuals, were not enough to satisfy Datson that Respondent had merely made a good-faith error in earlier reports. As a result, Datson sought an "audit" of Respondent's books.

Another agent of the Union, Ivy, later sent a pair of letters to Respondent on July 22, 1982, each stating in substance that the Union wished to audit Respondent's employment records and would follow up with a specific appointment letter setting forth the nature of the information to be audited. One letter addressed itself to a possible contract violation with respect to "owner-operators"; the other simply expressed a desire to "ascertain" whether Respondent was in compliance with "stipulated wages and fringe benefits."

On September 28, 1982, the Union's agent, Hendricks, sent a letter to Respondent containing this material text:

> Please be advised we will be at your premises at 9:30 a.m. on October 19, 1982, to conduct an audit of your records in accordance with our previous notification.
>
> At the aforementioned time, we shall expect to have the following records available:
> 1. All time cards for employees who are Operating Engineers or who are performing operating engineer work.
> 2. All payroll records consistent with item #1 above.
> 3. Cash disbursements ledger.
> 4. Accounts payables ledger.
> 5. Selected invoices as primary documents in accordance with item #4 above.
> 6. These records should be available commencing with June 1977 through the present.
> Should you have any questions in this matter, please direct them to this writer.

The appointment was later rescheduled, but Respondent ultimately refused to allow the audit, formally stating in a letter to the Union dated November 4, 1982, inter alia: "[W]e are not planning to cooperate or adhere to any of your contract agreements."

As noted earlier, Respondent's refusal to furnish the information sought in the Union's letter of September 28, 1982, triggered the filing of charges with a Regional Office of the Board and the issuance of a complaint by the Regional Director that Respondent had thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. This alleged violation was the subject of a settlement agreement that was later set aside when Respondent, after stalling and evasion, decided not to honor its settlement commitment to furnish the information at issue.[4]

There are more facts in this record, but discussion of them may be deferred until later, for the General Counsel rests her case on essentially the showing outlined above. As discussed in greater detail, infra, the General Counsel argues that the necessary threshold showing that a 9(a) relationship existed between Respondent and the Union was perfected by proof that Respondent signed a short-form agreement (either in 1973 or 1978; it does not matter) and that, by operation of law, that 9(a) relationship has continued to exist during the terms of the successive Master Agreements, including at the time in November 1982 when Respondent refused to submit to the Union's audit.

It is thus useful to digress from the almost complete narration of facts to analyze the potential validity of the General Counsel's threshold proposition about the adequacy of her showing that a 9(a) relationship existed. For, if she is correct, then the additional facts are of no significance. Accordingly, I now turn to such an analysis.

[4] Those circumstances are not further described herein because the General Counsel on brief has waived and disclaimed any contention that the settlement created a bargaining obligation under the Act independent of that which existed before it was entered into by Respondent, or that Respondent's breach of the settlement has independent character as an unfair labor practice. I return briefly to this subject in the "Analysis," infra.

II. ANALYSIS OF SECTION 9(A) ISSUE; FURTHER FINDINGS; CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. General Legal Setting

All parties acknowledge the existence of some legal principles of general application herein. It is thus admitted that facially lawful labor agreements reached in the nonconstruction sector carry with them a presumption that the contracting union enjoyed 9(a) majority status[5] at the time that recognition was initially extended by the contracting employer, and that such a presumption of majority status generally continues through the term of the union contract, including renewals. See generally NLRB v. Iron Workers Local 103 (Higdon Contracting), 434 U.S. 335, 343 fn. 8 (1978). See also, e.g., Pioneer Inn v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 835, 837–838 (9th Cir. 1978); Bartenders Assn. of Pocatello, 213 NLRB 651, 652 (1974).[6]

But Higdon, supra, also teaches that, when a "pre-hire" labor agreement is entered into in the construction industry, the contracting union is not entitled to the ordinary presumptions that attend nonconstruction labor agreements. As the Court noted, nonconstruction labor agreements would be unlawful under Section 8(a)(2) of the Act if the contracting union did not occupy 9(a) status when first recognized.[7] But construction unions and employers enjoy a special statutory exemption from the stricture of Section 8(a)(2) in the form of Section 8(f) of the Act. Id. at 345. See also Jim McNeff, Inc. v. Todd, 461 U.S. 260, 265 (1983).

Section 8(f) allows construction labor agreements to be reached without the union's majority status having first been established pursuant to Section 9. But "8(f) contracts," because they are not entered into on a majority showing by the union, suffer from certain well-established limitations not shared by "9(a)" labor agreements. Higdon, supra, 434 U.S. at 345. For our purposes, the most significant of these limitations is that 8(f) contracts carry with them no presumption that the contracting union enjoyed majority status at the inception of the bargaining relationship. Rather, the original 8(f) relationship must be shown to have "ripened" into a 9(a) relationship at some later point before the union's majority status will be presumed continuously to exist thereafter. Higdon, supra, 434 U.S. at 341, 344–345. See also Ruttman Construction Co., 191 NLRB 701, 702 (1971); R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973); Construction Erectors, 265 NLRB 786 (1982). Another, corollary feature of 8(f) contracts is that they are voidable and may be repudiated at will until the Union has attained 9(a) status. Higdon, supra; R. J. Smith Construction, supra.

This discussion should help illuminate the central point at issue in this case; for the record is silent as to the circumstances underlying Respondent's signing of either the 1973 short-form labor agreement or the 1978 short-form. And the silence of the record on this point is seized on by each party's lawyer as a dispositive factor requiring vindication of her/his position.

Obviously, however, one litigant will normally suffer if his opponent is to benefit from the absence of evidence on a material point. And in this case whether the short-form contracts were "8(f)"—as opposed to "9(a)"—in character will be the dispositive question; for I can discern no independent basis for inferring from this spare record that the Union in fact occupied majority status in an appropriate unit of Respondent's employees at some relevant time before the alleged unfair labor practices.[8]

B. The Question Restated; the Parties' Contentions

The General Counsel characterizes this case as centrally raising a "burden-of-proof" question. This characterization carries a potential to mislead because there is no dispute over the rule that the General Counsel carries the ultimate burden of establishing each element of the Government's case by a preponderance of the credible evidence in the record as a whole. Neither is there any debate about the notion that in a prosecution like this one, alleging a refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, it is the General Counsel who has the burden of establishing that the Union enjoyed 9(a) representative status at some relevant time before Respondent's alleged unfair practices took place.

The question may therefore be restated as follows: Is the General Counsel's mere proof of the existence of either of the short-form agreements enough, prima facie, to require Respondent to come forward to show that the Union was not the 9(a) representative when those agreements were entered into if Respondent wished to avoid a finding that the Union was such a majority representative then and during subsequent contract periods?

Arguing the affirmative, the General Counsel seeks to vindicate the as-yet-unsupported proposition that a labor agreement that is "lawful on its face,"[9] and is reached in the construction industry,[10] should carry with it the

[5] Sec. 9(a) of the Act refers to labor organizations which have been "designated or selected . . . by the majority of the employer's employees" in an appropriate bargaining unit as their exclusive representative. A union's "Section 9(a) status" thus triggers a duty on the employer's part under Sec. 8(a)(5) and 8(d) to accord exclusive recognition to it and to bargain in good faith with it about wages and other terms and conditions of employment.

[6] There are some exceptions not pertinent here. See generally Hershey Chocolate Corp., 121 NLRB 901 (1958), enf. denied 297 F.2d 286 (3d Cir. 1961).

[7] 434 U.S. at 344–346, citing Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731, 737 (1961).

[8] The matter of independent proof bearing on the majority question is addressed infra.

[9] Elsewhere, the General Counsel uses the considerably less meaningful expression "fair and regular"; and sometimes she simply refers to contracts that are "fair on their face," a meaningless abstraction that the General Counsel cannot seriously contend would help decide whether a construction labor agreement ought to carry a presumption that the signatory union occupied 9(a) status.

[10] On brief, the General Counsel begins her argument on the 9(a) issue with this unsettling assertion:

> First, the record does not establish that Respondent is an employer in the construction industry within the meaning of Section 8(f).

This triggered a return to the pleadings, the transcript, and the exhibits to verify that, indeed (as alleged and admitted), Respondent has been engaged at all times material "in the installation of underground conduits"; indeed, that the labor agreements relied on by the General Counsel prominently feature the word "construction" in them and incorporate by reference the terms of a Master Agreement with an association of "Gen-same presumptions that attend its nonconstruction industry contractual counterparts, i.e., that the contracting union occupied majority status when the contract was entered into, and continued in that majority status thereafter, through successive contractual periods.

In opposition, Respondent insists that the realities of the construction industry, especially those influencing the enactment of Section 8(f), demand instead that construction labor agreements be presumed to be no more than "pre-hire" contracts of the type authorized by that section.

C. Conclusions Concerning the General Counsel's "Contract Presumption" of 9(a) Status

The question as restated above is not a simple one; it implicates many legal areas; it affects construction practices; and it bears heavily on the ability of the Office of the General Counsel to investigate and process construction industry cases. It necessarily has impact also at the trial and decisional stages of the Board's processes. Clearly, if all it took is a signed "short-form" or other species of individual construction labor agreement to show, prima facie, that a construction union was the 9(a) representative of a unit of construction employees, then the Board's limited resources would not be expended to the degree they are now in efforts to reconstruct from equivocal data the arguably fictional point at which the 9(a) butterfly may have emerged from the 8(f) chrysalis.[11]

These considerations of private and public institutional stability and efficiency are not insubstantial, but they are not directly urged by the General Counsel. In any case, they would be more properly addressed in the first instance at the Board level of these proceedings should it come to that. But my rejections of the General Counsel's position as set forth below is not intended to suggest that brighter and more realistic lines are not needed in this legal area.

There is no direct legal authority—and nothing indirectly persuasive in the cases—for the proposition that a construction labor agreement may be presumed to have derived at its inception from a 9(a) labor relationship.

The General Counsel points to Carmichael Construction Co., 258 NLRB 226 (1981), and Redlands Construction Co., supra, as indirect support for her contention that the "burden of proof" is on the employer to show that his construction labor agreement was not entered into under 9(a) circumstances.

Carmichael contains dicta at fn. 1 on which I believe the General Counsel leans too hard; for the strict holding, expressed in the same footnote passage, derived from the Board's finding that the employer had "conceded the majority status of the Union at all times prior to . . . their . . . refusals to bargain." Thus, Carmichael did not decide our question. And Carmichael seems more striking for its clear "disavow[al of] the Administrative Law Judge's finding that '[t]he execution of succeeding contracts makes Section 8(f) irrelevant and, therefore, raises the presumption that the Union was the majority representative of the unit employees.'" Ibid.

Redlands provides even less nourishment for the General Counsel's theory. There, the Board also expressly refused to rely on the administrative law judge's discussion of Carmichael and found instead that "the record affirmatively establishes such a majority by direct evidence, contrary to the finding of the Administrative Law Judge." 265 NLRB at 586.

Notwithstanding the lack of any clear supporting precedent, the General Counsel came to trial with the belief that it was not her affirmative obligation to establish the Union's 9(a) status by means other than proof of the existence of the short-forms. She argued at trial that it was Respondent's duty to plead and prove that the Union had merely been recognized under Section 8(f) to "rebut" the "presumption" of the Union's 9(a) status, which was assertedly created by proof of the short-forms. Invited at trial to cite authority for her assertion that "8(f) is an affirmative defense" in such circumstances, the General Counsel failed to identify any such authority in her brief. Respondent called to my attention certain dicta to this effect in the administrative law judge's decision in Bay Area Sealers, 251 NLRB 89, 129 (1980). I agree with Respondent that Bay Area Sealers does not turn on the administrative law judge's "affirmative defense" dicta and that that case is merely another in which the Board has ultimately relied on independent proof that the union enjoyed majority status when the bargaining relationship was entered into. 251 NLRB at 89.

After the parties had lodged their posttrial briefs, the Board issued its decision in Stine Scovil Construction Co., 269 NLRB 465 (1984), which seems even more clearly to have considered and rejected the notion that "8(f) is an eral Contractors"; and, indeed, that the only persons claimed by the General Counsel to be legitimately part of the contract unit whose jobs were specifically identified in the record were jobsite backhoe operators (see findings, supra, and infra at sec. IV,D).

It is apparently the General Counsel's belief that, if this record did not show (as it does, over and over) that Respondent is in the construction industry, then the short-form contracts signed by Respondent would be more readily presumed to carry 9(a) trappings.

It is good that the General Counsel eventually concedes, albeit grudgingly, that Respondent "does appear" to be in the construction industry. This is not only because the record she made shows this to be the case without contradiction, but also because her case will collapse without a finding that Respondent is "primarily engaged in the building and construction industry" within the meaning of Sec. 8(f). For the agreements she relies on contain 8-day union-security clauses for jobsite employees that, she would not deny, are applicable to, e.g., the two backhoe operators on the May 1982 Candlestick Park job. And those otherwise impermissibly short union-security clauses are saved only by the 8(f)(2) exemption applicable only to construction industry employers and unions. Because the General Counsel stipulates that a labor agreement must be "lawful on its face" to enjoy her proposed 9(a) presumption, it is curious that she would in any way suggest that she has not proved that Respondent is in the construction business.

[11] I refer specifically to the drawn-out and frequently inconclusive searches of remote memories, payroll data, and other company and union and joint trust records that the Board and parties to Board proceedings often have been required to undertake in pursuit of the notion of a "ripened" bargaining relationship. See, e.g., Construction Erectors, 265 NLRB 786 (1982) (circuit court remand requiring second analysis of 1977 unit employee configurations as inferable from "myriad of exhibits," id. at 787); Redlands Construction Co., 265 NLRB 586 (1982) (examination of 8 years of hiring records); Carrothers Construction Co., 258 NLRB 175 (1981) (Board remand for more data about unit employment in 1966); Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60 (1980) (analysis of employment data on multiple jobsites between 1977 and 1978).

affirmative defense." There, the Board (Member Zimmerman dissenting) denied the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, saying (id. at 465–466):

> We note that the complaint fails to establish, by allegations or statements of fact, information necessary to determine that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Absent from the complaint are allegations or statements of fact that the Union is the lawful representative of the Company's employees under Section 9(a) of the Act; that the agreement between the parties is or not an 8(f) contract; that describe article 15 and its lawfulness under Section 8(e)'s proviso.
> Accordingly, we decline to grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and remand the proceeding to the Regional Director for appropriate action. [Emphasis added.]

If Stine Scovil Construction, supra, is not dispositive on the point, the remaining observations would cause me to reject the General Counsel's view in any case.

There is nothing in the Board's experience of empirical "realities" in the construction industry, nor in the legislative history underlying Section 8(f), to justify the presumption of fact that a construction labor agreement arose in a 9(a) context. Indeed, empirically, we know—and Congress presumed—that union contracts in the construction industry often are—and need to be—concluded before the employer has hired any workers.[12] And the mere fact that 8(f) agreements are common to the construction industry is enough to cause me to view warily any suggestion that a construction labor agreement ought to carry a presumption that the union signatory enjoyed 9(a) status from the outset.[13]

These doubts are not deflected by any coherent statement by the General Counsel of other possible countervailing considerations be they matters of law, policy, or equity. In the absence of any such arguments, I will not independently pursue such questions further. I would simply reject as not grounded in law or reality the presumption proposed by the General Counsel that a construction labor agreement arose in a 9(a)—as opposed to 8(f)—context.

Accordingly, I conclude that the General Counsel has not, by the mere introduction of either of the short-form labor agreements signed by Skinner in 1973 and 1978, established that Respondent owed the Union a statutory duty of recognition at either point. If that duty can be said to have arisen at all, it would have to derive from some independent circumstances, a possibility that I address briefly next.

D. Is There Independent Evidence of the Union's 9(a) Status? Findings and Conclusions

If we must look elsewhere for evidence that the Union achieved 9(a) majority status in an appropriate unit of Respondent's employees, then the main obstacles must be identified; for an attempt to reconstruct a union "majority" configuration at some historical point in Respondent's operations from the scant evidence on the subject requires the tools of archaeology, not those of legal science. There is, at the outset, the difficulty in defining precisely the unit jobs that are involved here. Relying on a presumption that a contractually covered unit is appropriate, the General Counsel describes the unit in the complaint as "All . . . employees performing work [for Respondent] covered by and within the job classifications set forth in the [1980–1983 Master Agreement]." But there are hundreds of such classifications, including scores that clearly are not applicable to Respondent's operation; and so the question of the scope of the unit of Respondent's employees is to some extent begged by such a characterization. All we know on this record is that Respondent used at least two persons on a backhoe on the May 1982 Candlestick Park job (whether using one or more owner/operators is not clear).[14] There is evidence that Respondent employed other persons—members of the Union—at various times. But that evidence does not disclose what their jobs were, whether they were owner/operators, nor whether they worked on any common days or, if so, at the same—or different—jobsites.[15]

[12] I do not here repeat the often-cited portions of the legislative history of Sec. 8(f) in which considerations of industry necessity are invoked as the basis for the exemption of prehire contracts from the more general proscriptions of Sec. 8(a)(2). See, e.g., Higdon, supra, 434 U.S. at 348–349.

[13] We are not truly presented here with the question of the weight to be accorded to a construction industry relationship involving "successively" applied labor agreements in determining whether a ripened 9(a) relationship has been achieved. There is no evidence that Respondent continuously applied to its unit personnel, if any, the terms of each of the succeeding Master Agreements following its signing of the initial 1973 short-form containing an evergreen clause (the initial point at which the General Counsel alleges in the complaint that the 9(a) relationship arose). Indeed, the absence of proof about the subsequent relationship (if any) between 1973 and 1978 and the paucity of evidence about the relationship between 1978 and 1982 suggest instead that Respondent and the Union were virtual strangers. Accordingly, this is not the record on which to revive the argument that a "successive" construction industry labor relationship may justify an inference that the necessary 9(a) transformation has occurred.

[14] There is evidence of a conversation between the Union's agent, Datson, and an operator of a "big-wheel trencher" on July 24, 1982, at another jobsite. There, the operator, self-identified as John Redfern, told Datson that he was employed by Respondent. But this evidence was offered by the General Counsel with the express reservation that it was only to explain Datson's subsequent conduct, and not for the truth of "Redfern's" remarks. A similar disclaimer of hearsay purpose was unmistakably made by the General Counsel with respect to Datson's testimony about what he was "told" by the Union's computer about Redfern's employment and union membership status. There is no independent evidence that Respondent employed Redfern in 1982 (cf. Skinner's admission in the case of the Candlestick Park operators, supra). Necessarily, because it has not been established, prima facie, that Respondent employed Redfern in July 1982, it has not been established, prima facie, that Respondent used a "big wheel trencher."

[15] The evidence in question consists of two types of computer-generated records, each created at the direction of Hendricks, by now an agent of the trusts. One set (C.P. Exhs. 2–4) recapitulates union membership data pertaining to the individuals whose names appear on the other record (C.P. Exh. 1). The latter is a recapitulation, generated on February 2, 1984, of all the persons for whom Respondent had reported "hours" to the trust for benefit contribution purposes during the periods April 1979 through July 1982. There are seven names on that recap, of whom six may be found (by cross-checking C.P. Exhs. 2–4) to have been members of the Union. Only one of them, Kosmach, was reported to have worked in 1982.

The General Counsel accurately distills a bit more from the record evidence pertaining to the persons who were shown to be members of the Union.[16] Thus, she notes:

> During the period April 1979 through July 1983, Skinner employed six operating engineers who were members of the Union. Respondent reported hours on John Redfern for April and May 1979 and February, March, April, May, and June 1981; on Dennis Covey for January 1980 and June, July and August, 1981; on John Kosmach for June, July, August, September and October, 1981 and June and July 1982; on Charles Clifton for June, July, August, September, October, and November, 1981; on James Brandon for August, 1981; and on Vernon East for September 1981.

This evidence, even when ground this fine, simply does not answer critical questions in the 9(a) majority analysis prescribed by the Board, specifically: Does Respondent employ a "permanent and stable work force"? If so, who are they and what is its size normally? See generally Construction Erectors, supra. And if Respondent's work force is not shown to be "permanent and stable," the task of establishing 9(a) status becomes even more difficult, i.e., "only upon a showing that the Union enjoyed majority support of Respondent's employees on a site-by-site basis."(Ibid., emphasis added.) See also Dee-Cee Floor Covering, 232 NLRB 421 (1977). Neither the General Counsel nor the Union makes any serious effort to match the data in this record to the necessary legal tests.[17]

Moreover, this kind of "reporting" data is even less reliable as a basis for attempting to divine the size and scope of the unit at whichever point might be appropriate because the "reporter," W. B. Skinner, Inc., is not elsewhere shown on this record to be reliable in its (minimal) relations with the Union.[18]

E. The Applicability of the Poole Foundry Doctrine

There is a question about the impact of the settlement agreement that Respondent signed in 1983 on Respondent's subsequent duty to recognize and bargain with the Union. The question arises in the light of Poole Foundry & Machine Co., 95 NLRB 34 (1951), enfd. 192 F.2d 740 (4th Cir. 1951), cert. denied 342 U.S. 954 (1952). The "doctrine" of that case is the one expressed by the Fourth Circuit, as follows, when it enforced the Board's Order against Poole (192 F.2d at 743–744):

> [T]he settlement agreement represents an agreement by Poole to undertake promptly the remedial action set out in the agreement rather than to be put to the trouble and expense of litigation . . . .
> . . . .
> While not an admission of past liability, a settlement agreement does constitute a basis for future liability and the parties recognize a status thereby fixed . . . . An entire structure or course of future labor relationships may well be bottomed upon the binding effect of a status fixed by the terms of a settlement agreement. If a settlement agreement is to have real force, it would seem that a reasonable time must be afforded in which a status fixed by the agreement is to operate . . . . Thus, it follows that Poole, after having solemnly agreed to bargain with the Union, should not be permitted, within three and one-half months after the agreement, to refuse so to bargain, even if, as here, the Union clearly did not represent a majority of the employees. [Emphasis added.]

The Poole doctrine as thus expressed has been adopted, inter alia, by the Ninth Circuit. Mammoth of California v. NLRB, 673 F.2d 1091, 1093 (1982).

I asked the parties to brief the question whether Poole, supra, might estop Respondent from denying the Union's presettlement 9(a) status. The General Counsel gave the matter this treatment in a footnote to her brief:

> The Judge, sua sponte, raised a potential alternative theory on which General Counsel might have proceeded. The Judge suggested that under Poole Foundry, the earlier settlement agreement between the Union and Respondent might have itself created a Section 9(a) relationship, even if the Union had not previously established majority support among Respondent's employees. While this theory is intriguing [sic], elaboration thereon would serve no useful purpose in this case, given the fact that the settlement agreement was, in fact, set aside [thus removing the factual predicate for the theory], and given the further fact that the alleged violation was neither plead [sic] nor litigated on such a theory. Accordingly, Counsel for the General Counsel's brief will not speculate on whether the Judge's proffered theory would independently support the Complaint's alleged violation. However, it should be noted that Poole Foundry and Machine Co., 95 NLRB 34 (1951) enfd. 192 F.2d 740 (C.A. 4, 1951), cert. denied 342 U.S. 954 does not appear to stand for the proposition that the Judge cited. The holding in Poole Foundry was predicated upon the fact that the Union, at the time the settlement agreement was executed, was the Section 9(a) representative of Respondent's employees. Id. at 35, fn. 4. Whether Poole Foundry was meant to include situations where no such Section 9(a) status was present at the [16] See fn. 15. Note, as well, that for reasons set forth at fn. 14 the Union's exhibits (R. Exhs. 2–4) are the only competent evidence of the membership status of any of the operators linked on this record to Respondent's operations.

[17] The Union's exposition also suffers from its erroneous inclusion of Redfern as an employee of Respondent in July 1982 (see fn. 14) and references to Norwood's alleged membership (status that may be found only by ignoring the hearsay character of the evidence, which was adduced on that point).

[18] As the General Counsel aptly observed about this very data during the trial: "[W]e have evidence to show that at certain periods of time the people that Mr. Skinner . . . was reporting to the trust fund, were all members of the Union. But we have no idea . . . if, indeed, he was hiring other people not through the Union and not reporting them." In fact, we do know from this record that Skinner was hiring persons other than those named on his own reports (e.g., Norwood) and that he was using others at times when he was not reporting them (e.g., Clifton and Norwood).

> time of the execution of the settlement agreement, i.e., whether a settlement agreement containing a bargaining obligation can in effect establish, as opposed to merely reaffirm, a Section 9(a) relationship, is a question that need not be decided herein.

I think that the General Counsel is capable of waiving prosecutorial rights, and that in these peculiar circumstances her statements on brief amount to such a waiver. This renders moot any further discussion of Poole's potential impact herein. I do not, however, adopt any of the express or implied assumptions about Poole's reach as they appear in the General Counsel's footnote analysis.[19]

Based on the foregoing, I render these ultimate

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. The record fails to establish that the Union was, at any relevant time, the exclusive collective-bargaining representative duly designated or selected by a majority of Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act; accordingly, it has not been shown that Respondent was under any statutory obligation to recognize and bargain collectively with the Union.
4. In the foregoing circumstances, it did not violate the Act, as alleged, for Respondent to have refused to furnish certain information to the Union.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[19] Among other things, I do not believe that the General Counsel has adequately considered subsequent holdings when she states that the "holding" in Poole was "predicated" on proof of the union's 9(a) status before the settlement was agreed to. The Fourth Circuit's statements quoted above that a settlement "constitute[s] a basis for future liability" and amounts to a recogni[tion of] a status thereby fixed does not accord with the General Counsel's analysis. See also, e.g., W. B. Johnston Grain Co. v. NLRB, 365 F.2d 582 (10th Cir. 1966) (cited in Mammoth of California, supra at 1093), wherein the circuit court stated (365 F.2d at 587, emphasis added): "It is true that the settlement agreement was not an admission that the Company had been guilty of an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain, but a party who enters into a valid compromise agreement . . . may not thereafter escape its obligation . . . on the ground that the claim asserted against it, which was settled by the agreement, was groundless." See also, e.g., NLRB v. Pride Refining, 555 F.2d 453 (5th Cir. 1977), denying enf. of 224 NLRB 1353 (1976), on grounds not material herein, in which the circuit court stated (555 F.2d at 458):

> It is not open to question that ordinarily in an 8(a)(5) settlement agreement the employer acknowledges the majority status of the union and agrees to bargain collectively for a reasonable time. [Emphasis added.]

Neither is it at all clear that the action of "setting aside" such a settlement affects the General Counsel's right to rely on the majority status that is "fixed" by the settlement itself. See, e.g., Soule Glass & Glazing Co., 246 NLRB 792 (1979). There, the Regional Director had set aside three settlement agreements, two of which were to remedy 8(a)(5) violations (including one "information" violation, as herein). 246 NLRB at 793. The Board nevertheless adopted without comment the administrative law judge's settlement (246 NLRB at 802 citing Poole, emphasis added): "Furthermore, at the time recognition was withdrawn Respondent was obligated to bargain in good faith with the Union by virtue of the settlement agreements in these cases." And see id. at fn. 23 (acknowledging as "proper exercise of his discretion" the Regional Director's "setting aside the settlement agreements").

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 6 August 1984 Administrative Law Judge Nancy M. Sherman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed a cross-exception and a supporting brief and a brief in support of the judge's decision, and the Respondent filed a brief in answer to the General Counsel's cross-exception.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions, as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order.

The General Counsel excepts to the judge's finding that Patricia Gapik was a confidential employee. The judge found that Gapik was a confidential employee based on her having been told she was a "confidential" employee by the Respondent's vice president, Halper, and on her conduct in typing two contract proposals that the Respondent subsequently tendered to the Union during contract negotiations. For the following reasons, we agree with the General Counsel.

In NLRB v. Hendricks County Rural Electric Corp., 454 U.S. 170 (1981), the Supreme Court affirmed the Board's long-established "labor nexus" test. Under this test, only those employees who act in a confidential capacity to persons exercising managerial functions in labor relations matters are confidential employees. 454 U.S. at 188–189. In addition, the Court approved the Board's alternative test that employees who have "regular" access to confidential information concerning anticipated changes that may result from collective-bargaining negotiations are confidential employees. Id. The Court rejected a broader interpretation that would have found any employee with mere access to confidential business information to be a confidential employee. Thus, the question here is whether Gapik's duties had a "labor nexus" sufficient to render her a confidential employee.[2]

Gapik was hired in 1979 as the Respondent's bookkeeper, a position outside the bargaining unit. She is married to Ziggy Gapik, a union member. In 1981, when the Respondent learned of her impending marriage, Gapik was told by Vice President Halper that she would have to be "let go" because of her "confidential" status, but no such action was ever taken. Her duties included taking care of the Respondent's accounts receivable and payable and keeping employees' time and payroll records. She received deduction authorization forms from the Union and typed checks for union dues and for the pension and welfare funds. She typed notices to the Union regarding employee termination and hires and filed certain information such as disciplinary notices and insurance claims in employee personnel files. She once attended an unemployment compensation hearing on the Respondent's behalf and repeated what Plant Manager Kearney told her to say. Gapik prepared a seniority list for a layoff of employees in 1982, but had no input concerning which employees would be laid off. With respect to labor relations, the Respondent's affairs, including clerical functions, were handled by outside counsel. Halper, however, was responsible for the substance of the Respondent's proposals, and he represented the Respondent during negotiations. All related information was kept in Halper's office, and he specifically did not permit Gapik to see any "confidential" correspondence, including that concerning labor relations matters. Gapik did not open Halper's mail and never typed any notes, minutes, or correspondence dealing with labor relations. She did, however, type an initial proposal from Halper's notes so that he could show it to the Respondent's counsel and once typed a wage proposal for employees at the Chicago facility where she worked.[3]

It is well settled that the party asserting confidential status has the burden of providing evidence to support its assertion. Intermountain Electric Assn., 277 NLRB 1 (1985). We find in this case that the Respondent has not met its burden. Although Halper was instrumental in formulating, determin-

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, the exceptions, the cross-exception, and the briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondent does not contend, nor does the evidence establish, that Gapik had "regular" access to confidential labor relations information.

[3] Gapik also typed two proposals for the Respondent's Momence Packing facility in preparation for negotiations with the Union's sister local.

ing, and effectuating the Respondent's labor policies, the record reveals only two minor instances in which Gapik was involved in the Respondent's labor relations matters, i.e., her typing of a wage proposal and an initial proposal from Halper's notes prior to his showing it to counsel.[4] The Respondent introduced no evidence indicating that these incidents are likely to be repeated. Moreover, the record does establish that the Respondent generally relied on outside counsel to handle all labor relations matters, including related clerical functions. Gapik was not involved in typing correspondence or minutes of meetings that may have concerned labor relations, and she did not have access to Halper's files. In addition, Gapik's general bookkeeping duties, described above, do not in any other respect support a finding that she is a confidential employee. Given Gapik's lack of other indicia of confidential status, the two isolated occurrences of her typing labor-related documents are insufficient to constitute a "labor nexus." Accordingly, we find that Gapik is not a confidential employee.

In view of our finding that Gapik is not a confidential employee, we agree with the judge's conclusions that the Respondent's statements to her violated Section 8(a)(1) and that Gapik's discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. We therefore find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's conclusion that confidential employees are entitled to the protection of the Act or on her alternative finding that, even if confidential employees are not so entitled, Gapik's discharge independently violated Section 8(a)(1) by analogy to Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Crest Mark Packing Co., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[4] We find that the potential for conflict arising from Gapik's typing the Momence documents is not significant.

R. Peter Carey, Esq., of Chicago, Illinois, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NANCY M. SHERMAN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in Chicago, Illinois, on June 15 and 16, 1983, pursuant to a charge filed on September 10, 1982, and a complaint issued on October 28, 1982, and amended on June 7, 1983. The complaint as amended alleges that Respondent Crest Mark Packing Co. violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, by directing an employee to speak to bargaining-unit employees against the bargaining proposals of the Beef Boners & Sausage Makers Union Local 100-A of the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC (the Union) and in support of Respondent's bargaining proposals; by threatening to lock out its employees and close its facility because of the employees' support for the Union; by threatening that Respondent's employees would never work again in the Chicago meat industry if they voted to engage in an economic strike; by threatening to oppose laid-off employees' unemployment compensation claims if they voted to strike in support of the Union; and by stating in an employee's presence that Respondent had solicited other businesses not to hire Respondent's employees if they decided to engage in an economic strike. Respondent denies having engaged in any of the foregoing conduct. The complaint further alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Patricia Gapik, and by failing to reinstate her because she supported the union activity of other employees and protested Respondent's efforts to solicit her support in Respondent's antiunion campaign. Respondent's posthearing brief contends that Gapik voluntarily quit, and that Respondent, for lawful reasons, accepted her resignation 3 days early.[1] Respondent further contends that Gapik was not protected by the Act because she was a confidential employee. The General Counsel contends that Gapik was not a confidential employee; that in any event, confidential employees are entitled to the protection of the Act; and that even if they are not, Gapik's alleged discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) because it was allegedly motivated by a refusal by her to commit unfair labor practices.

On the basis of the entire record,[2] including the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent,[3] I make the following

[1] At the outset of the hearing, Respondent's counsel stated, "most importantly, we contend she was not in fact discharged at all but voluntarily quit."

[2] Certain errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

Company witness Joseph Halper was properly present in the hearing room while Patricia Gapik testified as part of the General Counsel's case in chief. After the issuance of a sequestration order, Halper talked with company witness Patrick Kearney (who had not been so present) about Gapik's testimony regarding a telephone call to the state or Federal Department of Labor in the presence of Kearney but not Halper (see infra, part II,A). The General Counsel's posthearing brief requests me to reconsider my action at the hearing in denying his motion to strike all of Kearney's and Halper's testimony. I adhere to my denial of the motion. U.S. v. Fike, 538 F.2d 750, 757 (7th Cir. 1976), cert. denied 429 U.S. 1064 (1977); see also U.S. v. Schaefer, 299 F.2d 625, 631 (7th Cir. 1962), cert. denied 370 U.S. 917 (1962). As found infra fn. 30, this incident is immaterial to the results. Moreover, to the extent that Kearney's testimony differed from her testimony, I have credited her.

[3] Counsel's briefs state that the court reporter omitted certain exhibits, and misnumbered certain portions of the transcript, in copies of the record furnished to counsel. These errors do not appear in the copies furnished to me. Attached to Respondent's brief is a document that Re-

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business in Chicago, Illinois, where it is engaged in boning pork and in the wholesale sale of pork and related products. During the calendar and/or fiscal year preceding the issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent purchased and received at this facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside Illinois. I find that, as Respondent admits, it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, and that assertion of jurisdiction over its operations will effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

In July 1977 Respondent voluntarily, and without an election, recognized the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's hourly paid production workers. Respondent recognized the Union continuously thereafter, and was still doing so at the time of the June 1983 hearing. During this period, Respondent never locked out its employees, and the only strike occurred in March 1983.

In January 1982 Respondent's executive vice president, Joseph Halper, set up a new corporation, Momence Packing Company, in Momence, Illinois, 50 or 60 miles from Respondent's facility in Chicago, to perform a pork belly skinning operation. A maintenance staff was hired about March 1982, and production operations began about June 1982. However, at least until the end of August 1982, no office employees worked at the Momence facility, and practically all of its books and records were prepared and maintained by Respondent's clerical workers.

Patricia Gapik became employed by Respondent in 1979 as a salaried employee outside the bargaining unit. In September 1981 she advised Executive Vice President Halper, Company President John Mazur, General Manager Edward Kramer, and Plant Manager Patrick Kearney that she was getting married to Zbigniew Gapik, a union member who was working for Respondent as a butcher in the bargaining unit. About 2 weeks later, Kearney told her that Kramer had said that either she or her husband would be let go because of their marriage. Kearney said that it would probably be she, because Zbigniew Gapik was in the Union and there might be some problem with terminating him. She asked why she was being singled out when Respondent employed many other employees who were related. She asked Kearney to tell Halper that she was not going to leave voluntarily. Later, she went into Halper's office and told him that Kearney had said that either she or her husband was going to be discharged because they were getting married. She told him that she would like to know why because Respondent had other personnel in the plant who were related. Halper told her that she was a "confidential" employee. He went on to say that he was concerned that she would tell her husband about matters "such as our finances, different things like that," and that such information would thereby become "common knowledge." She promised that she would not take any information out of the office and would not discuss the office business with her husband.[4]

She credibly testified that she never in fact did so. Halper testified that he "accepted her assurance . . . and just let it pass and she remained our employee and so did her husband. There was no problem."

The Union's collective-bargaining agreement for the production and maintenance employees at Respondent's facility was due to expire at the end of April 1982. Gapik's desk was located 5 or 6 feet from and outside Respondent's conference room. In late February or March 1982, as Halper and General Manager Edward Kramer were coming out of the conference room, Halper was in the course of saying that nobody was going to tell him how to run his business; that the men were making too much money; and that he was planning on locking them out. Then, he turned around and asked Gapik whether she was planning on buying "that new car." She said that she was. He said, "I don't advise you to, because your husband might be out of a job real soon." He did not mention interest rates. She did in fact buy the car.[5]

In March or April 1982 Plant Manager Kearney told Gapik that he had told his wife that Gapik was being "harassed," and that Kearney had told him that Gapik should call the "Department of Labor" and see whether anything could be done about this.[6] Gapik, who at that time was unaware that there was both an Illinois and a Federal "Department of Labor," asked the telephone operator for the "Department of Labor" telephone number, and called the number given to her. Gapik asked the woman who answered the telephone, whose identity is not shown by the record, whether there were any em-spondent describes as "Administrative Law Judge's Exhibit 1" and as having been inadvertently omitted by the court reporter from the exhibit folders. At the hearing, a document was marked as ALJ Exh. 1, but was never offered.

[4] My findings about this conversation between Halper and Gapik are based almost entirely on his testimony. Her denial that the question of confidentiality and discussing business with her prospective husband came up is difficult to reconcile with her testimony that Halper said he had planned on letting her go because of her marriage, but had changed his mind, to which she replied that if he had let her go, he would have had to let go other company personnel who were kin to each other.

[5] My findings about this conversation between Halper and Gapik in Kramer's presence are based on her testimony. Halper and Kramer both testified that Halper advised her against buying a car because interest rates were high. However, Halper testified that this conversation took place in his private office and, when asked whether anyone else was present, said, "Not that I can recall." Kramer corroborated Gapik's testimony that this conversation occurred in his presence and in the main office area, and testified that clerical employee Annette McClory was probably present also. In view of these inconsistencies, and for demeanor reasons, I credit Gapik. McClory did not testify.

[6] This finding is based on Gapik's testimony. Inferentially, the alleged harassment consisted of alleged sexual and/or ethnic slurs. I need not determine whether Gapik's testimony is probative of the occurrence or contents of any conversation between the Kearneys.

ployee rights concerning "verbal harassment." The woman asked what type of harassment. Gapik told her a few things that had been said to Gapik. The woman said that she was sending Gapik a booklet concerning "all employee rights." Gapik then hung up the telephone, and related the conversation to Kearney. Kearney asked her to call the "Department of Labor" back and find out the rules or laws concerning lunch and coffeebreaks. Kearney explained that he had been told by General Manager Kramer not to permit her to leave the building for lunch any more, and to require Gapik (who was paid for her lunchbreak) to eat at her desk if she ate lunch at all. Kearney further explained that he was upset because he himself seldom got to go out to lunch, but had to watch the plant while Halper and Kramer went out; and that Kearney thought there should be a set rule concerning the hours and length of lunchbreaks. Gapik called the same woman again. She told Gapik that employees who worked 8 hours were entitled to a 20-minute lunch period, but other breaks were up to management. Gapik reported this conversation to Kearney.[7] No changes were thereafter made in Respondent's lunch practices with respect to Gapik or anyone else. Kearney and Halper denied that Kearney reported to Halper, Gapik's conversations with the "Department of Labor." Kearney testified that he never reported them to Kramer or anyone else in management.

B. Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

1. Alleged instructions to Gapik to speak in favor of Respondent's bargaining proposals and against union bargaining proposals

Before or during the initial bargaining session, which was held on April 23, 1982, the Union received from the Company a copy of the Company's initial bargaining proposals. Regarding the health, welfare, and pension funds the proposal as typed stated in its entirety:

> Section 19 - DELETE (Insurance)
> Will be provided by company through a private insurance company.
> Section 20 - DELETE
> Will be provided by company through a financial institution.

This first bargaining session with respect to a new contract was held at the union hall. The Union was represented by, inter alia, Union President Joseph Piotrowski, Union Secretary Walter Piotrowski, Union Business agent Walter Dzieronski, and employees John Kopinski and Stanley Lubinski. Respondent was represented by Halper. The Union proposed, inter alia, inclusion in the new agreement of the union health, welfare, and pension programs set forth in the expiring agreement. Halper said that these union programs "would no longer be in the negotiations." Halper said that he would like to get something in the nature of Blue Cross and Blue Shield, and mentioned that "that they did have Banker's Life." Walter Piotrowski said that if the private insurer's program was as good or better than the Union's, he would like to listen to it.

A later negotiating session on June 4, 1982, was held in Respondent's conference room. The Union was represented by, inter alia, Joseph Piotrowski, Walter Piotrowski, Dzieronski, and Kopinski. Respondent was represented by, inter alia, Halper and Kramer. The Union described improved health, welfare, and pension benefits in a recently ratified bargaining agreement between the Union and the American Meat Association. Respondent said that it would come up with a proposal that would be commensurate or better.

After the union officials had left, Halper came into the main office. In the presence of Kramer and Gapik, he remarked, "how difficult it was to get anything across to these stupid Polacks." Halper said that during the meeting he had been trying to explain his proposal regarding the health and welfare insurance and the pension fund, and that he "just didn't seem to get anything through John Kopinski's head." Halper said that Kopinski was so stupid that Halper could not understand why Kopinski was a union steward. Gapik said that she knew Kopinski was not stupid, that she knew he spoke English very well, that he had studied at the University of Polar[illegible] and that he was far from stupid. Halper said that if Kopinski was not stupid, then he must be afraid to go against the Union. Halper went on to say that under the union pension plan, the men were "vested for 10 years," and that "For 10 years, the Union takes the money and puts it in their pockets." He went on to say that the Union did not care about the men, that they were so stupid they did not realize this, and that he "just didn't seem to be able to get anything across."

Halper asked Gapik how she knew so much about Kopinski. She said that the Gapiks were friends of his, that they visited each other's houses, and that she felt she knew him very well. Halper said, "[W]hy don't you talk to [your husband and] explain all these proposals as far as the health and welfare and the insurance . . . and have him talk to Kopinski about it?" She asked Halper why he did not call Kopinski to his office and explain all this to him. Halper, who has a background in labor relations, said that he could not do this because it would violate the labor laws. However, he said, nobody could do anything to her for talking to Kopinski about this. Gapik said that she would talk to her husband.

On an undisclosed later date, inferentially a day or two later, Gapik told her husband that Halper wanted one of the Gapiks to explain the insurance, health, and welfare to Kopinski. Zbigniew Gapik told his wife not to get involved with it. On June 19, while the Gapiks and Kopinski were together in a restaurant, Gapik said to Kopinski that Halper was an intelligent man who thought that the Respondent's pension and insurance plan could be good for the workers, and asked whether Kopinski understood the proposals. He said yes, in a manner which suggested to Gapik that he felt the question insulted his intelligence. Zbigniew Gapik became "mad" at his wife for bringing the matter up, and she never brought it up again. During this conversation, Gapik did not tell Kopinski why she had chosen to speak to him about these items. Kopinski testified that he had no idea whether, in making these remarks, Gapik was speaking her own mind.

My findings concerning the conversation between Gapik and Halper are based on her testimony, which is indirectly corroborated by Respondent's continuous insistence, to the point of eventually taking a losing strike (see infra, part II,B,4,a,(5)) on its own proposals about pensions and insurance. Although the June 4 negotiating session likely broke up about 15 minutes after her normal quitting hour, during that week she worked several hours of overtime after her regular working hours. For demeanor reasons, I do not accept Kramer's denial that he was present during such a conversation. Also for demeanor reasons, and because Halper's testimony was impeached in other respects (see infra, part II,B,4,b), I do not accept Halper's denial that he told Gapik to tell her husband about the Company's proposals. Respondent's brief contends (Br. 17–18) that her testimony about this conversation is unworthy of belief because the health, welfare, and pension plan proposals as of that date were not very specific. However, Gapik attributed to Halper the remark during this conversation that the employees did not realize that the existing pension plan benefited union officials at the employees' expense. Moreover, Halper may well have been persuaded that the "Polacks" did not understand that Respondent was intending to offer plans commensurate with the Union's plans. Indeed, Halper testified that in June 1982, Gapik told Kramer and he regarding the pension plans and health insurance that her husband had said, "the people didn't really understand what [Respondent's representatives] were talking about," and asked Halper and Kramer to clarify the matter. Although for demeanor reasons I credit her denial of this conversation, Halper's testimony does evince his belief that "the people" could have been confused about Respondent's then position as to these bargaining issues.

2. Extension agreement; alleged lockout threat

The Union and the Company had another negotiating session on June 23 at the union hall. Respondent was represented by, inter alia, Halper, Kramer, and an insurance broker whom Respondent brought to the meeting. The broker said that he could plan both the health and welfare fund and the pension fund to yield better benefits than the union plans. That day, the parties entered into an agreement to extend (for employees on the payroll before May 1) the existing agreement until a new agreement was executed or, if the parties were unable to reach such an agreement, until either party had given to the other a 5-day written notice of its desire to terminate the provisions of the current agreement. Further, "The Union shall not strike and the Company shall not lock out its employees unless either party has provided the other with the five-day written notice previously set forth."

During the first week in June 1982, Zbigniew Gapik went on medical leave because he had broken his hand at work. On July 5, 6, 7, or 8, Halper came up to Gapik's desk and asked when she thought her husband would be released from the doctor. She said that she was very sure that he would be released the following Friday, July 9. Halper said that if her husband was released, to tell him not to bother to come back to work. She asked why. Halper said, "Because I'm locking the men out Friday." She asked if he was "kidding." He said, "No, I'm not. I'm going to lock them out and I'll run this operation out of Momence . . . I'm going to see how long those men can go without getting a paycheck." Halper went on to say that he and other company officers could get along for a long time, or indefinitely, without getting a paycheck, and asked her how long she could go without one. She said that if her husband was released that Friday, he would report to work Monday; and that if he was locked out, somebody from the Company would have to tell him that he was locked out. She repeated Halper's remarks to her husband before he returned to work on July 12.

My findings concerning this conversation between Halper and Gapik are based on her testimony. She testified that Kramer and (probably) Kearney were present, but they were not asked about the matter. Halper testified that during a conversation when nobody else (so far as he knew) was present, she asked him why her husband had not received his workmen's compensation checks and why his doctors had not been paid. Gapik credibly testified without contradiction that her husband's workmen's compensation checks were duly received at Respondent's office. She further credibly testified without contradiction that his medical claims were sent to the insurance company, that her husband never received at his home any bills for medical treatment for his injury, and that regarding such injuries at Respondent's plant, the procedure was for the insurance company to pay the providers directly. Halper testified that any problems with Zbigniew Gapik's workmen's compensation claim should have been noted in his personnel file; but no such notations were produced. I infer that the medical bills were paid in the usual course. Moreover, Halper sought to improve his denial that he mentioned a lockout by testifying that Gapik knew there would be a layoff, because she had been asked to prepare a seniority list. However, she dated that seniority list July 9, 1982; and Plant Manager Kearney testified that the decision to effect a layoff was not made until about 11 a.m., on July 9, several days after the July 5 date that Halper attached to his conversation with Gapik. For the foregoing and demeanor reasons, and because Halper's testimony was impeached in other respects (see infra, part II,B,4,b), as to this conversation I credit her over Halper. The fact that Respondent was still bound by a no-lockout agreement terminable on 5 days' notice is not inconsistent with testimony that Halper threatened a lockout in 4 to 7 days for the purpose of frightening his subordinates.

3. July 12 layoff; August 5 strike-vote and contract termination notices

On Thursday, July 8, the parties conducted another bargaining session. The Union was represented by Walter and Joseph Piotrowski, Dzieronski, and Kopinski.

Respondent was represented by Halper and Kramer. Health, welfare, and pension issues were discussed. The Union asked Respondent to show a "formula" that would show its proposed plans were as good as or better than the union plans. Halper said that if the administrator of the union plans could show Respondent a better "evaluation" of those plans, Respondent could formulate something more definite.

After the decision about 11 a.m., on Friday, July 9, to effect a layoff, and after Gapik had finished preparing the seniority list bearing that date, Halper conferred with the foremen about whom to lay off in view of the employees' jobs and seniority and the Company's production needs. After 4 hours' work on Monday, July 12, about half of Respondent's 40-unit employees were laid off. Among those laid off was Zbigniew Gapik. Ordinarily, after deciding to effect a layoff, Respondent would direct Gapik to prepare a typewritten list of who was to be laid off, and would post it immediately after it was prepared. The record fails specifically to show whether this was done in connection with the July 12 layoff. I infer that if such a typewritten list was prepared and posted at all, this was not done until the morning of that day.

On Thursday, August 5, the parties conducted another negotiating session in Respondent's conference room. The Union was represented by Walter and Joseph Piotrowski, Dzieronski, and Kopinski. Respondent was represented by Halper and Kramer. Respondent presented its proposal as to the health, welfare, and pension funds. The Union stated that it would not agree to these proposed plans because it was not sure whether they were at least as good as those called for in its recently executed contract with the American Meat Association. The insurance broker brought to the meeting by Respondent said that if the Union would just explain the current status of its health, welfare, and pension plan, she could use an experience factor in it and could get a formula for such plans. Union Secretary Walter Piotrowski told Respondent that at the next union meeting, he would report the status of negotiations to the membership and take a strike vote. That same day, Halper gave the Union a written notice of termination of the collective-bargaining agreement, "effective at the end of the shift, at approximately 2:30 p.m. on Friday, August 13, 1982.

4. Alleged August 9–10, 1982 threats of reprisal for strike; alleged August 10, 1982 discharge of Patricia Gapik; the March-April 1983 strike and bargaining agreement

a. Credited evidence about those events

(1) Events on August 9–11, 1982

After a 1-week vacation during the first week in August, Gapik returned to work on Monday, August 9. About 8 or 8:30 that morning, Halper called her into his office. In Kramer's presence, Halper asked her if her husband had started to receive his unemployment checks. She said that he had not, but should be getting them shortly. Halper told her not to count on it. She asked why. He said that there was going to be a strike vote, and that if any of the active employees struck, Halper was going to see to it that the employees on layoff status would stop receiving unemployment compensation. Gapik said that she did not think he could do that to the employees who had been laid off, "They didn't go on strike, you laid them off." Halper said that he could do it, that he would do it, that they were all union members whether they were on strike or laid off, and that that was the price that they were going to have to pay for being union members. Halper went on to say that if she cared anything about her husband's receiving his checks, she should tell him to contact the men that were on layoff and the ones who were still working and tell them to vote not to strike. Halper said that if they did strike, he would see to it that "none of those [obscenity] Polacks ever work in the Chicago meat industry again." Halper said that he could do this by merely making a few phone calls. She said, "I know you can." I have seen you do it before.[8] She said that she would not tell her husband anything, and that if there was a union meeting, the Union or the union steward would contact him. However, she did tell her husband about this conversation with Halper.

During Gapik's August 2–6 vacation, her job had been performed by Pat Dale (also referred to in the record as Pat Gail), who had been Respondent's first bookkeeper and who came in to help out when extra bookkeeping help was needed. About 8 a.m., on August 10, the morning after Gapik's conversation with Halper about her husband's unemployment compensation, Plant Manager Kearney told Gapik that Dale had taken home more money for the week than Kearney had, and said that he was going to talk to Halper about the matter.[9] Gapik said that she had had her own problems with Halper. Kearney asked what the matter was. She went through her whole August 9 conversation with Halper. In addition, according to her credible testimony, she told Kearney of "other things that had been said" to her and how she "had been asked to relay certain things about the Union to the men." I infer from this testimony that she described her conversation with Halper about March 1982 when he advised her not to buy a new car because her husband might be locked out of his job "real soon";

[8] Regarding the incident she was referring to, a composite of credible parts of the testimony of Gapik, Halper, and Joseph Piotrowski shows as follows: In late August 1981 (the 1982 date testified to by Piotrowski was obviously in error), employee Stanislaw Golan walked off the production line and was discharged. At his behest, the Union filed an unsuccessful grievance alleging that his departure was due to illness caused by a new production line system. The Union also filed a charge about his discharge with the NLRB, which dismissed the charge. When he filed an unemployment compensation claim, he was found disqualified for 6 weeks. During a November 1981 telephone conversation in Gapik's presence, Halper told Ed O'Hilski, a representative of another meat company whose employees were also represented by the Union, not to accept Golan's application for employment. Halper said that Golan had been discharged for walking off the production lines and refusing to work, that Respondent had had problems with him in the past, that O'Hilski had potential for future problems with Golan, and that if O'Hilski had such problems, "he would have the Union on his back."

[9] The parties stipulated that during that week Kearney's gross pay exceeded $500, his take-home pay was about $385, and Dale's take-home pay was $400. No deductions were made from her pay because she was a part-time employee.

bout her June 4 conversation with Halper regarding ex-lanations to Kopinski of Respondent's bargaining pro-osals; and about Halper's early July comments regard-ng alleged lockout plans that included her husband. She aid to Kearney that she was disgusted about the whole ituation, that she felt she was being put in the middle of he problems between the Union and Respondent, that hese problems were none of her business, that she was ired of being harassed verbally and of being insulted and legraded, that she could no longer concentrate on her work, that she was constantly being pulled away from ier work and being told different things, and that "it was going to have to stop." She said that if it did not stop, the following Friday was going to be her last day. Kear-ney asked if she wanted him to talk to Halper for her. She said, "no," that she would talk to Halper herself.

About 3 p.m. that afternoon, Gapik's normal quitting time, Kramer received a telephone call from Timothy G. Lowry, a meat broker with whom Respondent regularly does business. In Gapik's presence, Kramer told Lowry that there was a pending union meeting for a strike vote and that he had spoken to a couple of other meat compa-nies regarding not hiring these men if they went out on strike. Kramer said that he had talked to Thomas Smith from R and S Meats, to O'Hilski from Illinois Meat, and to someone from Ampack. Kramer said that he was pretty sure that Ampack would not hire strikers against Respondent, and that all of these firms seemed to be in sympathy with Respondent. Kramer asked Lowry, who acts as meat broker for a number of meat packers in ad-dition to Respondent, if he would ask other meat compa-nies not to hire any of these men. Kramer spoke in a loud, angry, boisterous, and theatrical tone.

At this point, Gapik approached Kearney and told him about Kramer's conversation with Lowry. She said that she had decided not to wait around for Halper and that she was going home. She asked Kearney to talk to Halper for her. Kearney said that he would see what he could do, that she should go home, and that he would see her in the morning. Halper's daughter Kim (who did not testify) was present at the beginning of this conversa-tion, but Kearney and Gapik concluded it in the shipping dock because Kearney told Gapik that he did not want their conversation to be overheard by Halper.

About 5:15 that evening, Kearney telephoned Gapik at her home. He told her that he had spoken with Joseph Halper and that Halper had told him to tell her that her services were no longer needed. She said that he was "kidding." He said, "[No], really, I spoke with Mr. Halper and he said to tell you that your services are no longer needed." She said, "That is it? Just get rid of me? That is it?" He said, "That is it." She said that she would be in on Friday to get her paycheck.

On Wednesday, August 11, Gapik telephoned Kearney and told him that on August 13, the next payday, her husband would pick up her final paycheck and some per-sonal effects that she had kept at the office. On Friday, August 13, Kearney gave these items to Zbigniew Gapik in the plant parking lot. Kearney told him in English that Gapik had been fired, and said in English "Everybody in this company is crazy."

My findings about the conversation between Kearney and Zbigniew Gapik are based on Gapik's testimony. Kearney testified that the conversation occurred in the office downstairs, and that all he said to Gapik was, "Ziggy, I'm sorry, [Mrs. Gapik's] not working here no more." Gapik impressed me as an honest witness, where-as Kearney was impeached in several respects (see infra, part II,B,4,b). Although Gapik's native language is Polish and his ability to understand English is very limit-ed, Kearney's version of what he said includes nothing that would be capable of being misunderstood as an as-sertion that everyone in the Company was crazy. More-over, although Kearney testified that Halper's daughter, Kim, was present during this conversation, she was not called as a witness. Accordingly, and after considering the witnesses' demeanor and respective interests, I credit Gapik.

On August 11, 1982, Respondent's employees voted to give the Union authority to strike. On or before August 18, the Union notified Respondent of this strike authori-zation. However, the union negotiators had not really wanted to strike at this time, and no strike was called.

(2) Gapik's unemployment compensation claim

On an undisclosed date before August 18, 1982, Gapik filed an application for unemployment compensation. Thereafter, the Gibbens Company, which represents Re-spondent in contested unemployment compensation claims, requested Respondent to fill out a blank form, printed up by Gibbens, headed "Notice of Termination of Employment." The form as filled out by Kearney on August 18 states that she quit and that Respondent would not rehire her. In a portion of the form stating "Reason in detail required," he inserted the following entry:

> When she returned to work after vacation and found out her replacement was paid more than she was, she said she was insulted by this and had no other recourse than to quit. In the past she has men-tioned that she would like to collect compensa-tion.[10]

On August 24, a claims adjudicator of the State of Illi-nois Department of Labor, Bureau Employment Securi-ty, Division of Unemployment Insurance, denied her claim on the ground that she had left work because of "Job dissatisfaction." Pursuant to her appeal dated August 27, 1982, a hearing on her claim was held on Oc-tober 21, 1982, by a hearings referee. Regarding the cir-cumstances of her separation, she gave the same testimo-ny to the referee that she gave before me and that is summarized above. At the conclusion of her testimony, the referee asked her, "Do you mean that you were fired for union activities?" She replied, "I guess that is what you can call it." Kearney testified before the referee that Gapik quit because Dale made more money than Gapik did. The referee's decision, dated October 29, 1982, states in part:

[10] The General Counsel's objection to the receipt of this document into evidence is discussed infra, part II,B,4,b.

FINDING OF FACTS:

The claimant was a bookkeeper. She left work because of dissatisfaction with employment. Her husband had been previously laid off for lack of work by the employer. Thereafter, a strike vote was to be taken. She objected to being asked to speak to her husband about the matter. The claimant felt as though she was in the middle of something that was of no concern to her. Thereafter, the claimant advised the employer she was leaving work the following Friday. Her resignation was immediately accepted. The claimant denied that she was going to stay at home and "draw compensation."

CONCLUSION:

The evidence established the claimant voluntarily left work without good cause attributable to the employing unit. It was not established the claimant's work was unsuitable per se. The claimant is disqualified under the provisions of Section 601A of the Act.[11]

DECISION:

The determination of the Claims Adjudicator is affirmed. The Claimant is disqualified for benefits under Section 601 of the Illinois Unemployment Insurance Act from August 08, 1982, and for each week thereafter until the Claimant had had employment in at least four calendar weeks and has had earnings in each of the weeks that equal or exceed $148, which is the Claimant's current weekly benefit amount.

On April 29, 1983, the board of review of the State of Illinois Department of Labor issued a decision finding that "the Referee's findings of fact and conclusions are fully supported by the record, and no errors of fact or law appear to have been made. Accordingly, the decision of the referee is affirmed."

(3) Gapik's knowledge of the instant charge

The charge that gave rise to the instant proceeding was executed by the Union on September 9, 1982. In the blank space after "Basis of the charge (be specific as to facts, names, addresses, plants involved, dates, places, etc.)," the charge states, "On or about August 10, 1982, the Company terminated Pat Gapic [sic] because of her activities on behalf of the Union." The charge does not specify her address or telephone number. The evidence that Gapik gave a statement to a Board agent on September 17, 1982, shows that at least by that date, Gapik had learned about the Union's charge.

(4) Gapik's EEOC charges

Meanwhile, on September 13, 1982, Gapik went down to the office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and spoke to an EEOC agent. Gapik told the EEOC agent that she had been subjected to "verbal" "sexual harassment" and insults of a sexual nature, and that she had been paid less than a male bookkeeper (who left in May 1982, more than 2 months before Gapik's termination), who performed the same duties and whom she had been required to train. Gapik did not mention her union complaints, because the EEOC agent said that she was only concerned with the sexual harassment and the pay differential. The EEOC "Charge of Discrimination" that Gapik signed on that day states that she had been discharged on August 11, 1982, and further states:

> I was subjected to harassment by the male bookkeeper and even though management was aware of the harassment, no action was taken.
> . . . In August 1981, I married an employee who was a member of the union. . . . My husband is Polish and I was continually subjected to ethnic slurs by Joseph Halper.
> . . . On August 11, 1982 I informed Patrick Kearney, that if the harassment did not cease, I would be quitting by August 14, 1982 [which was a Saturday]. I was called by Kearney and told not to return to work because my services were no longer needed.

Thereafter, another EEOC agent, Wagner, telephoned Gapik and asked her to come down to the EEOC office again to give further information. On January 6, 1983, she met with him in his office. On that date, she signed an amended charge. The first page of the amended charge consists of a photocopy of the September 13 charge with certain changes made by her. In material part, these consisted of a change in her alleged discharge date to August 10, 1982; and a change in the penultimate sentence so as to assert that on August 10 she told Kearney that if the harassment did not cease, she "would be quitting by following Friday."[12] As signed by her on January 6, 1983, the amended EEOC charge also contains two newly typed pages. These pages allege that Halper told her that he could not "get these [obscenity] polacks" to understand his contract proposals; that he had told her on August 9, 1982, that "If these [obscenity] polacks strike I'll make sure they never work in the Chicago meat industry again"; and that on August 10, 1982, Kramer had asked Lowry to pass the word not to hire any of the "[obscenity] polacks" that Respondent was locking out. The charge alleges that Halper, Kramer, and Kearney made additional anti-Polish remarks and that "these constant ethnic slurs made my work environment unbearable." The charge goes on to allege that Halper, Kramer, and Respondent's bookkeeper had made sexually offensive remarks; that she had been paid less than the male bookkeeper for equal work; and that Halper had attributed the salary differential to the fact that the other bookkeeper "was a man and would not work for any less money." The charge as amended concludes:

[11] "An individual shall be ineligible for benefits for the week in which he left work voluntarily without good cause attributable to the employing unit and thereafter, until he has become reemployed and has had earnings equal to or in excess of his current weekly benefit amount in each of four calendar weeks . . . ." 48 Smith Hurd Illinois Annot. Statutes Para. 431.

[12] The date of her marriage was also changed. The January 1983 charge, like the September 1982 charge, alleges that the most recent act of discrimination occurred on August 11, 1982.

> On August 10, 1982, I told Patrick Kearney that I was tired of being insulted and degraded and that I wanted the harassment to stop. I said that if the harassment did not stop by the following Friday I would be forced to quit. Patrick Kearney said that he would talk to Halper about it. At 5:15 PM on August 10, 1982 Pat Kearney called me and told me that I was fired. I have been retaliated against.

At the time of the June 1983 hearing before me, this EEOC charge was still pending.

(5) Events surrounding the strike in March and April 1983

Until March 28, 1983, the health, welfare, and pension plans were continuous subjects of negotiations, but the Union and Respondent had still failed to reach an agreement. On Friday, March 25, Respondent's employees voted to go out on strike on Monday, March 28. The evening of March 25 or early in the morning of March 26, Respondent received unofficial word of the strike vote. On the morning of March 26, Respondent called a meeting of its employees, most of whom were Polish-speaking and some of whom were Spanish-speaking. In rather poor Polish, Company President Mazur tried to explain to the employees Respondent's stand in the negotiations. He told the employees that they should not go on strike, that anybody who did strike should not go back to work, that the shop would be open on Monday, and that those who came in to work on Monday would get a company insurance and pension plan and the wages would be the same. He said that he could not give the employees any guarantee, but that they should believe his word. He said that he did not want the Union to represent the employees, and did not want them to pay union dues.[13] Then, Halper told the employees, in English, that the Union had not officially notified Respondent of the strike, that the shop would be open on Monday if anyone chose to come to work, and that wages would be the same as before. An employee asked in English what would happen if the Union took their insurance away if they came to work. Halper said in English that he would give the employees "the private insurance and the pension plan and that negotiations are not over, so we can still discuss some things." Kearney, who understands practically no Polish, testified without objection that Mazur also answered the question in Polish. Halper instructed employee George Negrete, who could speak both Spanish and English, to translate Halper's remarks for the benefit of employees who spoke only Spanish. Inferentially, Negrete told them something in Spanish. No witness who can understand Spanish testified about this meeting.

[13] My findings as to Mazur's remarks are based on the uncontradicted testimony of Kopinski, the only witness regarding this meeting who is able to understand Polish. Mazur did not testify.

The Union began to strike and picket the plant on March 28, 1983. The strike continued until April 8, 1983. On the following day, the employees ratified a new contract that included Respondent's health, welfare, and pension proposals.

b. Reasons for credibility findings

My findings in the preceding part II,B,4,a about management's remarks on August 9 and 10 are based almost entirely on Gapik's testimony, which I credit for demeanor reasons and the following considerations:

1. Regarding Gapik's testimony that about 8 a.m., on August 9, she and Halper conversed about unemployment insurance in Kramer's presence, both Kramer and Halper denied that Halper had any conversation whatever with her on the date and at the hour she gave. Kramer testified on direct examination that "I think" Halper was in Momence on August 9. On cross-examination, Kramer initially responded, "Right" to the inquiry, "So, Mr. Halper wasn't at the [Chicago] plant all day, right?" Then, when asked how Halper's daughter Kim (Respondent's receptionist) got to work that day, Kramer testified that he "would imagine" that Halper dropped her off at the plant on August 9, and that he would "not necessarily" stop to talk to Kramer before leaving for Momence. Company witnesses Kearney and Halper were evasive and untruthful about where Halper was on August 9 and 10. Kearney initially testified that Halper was at Respondent's plant, in Chicago, on August 9. Then, Kearney testified that Halper was not at Respondent's plant that day, that he was at the Momence plant on that day, and (in effect) that Kearney did not see Halper at all on August 9. After that, Kearney testified that Halper dropped off his daughter at Respondent's Chicago plant on both August 9 and 10; that Halper was not otherwise at Respondent's Chicago plant on either day, but was at the Momence Packing plant; and that Kearney drove Miss Halper home on the evening of both August 9 and 10. Halper testified that she and Kearney were still at the Chicago plant when Halper returned there late in the afternoon of August 10. He also testified that he came to the Chicago plant about 7:45 a.m. on August 9 to drop off his daughter, and that at this time he had a brief conversation with Kearney (who, as noted, in effect denied that this conversation occurred). Halper further testified that he then drove to the Momence Packing plant, which is 50 or 60 miles from Respondent's Chicago plant. In an effort to procure corroboration for his testimony about these events, he testified that he was the person who made two August 9 telephone calls that are listed on the Momence Packing telephone bill with Respondent's Chicago facility telephone number listed as the recipient, and that both these calls were made to Kearney; the bill shows that these calls were made at 9:52 a.m. and 12:52 p.m. However, Halper further testified that the August 10 telephone calls that are listed on the Momence Packing telephone bill, all nine of which were allegedly made by him, included a call made from the Momence Packing facility at 3:59 p.m.; and that he was in his car, driving from the Momence to the Chicago plant, when he made telephone calls on his mobile telephone that (as shown by his telephone bill) were made at 3:46, 3:57, and 4 p.m. on August 10. Moreover, he admitted that Momence Production Supervisor Dick Backhard had occasion to call the Chicago facility. Gapik credibly testified that she received a telephone call from Momence Packing every morning, usually placed by Backhard, about the previous day's receipts and shipments so that she could do the billing; and that she believed the August 9 morning call about this matter was made by him. I conclude that he, not Halper, made the 9:52 a.m. telephone call to Respondent's Chicago facility from the Momence Packing facility on the morning of August 9. Further, I conclude that Halper's misrepresentations about the August 10 telephone calls cast doubt on his credibility generally, including his veracity in denying the August 9 remarks that Gapik attributed to him. For this reason, and because of deficiencies, discussed infra, in Kramer's testimony about another matter, I do not credit their denials of Halper's August 9 remarks to Gapik in Kramer's presence. Further, I find that the above-described inconsistencies in Kearney's testimony about the foregoing August 9–10 events reflect on his credibility generally.

2. Kramer and Lowry both denied engaging in any conversation, as described by Gapik in her testimony about the August 10 events, about the possibility of a strike among Respondent's employees. However, it is undenied that on August 5 the Union, in Kramer's presence, said that it was planning to take a strike vote. Moreover, Kramer and Lowry admittedly have frequent occasion to engage in telephone conversations with each other. Furthermore, although on direct examination both of them testified that a possible strike among Respondent's employees was of no concern to Lowry, on cross-examination Lowry testified that reports regarding work stoppages involving his customers were of substantial concern to his meat-brokerage business because, "when the contracts are up . . . you don't buy or sell meat for them"; and that "Oh, sure," he talks with his customers about strikes as long as 1 month in advance. Moreover, Kearney did not deny Gapik's testimony that she described such a Kramer-Lowry conversation a few minutes after the time that she testimonially attached thereto.

3. Among the remarks to Lowry that Gapik attributed to Kramer during this conversation was the assertion that R & S General Manager Smith was sympathetic to Kramer's requests not to hire employees who struck Respondent. Although denying that Kramer made any such requests to him, Smith testified that when Respondent's employees struck in March and April 1983, he personally drove a truck across the picket line at Respondent's facility to pick up or deliver goods, even though the Union, which also represents R & S employees, had asked him in advance not to do so.[14] Moreover, Kramer's use of loud and boisterous tones during this converation indicates that much of his message was not really intended for Lowry's benefit, but rather was really directed at Gapik and (through her) her husband in the bargaining unit. For this purpose, the effectiveness of these remarks about Smith would have little or no relationship to their accuracy.

4. The undisputed evidence establishes that during the period when Gapik acted as Respondent's regular bookkeeper, Dale had worked for Respondent as a bookkeeper for 1 week in April 1982 while Gapik was on vacation, for an undisclosed period in May 1982 after the male bookkeeper quit, and in July 1982 during a state audit. Because Gapik maintained the payroll records, she was at all times well aware that on each of these occasions Dale was receiving higher direct wages than Gapik. Moreover, Gapik received various fringe benefits not enjoyed by Dale, and received a pay increase about early June 1982. Such evidence renders unlikely Kearney's discredited testimony that on Tuesday, August 10, Gapik said that she was quitting at the close of business on Friday, August 13, because, when substituting for Gapik the preceding week, Dale had been paid more than she. Moreover, the stipulation that Dale's take-home pay for that week had also been higher than Kearney's, his testimony that he had not learned this until August 10, and the absence of evidence or claim that he had known Dale's pay rate during her previous sporadic employment with Respondent, tend to corroborate Gapik's credited testimony that it was he who on August 10 expressed resentment at Dale's pay in comparison to his.[15]

Although I have discredited Kearney's testimony about this August 10 conversation with Gapik, I adhere to my action at the hearing in receiving, over the General Counsel's objection, the Gibbens-provided form that Kearney filled out and sent to Gibbens about the circumstances of Gapik's separation. The document is not hearsay to the extent that it shows Respondent's representations to Gibbens, which opposed, on Respondent's behalf, Gapik's unemployment compensation claim. In contending that the document is not receivable under rule 803(6) of the Federal Rules of Evidence to show the truth of the contents, the General Counsel's posthearing brief seems to rely solely on the contention that the source of information indicates "lack of trustworthiness." Particularly because Kearney himself testified about the events that the document purports to describe, the circumstances on which the General Counsel bases his "lack of trustworthiness" claim go to the weight of the document and not to its admissibility. See American International Pictures v. Price Enterprises, 636 F.2d 933, 935 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. denied 451 U.S. 1010 (1981); Crompton-Richmond Co. v. Briggs, 560 F.2d 1195, 1201–1202 fn. 12 (5th Cir. 1977). Because I do not read Kear-ney's testimony as representing that Respondent fills out such a form only after the applicant's unemployment compensation claim is initially denied, I do not regard as reflecting on the document's trustworthiness the fact that it is dated before Gapik's claim was initially denied. However, I attach no evidentiary weight to the representations in this document, for the reasons set forth in connection with Kearney's testimony and because the document was prepared in anticipation of the litigation of Gapik's unemployment compensation claim. I note, moreover, that the document, unlike Kearney's testimony, does not allege that Gapik said that she was not quitting until the end of the week, or that Halper thereupon told him to accept her resignation immediately.

[14] There is no evidence that R & S ever hired any of Respondent's employees during the March-April 1983 strike. In contending that Kramer did not ask R & S Representative Smith about August 1982 not to hire Respondent's employees if they went on strike, Respondent's brief (Br. 27) refers to R & S' conduct in hiring several of Respondent's ex-employees in 1982, beginning in early 1982 and up to 14 months before the strike.

[15] I do not credit Gapik's testimony that when stating on Tuesday, August 10, that the following Friday would be her last day if management's harassment did not stop, she meant Friday, August 20, and not Friday, August 13. Her testimony in this respect is inconsistent with her initial EEOC charge and with the natural reading of her amended EEOC charge. In any event, management had no reason to suppose that she meant August 20.

5. Kearney and Halper both testified that on Tuesday, August 10, Kearney told Halper that Gapik had said that Friday was her last day, and that she was quitting because she felt insulted by reason of Dale's pay while Gapik was on vacation. Halper, but not Kearney, further testified that Kearney said that Gapik did not want to talk about a raise; and that Halper replied,". . . if she is that unhappy to the point she doesn't want to talk about a raise or anything else, and she is quitting Friday, we better accept her resignation immediately, because if we don't, we have the potential of her goofing up our accounts receivable and accounts payables, because her attitude is so bad." Kearney's testimony nowhere refers to any unwillingness by Gapik to talk about a raise, or to any explanation by Halper for telling Kearney to accept her resignation immediately. I do not credit either Halper's or Kearney's testimony about this conversation between them. Rather, and because I see no reason why Kearney would have given Halper an inaccurate report of what Gapik had told Kearney, I infer that Halper received an accurate report from Kearney and that Halper told him (as Kearney promptly did) to tell her immediately that her services were no longer required. Further, in the absence of corroboration from Kearney, I do not credit Halper's testimony about the reasons Halper gave for his instructions to Kearney.

6. Kearney testified that after this conversation with Halper, Kearney telephoned Gapik and told her that Respondent was accepting her resignation. Kearney went on to testify that she said, "Oh, as of Friday," and he said, "No, as of today." Kearney further testified that about August 18, Gapik telephoned him and told him that if Respondent opposed her claim for unemployment compensation, she was going to file "all kinds of charges." As previously shown, Kearney's testimony in other respects is unreliable. Moreover, although Respondent's counsel stipulated that a document drawn up by Gapik on the Friday before a Monday layoff was in fact a seniority list of all the employees working in the plant that Friday, Kearney testified (in connection with Respondent's efforts to show that she was a confidential employee) that the document listed only those employees who were to be laid off. Accordingly, and for demeanor reasons, I credit Gapik's version of the discharge conversation, and her denial of the August 18 conversation. In connection with the alleged August 18 conversation, I note that she later filed a total of one charge (with EEOC), and that she filed this charge almost a month after this alleged conversation and while her unemployment compensation claim was pending before the referee. I further note that when testifying before the unemployment compensation referee, Kearney admittedly did not refer to this alleged conversation. Although he was not asked during that hearing about an event that happened after Gapik's discharge, I think it likely that he would have volunteered testimony about this conversation if it had really occurred.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Whether Gapik was a confidential employee

a. Facts

Most of Respondent's eight-floor building is occupied by production operations. The fourth floor of the building contains the private office of Executive Vice President Halper and an undivided office area. During 1982 and until Gapik's separation in mid-August 1982, the undivided office area contained desks occupied by General Manager Kramer, Gapik, and McClory. Until May 1982, when the male bookkeeper quit, he also had a desk in that area. Dale also worked in that office from time to time between April 1982 and the end of the first week in August 1982. So far as the record shows, during the first 8 months of 1982 Respondent's only clerical personnel were Gapik, McClory, Dale, the male bookkeeper, and receptionist Kim Halper, whose office was on the first floor and who, inferentially, was a student who intended to return to school at the end of the summer.[16] During part of this period, Dale was acting as a fill-in for the male bookkeeper after he quit. Gapik and McClory each had a typewriter at their desk; Dale also had access to a typewriter. At the time of Gapik's separation, she was keeping the books for both Respondent and Momence Packing, and was training McClory to do the payroll. Halper testified that McClory was supposed to be learning to take over Momence Packing's "paper work," was performing general office work, and performed duties for Respondent "Just to give her whatever extra time to fill out her eight hours." The duties of the clerical employees in the undivided office area included answering the telephone and connecting the caller with the person called.

As of early July 1982, Respondent's active work force numbered about 40 people. Gapik's job title was bookkeeper. She took care of accounts receivable and accounts payable. She never saw Respondent's profit and loss statements. She kept a record of each employee's hours of work, figured out the gross and take-home pay of each, and made the data entry sheets for the payroll. After the payroll readout and the checks had been printed, she balanced them against her own records. She received checkoff and welfare deduction authorization slips from the Union, made appropriate data entries, typed up the checks to the Union for checked-off union dues, typed up the checks for the pension and for the health and welfare funds, and typed notices to the Union that employees had been added to or removed (by termination or otherwise) from the deductions lists. She maintained individual personnel files, and she put into or took out of these files such information as injuries or changes in deductions. She inserted into the files of office personnel certain information regarding vacation, sick, and off days. When Plant Manager Kearney wrote up a disciplinary action, she would insert a copy into the employee's file and send a copy to the Union. When Respondent was presented with an employee's health insurance claim (on a form prepared by the Union), she would determine from the employee's personnel file (or, perhaps, from the payroll records) whether he had been working for Respondent on the critical dates, sign the form, and (without keeping a copy) return it to the employee, who sent it to the Union.

When an employee was injured on the job, Gapik would fill out and mail to the insurance companies claims made by employees or by the clinic Respondent was associated with, and put a copy of the clinic's report in the employee's personnel file. About June 1982, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration asked Respondent for a record of how many injuries there had been in the plant. The testimony suggests that a file of records of such injuries was supposed to be, but had not been, kept. Gapik asked Respondent's workmen's compensation insurance company for a printout of how many claims it had paid, and sent the printout to OSHA.[17]

When Respondent received an unemployment compensation claim, whether to contest it was usually discussed between Halper, Kramer, and Kearney. On occasion, Respondent would merely forward the claim notice to the Gibbens Company, a professional organization hired by Respondent to handle unemployment compensation claims, and leave the matter up to it. Halper would either tell Gapik to put a particular unemployment compensation claim notice into the personnel file, or (if Respondent was responding to the notice) tell her how to respond. On an undisclosed date after November 1981, after both Kearney and Kramer refused to attend a hearing on a particular employee's unemployment compensation claim, Halper said to Gapik, "You are the bookkeeper, take care of this." Kearney told her how the employee had been terminated and what to say. At the hearing, Gapik appeared as Respondent's representative and repeated what Kearney had told her—namely, that the employee had been fired for refusing to work on some new equipment. His claim was denied for 6 weeks. This was the only occasion on which Gapik ever performed such an unemployment compensation function.

In June 1982 an auditor from the wage and hour division of the United States Department of Labor came to Respondent's plant. After going through the payroll records, he asked her whether anyone was being paid cash and how hourly paid employees were paid for Saturday work. No other clerical personnel were involved in this audit. Her participation took about 20 minutes. This audit did not result in any charges against Respondent.

On an undisclosed 1982 date before Gapik's separation in mid-August, Respondent underwent a sales-tax audit by the Illinois Department of Revenue. At the request of Respondent's accountant, Gapik pulled from Respondent's files some invoices for a 3-year period. When the state auditor came in, Respondent's accountant worked with him, inferentially with the assistance of the retrieved invoices.

As previously noted, after 11 a.m. on Friday, July 9, 1982, Gapik was asked to prepare a seniority list to be used in determining which employees were to be included in a layoff announced about noon on Monday, July 12. This was the only occasion on which a seniority list was ever prepared for this purpose. When layoffs were effected, she typed up, "whenever she could get to it," a list of employees to be laid off. The layoff list was posted immediately after she typed it. She had nothing to do with choosing which employees would be selected for layoff.

Gapik occasionally picked up mail from Respondent's post office box. Halper credibly testified that she gave the mail to him unopened, and that he returned it to her after he had removed "confidential" letters, which he did not show her. He went on to testify that by "confidential" letters, he meant "Correspondence between our corporate attorneys and myself that were of a private nature, concerning labor negotiations, things like that that [Kramer] was working on immediately or financial statements due to the commodities and trade, I would keep that all myself."

Halper testified that current labor relations files that he was working on "right away," were kept in his desk, and that files that he did not need immediately or on "something which is done" are kept in the "general file" in the main office. He went on to testify that when a new file was to be set up, he asked, "The bookkeeper, whoever was in charge" to set it up. His testimony is somewhat vague about who inserted material into the labor relations files, but he testified, in effect, that he did not do this himself because he did not know exactly where in the main office these files were kept. Gapik testified that Halper maintained the labor relations files and kept them in his office, that she had nothing to do with them, and that she never saw the correspondence file concerning negotiations. In view of her uncontradicted testimony that when Halper sent materials to Respondent's labor counsel, Halper inserted the material into the envelopes that she addressed; in view of Halper's testimony that he did not permit her to see "confidential" incoming correspondence; and for demeanor reasons, I credit Gapik.

Halper decided on the substance of Respondent's bargaining proposals and represented Respondent during bargaining negotiations. Gapik never sat in on negotiations. Laying to one side Halper's comments when leaving the conference room in February or March 1982 and his June 1982 remarks about the Union's allegedly stupid representatives, she was never (so far as the record shows) in hearing distance of intramanagement discussions about negotiating strategy. The record suggests that most of the typing in connection with Respondent's 1982 negotiations was performed by secretaries employed by Respondent's counsel. Gapik never typed any notes, minutes, or correspondence in connection with bargaining negotiations. However, Halper testified that in February 1982, Gapik typed Respondent's initial proposal to the Union (headed "Crest Mark Packing Co.") from his handwritten notes so that he could show the proposal to Respondent's counsel before giving it to the Union. Halper further testified that Gapik typed a wage proposal (R. Exh. 8) that Respondent submitted to the Union in July 1982; but that she typed no other proposals that Respondent used during the negotiations. So far as relevant here, Respondent's initial proposal consists of Respondent's Exhibit 2 and Respondent's Exhibit 4.[18] On rebuttal, when the General Counsel showed her these three exhibits and asked her whether she had typed "any" of them, she said yes. I accept Halper's testimony that she typed these two proposals by Respondent notwithstanding her testimony elsewhere that she typed only Momence Packing bargaining proposals. An exhibit-folder copy of Respondent's initial proposal consists of material typed by Gapik plus various notations written by Halper during negotiations. At least two of these notations might suggest, to someone acquainted with prior negotiations, what positions Respondent planned to take during future negotiations.[19] Halper testified that it was his practice to take to each bargaining session a xerox of such an annotated copy of Respondent's proposal, and that the xerox was made either by him or by "the bookkeeper or the other secretary."

As previously noted, while Gapik was in Respondent's employ, no clerical personnel were working in Momence Packing Company's office in Momence, and she was training McClory to perform these functions. Gapik set up and maintained the books, and did the billing, for Momence Packing. She typed up two proposals made by Momence Packing to the labor organizations (the Union and a sister local) which represented the Momence Packing employees. The record suggests that Momence Packing did not reach a final agreement until about January 1983, after Gapik's separation. Gapik did not maintain the labor negotiation files from Momence Packing; they were kept by Halper in his office.[20] Halper asked her to keep Momence Packing business confidential. There is no evidence or claim that she failed to do so.

I agree with Respondent that Gapik was a confidential employee. In so finding, I solely rely (1) on the fact that on learning of her betrothal to a unit employee, Halper told her that she was "confidential" (although without any reference or, at least, specific reference, to the duties that afforded her that status under the Act),[21] and (2) on her conduct in typing contract proposals, which Respondent thereafter tendered to the Union during collective-bargaining negotiations. Reymond Baking Co., 249 NLRB 1100 (1980); see also Associated Day Care Services, 269 NLRB 178 (1984). No different result is suggested by Postal Service, 232 NLRB 556, 558 (1977), cited by the General Counsel; that case does not indicate that the "merit evaluations and other personnel documents" typed by the employees in question were in other than their final form. See Associated Day Care Services, supra. Although there is no evidence that Gapik typed up any contract proposals for Respondent at any other time, neither is there any evidence that Respondent engaged in contract negotiations at any other time while she was working for it.[22]

I need not and do not determine whether Gapik's conduct in typing employer contract proposals with respect to the Momence facility, which is owned and operated by a corporation other than Respondent, is relevant to determining whether she was a confidential employee with respect to Respondent, her own employer. Cf. Kleinberg, Kaplan, Wolff, Cohen & Burrows, P.C., 253 NLRB 450, 457 (1980). In this connection, I note that she was performing this function merely until Momence Packing acquired a trained clerical force of its own. Cf. Swift & Co., 129 NLRB 1391, 1393 (1961); NLRB v. Allied Products Corp., 545 F.2d 644, 650 (6th Cir. 1977).

2. Whether Gapik was an employee within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act

Respondent contends that confidential employees are not employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act for any purpose. Respondent cites Peerless of America v. NLRB., 484 F.2d 1108, 1112 (7th Cir. 1973);[23] NLRB v. Wheeling Electric Co., 444 F.2d 783, 788 (4th Cir. 1971); and the dissenting opinion in NLRB v. Hendricks County Rural Electric Corp., 454 U.S. 170, 197–198 (1981). However, the Hendricks County majority declined to rule on this issue (454 U.S. at 186–187 fn. 19). Nor has the Board abandoned its position that confidential employees are employees within the meaning of Section 2(3). See, e.g., Intermountain Rural Electric Assn., 253 NLRB 1153, 1165–1166 fn. 20 (1981), remanded 732 F.2d 754 (10th Cir. 1984); see also NLRB v. Greyhound Lines, 426 F.2d 1299, 1301 (5th Cir. 1970); NLRB v. Poultrymen's Service Corp., 138 F.2d 204, 210 (3d Cir. 1943); Sure-Tan, Inc. v. NLRB, 467 U.S. 883 (1984). Accordingly, I am bound by the Board's view of the law. Ford Motor Co., 230 NLRB 716, 717–718 (1977), enfd. 571 F.2d 993, 996–997 (7th Cir. 1978), affd. 441 U.S. 488 (1979).

[18] The typewritten portions of G.C. Exh. 4 and of the first page of R. Exh. 2 are identical.

[19] "O.T. over 40 hours only!!" and "4 yr. K."

[20] This finding is based on her testimony. For the reasons set forth in connection with the labor negotiation files for Respondent, I do not accept Halper's testimony otherwise.

[21] Cf. Ohio State Legal Services Assn., 239 NLRB 594, 599 (1978). Indeed, all the duties on which I rely in finding that she occupied that status were not performed until several months later, and about 3 years after her hire.

[22] The bargaining agreement which expired in 1982 became effective in April 1979. She started working for Respondent in October 1979.

[23] Although the instant case will probably be presented to that court of appeals if the case goes beyond the Board level, this is by no means certain. See J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 388 F.2d 892 (4th Cir. 1967); NLRB v. General Electric Corp., 418 F.2d 736, 739 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 965 (1970); NLRB v. B.V.D. Co., 225 F.2d 923 (D.C. Cir. 1955).

I find that although Gapik was a confidential employee, she was an employee within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act. In this connection, it might be appropriate to point out that the General Counsel contends in substance that Gapik's discharge stemmed from her desire to remain neutral in the labor dispute between Respondent and the Union. This case does not present the question of whether she could have been lawfully discharged for making common cause with the Union (cf. Wheeling, supra) or with an admitted employee (cf. Hendricks County, supra). Further, because the allegedly unlawful remarks shown by the credible evidence constituted deliberate efforts by Respondent to enlist her aid in its dispute with the Union, this case does not present the question of whether her ability to overhear intramanagement discussions about the Union rendered them unlawful (cf. Peerless, supra). Nor, of course, does this case present the question of whether she could properly have been included in a bargaining unit (cf. Hendricks County, supra; Kleinberg, supra, 253 NLRB at 450–451).

3. Whether Respondent's statements to or through Gapik violated Section 8(a)(1)

I disagree with the General Counsel's contention that Respondent violated the Act when Executive Vice President Halper told Gapik that he was locking the men out the following Monday, and when she told this to her husband, pursuant to Halper's instructions. I so find because the record fails to show that such a lockout, if effected, would have violated the Act. See Darling & Co., 171 NLRB 801 (1968), affd. 418 F.2d 1208 (D.C. Cir. 1969).[24]

However, and in view of my finding that Gapik was an employee within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act, I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when (1) Halper told her that if any of the active employees struck, he would see to it that the employees on layoff status (who included her husband) would stop receiving unemployment compensation;[25] (2) he told her that if the employees struck, he would see to it that none of the employees (or, at least, none of the Polish employees, who included her husband) ever worked in the meat industry again; and (3) General Manager Kramer said to Meat Broker Lowry, under circumstances when Kramer must have known that Gapik could overhear him and likely intended her to do so, that Respondent had solicited other businesses not to hire Respondent's employees if they went on strike. While it is true that the laid-off employees were receiving unemployment compensation from the State of Illinois rather than from Respondent, Respondent has made no showing that a genuine material issue of fact or law would be presented by a claim that employees on layoff status lost their right to continued unemployment compensation payments by virtue of a strike subsequent to their layoff. Cf. Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731 (1983). Moreover, because Halper instructed Gapik to tell her husband (admittedly an employee) about Halper's remarks, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) when she complied with these instructions, whether or not she was herself an employee. Indian Head Lubricants, 261 NLRB 12, 18 (1982).[26]

In addition, and regardless of whether Gapik was a statutory employee, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) when, pursuant to instructions issued by Halper for the purpose of procuring unit employees' receptivity to Respondent's proposals, she told employee Kopinski that Halper was an intelligent man who thought that Respondent's pension and insurance plan could be good for the workers, and asked whether Kopinski understood the proposals. From the fact that Respondent and the Union had at all relevant times been either parties to or negotiating for a bargaining agreement, I conclude that the Union was the employees' statutory bargaining representative. The Union's status as such exacted from Respondent the negative duty to refrain from dealing with unit employees. Medo Photo Corp. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 678, 683–695 (1944); General Electric, supra, 418 F.2d at 755; Ross Crane Rental Corp., 267 NLRB 415 (1983). Although Union Steward Kopinski was one of the Union's employee bargaining representatives, Halper's comment that Kopinski must be afraid to go against the Union shows that Mrs. Gapik was being directed to (as she did) address him as a unit employee and a friend, rather than in his official capacity; and in the absence of the Union's professional and other employee negotiators. Although Kopinski testified that he had no idea whether she was then speaking her own mind, Respondent's conduct was unlawful even assuming that Kopinski believed Gapik had approached him entirely of her own volition, and that he had no suspicion she was acting on the instructions of Halper, who was her immediate supervisor and one of Respondent's bargaining representatives. Whether employee Kopinski knew it or not, Respondent was in fact trying to undermine employee support for the Union's present bargaining position about pensions and insurance. Such employer efforts might even be more successful if they seemingly proceeded solely from another employee's friendship and from a wife's natural concern about her husband's fringe benefits. Moreover, in view of my finding that Gapik was a statutory employee, I find that Respondent violated the Act when Halper told her to make such statements to her husband (a unit employee) and Kopinski. Enterprise Products, supra, 265 NLRB at 548; Texaco, supra, 700 F.2d at 1043.[27]

[24] The complaint does not allege that Respondent violated the Act by instructing Mrs. Gapik to convey this message to her husband. Cf. Texaco Oil Co. v. NLRB, 700 F.2d 1039, 1043 (5th Cir. 1983).

[25] See Texaco Oil Co., 259 NLRB 408 (1981), enfd. 700 F.2d 1039 (5th Cir. 1983). The complaint does not allege that Respondent violated the Act by telling her, expressly or impliedly, to tell employees, directly or indirectly, about part or all of what Halper told her on this occasion. Cf. Texaco, supra, 700 F.2d at 1043; Enterprise Products Co., 265 NLRB 544, 548 (1982).

[26] The General Counsel stated at the outset of the hearing that he was proceeding on the theory that the Respondent was answerable for Gapik's remarks because it had directed her to convey these messages to admitted statutory employees.

[27] The complaint alleges that Respondent "acting through Joseph Halper, directed an employee to speak to bargaining unit employees against the Union's bargaining proposals and in support of Respondent's bargaining proposals," in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) (pars. V,(a),VII). Both

4. Whether Gapik's discharge violated the Act

During Gapik's last day of active employment, she told Plant Manager Kearney about Halper's unlawful June 4 instructions to talk to unit personnel about Respondent's insurance and pension proposals; about Halper's early July instructions to her to tell her husband about Halper's alleged lockout plans; about Halper's unlawful August 9 statements that if the active employees struck, he would see to it that the employees on layoff status would stop receiving unemployment compensation and that none of the employees (or, at least, none of the Polish employees) would ever work in the meat industry again; and about Halper's concomitant efforts to induce her to get her husband to campaign against a strike. She went on to tell Kearney that she had been asked to relay to the men certain things about the Union, that she was disgusted about the whole situation, that she was being put in the middle of the problems between the Union and Respondent, that these problems were none of her business, that she was tired of being harassed verbally, that she had been insulted and degraded, that she could no longer concentrate on her work, that she was constantly being pulled away from her work and told "different things," and that if this conduct did not stop, the following Friday was going to be her last day. At this time, she said that she would wait for Halper's return in order to talk to him about the matter. However, later that day, General Manager Kramer told Meat Broker Lowry, in a conversation that was unlawful because Kramer knew Gapik could overhear him, that Respondent was trying to induce other employers not to hire Respondent's employees if they went out on strike. Inferentially, she concluded from Kramer's loud and boisterous tones that he intended her to overhear this conversation and to relay it to her employee husband, at least, and perhaps to other employees as well. At this point, Mrs. Gapik told Kearney about Kramer's remarks, said that she was going home, and asked Kearney to speak to Halper about the matter. Later that day, Kearney reported Gapik's statements to Halper, who instructed Kearney to tell her immediately that her services were no longer needed. Kearney promptly conveyed this message to Gapik. Three days later, he told her husband that she had been fired.

I agree with the General Counsel that Gapik's termination violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Her Section 7 rights as an employee included the right to remain neutral in the dispute between Respondent and the Union over the terms to be included in the bargaining agreement under negotiation and, a fortiori, to refrain from unfair labor practices in connection with that dispute.[28] The foregoing sequence of events shows that Halper discharged her because he had learned from Kearney that she intended to exercise these rights.

Moreover, I agree with the General Counsel that Gapik's termination violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act even assuming that her status as a confidential employee wholly removed her from the protection of the Act. Although supervisors are specifically excluded from the protection of the statute (see Secs. 2(3) and 14(a)), the statute nonetheless forbids their discharge for refusing to commit unfair labor practices. Such a prohibition stems from the need to vindicate the employees' exercise of their Section 7 rights. Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402, 402–403 (1982), affd. sub nom. Food & Commercial Workers Local 1095 v. NLRB, 711 F.2d 383 (D.C. Cir. 1983), and cases cited. I perceive no reason why excluding confidential employees from the protection of the statute would call for a different rule with respect to them. I infer that the reasons for Gapik's discharge were known to her employee husband, at the very least.[29] In any event, under the circumstances of this case, I conclude that such employee knowledge would not be an essential element of the offense. The principle that an employer may not lawfully discharge a supervisor for refusing to commit unfair labor practices protects rank-and-file employees by permitting their supervisors to respect the employees' statutory rights without fear of reprisal. Frenchy's K & T, 263 NLRB 45, 47 (1982). If employers are allowed to force supervisors to engage in unfair labor practices, this necessarily results in direct interference with the affected rank-and-file employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. Howard Johnson Co. v. NLRB, 702 F.2d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 1983), and cases cited; Gerry's I.G.A., 238 NLRB 1141, 1151 (1978), enfd. 602 F.2d 1021, 1023 (1st Cir. 1979). I perceive no reason for a different rule with respect to persons held unprotected by the Act on the ground that they are confidential employees. Employee ignorance of the reason for Gapik's discharge could not affect either Respondent's ability to resume unfair labor practices through a more tractable replacement, the willingness of that replacement (lest she suffer Gapik's fate) to engage in the unlawful conduct that Gapik had eventually abjured, or the likely impact of her successor's unlawful conduct on employees. A requirement that rank-and-file employees know the reasons for such an unlawful discharge would be particularly inappropriate where, as here, the employer's unfair labor practices sought to be committed through the confidential employee may have been rendered more effective by concealment from admitted rank-and-file employees of the fact that such conduct had proceeded from the employer's instructions. See Belcher Towing Co. v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 88, 91–92 fn. 4 (5th Cir. 1980); Elder-Beerman Stores Corp., 173 NLRB 566 (1968), enfd. 415 F.2d 1375 (6th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 1009 (1970); GTE Automatic Electric, 204 NLRB 716, 722, 738–739 (1973). Contra: Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 551 F.2d 306 (4th Cir. 1977), relied on by Respondent.

I am aware that Gapik's complaints to Kearney, who (inferentially) relayed them to Halper, included complaints that likely did not constitute Section 7 activity, about alleged employer conduct that likely would not have constituted violations of the National Labor Rela-briefs treat this allegation as including an allegation that Gapik's comments to Kopinski constituted an 8(a)(1) violation by Respondent (G.C. Br. 33, R. Br. 24).

[28] Texaco, supra, 700 F.2d at 1043; Longshoremen ILA Local 31 (U.S. Borax), 223 NLRB 1257, 1261 (1976), enfd. 549 F.2d 698 (9th Cir. 1977).

[29] She credibly testified that she would talk to him about "something bothering me with my job," and that she discussed with him "the problems that I was having as far as being put in the middle of the union negotiations between Crest Mark and the Union."

tions Act.[30] However, Respondent has failed to show that its treatment of Gapik would have been the same if her statements to Kearney had been limited to such matters. See NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

I find without merit Respondent's contention that even assuming (as I have found) that Gapik's August 10 discharge was an unfair labor practice, she should not be afforded a reinstatement remedy, or any backpay after Friday, August 13, because she told Kearney on the morning of August 10 that the following Friday would be her last day if Respondent did not stop its unfair labor practices. In the first place, by discharging her immediately, Respondent deprived her of the opportunity to change her mind. Because her immediate discharge was unlawful, doubts about whether she would have adhered to her decision should be resolved against Respondent. Transportation Management, supra.[31] Moreover, if she had changed her mind before actually quitting, Respondent could not lawfully have refused to let her rescind, because of her refusal to continue enduring or engaging in unfair labor practices, any quit notice which she may have given. See Sycor, Inc., 223 NLRB 1091, 1092 (1976); DeQueen General Hospital, 264 NLRB 480, 490–491 (1981). Furthermore, because Gapik told Kearney on August 10 that she would not quit at all if Respondent stopped its unlawful conduct, Respondent is in a singularly poor position to contend that on August 11–13 it would have continued its unlawful conduct and, therefore, that it is now entitled to the financial benefits of a determination that she would have quit on August 13. See Remodeling by Oltmanns, 263 NLRB 1152, 1161–1162 (1982), enfd. 719 F.2d 1420 (8th Cir. 1983).

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Patricia Gapik was a confidential employee at all relevant times.

4. Patricia Gapik was at all relevant times an employee within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act.

5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act:

a. When Supervisor Joseph Halper told employee Patricia Gapik that if any of the active employees struck, he would see to it that the employees on layoff status (who included her husband, employee Zbigniew Gapik) would stop receiving unemployment compensation.

b. When Patricia Gapik so advised employee Zbigniew Gapik, pursuant to Supervisor Halper's instructions.

c. When Supervisor Halper told employee Patricia Gapik that if the employees struck, he would see to it that none of the employees (or, at least, none of the Polish employees, who included her husband, employee Zbigniew Gapik) ever worked in the meat industry again.

d. When Patricia Gapik so advised employee Zbigniew Gapik, pursuant to Supervisor Halper's instructions.

e. When Supervisor Edward Kramer told Meat Broker Timothy Lowry, under circumstances when Kramer knew that employee Patricia Gapik could overhear him, that Respondent had solicited other businesses not to hire Respondent's employees if they went on strike.

f. When Patricia Gapik, pursuant to instructions issued by Supervisor Halper for the purpose of procuring unit employees' receptivity to Respondent's bargaining position, told employee John Kopinski that Halper was an intelligent man who thought that Respondent's pension and insurance proposals would be good for the workers, and asked whether Kopinski understood these proposals.

g. When Supervisor Halper instructed employee Patricia Gapik to make such statements to employees John Kopinski and Zbigniew Gapik.

6. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Patricia Gapik.

7. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by discharging employee Patricia Gapik.

8. The unfair labor practices set forth in Conclusions of Law 5–7 affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.

9. Respondent has not violated the Act by threatening to lock out employees.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has violated the Act in certain respects, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom and from like or related conduct, and to take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Affirmatively, Respondent will be required to offer Patricia Gapik immediate reinstatement to the job of which she was unlawfully deprived or, if such a job no longer exists, a substantially equivalent job, and make her whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered by reason of her discharge, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1959), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231

[30] Gapik testified without contradiction that Halper had rejected her prior complaints about the male bookkeeper's remarks to her of a sexual nature, and (with some corroboration from Halper) about a salary differential between her and the male bookkeeper allegedly based on sex. In addition, her EEOC charges contain certain allegations, regarding management's ethnic and sexual slurs, as to which there is no other evidence in the instant record.

Notwithstanding Halper's and Kearney's denials that Kearney reported to Halper Gapik's March or April 1982 contacts with a Government "labor department" about breaks and "verbal harassment," and Halper's credible testimony that it was he alone who decided on Gapik's discharge, Respondent's brief states (Br. 29) that "Crest Mark knew of Mrs. Gapik's inquiries to the Department of Labor." Cf. Jackson Sportswear Corp., 211 NLRB 891, 902 and cases cited in fn. 47 (1974). Because I see no reason to suppose that such inquiries had anything to do with her discharge, I need not and do not determine whether they were protected by Section 7. Citing, inter alia, Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984), Respondent alleges that they were not. Respondent has not addressed the question of whether her inquiries about breaks were afforded statutory protection, even though Kearney was not an employee within the meaning of Sec. 2(3), because he asked her to make such inquiries in order to obtain a lunchbreak for himself as well as her.

[31] Indeed, her testimony suggests that because she was the only full-time employee who knew how to close the July books for Respondent and Momence Packing, she would have remained on the job until she completed that task, which would have taken her until at least August 20.

NLRB 651 (1977).[32] I find that such relief would be appropriate if her discharge violated only Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See the cases cited in Parker-Robb, supra, 262 NLRB at 403 fn. 7. Also, Respondent will be required to remove from its files any reference to Patricia Gapik's discharge, and notify her in writing that this has been done and that evidence of her unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against her. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

In addition, Respondent will be required to post appropriate notices. Because some of Respondent's employees speak Spanish or Polish as a native language and understand little or no English, notices will be required in all three languages.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[33]

ORDER

The Respondent, Crest Mark Packing Co., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Telling employees that if any of the active employees struck, Respondent would see to it that the employees on layoff status would stop receiving unemployment compensation.

(b) Telling employees that if the employees struck, Respondent would see to it that none of them ever worked in the meat industry again.

(c) Telling employees that Respondent has solicited other businesses not to hire Respondent's employees if they went on strike.

(d) Seeking to bargain directly with employees, at a time when Respondent is under a duty to bargain with a labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of such employees.

(e) Telling employees to engage, on Respondent's behalf, in the kind of conduct described in paragraph 1(d).

(f) Discharging personnel for refusing to commit unfair labor practices against employees.

(g) Discharging any employee, or otherwise discriminating against any employee with regard to his hire or tenure of employment or any other term or condition of employment, to discourage membership in the Beef & Sausage Makers Union Local 100-A of the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, or any other labor organization.

(h) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Patricia Gapik reinstatement to the job that she was unlawfully deprived or, if such a job no longer exists, a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of pay she may have suffered by reason of her unlawful discharge, in conformity with the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to Patricia Gapik's unlawful discharge, and notify her in writing that this has been done and that evidence of that discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against her.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Chicago, Illinois facility copies in English, Polish, and Spanish of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[34] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that paragraph V(b) of the complaint be dismissed.

[32] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[33] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[34] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 8 August 1986 Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Giannasi issued the attached decision. The Respondent Union filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

[1] The Respondent Union's request that the Board reverse the judge and grant the Respondent Employer's motion that the General Counsel submit exculpatory evidence to the judge is denied. See Nueva Engineering, 269 NLRB 999, 1005 (1984), enfd. 761 F.2d 961, 969 (4th Cir. 1985).

[2] The Respondent Union has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] In par. 4 of his Conclusions of Law, the judge inadvertently stated that the Respondent Union violated Sec. 8(a)(2) of the Act, rather than Sec. 8(b)(2). We correct the error.

[4] In par. B,1(a) of his recommended Order, the judge recommended that the Respondent Union be ordered to cease accepting recognition from and executing a collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent Employer when the Respondent Employer does not employ a representative number of its ultimate complement of unit employees and before it is engaged in normal business operations. In her exceptions, the General Counsel contends that the Respondent Union should be directed to cease and desist from accepting recognition as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of any employees of the Respondent Employer unless and until it has been so certified by the Board. We agree and shall modify the Order accordingly.

The General Counsel also contends that the judge erred in failing to order the Respondent Union to disclaim recognition as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of any employees of the Respondent Employer unless and until it has been so certified by the Board. We shall modify the judge's recommended Order to include such affirmative relief and shall issue a new notice to members.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent Employer, A.M.A. Leasing Ltd., Bensenville and Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, and the Respondent Union, Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707, Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph B,1(a).

"(a) Accepting recognition as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of any employees of the Respondent Employer unless and until it has been so certified by the National Labor Relations Board."

2. Insert the following as paragraph B,2(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(b) Disclaim recognition as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of any employees of the Respondent Employer unless and until it has been so certified by the National Labor Relations Board."3. Substitute the attached Appendix B for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX B

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT accept recognition as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of any employees of A.M.A. Leasing, Ltd. unless and until we have been so certified by the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT give effect to the 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement between A.M.A. Leasing, Ltd. and us or to any extension, renewal, or modification thereof.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act except to the extent that such rights may be affected by an agreement, as authorized in Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

WE WILL, jointly and severally with A.M.A. Leasing, Ltd., reimburse with interest all present and former employees of A.M.A. for all initiation fees and dues paid by them or withheld from them pursuant to the union-security clause and the dues-checkoff clause of the 15 August 1984 contract. However, reimbursement will not extend to those employees who voluntarily joined Local 707 before 15 August 1984.

WE WILL disclaim recognition as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of any employees of A.M.A. Leasing, Ltd. unless and until we have been so certified by the National Labor Relations Board.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GIANNASI, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried for 5 days in December 1985 and January 1986 in Chicago, Illinois. The complaint alleges that the Respondent Employer A.M.A. Leasing, Ltd. (AMA) and Respondent Union Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707 (Local 707, collectively the Respondents) violated the National Labor Relations Act. More specifically, the complaint alleges that AMA violated Section 8(a)(1) by preventing employees from engaging in union activities on behalf of Charging Party Union Beef Boners & Sausage Makers Union Local 100-A, United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC (Local 100) and Section 8(b)(2) and (1) by rendering aid, assistance, and support to Local 707, by soliciting and distributing Local 707 authorization cards to employees, by permitting Local 707 agents to use its facility to solicit authorizations, and by deducting dues from employee wages and remitting them to Local 707 in the absence of employee authorizations. The complaint also alleges that AMA violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) and Local 707 violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) when they agreed that AMA would recognize Local 707 and when they entered into a collective-bargaining agreement because, at those times, Local 707 did not have the support of an uncoerced majority of AMA employees and, alternatively, because AMA was not engaged in normal business operations and had not yet employed a substantial and representative complement of employees. Because the parties' collective-bargaining agreement contained a union-security clause requiring union membership after a certain date, the complaint also alleges that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act. The Respondents deny the substantive allegations of the complaint. I have received briefs from all the parties and a reply brief from the General Counsel. I have read and considered all the briefs.

On the entire record, including the testimony of the witnesses and my observation of their demeanor while testifying, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

AMA, an Illinois corporation with offices in Bensenville, Illinois, is engaged in the meat processing business at the so-called Donna Packing facility or plant at 225 North Green Street, Chicago, Illinois. During a representative 1-year period, AMA has, in the course of its business operations, performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for enterprises located outside the State of Illinois and performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for enterprises located within the State of Illinois, which are directly engaged in interstate commerce. Accordingly, I find that Respondent AMA is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Respondent Local 707 and Charging Party Local 100 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

On 9 July 1984 AMA entered into an agreement with a wholly owned subsidiary of Dominick's Finer Foods, Inc. to provide an employee work force to break, cut, and process meat at a facility on 225 North Green Street, Chicago, Illinois, known as Donna's plant. Dominick's agreed to pay AMA an amount to cover employee wages, taxes, and fringe benefits, as well as a management fee and a service charge. The contract states that effective 1 August 1984, AMA is to be paid a service charge of $10 per week per employee. For any workweek in which 26 to 40 employees are actively at work, the service charge is set at $9 per employee and when more than 40 employees are working the service charge becomes $8 per employee. The contract, which specifically states that Dominick's is not to be considered the employer of these employees, continues in effect until 31 July 1987.

The facility manned by AMA is located in an area—the Fulton Street area of Chicago—which houses many meatpacking plants. Both Local 707 and Local 100 represent employees in these plants. It appears that these two unions actively compete for the representation of employees in the packing industry in this particular area. Donna's plant is located next door to a meatpacking house operated by a company called Nationwide. Until sometime in 1983 Nationwide also operated Donna's plant as a meat packing facility. Nationwide's employees were and are presently represented by Local 100.

One of Nationwide's employees and a Local 100 member, Tirbucio "Butch" Trevino, was hired by AMA in a supervisory position. His initial responsibilities included supervising the cleaning, painting, and refurbishing of Donna's plant—which had been unused for about a year—in order to pass a United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) inspection and obtain a certificate to process meat. Trevino, who obtained a withdrawal card from Local 100, began hiring employees in late July 1984. According to Trevino, word of the reopening of Donna's plant was well known in the packinghouse area and he was able to hire applicants basically off the street.

By 30 July, Trevino had hired between 12 and 15 employees essentially to clean up the facility. The employees, most of whom had no meatcutting experience, were told they would have jobs after the plant became operational, that is, when meat arrived, but most were not told what particular job they would have. The employees continued to do essentially cleanup work until mid-September. On 14 September 1984 the USDA finally approved the facility for meat processing with an inauguration of service date of 17 September 1984.

On 30 July 1984 Local 707 Business Agent Al Polk approached Isaac Sanchez, who had been hired that day by AMA. Polk and Sanchez, who had formerly been a Local 707 steward at another packing plant,[1] met on the street outside Donna's plant. Polk asked Sanchez to sign a union authorization card and to help organize the AMA employees. Sanchez signed a card and agreed to help organize the employees. Polk signed up seven other employees at this time. Polk also gave some blank cards to Sanchez and another employee, Vince Gaglione. Sanchez testified that he "helped" several employees fill out their cards and returned them to Polk. Gaglione also solicited several employees who thereafter signed Local 707 authorization cards.

The record shows that for the pay period ending 4 August 1984, AMA employed 13 people, and for the pay period ending 11 August 1984, AMA employed 15 people. The record shows that 8 out of the 13 employees as of 4 August had signed union authorization cards and 10 of the 15 employees as of 11 August had signed cards.

However, out of the eight employees who signed cards as of 4 August, two, Depcik and Renteria, testified to circumstances which the General Counsel alleges call into question their authorizations. They both signed authorization cards on 30 July—their first day of work. They are still employed at AMA and they testified that Supervisor Butch Trevino told them to sign authorization cards for Local 707 and sent them to another portion of the plant where Al Polk was having employees sign cards. Although I believe Depcik and Renteria were honest witnesses striving to tell the truth, their testimony on this issue is not reliable. I believe they confused the signing of their authorization cards on 30 July with the subsequent signing of insurance cards, which contained a union membership and authorization statement. It is uncontested that many employees signed such insurance cards at the plant on 25 September 1984 and that Al Polk supervised the signing of cards at this time. Renteria testified that the Trevino instructions were given 2 or 3 weeks after he began working; obviously this could not have referred to his authorization card signing, which took place on his first day of work. Depcik testified that Polk, Sanchez, and another Spanish-speaking person from Local 707 had insurance cards spread on a table inside the facility. Clearly Depcik was likewise referring to the 25 September meeting when Local 707 officials were getting employees to sign insurance cards. In these circumstances, I cannot accept the testimony of Depcik and Renteria that Trevino directed them to sign union authorization cards on 30 July.

Two other employees—Gross and Vanisi—testified that, at various times in August 1984, Trevino actually distributed Local 707 authorization cards to employees and directed that they be signed. Gross testified that shortly after he began working at Donna's plant, Trevino gave him a Local 707 authorization card and asked him to sign it and return it to him. Trevino also said that Local 707 was going to be the union and that he should not talk to the people from Local 100. Gross also testified that he saw Trevino hand out cards to other employees. Vanisi testified that some time in August he asked Trevino for a Local 707 union authorization card because he thought an earlier one he had signed had been lost. Trevino gave him a blank card; Vanisi signed it and gave it back to Trevino. Two weeks later, Vanisi asked if he were in the Union because he noticed that no dues were being deducted from his pay. Trevino gave him another card and told him to give it back to him. Trevino denied having any conversation about unions with these employees or distributing union authorization cards.

Although the Respondents have strenuously attacked the credibility of Vanisi and Gross, I found these two witnesses believable in the essentials of their testimony. Their testimony was corroborative and survived vigorous cross-examination. Contrary to AMA's contention, there was no evidence elicited that they bore a grudge against AMA despite the fact that they were discharged before the hearing. Nor are their interests any more aligned with a party to this proceeding than is Trevino's interest. I have considered AMA's contention that Gross' pretrial affidavit did not contain certain of Trevino's remarks that Gross mentioned in his testimony. However, there was no material inconsistency shown between Gross' testimony and his pretrial affidavit. Gross candidly testified that he was not asked particular questions about Trevino's remarks by the Board investigators who took his affidavit. Vanisi also was questioned about his pretrial affidavit, but there was no showing of a material inconsistency between his testimony and his affidavit. Vanisi's authorization card, dated 6 August 1984, was received in evidence, but there was no evidence whether this was the card he first signed and believed was lost or a later one obtained from Trevino. Thus, his testimony about Trevino's activity is perfectly compatible with the rest of his testimony. AMA's suggestion that Vanisi and Gross may have been talking about dues-checkoff cards is unsupported by the evidence. Trevino was tightlipped about any union conversations that he may have had. He denied he had any union-related conversations with Vanisi and Gross. This not only undercuts AMA's suggestion, but it also raises questions in my mind about Trevino's candor. I found Trevino a less impressive witness than Vanisi and Gross who clearly and firmly referred to union authorization cards in their testimony. In evaluating the testimony of all three witnesses—particularly their demeanor—I find that Trevino did indeed pass out Local 707 authorization cards. I also find that Trevino told Gross that Local 707 was the incumbent union and that Gross should not talk to representatives of other unions.

[1] Actually, Sanchez had been a steward for Local 100, but the employees thereafter ousted Local 100 and replaced it with Local 707. Sanchez simply shifted union affiliation and retained his job as union steward.

On some indeterminate date in August 1984, Local 100 Business Agent David Speciale, who serviced employees represented by Local 100 in the Fulton Street area, became aware that Donna's plant was gearing up for meatpacking. He had occasion to talk to employee David O'Keefe who was working outside the plant cleaning rails leading into the plant. Speciale was trying to interest O'Keefe in Local 100. Trevino approached them and told O'Keefe not to sign anything "unless I tell you to." O'Keefe continued working and did not speak to Speciale any further. The testimony of Speciale and O'Keefe was mutually corroborative, except that O'Keefe testified that Trevino also said that "everything was taken care of," a remark similar to that Trevino made to Gross. Trevino denied making the statements attributed to him. I credit Speciale and O'Keefe. Neither one's testimony was shaken on cross-examination and they both appeared to me to be honest and reliable witnesses.

On 31 July Local 707 sent a telegram to AMA requesting recognition. The telegram stated that if Local 707 did not receive a response by 3 August it would "exert economic pressure." On 1 August AMA responded by telegram denying the request unless Local 707 demonstrated majority status through "a card check by an independent third party." An undated agreement signed by a Local 707 representative and AMA Vice President Anthony Apa was received into evidence. It authorized the Illinois Department of Labor to conduct a card check of AMA employees as of 7 August 1984 in a specifically defined unit. The agreement provides that should the Department of Labor certify that Local 707 represented a majority of the employees, "AMA shall recognize the Union at once." The agreement continues as follows: "Both parties agree to be bound by the results of this card check, and it is agreed that this shall be the sole method utilized for resolving all questions concerning representation of the employees." The agreement contains an attached list that purports to be that of "AMA/Donna Authorization Cards." The list contains 12 names.[2]

On 7 August 1984 the Illinois State Department of Labor sent a letter to Local 707 and AMA stating that it had made a cross check of Local 707 authorization cards against AMA's current payroll and certifying Local 707 as the bargaining representative of the AMA employees. The letter stated that, of 16 eligible employees on the payroll as of 7 August, 12 had signed authorization cards for Local 707.[3]

Thereafter, Local 707 and AMA entered into negotiations and signed a collective-bargaining agreement, a copy of which was entered into evidence. Also, thereafter, Local 707 representatives met with employees at the plant, on one occasion to ratify the agreement, and on another to have them sign insurance cards and dues-checkoff authorizations. The General Counsel asserts that recognition was accorded on 7 August 1984 and the agreement was signed on 15 August 1984. The Respondents suggest that recognition was really accorded on 24 September 1984 and the agreement was signed on 8 October 1984. The General Counsel asserts that the ratification meeting was held the week before meat arrived at the plant and that both that meeting and the insurance and dues checkoff card meeting occurred after the contract was signed. The Respondents' theory is that there were two ratification meetings after meat arrived at the plant and that the insurance and dues-checkoff card meeting occurred 1 day after recognition and 2 weeks before the contract was signed. Based on my assessment of the documentary evidence, the plausibility of each position, and the reliability and demeanor of the witnesses on these issues, I agree with the General Counsel.

It is fairly clear that on 25 September 1984 representatives of Local 707 came to the plant to sign up employees for Local 707's insurance program. At this point, according to the Respondents' witnesses, the parties had agreed orally at least to the insurance provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement. Documentary evidence reveals that many employees signed such insurance cards on 25 September and that those cards also contained a provision for membership in Local 707, and authorization of Local 707 as bargaining representative. According to Polk, he also had some employees sign dues-checkoff authorization cards at this time, implying that a union-security and dues-checkoff agreement had also been concluded.

A number of employees testified credibly and in a way that was mutually corroborative that the week before meat arrived at the plant—which all parties agreed was 17 September 1984, Al Polk came to the plant to talk to employees to explain the contract he had negotiated with AMA. He asked for a show of hands to reflect acceptance of the contract and the employees in effect ratified the contract. The employees testified that Trevino asked them to attend the meeting, which was on worktime, and he was present during the entire meeting. One employee even testified that he was scheduled to begin work on Monday when the meat was to arrive, but he was called at home by Trevino and asked to attend this meeting. The employees had no prior knowledge of or imput in any negotiations and had no role in selecting Sanchez as their steward, a selection which was apparently made by Polk and announced to Trevino. Although these employees understandably were not consistent in all details,

[2] This apparently constituted the entire work force as of 7 August. Employees Gross, Lucente, and O'Keefe were placed on the payroll as of the week ending 11 August, but it is unclear when exactly they started work. The record reveals that Gross and Lucente signed authorization cards on 25 September. The record is unclear when O'Keefe signed an authorization card.

[3] The Department of Labor apparently counted Butch Trevino as one of the employees in the unit.

their testimony about the meeting was essentially credible and reliable.

In contrast, Polk and Sanchez testified that there were two ratification meetings at the plant, one in which the employees rejected a proposed contract and another in which the employees accepted the contract. Both Polk and Sanchez were vague both as to the [illegible] of these meetings and their contents, although presumably they meant to place the meetings after the 25 September meeting at which insurance cards and dues-checkoff authorizations were signed. Trevino testified to only one ratification meeting, which he placed in "around October." I reject the testimony of Trevino, Polk, and Sanchez to the extent that it conflicts with that of the employee witnesses. Significantly, the Respondents failed to call as witnesses on this point any employees other than Sanchez—who was, after all, a Local 707 steward. Not only was the testimony of Polk and Sanchez inconsistent with that of Trevino about the number of ratification meetings, but Sanchez was confused about whether the first ratification meeting was when "we were just starting" or, as he stated in response to a leading question, after the meat arrived. Thus, the Respondents' witnesses were not only vague but inconsistent. I do not accept their testimony on this point and I credit instead the mutually corroborative testimony of employee witnesses.

The testimony of Apa and Polk that recognition was not accorded to Local 707 until 24 September 1984 and that the collective-bargaining agreement was not signed until 8 October 1984 is not persuasive. Their testimony is basically that on 24 September—after an 11 September letter from Polk—Polk was forced to and did demonstrate a new majority as of that date, which Apa accepted. Polk then testified that the next day he went to the plant and had employees sign insurance cards, after obtaining Apa's permission to do so "to expedite our negotiations." Polk also had employees sign dues-checkoff authorization cards on that day. It is implausible that, after having agreed to recognize Local 707 if it demonstrated a card majority to the satisfaction of the Illinois Department of Labor, both Local 707 and AMA would have waited from 7 August to 24 September to effectuate recognition and to 8 October to sign an agreement. In early August, Local 707 had threatened economic action if AMA did not grant immediate recognition and AMA quickly agreed to abide by the card check. The Department of Labor quickly certified Local 707 and, in accordance, with the agreement of the parties recognition followed. The parties demonstrated such ardor when they became engaged and celebrated a wedding in early August that it is hard to believe that their relationship was unconsummated until late September or early October. Apa claims that the hiatus was occasioned by the fact that AMA's work force was expanding at this time and, as a result, he required a new majority showing. However, Apa's testimony in this respect is refuted by documentary evidence that shows no appreciable increase in employees during this period. The 20 September payroll records show the same 15 employees that appeared on the 16 August payroll.

My view is supported by other documentary evidence. Although the signature page of the collective-bargaining agreement entered into evidence was undated, the text states quite clearly that the agreement was "made and entered into this 15th day of August, 1984." In addition, another document entitled "Memorandum of Agreement," which was signed by representatives of Local 707 and AMA on 15 October 1984, states that the parties had "previously entered into a Collective Bargaining Agreement, dated August 15, 1984, covering the employees at the Donna Packing Facility." The purpose of the memorandum was to "reexecute the Collective Bargaining Agreement, because of the expansion of the unit, effective with the signature of the undersigned on this Agreement." Documentary evidence shows that the expansion of the unit occurred in late September and early October. This is consistent with the 15 October memorandum but inconsistent with Apa's testimony that such expansion occurred earlier and was the reason he did not abide by the 7 August certification. Indeed, Apa's denial that he accorded recognition to Local 707 on 7 August not only flies in the face of AMA's agreement with Local 707 and the Illinois Department of Labor but is refuted by Apa's own reliance on such recognition to fend off a subsequent demand for recognition by Local 100. Thus, as I discuss later in this decision, in a 21 November letter, Apa rejected Local 100's request for recognition by stating that Local 707 had been certified by the Illinois Department of Labor on 7 August 1984. A further example of Apa's unreliability as a witness was his reluctance to acknowledge the 21 November letter.

Polk's testimony is, of course, consistent with Apa's and fails for the same reason. In addition, I found quite significant an apparent slip of the tongue by Polk during his testimony. When he was asked by his counsel when the contract was signed, Polk responded, "About the 8 of August." When his counsel then asked, "August or October?", Polk obligingly responded, "I am sorry, October." I believe Polk was right the first time—the parties entered into the contract in early August. Polk's testimony is also difficult to reconcile with the uncontested fact that he went to the plant on 25 September 1985 to obtain insurance cards and dues-checkoff authorizations from employees. If recognition had been accorded the day before, as he testified, it seems highly unlikely that agreement on insurance and dues-checkoff would have been reached so quickly, particularly since, according to Polk, the contract itself was signed on 8 October. Indeed, it is much more likely that the insurance and dues-checkoff cards were signed, after a contract was entered into and after the ratification meeting. I also find it difficult to accept Polk's testimony that when he and Apa bargained on 24 and 25 September they exchanged written proposals. No written proposals were offered in evidence. If such written proposals existed, they undoubtedly would have been offered as they would have shed light on important contested issues in this case. Finally, in view of my rejection of the testimony of Apa and Polk, I place no reliance on two self-serving letters written by Polk—one to AMA dated 11 September and another to the Board's investigator—which allegedly support his position concerning the signing of the contract and granting of recognition.

The Respondents argue that the signed agreement simply was made effective or retroactive to 15 August to protect the employees' seniority. I disagree. If so, the contract would have specifically stated these facts and would have contained a date on the signature page, as the 15 October memorandum clearly does. Indeed, the only reference I could find in the bargaining agreement to retroactive pay was the following statement in the "wage scale" appendix that provided for wage rates as of 15 August for the years 1984, 1985, and 1986: "wages in all classifications shall be retroactive to August 7, 1984 for allemployees employed by AMA Leasing on that date."[4]

Local 707 also alleges that other facts support the Respondents' position: (1) AMA did not commence withholding dues from the wages of its employees until October; (2) a retroactive wage increase was put into effect in October; (3) employees were not enrolled in the insurance plan until 25 September; and (4) the contract was not ratified until September. Although some of these facts may tend to support the Respondents' position, they do not overcome the substantial evidence in support of the General Counsel's position. It is fairly clear that the Respondents did not have any need to implement their contract until the plant opened as a meatpacking facility. Since, at that point, the work force began to expand, it was natural that union representatives would wait until then to enter the plant to explain the contract and implement its terms. The Respondents could not, of course, have implemented the dues-checkoff provision until they obtained authorizations from employees; this took place on 25 September. In view of the contract provision for retroactive wage payments and the sketchy evidence about them in the record, it is difficult to see how the fact that these payments were made in October sheds any light on when the contract was signed. Moreover, the Respondents have not clearly or persuasively shown what kind of retroactive payments were made. Both the testimony and the payroll figures are confusing in this respect. Finally, the facts cited by Local 707 are in no way inconsistent with my findings and, indeed, do nothing to support or rehabilitate Apa and Polk whose testimony refutes the Respondents' position.

In accordance with my credibility determinations and the clear and objective documentary evidence, I find that AMA agreed to recognize Local 707 on 7 August 1984 and entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 707 on 15 August 1984. I also find that Local 707 representatives had only one contract ratification meeting—shortly before the meat arrived at the plant, and that a second meeting between employees and union officials took place on 25 September 1984—after the meat arrived and after a contract was entered into, at which time insurance and dues-checkoff authorization cards were signed by employees.

The bargaining agreement between the parties contains the following union-security clause:

> Section 2—Recognition of Union; Union Shop; Probation
> (b) It shall be a condition of employment that all employees of Employer covered by this agreement who are members of the Union in good standing on the date on which this Agreement is signed shall remain members in good standing, and those who are not members on the date on which this Agreement is signed shall, on the thirtieth (30th) day following the date on which this agreement is signed, become and remain members in good standing in the Union. It shall also be a condition of employment that all employees covered by this Agreement and hired on or after the date on which this Agreement is signed shall, on the thirty-first (31) day following the beginning of such employment, become and remain members in good standing in the Union.

The agreement also provides for the checkoff of union dues:

> Section 3—Check-off
> Whenever any employee covered by this Agreement has executed and delivered to his employer a written assignment for the deduction of Union dues and initiation fees by the Employer from that employee's wages, the Employer agrees to make such deduction and to send the Employer's check for the amount so deducted . . . .

On 25 October 1984, a number of employees met with Local 100 Business Agent Speciale across the street from Donna's plant where he was on a service call. The next day, employee James Anhock went to the Local 100 union hall and obtained a number of blank Local 100 authorization cards. There is no evidence concerning the solicitation of these cards, but it appears that some employees signed cards and gave their support to Local 100.

On 6 November 1984 Local 100, the Charging Party Union, requested recognition as bargaining agent of Respondent AMA's Donna's plant employees. On 21 November 1984 AMA responded, through its president, Michael P. Apa, stating that it was unable to recognize the Charging Party Union because Local 707 was "certified by the Illinois State Department of Labor as the bargaining agent for those employees on August 7, 1984."

B. Discussion and Analysis

1. Incidents of unlawful interference and assistance

I have found that AMA Supervisor "Butch" Trevino distributed authorization cards to employees and solicited them to sign such cards. This conduct constitutes unlawful interference with protected activities of employees and unlawful assistance to Local 707 in violation of Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act. See Mason City Dressed Beef, 231 NLRB 735, 741, 749 (1977); Hillside Bus Corp., 262 NLRB 1254, 1270 (1982). In addition, I have found that Trevino told two employees—Gross and O'Keefe—that Local 707 was the incumbent union and that they should not speak with representatives of Local 100. In [4] The contract also provides that classification rates will be 50 cents below the contract rate for the first 30 days of employment and 25 cents below the contract rate from the 31st through the 90th day of employment.

one instance, Trevino interrupted a conversation between O'Keefe and a representative of the disfavored union. Such conduct constitutes both coercion and unlawful assistance. See Southland Knitwear, Inc., 260 NLRB 642, 655–656 (1982).[5]

2. The alleged unlawful recognition and bargaining agreement

In accordance with my credibility determinations, I find that AMA accorded, and Local 707 accepted, recognition on 7 August 1984. The parties agreed that recognition would follow if the Illinois Department of Labor certified Local 707 as the majority representative as of that date. The Department of Labor did certify Local 707. There is no credible evidence—indeed no documentary evidence at all—that this agreement for recognition upon certification was rescinded or revoked. The parole evidence rule precludes any attempt to alter the plain and unambiguous agreement of the parties. See Precision Anodizing & Plating, 244 NLRB 846, 857 (1979). Indeed, AMA specifically relied on the 7 August certification by the Illinois State Department when it refused to recognize Local 100, a competing labor organization.

In addition, again having resolved conflicting evidence, I find that AMA and Local 707 entered into a collective-bargaining agreement on 15 August 1984. That agreement contained union-security and dues-checkoff provisions.

The remaining question to be resolved is whether, when recognition was granted and when agreement was reached, Local 707 had a valid majority. The General Counsel's rationale in support of the complaint allegation of unlawful recognition is twofold: First, the General Counsel contends that, on 7 August, Local 707's majority was invalid because it was coerced by AMA's unlawful conduct. Alternatively, the General Counsel asserts that recognition was improper because, at that time, AMA was not engaged in normal operations and did not employ a substantial and representative complement of employees.

Regarding the first theory, the General Counsel contends that Trevino's misconduct tainted Local 707's majority showing. I reject this contention. The evidence shows that Local 707 had signed authorizations from 8 of 13 employees as of 4 August and 10 of 15 employees as of 11 August. The Illinois Department of Labor found a clear majority as of 7 August 1984. The General Counsel's evidence identified only two employees as having received cards from Trevino. One, Vanisi, had previously signed a card distributed to him by a fellow employee which he feared had been lost. Union Business Agent Polk and two other employees had distributed cards. Thus, Trevino's card distribution was not shown to have affected Local 707's majority. Moreover, the General Counsel has failed to show that Trevino's statements to Gross and O'Keefe that there already was a union at the plant and that they should not talk to representatives of other unions took place before the 7 August 1984 certification by the Illinois Department of Labor or otherwise affected Local 707's majority as of that date. None of the General Counsel's other evidence, including use of the employer's facility and deduction of dues without authorizations, relates to Local 707's majority status as of 7 August. In these circumstances, I cannot find that Local 707's acknowledged majority status as of 7 August 1984 was coerced or tainted by unlawful employer assistance.[6]

The General Counsel, however, advances an alternative theory, namely, that on 7 August—when AMA recognized Local 707—and on 15 August—when it signed a contract with Local 707, it did so prematurely at a time when it was not engaged in normal operations and had not employed a substantial and representative complement of employees. I agree with the General Counsel's position and, on this theory, I find that there was no lawful authority for the parties to agree to recognition on 7 August 1984 and enter into a collective-bargaining agreement on 15 August 1984.

Hilton Inn Albany, 270 NLRB 1364, 1365 (1984), citing Herman Bros., 264 NLRB 439 (1982) (emphasis added), the Board's test for determining whether allegedly premature recognition has been lawfully extended is > . . . twofold. At the time of recognition (1) an employer must employ a substantial and representative complement of its projected work force, that is, the jobs or job classifications designated for the operation must be substantially filled and (2) the employer must be engaged in normal business operations.

The evidence here is overwhelming that until mid-September at the very earliest AMA was not engaged in normal business operations at Donna's facility. Many employees testified, in a mutually corroborative way, that they did cleanup, painting, and refurbishing work from late July until mid-September. The purpose of this cleanup work was to get the plant operational and ready to pass the USDA inspection. Most employees were not told what their jobs would be once the meat arrived. The meat arrived on 17 September—the date the USDA gave on its certificate as the inauguration date for meat processing. Several employees were specifically hired to report for work when the meat arrived. After the meat arrived, employees wore uniforms, including frocks, gloves, and hats, which they had not worn before. And [5] The General Counsel's two other independent allegations of unlawful assistance—permitting Local 707 agents to use its facility and deducting dues from employee wages without proper authorization—turn essentially on whether the recognition and the bargaining agreement were proper. Because I find the recognition and the bargaining agreement improper, this conduct is likewise unlawful. However, I believe it is unnecessary to make specific findings or provide a specific remedy for this conduct because it is adequately encompassed by the findings and remedy relating to the unlawful recognition and the unlawful bargaining agreement.

[6] The General Counsel asserts, in her brief, that she "need not prove with mathematical certainty that the union lacked majority support at the time of recognition where there is evidence that the employer unlawfully assisted a union's organizational campaign," quoting from Siro Security Service, 247 NLRB 1266, 1271 (1960). However, the General Counsel failed to fully explicate the legal principle involved. In such cases, the trier of fact must assess the "totality of the circumstances" to determine "whether the employer's conduct was sufficiently pervasive to taint the union's majority status." And although the General Counsel's evidence may establish "a prima facie case of non-majority status," that evidence may be rebutted. Id. at 1272.

they no longer performed the kind of cleanup work they did before, although, of course, some did perform normal maintenance duties. Their jobs changed substantially to reflect the meat processing character of the plant. And there is no evidence that prior to 17 September the employees were specifically being trained for meat processing work. Indeed, they were paid substantially less in August than they were in October when the plant was fully operational. Thus, it is clear that until 17 September 1984 AMA was not engaged in normal business operations at Donna's plant.

Although the above finding that AMA was not engaged in normal business operations in August 1984 would alone establish a violation, the evidence also shows that the employee complement at Donna's facility in August 1984 fell far short of a substantial and representative complement. Thus, as of the payroll period ending 11 August, AMA had 15 employees in one job classification. By the payroll period ending 29 September 1984, AMA had 46 employees in three job classifications and by the payroll period ending 15 December 1984, AMA had 47 employees in four classifications. This is, of course, understandable because after the plant began operating as a meat processing facility, AMA began hiring more employees, as the record shows. Indeed, AMA's agreement with Dominick's contemplated that the work force would increase substantially since it provided for different forms of compensation when the work force reached employee levels of over 40. In these circumstances—as well as for other reasons based on the unreliability of his testimony, I reject Michael Apa's rather rambling, self-serving, and uncorroborated testimony that initially he only expected to employ 20, 25, or 30 people at Donna's facility. I find instead that the work force in early August was not a substantial and representative complement of employees.

The Respondents allege that AMA's early August work force would have satisfied the Board's General Extrusion rule, which is utilized in representation cases. I disagree. As the Board stated in Ten Eyck, supra, the Board looks for guidance in these types of cases to the standard in General Extrusion Co., 121 NLRB 1165 (1958), which provides that an existing contract bars an election, if, compared to the hearing date, an employer employs 30-percent of its employees in 50 percent of the job classifications at the time the contract was signed. Here, AMA may have barely met the 30 percent figure on employees, but it did not meet the 50-percent job classification figure. In any event, as the Board indicated in Ten Eyck, the application of a mathematical formula on this issue is not conclusive. 270 NLRB at 1366. Here, the employees working in early August were classified as shipping and receiving personnel; yet, in fact, they were cleaning the plant to prepare it for meat processing. Thus, when the plant was fully operating, all four of the relevant job classifications, shipping and receiving, driving, breaking and wrapping, were ones that had not been in existence in early August.[7]

Accordingly, I find that by agreeing to recognize Local 707 on 7 August 1984, at a time when AMA was not engaged in normal business operations and did not employ a substantial and representative complement of employees, AMA violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act. By demanding and accepting recognition under these circumstances, Local 707 violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. In addition, by thereafter entering into a collective-bargaining agreement, AMA further violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act and Local 707 further violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. See Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731 (1961). Although I found that the parties entered into the agreement on 15 August 1984, this violation flows from the earlier unlawful recognition and would stand even if the Respondents had signed the agreement on 8 October 1984.[8] Finally, as the agreement contains union-security and dues checkoff provisions, AMA also violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act and Local 707 violated Section 8(b)(2). See Ten Eyck Hotel, supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By distributing union authorization cards to employees, soliciting them to sign union authorization cards, and by preventing employees from speaking with representatives of particular unions, Respondent AMA violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act.

2. By recognizing Respondent Local 707 on 7 August 1984 as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees and by executing and maintaining a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 707 on and after 15 August 1984, Respondent AMA has unlawfully assisted and supported Local 707 and has thereby violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act.

[7] The Respondents also assert that their contrary position is supported by Klein's Golden Manor, 214 NLRB 807 (1974), and California Labor Industries, 249 NLRB 600 (1980). I disagree. Unlike here, in Klein's, the employer's original work force constituted more than 50 percent of its ultimate complement and its job categories "covered substantially all of the job classification at the [facility] when it was in full operation." Id. at 815–816. Likewise, in California Labor Industries supra, a representation case, the evidence showed, unlike here, that over half of the job classifications were filled at the time the contract was signed. Moreover, although in Klein's there is little discussion of the employer having engaged in normal business operations at the time of recognition, it is clear that the Board viewed the work in preparation for the opening of the nursing home involved in that case as essentially the same as the work after it opened its doors to patients. 214 NLRB at 809. The same cannot be said for the work of the employees in this case. In any event, it is clear, under Ten Eyck, that both the tests for lawful recognition must be met. Here neither were met.

[8] To the extent that the Respondents assert that—even if recognition on 7 and 15 August was premature, a subsequently obtained majority justified a subsequently reaffirmed contract, I reject this assertion. The violation flowing from premature recognition is not cured unless it is fully remedied. See Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, supra, 366 U.S. at 736, in which the Supreme Court stated:

> [W]e reject as without relevance . . . that, as of the execution date of the formal agreement . . . [the union] represented a majority of the employees. As the Court of Appeals indicated, the recognition of the minority union . . . was "a fait accompli depriving the majority of the employees of their guaranteed right to choose their own representative." . . . It is, therefore, of no consequence that [the union] may have acquired by [the formal date of the agreement] the necessary majority if, during the interim, it was acting unlawfully. Indeed, such acquisition of majority status itself might indicate that the recognition secured by the . . . agreement afforded [the union] a deceptive cloak of authority with which to persuasively elicit additional employee support.

3. By accepting recognition as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent AMA's employees and by executing and maintaining the 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement between it and AMA, Respondent Local 707 has restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By maintaining and enforcing the union-security and dues-checkoff provisions of the 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent AMA has violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act and Respondent Local 707 has violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act.

5. The violations set forth above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. The Respondents have not otherwise violated the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that AMA has violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) of the Act and that Local 707 has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2), I shall order each to cease and desist from the unlawful conduct and to take certain affirmative actions to effectuate the policies of the Act.

AMA will be ordered to withdraw recognition from Local 707 and the latter will be ordered to cease accepting recognition from the former unless certified by the Board. Both the Respondents will be ordered to cease giving effect to their 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement, including all renewals, extensions, and modifications, and to cancel it entirely. AMA and Local 707 will also be ordered to jointly and severally reimburse, with interest, all present and former employees for all initiation fees, dues, and other moneys paid by them or withheld from them pursuant to the terms of the union-security and dues-checkoff provisions of the 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement. However, reimbursement shall not extend to those employees who voluntarily joined and became members of Local 707 prior to 15 August 1984.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[9]

ORDER

A. The Respondent, A.M.A. Leasing, Ltd., Bensenville and Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Distributing union authorization cards to employees, soliciting them to sign union authorization cards, and preventing employees from speaking with representatives of particular unions.

(b) Recognizing Local 707 as the exclusive representative of its employees for the purpose of collective bargaining unless and until it is certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of such employees pursuant to Section 9(c) of the Act.

(c) Maintaining or giving any effect to the collective-bargaining agreement between AMA and Local 707 entered into 15 August 1984, or any renewal, extension, or modification thereof unless and until Local 707 is certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of such employees; provided, however, that nothing in this Order shall authorize or require any changes in wages or other terms and conditions of employment that may have been established pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Withdraw and withhold all recognition from Local 707 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees unless and until it has been duly certified by the Board as the exclusive representative of such employees.

(b) Jointly and severally with Local 707 reimburse with interest all present and former employees for all initiation fees, dues, and other moneys paid by them or withheld from them pursuant to the terms of the dues-checkoff and union-security clauses of the 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement. However, reimbursement does not extend to those employees who voluntarily joined and became members of Local 707 prior to 15 August 1984.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amounts of reimbursement due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Donna facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the authorized representative of AMA, shall be posted by AMA immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by AMA to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

B. The Respondent, Production Workers union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707, Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

(b) Giving effect to the 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent AMA and Respondent Local 707 or to any extension, renewal, or modification thereof.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining with or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, except to the extent that such rights may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Jointly and severally with AMA reimburse with interest all present and former employees for all initiation fees, dues, and other moneys paid by them or withheld from them pursuant to the terms of the dues-checkoff and union-security clauses of the 15 August 1984 collective-bargaining agreement. However, reimbursement does not extend to those employees who voluntarily joined and became members of Local 707 prior to 15 August 1984.

(b) Post at its business office and other places where notices to its members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative of Local 707, shall be posted by Local 707 the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Furnish the Regional Director with signed copies of the notice for posting by AMA at its Donna plant where notices to all employees are customarily posted. Copies of the notice, to be furnished by the Regional Director, shall be signed and forthwith returned to the Regional Director.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX A

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT distribute union authorization cards to employees, solicit them to sign union authorization cards, or tell them that they cannot speak to representatives of particular unions.

WE WILL NOT recognize or contract with Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707 as the bargaining representative of our employees until it has been certified as such representative by the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT maintain or give effect to our 15 August 1984 contract with Local 707 or to any renewal, extension, or modification thereof but we are not authorized or required to withdraw or eliminate any wage rates or other benefits, terms, and conditions of employment that we have given to our employees under the contract.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL withdraw and withhold all recognition from Local 707 as the collective-bargaining representative of our employees.

WE WILL, jointly and severally with Local 707, reimburse with interest all our present and former employees for all initiation fes and dues paid by them or withheld from them pursuant to the union-security clause and the dues-checkoff clause of the 15 August 1984 contract. However, reimbursement will not extend to those employees who voluntarily joined Local 707 before 15 August 1984.

Mission Industries and Ralph Barbosa, Petitioner and International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 501, AFL–CIO. Case 31–RD–1032

18 May 1987

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to an election held 24 October 1986 and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs, and has adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations only to the extent that they are consistent with this decision.[1]

Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, a secret mail ballot election was conducted on 24 October 1986. A ballot was mailed to each of 31 eligible voters, whose names and addresses were provided by the Employer. Twenty-eight ballots were returned. The tally of ballots shows 14 for and 13 against the Union, with 1 ballot declared void and none challenged. The Employer alleged in its Objections 1 and 2 that the voided ballot should be opened and counted (Objection 1) or, in the alternative, that the Board, through its agents, should have challenged the ballot rather than consider it void (Objection 2). The Union has excepted to the Regional Director's recommendation that the Employer's Objections 1 and 2 be sustained. We find merit in the Union's exceptions.

The mail ballot in question arrived at the Regional Office enclosed in the appropriate official envelope. The identification stub of the mail ballot envelope, however, was missing. This identification stub would have exhibited both the signature of the voter and a "key number" matching the particular ballot to that voter on the eligibility list. Although the main portion of the disputed mail ballot envelope was postmarked in Santa Barbara, California, the Board agent was unable to identify its source as an eligible voter and thus voided the ballot.

After the election, the Employer interviewed the only four eligible voters whose names were not checked on the eligibility list as having voted. Each of these individuals signed statements, which the Employer submitted to the Regional Director in support of its objections. Only one of the four eligible voters interviewed attested to having mailed his ballot, with the identification stub attached and signed, from Santa Barbara.[2]

The Regional Director determined that these affidavits and the Santa Barbara postmark were sufficient to establish positively that the eligible voter who claimed to have mailed his ballot from Santa Barbara was the source of the ballot in question. Therefore, the Regional Director recommended that the ballot previously declared void be opened and counted and that a revised tally be issued.

The Union has excepted to the Regional Director's recommendation with respect to the Employer's Objections 1 and 2. The Union contends, inter alia, that the envelope identification stubs are necessary to ensure that only eligible voters participate in the election. We agree with this contention. As noted in Brink's Armored Car, 278 NLRB 141 (1986), mail ballot elections are more vulnerable to the destruction of laboratory conditions than are manual elections, due to the absence of direct Board supervision over the employees' voting. Accordingly, the Board has adopted mail ballot election procedures, including the use of an identification stub, designed to preserve the integrity of the election process and to ensure that no reasonable doubt is raised about the fairness or validity of that process. The absence of an identification stub, in itself, raises a reasonable doubt concerning whether only eligible voters participated in the election and whether each of those eligible voters cast only one ballot. See Northwest Packing Co., 65 NLRB 890 (1946). We further find that permitting inquiry into the source of a mail ballot without an identification stub would greatly increase the potential for confusion and coercion and that such inquiries are not likely to dispel the reasonable doubt concerning the validity of such ballots.[3] Accordingly, we con-

[1] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt, pro forma, the Regional Director's recommendation that the Employer's Objections 3, 4, and 5 be overruled.

[2] The ballot declared void by the Board agent conducting the election has been retained in an official Board envelope and secured at the Regional Office. The Regional Director designated the four eligible voters whose names had not been checked off on the eligibility list as having voted as Employees A through D. Employee A indicated that he signed the identification stub of his mail ballot envelope and watched his wife deposit it in a Santa Barbara mailbox. Employee A's wife also provided a statement corroborating Employee A's account. Employees B and C claimed that they mailed their ballots from locations other than Santa Barbara. These ballots were not received by the Regional Office. Employee D, who resides in Santa Barbara, maintained that he never recieved a ballot from the Regional Office and, therefore, he did not vote. No party has excepted to the Regional Director's findings that the apparent failure of the Regional Office to receive the ballots of Employees B and C, as well as Employee D's apparent nonreceipt of a ballot, did not warrant setting aside the election.

[3] Moreover, even assuming inquiry into the source of the presently disputed ballot would be appropriate, which we decline to do for the policy reasons set forth above, we would find that the Santa Barbara postmark on the mail ballot envelope and the employee affidavits would not be sufficient evidence to establish positively the identity of the voter.

clude, contrary to the Regional Director, that the mail ballot in issue should remain void. We therefore overrule the Employer's Objections 1 and 2 and find that a certification of representative should be issued.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for the International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 501, AFL–CIO and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

Included: All engineers and automotive repairmen employed by Mission Industries at its facilities located in Bakersfield, Eureka, Fresno, Lancaster, Morro Bay, Oceanside, Oxnard, Pacific Grove, Sacramento, Salinas, Santa Barbara, Santa Cruz, Santa Maria, Turlock, Ventura and Victorville, California.

Excluded: Office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

18 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 12 February 1987 Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed limited exceptions and a supporting brief and a brief in answer to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Dickinson-Iron Community Action Agency; Dickinson-Iron Alternative Fuel Energy Corporation; Eagle Fiber Fuels Manufacturing Inc., Iron River, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

In accordance with the policy set forth in Ming Quong Children's Center, 210 NLRB 899 (1974), I would decline to assert jurisdiction in this case and would dismiss the complaint.[1] The Respondent is a nonprofit institution engaged in providing social services such as the weatherization of homes of low income and elderly individuals pursuant to grants from Federal, state, and regional governments. Thus, in the absence of evidence that this Company has a substantial impact on interstate commerce, I would decline to exercise jurisdiction over any labor dispute involving this Employer.

Benjamin Madelman, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Vincent R. Petrucelli, Esq. (Petrucelli & Hopkins, P.C.), of Iron River and Hopkins, Michigan, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard on 15, 16, and 17 October 1986 in Iron Mountain, Michigan, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed by Thomas Barnhart, an individual, on 20 May 1986, and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 30 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), on 29 July 1986, as amended on 5 August 1986.[1] The complaint alleges that The Dickinson-Iron Community Action Agency; Dickinson-Iron Alternative Fuel Energy Corporation; and Eagle Fiber Fuels Manufacturing, Inc. (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by discharging employees who had engaged in a concerted work stoppage. Respondent's timely filed answer denies the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

The Dickinson-Iron Community Action Agency (DICAA) is a Michigan not-for-profit corporation with an office and place of business in Iron River, Michigan, where it is engaged in providing social services, including the weatherization of homes of low income and elderly individuals, pursuant to grants from state, Federal, and regional governments. During 1985, its funding from these sources approximated $1,250,000 of which about $250,000 was expended by its weatherization program. During the same time period, DICAA received funds in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside the State of Michigan and purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources similarly located outside the State of Michigan.

Respondent denied that DICAA (and the business allegedly affiliated with it as a single employer) was an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Respondent contended first that the dollar volume of business engaged in by DICAA was insufficient for the assertion of the

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's recommended Order to the extent that it does not include a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

[1] See my dissenting opinions in Alan Short Center, 267 NLRB 886 (1983); and Salvation Army of Massachusetts, 271 NLRB 195 (1984).

[1] All dates hereinafter are in 1986 unless otherwise specified.

Board's jurisdiction; it subsequently asserted that jurisdiction should not be taken because of DICAA's nonprofit governmental status. Respondent's contentions with respect to jurisdiction are without merit. In St. Aloysius Home, 224 NLRB 1344 (1976), the Board (Chairman Murphy and Member Penello dissenting) abandoned its earlier rule in which it had declined to assert jurisdiction over charitable nonprofit institutions (see Ming Quong Children's Center, 210 NLRB 899 (1974)) and asserted jurisdiction, applying the jurisdictional standards that would be applied to commercial enterprises of the same nature. For nonretail enterprises such as DICAA, the Board's jurisdictional standard requires only $50,000 in direct and indirect outflow or inflow of goods or materials. Siemons Mailing Service, 122 NLRB 81 (1958). Respondent clearly meets this dollar volume standard.

With respect to Respondent's second jurisdictional contention, the Board, in Rustman Bus Co., 282 NLRB 152 (1986), recently reaffirmed its assertion of jurisdiction over entities providing service to exempt governmental entitles. The basic test for determining whether the assertion of jurisdiction over such an employer is waranted is whether the employer retains broad discretion and control over its day-to-day labor ralations policies and practices and is capable of effective bargaining with a representative of its employees. See National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979). The Board also examines the scope and degree of control, if any, exercised by the exempt entity over the employer's labor ralations. See Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986) (Member Stephens concurring and dissenting). The Board has rejected the "intimate connection" standard under which jurisdiction was withheld if the private employer performed functions that were intimately related to traditional government functions of the exempt entity. See, e.g., Rural Fire Protection Co., 216 NLRB 584 (1975). In the instant case, the board of DICAA and its executive director hire the employees, determine the wages and benefits to be paid, and set all labor relations policies. There is no record evidence concerning any control over "essential terms and conditions of employment" by any of the governmental agencies that fund DICAA's operations.

I find that DICAA retains broad, indeed complete, discretion and control over the day-to-day labor relations policies and practices applicable to its employees. It is, therefore, completely capable of effective bargaining with any representative the employees might select. I further find that DICAA meets the jurisdictional standards that would be applied to a commercial enterprise of a similar nature. Accordingly, I find that DICAA is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Dickinson-Iron alternative Fuel Energy Corporation (AFE) is a Michigan for-profit corporation with an office and place of business in Iron River, Michigan, where it is engaged in the sale and distribution of fuel and the installation of wood burning furnaces. The record reflects that Eagle Fiber Fuels Manufacturing, Inc. (Eagle) is a Michigan for-profit corporation with its office and place of business in Iron River, Michigan, where it is, or had been, engaged in the manufacture and sale of wool burning furnaces. DICAA wholly owns AFE and is the majority stockholder in Eagle. AFE and Eagle were created, in part, to bring money into DICAA. All three are located at the same address and DICAA's executive director, Daniel Bonetti, is the incorporator of both AFE and Eagle; he is currently president of Eagle. AFE and Eagle operate out of the Angeli-Jacobetti Center (the A-J Center) which is owned by DICAA and operated as an industrial incubator center, providing low-rent facilities and other services to new business ventures. Bonetti acknowledged that he endeavored to make AFE a successful business operation on behalf of its owner, but denied that he oversaw its operations.[2] Bonetti hired AFE's general manager, Thomas Barnhart[3] and, after Barnhart's discharge, hired his replacement. Bonetti also negotiated Barnhart's wage rate with him. AFE leases space from DICAA in the A-J Center at a nominal rent and similarly rents some equipment from DICAA. DICAA maintains AFE's books and all of AFE's checks are signed by Bonetti and the DICAA treasurer.

Eagle built burning furnaces, identical to those manufactured by AFE, at the A-J Center, and when Eagle sold furnaces, installation was performed either by the purchaser or by AFE. Eagle, it appears, has not been a functioning business entity since approximately December 1985.

The complaint alleges that DICAA, AFE, and Eagle are affiliated businesses to the extent that they comprise a single-integrated enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act. Respondent denied that allegation, but I find that the facts, as set forth above, fully support it. In Truck & Dock Services, 272 NLRB 592 fn. 2 (1984), the Board concisely summarized Board and court law with respect to single-employer status, as follows:

> To determine weather two entities are sufficiently integrated so that they may fairly be treated as a single employer, the Board and the courts examine four principal factors: (1) common management; (2) centralized control of labor relations; (3) interrelation of operations; and (4) common ownership. Radio Union v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965); NLRB v. Browning-Ferris Industries, 691 F.2d 1117, 1122 (3d Cir. 1982); Shellmaker, Inc., 265 NLRB 749, 754 (1982). While none of these factors, viewed separately, has been held controlling, the Board has stressed the first three factors, particularly centralized control of labor relations. Parklane Hosiery Co., 203 NLRB 597, 612 (1973). Single-employer status depends on all of the circumstances and has been characterized as an absence of an "arms length relationship . . . among unintegrated companies." Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, 240 NLRB 206, 215 (1979), enfd. 626 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1980).

[2] In his affidavit, he had acknowledged "informally" overseeing those operations in order "to protect DICAA as shareholder."

[3] The Charging Party herein.

All the foregoing factors are satisfied here. DICAA owns all or nearly all the stock in both corporations, Bonetti and the DICAA board exercise substantial managerial control over both, the operations of AFE and Eagle were closely interwined regarding functions and location, and both fit into the operations of the DICAA weatherization program. Employees are interchanged regularly between all three entities. AFE and Eagle are, to all intents and purposes, mere operating arms of DICAA, established, at least in part, to bring revenue into the programs of DICAA. Accordingly, I find that DICAA, AFE, and (to the extent that it is still a functioning enterprise) Eagle constitute a single-integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

The employees of DICAA and AFE are not represented by any labor organization and there is no labor organization involvement in any of the following facts.

II. SUPERVISORY STATUS

A. General Discussion—Bonetti's Role

The complaint alleges that Respondent discharged eight individuals, Edwin Yackel, Francis Arvidson, Duane Juneau, Robert Kenny, Richard Makela, Martin Sheffer, Danny Thurston, and William Weier because of their concerted protected activities.[4] Respondent contends that Yackel, Juneau, Arvidson, Sheffer, Kenny, and Thurston were staturoty supervisors, not entitled to the protections of the Act. At various points, Respondent's executive director, Bonetti, also referred to Makela and Weier as independent contractors, at least implicitly asserting that they were not employees covered by the statute.[5]

Respondent DICAA is organized, pursuant to the Economic Opportunities Act of 1964, with a board of governors appointed by elected officials, representatives of the poor, and other interest groups. That board determines the rates of pay, fringe benefits, personnel policies, and other terms and conditions of employment of the Agency's employees. DICAA is managed on a day-to-day basis by Bonetti and his assistant, Judy Tefft. DICAA's personnel policies give Bonetti final say in hiring and firing, subject to review by the personnel board. According to those policies, he appoints all staff members and makes all promotions. Bonetti, however, testified that potiential employees, responding to advertisements, would be interviewed by the immediate job supervisors, crew chiefs, or foremen, and he would only review their recommendations in a manner he characterized as "perfunctory." He would "normally" accept the recommendations, but sometimes reject them if there was sufficient cause or reason. He denied that he interviewed employees for the weatherization program. Similarly, he sometimes transferred employees between the DICAA weatherization program and AFE but, he testified, such transfers were more often made by Barnhart, Yackel, or Juneau.[6] Bonetti clearly had, and exercised, the authority to discharge employees. He personally made the decision to terminate the individuals involved in this proceeding. His role, in both hiring and firing, was more than perfunctory, even according to his own testimony.

According to Respondent's table of organization, immediately below the assistant director were the weatherization department coordinator and automotive shop foreman. The former position was allegedly filed on a part-time basis by Ed Yackel. The person designated as auto shop foreman was Robert Kenny. Below Yackel was Duane Juneau, Iron County foreman for weatherization, and he allegedly had Crew Chiefs Francis Arvidson and Martin Sheffer reporting to him. Reporting to Auto Shop Foreman Kenny, according to the table of organization, was Dan Thurston, alleged to be an assistant foreman. The specific evidence with respect to the supervisory status of each of these employees will be discussed hereafter. According to Respondent, the only nonsupervisory persons on its payroll in the weatherization department were Makela and Weier, both of whom it referred to as independent contractors.

In addition to the foregoing individuals, Respondent's work was accomplished through the use of general assistance workers or GAs furnished by the Michigan Department of Welfare and, on occasion, individuals referred to Respondent by the courts under offender programs, by CETA (Comprehensive Employment Training Act) and by Youth Experience Programs. According to Bonetti, Respondent had a contract with the Michigan Department of Welfare to provide a worksite, supervision, materials, tools, equipment, and timekeeping for the GAs. They did not fill out employment applications or other paperwork for Respondent and, other than possibly being covered by Respondent's unemployment compensation insurance, they received no benefits or wages for the time spent working on Respondent's projects. They were generally untrained and unskilled labor and were assigned to work under the crew chiefs, in weatherization, the automotive shop or other DICAA projects. On the average, according to Bonetti, there were between 7 and 20 GAs assigned to Respondent's weatherization program at any one time; approximately 300 GAs have put in time working for DICAA over the last 3 years.

[4] The unfair labor practice charge was filed by Thomas Barnhart and similarly alleged his discharge. The investagation revealed that he was a statutory supervisor and, accordingly, the complaint did not allege his discharge was violative.

[5] The General Counsel contends that Respondent has taken shifting and inconsistent positions with respect to the status of these individuals. Thus, in Respondent's counsel position letter to the Board of 10 June, it was asserted that Yackel as Energy coordinator was a statutory supervisor, while Juneau, Kenney, Sheffer, Arvidson, and Thurston "were classified as Energy program workers . . . general laborers." Weier and Makela, it was contended, were independent contractors, not employees. On 3 July, Bonetti gave an affidavit to the Board in which he asserted that Juneau, Sheffer, Arvidson, and Kenny had supervisory authority as crew chiefs. Thereafter, however, in a meeting of Respondent's board on 21 August, Bonetti presented in update on the Board proceedings, reasserting Respondent's contentions that Yackel and Juneau were supervisors, but not claiming that Sheffer, Arvidson, Kenny, or Thurston were or that makela and Weier were independent contractors. It is clear from the differences in positions stated that Bonetti was not merely reading that attorney's position letter to the Board. Respondent's prior statements are properly considered here as admissions against interest. See Liberty Cleaners, 227 NLRB 1296 (1977).

[6] As will be seen, infra, the individuals alleged to be supervisors contradicted Bonetti's testimony concerning their authority.

According to Bonetti, because Respondent could not promote or grant raises to the GAs, it could "fire" them or give them written warnings with copies sent to the Department of Welfare. No such warnings were proffered as evidence in this proceeding. Nor was there any evidence of instances where GAs were "fired." The giving of such warnings, he claimed, might affect whether Respondent would subsequently hire these individuals as its own employees if and when job opportunities arose. Respondent could not independently deny these individuals their welfare payments, but, according to Bonetti, the crew chiefs could send them home if they refused to work and that might cause them to lose their welfare. Arvidson testified that although he did not have GAs working under him on a daily basis, they were assigned to him regularly, and he told them what to do. He directed their work and, if they failed to do as directed, he repeated his directions. He said generally they came and put in their 8 hours. Kenny also had GAs working under him; he testified that he was never told what he could do if they failed to do their work. Frequently, he stated, they did not show up for work and nothing adverse happened to them. Kenny said that if they failed to do their work, he could report them to Foreman Juneau.

Bonetti met and gave directions to all the employees virtually every morning. On a daily basis, employees and general assistance workers were assigned to weatherization or AFE by Bonetti and it was generally Bonetti who told the crews what projects they would be working on. If employees and general assistance workers were not assigned by Bonetti to special projects, Iron County Foreman Juneau would assign them to the crew leaders for weatherization work.

B. Evidence Regarding Specific Individuals

1. Edwin Yackel—weatherization coordinator

Yackel was employed by Respondent for approximately 9 years. For the period that ended in 1983, he was the Iron County foreman for DICAA's weatherization department. In 1983, Yackel was transferred to AFE where he delivered fuel and installed furnaces. In early 1986, AFE ran out of funds and Bonetti laid AFE's employees off. Yackel and some others continued working although they drew no wages. About 1 February, Bonetti asked Yackel whether he would serve as weatherization coordinator on a part-time basis, explaining that this would provide a means in which Yackel's hourly wage could be paid. Yackel agreed and from that time forward he received half of his weekly earnings from DICAA and the other half from AFE. His wage, $6.30 per hour, was unchanged from that which had been paid him both as Iron County foreman and AFE employee.

The position of weatherization department coordinator had been unfilled between 6 and 8 months prior to Yackel's designation. After his designation, Yackel's duties changed very little. He continued to spend upwards of 90 percent of his time delivering fuel and installing furnances for AFE. His duties with respect to the weatherzation department consisted of passing on material requests from Juneau to Bonetti and Tefft and signing such forms as timesheets and leave requests. His signature, it appeared, carried little weight; overtime payments that he "approved" were disallowed by Tefft or Bonetti even though the employees had worked the overtime hours. Although he signed leave requests, he never denied an employee time off and did not believe that he had the authority to do so. The employees did not report to him if they were going to be absent. Yackel credibly denied that he was told what his authority, duties, and responsibilities would be when he was given the title of weatherization coordinator. He specifically denied being told that he had the authority to hire, fire, promote, grant wage increases to, discipline, or transfer employees and, between his appointment and his discharge, Yackel never exercised any of these functions. He did not interview employees for hire or make recommendations concerning anyone's hiring. Bonetti never asked him for recommendations on personnel actions concerning weatherization department employees. Employee William Weier was hired during this period; Weier was interviewed by Bonetti.

Although Yackel was allegedly the weatherization coordinator for both counties, he never talked with the Dickinson County foreman. He denied that he directed the flow of work or inspected the work done by employees in the weatherization department. According to Martin Sheffer, it was not Yackel who would inspect the homes and determine what work had to be done, but Juneau. Yackel did not assign work or make up the crews. Either Sheffer or Arvidson would pick up the files themselves or Juneau would tell them which houses to work on. During his brief tenure as weatherization coordinator, Yackel made one report to the DICAA Board, detailing the progress made by that department during a 2-month period.[7]

2. Duane Juneau—Iron County foreman

DICAA employs a separate weatherization foreman for each of the counties it covers; the Iron County foreman was Duane Juneau. Juneau had started working for Respondent as a laborer in the spring of 1984 and continued in the capacity until laid off in February 1985. He was hired back as a crew leader in October 1985. In December of that year, Bonetti called crew leaders Sheffer, Arvidson, and Juneau to a meeting and suggested that as there was then no Iron County foreman they should decide among themselves who would be foreman. Arvid-

[7] Bonetti and Tefft deny that Yackel was appointed weatherization coordinator solely for budgetary considerations. They contend that his appointment was real, that he spent 50 percent of his time performing the duties of weatherization coordinator, which duties included the inspection of homes before and after the weatherization work was completed and the supervision of the employees within that department. Specifically, Bonetti claimed that he told Yackel that he possessed the full range of supervisory authorities. As between Bonetti and Tefft on the one hand, and Yackel, and Juneau and Kenny who corroborate his testimony, on the other hand, I find Yackel, Juneau, and Kenny to have been the more convincing witnesses. In addition to my observations of their comparative demeanors, I note Respondent's shifting and inconsistent positions. I further note that Bonetti was a frequently vague or evasive witness given to making broad, unresponsive, and self-serving statements. His repeated use of stock phrases concerning the authority of the various individuals was unconvincing.

son was the most senior of the three, but declined the position. Juneau agreed to take it. Bonetti approved and instructed Juneau that he would be a working foreman. Juneau's wage of $5.50 per hour, less than Arvidson's $5.55, remained unchanged. His duties included preinspecting the homes to be weatherized, determining what needed to be done and at what cost, assigning the general assistance workers to the crew leaders, checking the progress of the weatherization work as it was being done, correcting work that had not been done properly, and inspecting the work on its completion to make sure that it had been done properly. The work itself was performed by Juneau, the crew leaders, and the general assistance workers. The only laborer employed by Respondent to do this work, albeit for only a week, was William Weier. Juneau credibly testified that he was never told what authority, if any, he had over other employees. He understood that his responsibility as foreman was to make sure that the work was done properly and to work out any problems brought to him by the crew leaders. Had there been any problems that he could not handle, he would have brought them to Bonetti. He was never told that he could hire or fire employees, and he never had the occasion to attempt to do so. Similarly, he did not understand that his authority extended to demoting employees, promoting them, granting them time off, or doing anything else that could affect their employees status. He was never told that he would be doing employee appraisals or evaluations. As foreman, Juneau signed and sometimes completed the timesheets for the crew leaders. He never disapproved the time records, but overtime, which he certified as correct, was sometimes disallowed by either Tefft or Bonetti. Bonetti had told him that Respondent could not afford to pay overtime and did not want employees claiming it. Similarly, leave requests went through Juneau to Tefft. Juneau did not understand that he had any authority to disallow such leave requests and, on occasion, leave requests that he signed as approved were disallowed. If any of the crew leaders or laborers were going to be absent, they called Juneau.

Bonetti was present nearly every morning when Juneau and the crew leaders gathered prior to going out into the field. Bonetti assigned the employees and general assistance workers to various projects, and general assistance workers who were not assigned to other DICAA projects were assigned by Juneau to the crew chiefs for weatherization work. Juneau would then check that the beneficiaries of Respondent's weatherization work were at home so that the work could be carried out. The crew leaders would usually pick up the individual files to determine which homes they would do. Juneau spent between 50 and 70 percent of his time in physical work; the remainder of his time was spent inspecting homes and preparing monthly reports and other paperwork.

On 4 April, Juneau had received a disciplinary notice from Bonetti (not Yackel, his alleged supervisor), purporting to discharge him for unsatisfactory performance and attitude, showing him to be a "disloyal and negatively productive Community Action Agency Worker." The letter stated that Respondent had provided him with employment and charged him "with responsibility of leadership." Respondent did not carry through with Juneau's discharge at that time.[8]

3. Robert Kenny—automotive shop foreman

Robert Kenny first performed work for Respondent as a general assistance worker assigned to DICAA. After 3 or 4 months, Respondent hired him as a laborer. In April 1985, Bonetti made him a crew leader with a raise to $5.55 per hour. He was told that he would be supervising general assistance workers in the automotive shop. However, for 80 to 90 percent of his time he worked alone. On occasions, Dan Thurston would work in that shop and sometimes there were general assistance workers helping them. Kenny got complete instructions daily from Bonetti, either orally or in writing. To the extent that Kenny would instruct Thurston or others about what work they should be doing, it was usually pursuant to such instructions from Bonetti.[9] Kenny was told, when made a crew chief, that he should watch over Thurston, keep an eye on him, make sure that he was working. He was never told what he could do regarding discipline or personnel actions, he was not told that he could issue written warnings, and he did not sign Thurston's timeslips or approve time off or leave for Thurston.

According to Bonetti, Kenny made many recommendations concerning the hiring or firing of individuals. The record reflects that after Martin Sheffer had worked for a period while on general assistance, Kenny recommended that he be hired as a regular employee. Kenny, however, did not interview Sheffer or give him employment application forms. Sometime after Kenny had made this recommendation, Sheffer was hired by Bonetti, who had evaluated Kenny's recommendation. On other occasions, Kenny has recommended that Bonetti hire another individual, Dale Petz, and recommended that a foreman, Marcell, be fired because he was wasting time. Bonetti interviewed Petz, but did not adopt either of these recommendations.

4. Danny Thurston—assistant auto shop foreman

The record contains little direct evidence concerning Dan Thurston, whom Respondent has called the assistant foreman of the auto shop. It appears that Thurston had been working for Respondent about 1 year; his rate of pay was $4.75 per hour. He spent much of his time hauling fuel pellets for AFE, pursuant to instructions from Bonetti and, when he was not hauling pellets, he was assigned to the auto shop because he possessed mechanical skills. No one other than the general assistance workers who might be assigned to the auto shop on a sporadic basis worked under Thurston and, when working in the [8] To the extent that the testimony of Bonetti and Tefft is inconsistent with the above, I have credited the testimony of Juneau as corroborated by Arvidson and Sheffer for the reasons previously stated. I have considered, but have accorded little weight to, the authority that prior county foremen may have possessed when Respondent' weatherization program was a considerably larger operation.

[9] Bonetti did not deny giving Kenny detailed daily instructions. It was, according to Bonetti, part of Kenny's training as a foreman.

auto shop, Thurston got his instructions from Bonetti, either directly or through Kenny. Respondent did not contend, either in its 10 June position letter Bonetti's 3 July affidavit, or Bonetti's 21 August presentation to his board of governors that Thurston was a supervisor.

5. Francis Arvidson and Martin Sheffer—crew leaders

Weatherization department crew leaders Francis Arvidson and Martin Sheffer received their assignments, i.e., the houses on which they would be working, either from Bonetti or Juneau or by drawing them out of a folder themselves. They performed their work in the homes to be weatherized, working alone or with other crew leaders and the foreman. Sometimes they worked with a DICAA employee or with general assistance workers. When they worked with other crew leaders and the foreman, each performed his own work with no need for direction. When Sheffer worked with William Weier, he instructed Weier concerning the work that had to be done and let him do it. When Juneau or Bonnetti assigned general assistance workers to them, the crew leaders told those workers what had to be done, instructed them how to do it, and attempt to keep them busy during an 8-hour shift. According to Sheffer, Juneau would ask at the end of each day whether he had had any problems. Normally there was nothing to report; if there were any problems with any of the general assistance workers or DICAA employees, Sheffer would relate them to Juneau. Other than seeing that the DICAA employees put in their 8 hours and that the work was done, neither Arvidson nor Sheffer were ever told what authority they had over such employees. Neither was told that they had the authority to discipline employees. Although both believed that if they felt that discipline of either DICAA general general laborers or general assistance workers had been warranted, they could have recommended it to Foreman Juneau.[10] The crew leaders received detailed instructions from Bonetti each morning and spent 90 percent or more of their time doing the physical work involved in home weatherization. Arvidson's hourly rate of pay was $5.55; Sheffer's, however, was only $4.75.

C. Conclusions With Respect to Alleged Supervisory Status

Respondent contends that six of the eight individuals named in the complaint, individuals who comprised essentially the entire work force of the DICAA weatherization department and AFE, are statutory supervisors to whom the protections of the Act do not apply.[11]

The party seeking to establish that individuals are supervisors within the contemplation of the statute bears the burden of proving that such individuals actually possess and exercise at least one of the authorities delineated in Section 2(11) of the Act. George C. Foss Co., 270 NLRB 232 (1984), enfd. 752 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1985); Hydro Conduit Corp., 254 NLRB 433 (1981); Commercial Movers, 240 NLRB 288 (1979). Section 2(11) provides:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having the authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibility to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

Hydro Conduit Corp., supra, and cases cited therein at 437, stated:

> [S]upervisory status exists only if the power is exercised with independent judgment on behalf of management, and not in a routine or clerical manner . . . "the statute expressly insists that a supervisor (1) have authority (2) to use independent judgment (3) in performing such supervisory functions (4) in the interest of management. These latter requirements are conjunctive."

Conclusionary statements attributing supervisory authority to any given individual are insufficient to carry Respondent's burden of proof. Moreover, in resolving questions of supervisory status, one must keep in mind that "the Board has a duty to employees to be alert not to construe supervisory status too broadly because the employee who is deemed a supervisor is denied employee rights which the act is intended to protect." Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 1151, 1158 (7th Cir. 1970); Hydro Conduit Corp., supra at 437.

Applying the foregoing principles to the record before me, I must conclude that Respondent has failed to sustain its burden of proving that any of the six named individuals are statutory supervisors outside the ambit of the Act's protection.

First, I must reject Respondent's contention that supervision of general assistance workers (or any others similarly situated, such as court referrals) renders the overseeing individual a statutory supervisor. The general assistance workers, like the court-referred workers, are assigned by a public agency to assist Respondent in carrying out its charitable mission. They are not interviewed, hired, or selected by Respondent and they derive no benefits from Respondent. They remain with Respondent only so long as they are on welfare or the referring agency deems that they shall remain. They earn no wages or other benefits and therefore cannot be granted raises, promoted, or rewarded in any sustantive way by their overseer. The only action that might be taken against them is that they might be sent home or rejected from further service by Respondent. Any detriment that might come to them from such an action would be determined by the referring agency, not Respondent. Moreover, there is no evidence in this record that any of the named individuals ever took such an action with respect to any of the general asisstance workers. Inasmuch as these workers are not statutory employees, the persons under whose oversight they happen to work at any given time are not supervisors. The relationship, if any, is more akin to that of teacher to pupil or guard to prisoner. See Key Opportunities, 265 NLRB 1371 (1982; Oakland Press Co., 229 NLRB 476, 477 (1977); and Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, 210 NLRB 928 (1974) (Chairman Miller and Member Kennedy dissenting).

[10] I do not credit Bonetti's rote assertions that the crew chiefs could discipline, correct, send home, or remove general assistance workers or anyone else from the job. His statement, "They know it, you know it, I know it and the world knows it," oft-repeated during this hearing, was unsupported by any concrete examples.

[11] Prior to the hearing, Respondent also argued that the remaining two individuals, Richard Makela and William Weier, were independent contractors. While Bonetti referred to Makela as an independent contractor in the course of his testimony, Respondent did not repeat this assertion on brief. The only evidence concerning their status established that they were hourly paid employees who, for budgetary reasons, were denied any other benefits of the employment relationship. The limitation of their employment benefits to hourly wages does not establish that they were independent contractors. To the extent that the status of Makela and Weier is in issue, I find them to be employees entitled to the Act's protection.

Even if the general assistance workers were to be deemed "employees," the extent of authority exercised over them by the crew leaders, foremen, and weatherization coordinator would not be sufficient to render those later individuals statutory supervisors. The general assistance workers work for limited periods of time on what appears to be an irregular basis. At most, they would be deemed to be casual employees excluded from any appropriate collective-bargaining unit. The persons Respondent alleges to be supervisors spend the great bulk of their time performing the physical labor entailed in weatherizing homes, delivering fuel, and installing furnaces. The amount of time any one of them spends in directing the general assistance workers in their labors is minimal (and such direction as is given is routine). The Board has addressed the issue of supervisory status derived from the exercise of supervision over nonunit personnel and concluded that when, as here, individuals spend less than 50 percent of their time "supervising" nonunit personnel, they should not be denied the protections of the Act as employees. Amalgamated Clothing Workers, supra at 930, Adelphi University, 195 NLRB 639 (1972); Westinghouse Electric Corp., 163 NLRB 723 (1967). Indeed, the Board has held that even the occasional hiring of such nonunit personnel is insufficient to establish supervisory authority. John Cuneo, Inc., 238 NLRB 1438 (1978); Amalgamated Clothing Workers, supra.

The situation that is present here is one of a small, eight-man unit of employees performing functions that are routine and well known to them and that therefore, require little or no direct supervision at diverse locations, under the general supervision of a single individual in whom, essentially alone, resided statutory authority, Bonetti.[12] It is improbable that an operation the size of Respondent's weatherization department, even including AFE, would have as many supervisors, and as few employees, Respondent would have us believe. Health Care Logistics, 273 NLRB 822 (1984). (Employer's contention that there were three supervisors in a unit of not more than eight employees held improbable.) Moreover, the titles attributed by Bonetti to the specific individuals warrant no contrary conclusions about any of them. Lovilia Coal Co., 275 NLRB 1358 (1985); Health Care Logistics, supra at 824; Thayer Dairy Co., 233 NLRB 1383 (1977).

I have credited Edwin Yackel's testimony to the effect that he was given the title of weatherization coordinator essentially as a means of ensuring that he would be paid for the hours he spent working for AFE. The weatherization department was able to function for more than half a year prior to his appointment without a functioning coordinator and continued to do so after his nominal appointment. His duties changed little. He continued to spend at least 90 percent of his time performing AFE's labors. What little time he spent in the job of coordinator, including the signing of timesheets, involved routine clerical functions that were not necessarily indicative of supervisory status. Indeed, his signature on a timesheet or leave request carried little if any weight. Hydro Conduit Corp., supra (the isolated signing of a few warning notices deemed insufficient to establish supervisory authority); Cuneo, supra (recording hours and signing timesheets not sufficient to establish supervisory authority). Neither can Yackel be found to have been a supervisor in May 1986 on the basis that he may have occupied a supervisory position for Respondent at some time in the past. Such prior experience is irrelevant. Health Care Logistics, supra. Respondent has not established his supervisory authority.

Unlike Yackel, Juneau actually functioned in the position to which he was nominally assigned. As Iron County foreman, he inspected the homes to be weatherized, determined what work needed to be done, checked to see that it was being done in a proper fashion, and checked again to determine that it had been done properly. The crew leaders nominally worked under him in carrying out the weatherization functions. Nonetheless, I conclude that he did not possess real supervisory authority. He was, at most, a "leadman" or "strawboss" rather than a part of management and a statutory supervisor. George C. Foss, supra. Like Yackel, he was named to fill a position that was vacant for a considerable period of time, indicating that supervision at that level was not essential. He spent the majority of his time performing the same physical work as the other crew leaders. Work assignments were made by Bonetti, or by Juneau as a conduit from Bonetti. Those work assignments, moreover, were routine in nature, to do this house rather than that house first, and had no effect on the employees' compensation. The work itself was routine and each employee knew what to do. Even if it could be said that Juneau was "running the jobs," he exercised authority only in routine matters that did not require the exercise of independent judgment. Similarly, his recordkeeping duties with respect to hours worked was routine or clerical in nature and his signature approving payment for overtime worked carried no weight against Respondent's determination that it could not afford to pay for overtime. Respondent has failed to establish his supervisory authority.

Robert Kenny, as the nominal foreman of the automotive shop, had even less real authority than Juneau. He received daily instructions from Bonetti, designating the work to be done and, to the extent that he directed Thurston, he did so primarily as a conduit from Bonetti. As with Juneau and each of the others alleged to be supervisors, there is nothing other than conclusionary statements concerning purported authority to establish possession of any of the statutory indicia. Kenny worked as a mechanic, usually alone, and on those occasions when he had Thurston and/or general assistance workers in the shop, the relationship was one of experienced employee to helper, not supervisor to employee.

If Kenny is not a supervisor, then Dan Thurston, whom Respondent claimed to have been the assistant automotive shop foreman, is, a fortiori, without supervisory authority. The record contains no evidence of any employee who would have been supervised by Thurston and there was nothing beyond Respondent's claim that he held the title of assistant supervisor to confer such authority on him. His hourly wage of $4.75 is surely not indicative of supervisory status. Respondent has not established that either Kenny or Thurston were statutory supervisors.

Like Juneau, crew leaders Francis Arvidson and Martin Sheffer are, at most, leadmen or strawbosses. They do the physical work of the weatherization department and give routine direction concerning the work to be done to very few employees, if any, and others who may not be employees at all. Beyond Bonetti's conclusionary statements, there is no indication that they actually possessed any of the statutory indicia. At most, they may be empowered to tell other employees on the worksite to keep busy. The authority to issue such minor oral reprimands does not establish one as a supervisor, particularly where, as here, there is no showing that such reprimands have any effect on an employee's job status. John Cuneo, supra. See also Vanport Sand & Gravel, 267 NLRB 150 (1983). Finally, the wages paid to crew leaders, particularly Sheffer's $4.25 per hour, are hardly indicative of supervisory status.

Considering all the foregoing, I must conclude that Respondent has failed to sustain its burden of proving that Edwin Yackel, Duane Juneau, Robert Kenny, Dan Thurston, Francis Arvidson, or Martin Sheffer are statutory supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. I find them to be employees as defined in Section 2(3).

III. WORK STOPPAGE AND DISCHARGE

A. Events Leading Up to the Work Stoppage

The work stoppage for which these employees were ultimately discharged was precipitated, in large measure, by ill-will between Respondent's employees and William Fagan, the owner, and Jack Vinnedge, the employee, of Action Welding, a small business that leased space in A-J Center, adjacent to Respondent's automotive shop. That ill-will, in turn, stemmed from a number of problems, particularly the mutual borrowing of tools and equipment and Vinnedge's efforts, by threats of physical harm, to prevent such borrowing by Respondent's employees. On one occasion, around March or early April, a meeting was held between Respondent's employees and Vinnedge to discuss the problem of missing tools. In the course of that meeting, Vinnedge stated that if his tools were not returned he would break someone's arms or legs. He had made similar threats directly to employees Kenny and Thurston earlier that same day. Additionally, Vinnedge had threatened to get certain employees fired by Bonetti, had threatened to get himself placed in charge of the employees, and had complained to Bonetti about what he perceived to be deficiencies in their work. In addition to Vinnedge's threats, Respondent's employees were concerned with dangerous working conditions caused by Vinnedge welding on gas tanks, Action's usurping of space from the automotive shop, and noise, smoke, and clutter caused by Action Welding.

The problems between Respondent's employees and Action Welding came to a head during the week of 21 April. On Wednesday evening, 23 April, Fagan and Barnhart exchanged strong words in a phone conversation over the lack of heat in the A-J Center. Fagan told Barnhart that he was an ex-Marine and would "not put up with it," that Barnhart had gotten in the first lick, but would "get it in the end." Fagan then told Vinnedge of his conversation with Barnhart, making Vinnedge aware that he was angry. On the morning of 24 April, Vinnedge came into the automotive shop where Kenny and Thurston were working. He angrily stated, "I don't see why you are siding up with Tom Barnhart for . . . it is going to come and haunt you in the end. . . . You have Fagan so F'n pissed off, he is going to come with a shotgun and blow you all away."[13] Kenny, who knew Fagan to have a drinking problem, post combat stress syndrone, and a history that included some violent conduct, took this threat seriously. He reported it to Yackel, who had earlier heard of Fagan's threat to Barnhart, and to Barnhart. Barnhart directed Kenny and Thurston to assemble the rest of the crew at the warehouse. When they were gathered, they discussed the threats and Barnhart suggested that they all go to the Hanna Building, Respondent's main office.

B. The Work Stoppage

About 10 a.m., the employees went to the Hanna Building. Bonetti was out of town and they met with Gilbert LaFave, Respondent's associate director. They told LaFave of the threats and of their other complaints. LaFave left them briefly to call Bonetti and, in his absence, the employees examined Respondent's personnel manual. Most of them had never seen it before. They learned of a grievance procedure and discussed such matters as it provisions for annual, personal, and sick leave, and holidays. When LaFave returned, he told the [13] Vinnedge did not testify and Fagan's denial that he had told Vinnedge he would take any such action is irrevelant. Irrelevant also is the absence of evidence that Fagan was observed carrying any weapons.

employees that Bonetti would return that evening. LaFave requested that they clean up the Eagle Furnace facilities for Bonetti, who had a potential buyer for that property, and the employees did so. Several employees also finished up the installation of a furnance.

The employees then prepared a list of complaints, problems, and demands to be presented to Bonetti on Friday. The list, somewhat paraphrased, included:

(a) Vinnedge's lying to Bonetti about the employees.

(b) Vinnedge's attempts to take over the jobs and run the show.

(c) Vinnedge's threats of bodily harm.

(d) Vinnedge's threats to their job security.

(e) Action Welding's imposition on their working space.

(f) Action Welding's use of tools and equipment.

(g) Fagan's drinking on the job.

(h) Poor work being done by Action Welding on Respondent's equipment, necessitating that the work be redone.

(i) Respondent's requiring that employees pay for broken or damaged property even when the damage was not intentional.

(j) Compensation for accumulated leave time between layoff and rehire.

(k) Two week's advance warning if leave was disapproved.

(l) Blaming the employees for messes left by Vinnedge.

(m) Pay for annual leave over 15 days rather than forfeiture.

(n) Reinstatement of the half-hour lunch.

(o) Management to keep its promises of extra days, bonuses, and compensatory time.

(p) Safe equipment such as ladders and power tools needed for weatherization to be provided.

(q) A single day per month for cleanup.

On Friday morning, the employees went directly to the Hanna Building, purposely avoiding the A-J Center so as not to come into contact with Fagan or Vinnedge. They met with Bonetti, Tefft, and Glenwood Johnson, a consultant retained by DICAA, and presented the foregoing list of demands. Each item was discussed, with little or nothing being resolved. There was specific discussion of Vinnedge's threats, including his remarks about Fagan and a shotgun. Bonetti asked each man if he had been personally threatened. According to Bonetti, only Barnhart said that he had. Bonetti concluded that the threat had been exaggerated and that Barnhart was inciting the men. Bonetti's recollection is not corroborated by Johnson, who testified that the men stated that they felt threatened and wanted Action Welding moved away from the automotive shop. Johnson further recalled the employees as stating that they would not return to work unless the problems were cleared up.

At the conclusion of the morning session, Johnson suggested that each side compromise. He told the employees that they should reduce their demands to the most important ones. Following his advice, the employees prepared a shortened list of five demands:

1. Move said party over to some [other part] of compex [sic] with no affiliation whatsoever with said party;

2. No loss in pay for all people present at meetings;

3. All work of Community Action to be done by Community employees;

4. All department heads be in full charge of persons under his or her charge; and

5. [Makela and Weier] on full benefits May 1, 1986 and no loss of pay.

At the bottom of this list was written, in a different hand, "return to work Monday, 7:30 A.M." None of the employees knew who placed that on the list, or when it was placed there.

The shortened list of demands was discussed in the afternon session. Bonetti agreed to meet demands 2 and 4. With respect to item 5, he agreed to put Makela on full benefits, but only to consider such benefits for Weier. In response to item 3, he told the employees that some of the functions of DICAA required the use of professionals, like bookkeepers and other technicals from outside the Agency.[14] No agreement was reached on the central issue, moving Action Welding away from DICAA employees, even though those employees volunteered to move Action Welding into another space. According to Kenny, Bonetti stated that this would be too much trouble.

In this afternoon session, Bonetti believed that Barnhart was losing control of the men. He also claimed to believe that Barnhart was being less than turthful and "felt that it was [his] obligation to jump [Barnhart] on that." About the third time he accused Barnhart of lying, Barnhart took umbrage, rose to his feet, and stated, "We are not making any progress here."[15] Barnhart left and was followed within a few minutes by the rest of the men.

Before they walked out of the meeting, at least some of the employees believed that they would be returning to work on Monday, 28 April. Several had even agreed to unload a truck of windows that had arrived during the meeting. Once outside, however, the men agreed that they would have to do something different to get the issues resolved. Sheffer suggested that they all go home; he, at least, expected the discussions to continue on Monday morning. The employees did not unload the truck; Bonetti did.[16]

[14] This response, like many of his answers to question propounded at trial, was unresponsive to the issue raised. The employees were obviously concerned with Action Welding doing their work, not whether DICAA employed its own bookkeeping or legal staff.

[15] Bonetti's claim on direct examination to the effect that Barnhart had said, "This isn't getting me anywhere" is contradicted by both his testimony as a Sec. 611(c) witness and his transcribed testimony before the DICAA board of governors in the personnel hearing held on 7 May. I am constrained to conclude that he was shading this testimony to support his contention that Barnhart was "inciting" the men for his own purposes.

[16] At this hearing, Bonetti testified that, in his "heart and mind," he believed that he had solved each of the employees' concerns and that the employees had agreed to return to work on Monday. At the personnel

According to Kenny, some of the employees met on Saturday. There was some discussion of securing help from a labor organization, and Kenny, at least, decided that he was not going to work on Monday because Bonetti had not resolved the problem involving Vinnedge and the location of Action Welding. On Sunday night, Barnhart called Sheffer and told him that they would have a meeting on Monday morning at the home of a former DICAA administrator, Glen Polich.[17]

Barnhart and the employees met with Polich on Monday morning. They told him of what had transpired in the prior week and of their concern for their own safety because of Vinnedge's threats. Knowing that Polich had a rapport with one of the DICAA board members, Garland Mainville, they asked for his help in pursuing DICAA's grievance procedure. On their behalf, Polich called Mainville and Mainville promised to call Dorothy Peroceschi, chairperson of the board, to start the grievance procedure. About the same time, the employees, with Polich's assistance, wrote out a request to the local law enforcement authorities, seeking to restrain Bonetti, Vennedge, Fagan, and others from harassing them and took it to the sheriff.

C. The Discharge

When the employees did not return to work as he expected, Bonetti prepared a notice, directing each of them to come to a meeting in his office at 2 p.m. that day. It was personally served on some but not on all of them. None, however, attended Bonetti's meeting. When they failed to attend, Bonetti sent each of them a letter by certified mail, stating that they had been discharged for "misconduct in walking off the job in an un-authorized work stoppage and not attending a scheduled meeting with the Executive Director for which you received written notice." At the hearing, Bonetti testified that they were discharged for failing to come to work and to the meeting on 28 April, not for their refusal to work on 24 and 25 April.

On Tuesday morning, before they learned of their discharges, the employees met again at Polich's home. From there, they drove to Iron Mountain and met with Mainville. Mainville called Peroceschi. She told him that a grievance hearing would not be necessary as Bonetti had already discharged all the employees; Mainville relayed that message to them. They requested a meeting with her and drove to her home where she reiterated what she had told Mainville. After further discussions concerning their situation, she agreed that a grievance hearing would be appropriate. The employees then prepared a grievance, protesting the threats of bodily harm by Vinnedge, threats of job loss if they refused to work overtime, and their discharges while pursuing the grievance procedure.

On 6 May, the employees were informed that a hearing on their grievances would be held the following day. They attended, and appointed Barnhart to be their spokesman to request a postponement so that they could adequately prepare. The request was denied and they refused to cooperate further. The DICAA board of governors sustained the discharges.

D. Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel contends, and I agree, that the activity for which the employees were discharged was concerted activity protected by Sections 7 and 8(a)(1).[18] The work stoppage began with the employees seeking their employer's aid in protecting them from serious harm threatened by an employee of a business to whom their employer had leased adjacent space. Employee complaints related to their safety are protected, even when the threat comes from someone other that the employer. See, for example, Consumers Power Co., 282 NLRB 130 (1986), in which employee complaints about threats of violence by customers were found protected. See also Tamara Foods, 258 NLRB 1307 (1981), enfd. 692 F.2d 1171 (8th Cir. 1982), in which the Board stated "that the Act protects the rights of employees to strike over what they honestly believe to be unsafe and unhealthy working conditions." That is precisely what these employees did.[19]

Moreover, the employes' complaint concerning Vinnedge's threats was not the sole basis for the work stoppage. When they met with Bonetti, they brought up other areas of concern, virtually all within the ambit of statutorily protected conduct. These included other safety complaints (unsafe ladders and tools), threats to their job security, and their work opportunities (see Key City Contractors, 227 NLRB 1884, 1888 (1977)), compensation, leave policies, and breaktimes. All the concerns that they raised were clearly susceptible of resolution by Respondent. While they put some of these issues aside when urged to compromise in the interests of securing an agreement, there is no evidence that they were satisfied with Bonetti's response to these demands. Further, even on their shortened list, there were other protected matters. They sought pay equity for fellow employees hearing of 7 May, earlier referred to, however, he testified to his assumption at that point in time that they would return if management agreed to all five points. He admitted there that no such agreement had been reached. Instead, he told the directors that the employees had been directed to return to work, that he had not given them permission to continue their work stoppage.

[17] I credit Polich's testimony that his first involvement in this dispute was on 27 April when Barnhart informed him of the threats and solicited his help. However, even if I were to find that he had been involved with these employees at some earlier point, I would not find his involvement to detract from what I hereinafter find to be the protected character of the employees' job action. So long as the employees were engaged in protected concerted activity, Polich's reasons for becoming involved are irrelevant.

[18] The employees' protest and work stoppage were clearly concerted and Respondent does not contend that it was unaware of its concerted nature. Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984), remanded sub nom. Prill v. NLRB, 755 F.2d 941 (D.C. Cir. 1985).

[19] There is not a scintilla of credible evidence to support Respondent's claim that the employees relied on Vinnedge's threats as a pretext to justify their work stoppage or to promote any unprotected objective. Having observed these witnesses and reviewed their testimony, I am totally convinced that they perceived the threats as real. Considering the pervasive and mindless violence constantly reported in the news media, it was certainly not unreasonable for them to have done so. Even if I were to find that their fear was unreasonable and their work stoppage unwise and unnecessary, I would still be compelled to find their conduct protected. NLRB v. Washington Aluminum, 370 U.S. 9 (1962); Serendippity-Un-Ltd., 263 NLRB 768 (1982).

Makela and Weier. That demand was among those that even Bonetti realized had to be satisfied if the work stoppage were to end. It was not resolved to the employees' satisfaction.

Respondent contends that the employees' failure to report for work on Monday, 28 April, was in breach of contract, indefensible disloyalty, and in support of an illegal secondary boycott. These defenses are patently without merit. There was no collective-bargaining agreement; therefore, there was no contractual no-strike clause to breach. An employer may not impose a work rule prohibiting walkouts and thereby deprive employees of their statutory rights. Tamara Foods, supra. Similarly, there was no secondary activity involved in the instant case.

Neither was the employees' walkout an act of "indefensible disloyalty." It was a common, everyday strike, totally distinguishable from the actions of the employees in NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1229, 346 U.S. 464 (1953). There, the employees attacked the quality of their employer's product in vitriolic leaflets, which made no reference to the union, the labor controversy in which they were engaged, or the bargaining that had broken down.

Further, Respondent cannot contend that these employees were somehow insubordinate when they failed to report for work on Monday without advising Bonetti of their intention to continue their protest or when they refused to attend the meeting that he had scheduled. After they refused to unload the truckload of windows on Friday, Bonetti had no basis to expect them to report for work on Monday, even if he believed that he had satisfied their demands. More importantly, however their failure to notify Bonetti and their rejection of his proposed meeting as a method of resolving the problems are totally irrelevant to the question of whether their concerted activities were protected. Serendippity-Un-Ltd., supra. Indeed, at the very time that Bonetti was ordering them to attend his meeting and then discharging them for their failure to comply, these employees were pursuing other avenues within Respondent's organization to resolve their complaints. They were not required to do otherwise. Having experienced frustration in their attempts to deal with Bonetti, they were free to engage in the concerted activity that they deemed appropriate and to pursue their goals through members of Respondent's board of governors and Respondent's own grievance procedure. In Millcraft Furniture Co., 282 NLRB 543, 595 (1987), the employees refused to obey an order that they discussed their complaint with a particular supervisor, the subject of their complaint, and insisted that they would only meet with a particular higher-level official. The Board found that their conduct was protected, not insubordinate, and stated:

> Rather . . . the employees . . . had the right under Section 7 of the Act to seek to voice their grievances to the Respondent official of their choice . . . . Thus, the Board has long held, with court approval, that the Act allows employees to engage in any concerted activity that they decide is appropriate for their mutual aid and protection, unless that activity is specifically banned by another part of the statute, or falls within other well-established proscriptions, such as violent conduct or indefensible disloyalty.

As we have seen, the employees' conduct was not violent, did not fall within any other statutory proscriptions, and was not disloyal as the Board and the courts have used that term.

The individuals named in the complaint, I have found and concluded, were employees entitled to the protections of the Act. They were engaged in protected concerted activities and were discharged because they were so engaged. Their discharges violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and I so find.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent, Dickinson-Iron Community Action Agency; Dickinson-Iron Alternative Fuel Energy Corporation; Eagle Fiber Fuels Manufacturing, Inc., has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent discharged Edwin Yackel, Duane Juneau, Robert Kenny, Francis Arvidson, Martin Sheffer, Daniel Thurston, Richard Makela, and William Weier because they engaged in protected concerted activity, I shall order that Respondent offer each of them immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions, or to substantially equivalent positions if their former positions no longer exist, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges. I shall further order that Respondent make each of them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination practiced against them, such earnings to be computed in accordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Further, I shall order that all references to their discharges be removed from Respondent's files and that Respondent notify them, in writing, that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

The General Counsel seeks, for compliance purposes, a visitatorial clause in the recommended Order. Such a clause would permit the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Board's Order. Under the circumstances of this case, including the absence of any indication of prior violations and the straightforwardness of the compliance issues, I deem it unnecessary to include such a clause and shall deny the General Counsel's request. See, for example, Two-M, 281 NLRB 502 (1986).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Dickinson-Iron Community Action Agency; Dickinson-Iron Alternative Fuel Energy Corporation; Eagle Fiber Fuels Manufacturing, Inc., which together comprise a single employer, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Edwin Yackel, Duane Juneau, Robert Kenny, Francis Arvidson, Martin Sheffer, Daniel Thurston, Richard Makela, and William Weier are employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act.

3. By discharging the above-named employees because they engaged in protected concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The Respondent, Dickinson-Iron Community Action Agency; Dickinson-Iron Alternative Fuel Energy Corporation; Eagle Fiber Fuels Manufacturing, Inc., Iron River, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging employees because they engage in protected concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

(b) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Edwin Yackel, Duane Juneau, Robert Kenny, Daniel Thurston, Francis Arvidson, Martin Sheffer, Richard Makela, and William Weier immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from Respondent's files all references to the terminations of the above-named employees and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful terminations will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(c) Post at its Iron River, Michigan facilities, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 30, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[20] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[21] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees because they engage in protected concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Edwin Yackel, Duane Juneau, Robert Kenny, Daniel Thurston, Francis Arvidson, Martin Sheffer, Richard Makela, and William Weier immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to their discharges and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 10 June 1986 Adminstrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief, and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Janet Holland Branch, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Andrew A. Canoutas, Esq., of Wilmington, North Carolina, for the Union.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. The hearing in this case held on 24 March 1986 is based on a charge filed by James Luther Johnson Jr., an individual (Johnson), on 31 December 1985,[1] and amended on 18 February 1986, and an amended complaint and notice of hearing (complaint) issued on 24 February 1986 on behalf of the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) by the Regional Director for Region 11 alleging that International Longshoremen's Association, Local 1426 (the Union) has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The Union in its answer to the complaint admitted various allegations of the complaint, but denied the commission of any of the alleged unfair labor practices.

[1] All dates are 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate and introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Union.

On the entire record of the case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Waterfront Services, Incorporated (Waterfront) is a North Carolina corporation with a facility located at Wilmington, North Carolina, where it is engaged in the docking and undocking of ships at the port of Wilmington, North Carolina. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Waterfront, in the course and conduct of its business operations, received at its Wilmington, North Carolina facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of North Carolina. During the same period, Waterfront provided to customers outside the State of North Carolina services valued in excess of $50,000. The complaint alleges, the Union admits, and I find, that Waterfront is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Wilmington Shipping Company (WSC) is a North Carolina corporation with a facility located at Wilmington, North Carolina, where it also is engaged in the docking and undocking of ships at the Port of Wilmington, North Carolina. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, WSC received at its Wilmington, North Carolina facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of North Carolina. During the same period, WSC provided to customers outside the State of North Carolina services valued in excess of $50,000. The complaint alleges, the Union admits, and I find that WSC is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The parties admit, and I find, that the Union is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Central Issue

The central issue presented in this case is whether the Union failed and refused for unfair, arbitrary, and invidious reasons, and in contravention of its exclusive hiring hall arrangement with the North Carolina Shipping Association (Association) to refer Johnson to employment with Association member Waterfront at the port of Wilmington on 22 August and to employment with Association member WSC at the port of Wilmington on 30 December.[2] For the reasons hereinafter discussed, I find for the Union.

B. Background

The Association is an organization composed of approximately 14 employers and exists at least in part for the purpose of representing its employer members in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements with various labor organizations including the Union herein. At all material times, Waterfront and WSC have been employer members of and have authorized the Association to bargain collectively with the Union covering wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of their respective employees in admittedly appropriate bargaining units.[3] At all material times, the Association and Union have maintained a practice[4] permitting the Union to be the sole and exclusive source of referrals to employment with members of the Association including Waterfront and WSC for the units just described above.

In operating the hiring hall, the Union conducts what is referred to as "shape-up" on a daily basis. A number of things occur during shape-up, some of which will be referred to only in general terms while others will be discussed in greater detail. The Union's business agent or his designated assistant is present in the hiring hall for shape-up.[5] Two Guaranteed Annual Income (GAI) dispatchers[6] are also present in the hiring hall during and after each days' shape-up. Certain longshoremen are guaranteed an annual income and if they are not referred for work the required number of hours to meet their guaranteed income, they are paid the amount they are annually guaranteed from a special fund established for that purpose.

The GAI dispatchers who work 5 days per week from 6 a.m. until 1 p.m.[7] generally commence daily at approximately 6:15 a.m. to give each GAI longshoreman, who is present in the hiring hall and desiring to work that day, a badge.[8] The GAI longshoremen are also given slips that are filled out and at approximately 6:30 or 7 a.m. the business agent (or assistant business agent) announces that it is shape-up time. Headers (or foremen) obtain certain paperwork from the Union and then proceed to hire their work gangs for that day. The hiring of work gangs is done inside the hiring hall. The headers first hire those who are regularly assigned to their gangs.[9] The work gangs are hired based on the workers' GAI status and by seniority classification. After a header has hired all longshoremen regularly assigned to his work gang and finds he still needs workers, he hires the additional workers by seniority classification from those present in the hiring hall.[10] If all of the seniority classifications are exhausted, the header may then hire casuals. Whenever a header has completed assembling his work gang for any particular workday, he takes the necessary paperwork to the employer at the docks and the longshoremen then go to work. The two GAI dispatchers remain behind at the hiring hall to process the paperwork necessary to administer the GAI program.[11] Inasmuch as the GAI dispatchers are on the payroll of the GAI fund from 6 a.m. until 1 p.m., they are precluded from going to work at any other job during that time.[12]

If after all headers have hired all the longshoremen they need for their gangs for any particular day and there still are those seeking to be employed on that day, those unemployed longshoremen and casuals generally remain in the hiring hall for a portion of the workday to see if any header will, for any reason, need any additional workers. If additional workers are needed, the header comes to or calls the hiring hall. The business agent (or assistant business agent) will announce the need for additional longshoremen over a public address system[13] and those longshoremen or casuals waiting in the hall will present themselves by seniority to the business agent (or assistant business agent) for employment.

[2] Johnson contends he lost a half day's work on 22 August and a full day's work on 30 December. The General Counsel acknowledges Johnson was properly referred to employment by the Union prior to 22 August and after 22 August until 30 December. She also acknowledges he has been properly referred to employment at all times since 30 December.

[3] The admittedly appropriate unit at Waterfront is as follows:

> All employees engaged in the loading or discharging of ships at the Employer's location at the Port of Wilmington, North Carolina; excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The admittedly appropriate unit at WSC is as follows:

> All employees engaged in the loading or unloading of ships at the Employer's location at the Port of Wilmington, North Carolina; excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[4] A copy of the hiring hall procedures, which it appears was posted at the hiring hall in 1976, was received in evidence as Jt. Exh. 3(b).

[5] Sammy Hicks (Hicks) is the Union's business agent and when he is not present his assistant, Clayton Alfred Vaught (Vaught), fills in for him.

[6] The two dispatchers are Chester Wiggins (Wiggins) and Johnny McCoy (McCoy).

[7] I find the evidence is persuasive that the GAI dispatchers' tours of duty at the hiring hall are from 6 a.m. until 1 p.m. notwithstanding the General Counsel's contention to the contrary. The General Counsel was never able by any reliable evidence to demonstrate the GAI dispatcher's hours were otherwise.

[8] The badges are simply plastic cards with the longshoreman's name and classification thereon.

[9] Longshoremen must stand in front of the headers in the hiring hall to present themselves for employment.

[10] GAI longshoremen are given first priority by seniority for employment. Thereafter there are six seniority classifications utilized, namely, (A) through (F) inclusive, with (A) being the most senior. Others who may be present in the hiring hall who have no classification are referred to as casuals. (Wilmington, North Carolina Longshore Seniority Plan Jt. Exh. 2).

[11] The GAI dispatchers do not work for, nor are they paid by, the Union; rather, they work for the GAI fund which is administered from Jacksonville, Florida.

[12] I credit Local Union President Willie Sloan's (Sloan) testimony that he established the above-stated rule to preclude the GAI dispatchers from being on two payrolls at the same time and to prevent them from being in competition with other longshoremen who might be present at the hiring hall wanting to go to work. After 1 p.m., the GAI dispatchers revert to the status of GAI longshoremen with a seniority classification. President Sloan credibly testified he did not want a GAI dispatcher to take a job before 1 p.m. if there were any longshoremen waiting in the union hall for a job.

[13] The public address system can be heard in the hiring, dining and restroom areas. There is an outside speaker, but it is usually not utilized.

If a header returns to the hiring hall and the business agent or his assistant is not present, the header may hire by seniority classification anyone in the hiring hall area.

C. Applicable Hiring Hall Principles

It is appropriate at this point to very briefly highlight some applicable principles governing hiring hall practices. Applicable law clearly establishes that unions operating exclusive hiring halls must do so in a manner that is free from arbitrary or invidious treatment of those utilizing the hiring hall services. A union's power in operating an exclusive hiring hall is so great that any action by it that prevents an employer from hiring a user of its hiring hall services will be presumed to encourage union membership among those who perceive the union's actions and hence will be found to violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. Teamsters Local 5 (Hebert & Co.), 272 NLRB 1375, 1378–1379 (1984). Carpenters Local 720 (Stone & Webster), 274 NLRB 1506 (1985). Applicable law as reflected in Carpenters Local 25 (Mocon Corp.), 270 NLRB 623, 630 (1984), enfd. 769 F.2d 574 (9th Cir. 1985), also establishes:

> A union which demonstrates the fair and regular utilization of facially valid hiring hall regulations in determining the order of dispatch among registrants clearly establishes a sufficient defense to allegations of impropriety in the selection or rejection of applicants for employment referral. If, however, following proper rules is a defense to a hiring hall allegation, ignoring or violating such rules is not. The Board holds that where clear and unambiguous hiring hall regulations are ignored or violated so as to prevent an otherwise entitled individual from being dispatched to employment, without more, a prima facie violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act has been established.

It is not unlawful for a union to enforce a valid exclusive hiring hall arrangement by requesting that an employer discharge an employee from a job that the employee secured outside the valid exclusive hiring hall procedure. See Laborers Local 596 (Hood Contractors), 216 NLRB 778 (1975).

D. The 22 August Referrals

1. Facts

On 22 August, Johnson went to the hiring hall at approximately 9 a.m.[14] Johnson testified he ate breakfast with Local Union President Sloan and after doing so went to the hiring area at the union hall to wait for any job that might become available that day.[15] Johnson testified he did not leave the hiring area at the union hall until 1:30 p.m.

Leo Wilson (Wilson) testified he rotated working as a header with Joseph M. Pridgen (Pridgen) on a particular work gang at Waterfront. On 22 August, Pridgen worked as the header. Pridgen's work gang tied up a vessel at the port that morning and Waterfront's management then told him his work gang would be tying up a larger vessel that afternoon and he would need two longshoremen in addition to his regular gang in order to be able to tie up the larger vessel.[16] Pridgen told Wilson to go to the hiring hall and get two additional longshoremen to assist his work gang that afternoon in tying up the larger vessel. Wilson credibly testified he went to the union hall between 11 and 11:30 a.m.[17] Wilson stated he entered the hiring hall, but saw no one in the hall.[18] After looking around the hall he happened to see Wiggins. Wilson told Wiggins he was going to need two additional longshoremen that afternoon. Wiggins wanted to know what time that afternoon and Wilson told him 2:30 p.m. Wiggins told Wilson he would not take the job unless it was after 2 p.m.[19] Wilson told Wiggins not to mess him up and to be at the dock at 2:30 p.m.[20] Not finding anyone else, Wilson returned to the docks and finished tying up the vessel that was already in port.

After tying up the vessel already in port, Wilson returned to the hiring hall at about noon.[21] When Wilson arrived at the hiring hall, he saw Johnson sitting on the stage in the hiring area and told him:

> We're going to need a man to tie up . . . . We got a ship coming in and we're going to need a line handler . . . . Go to the office and let Vaught

---

[14] Johnson had worked that morning from approximately 5 to 8 a.m. at a port location in Wilmington, North Carolina.

[15] Johnson holds a "F" seniority classification, is not a regular gang member, and is not a GAI longshoreman.

[16] Actually a third additional longshoreman was needed that afternoon because longshoreman William Canaday (Canaday), who normally worked in Pridgen's gang and in fact worked during the morning hours of 22 August, did not work that afternoon. Pridgen allowed J. C. Corbette (Corbette) to work over from a previous shift to replace Canaday that afternoon. No contention was made that it was improper for Pridgen to allow Corbette to work over.

[17] Wilson stated it was normal procedure to go to the hiring hall because all hiring took place there.

[18] Contrary to Wilson's testimony, Johnson stated he was in the hiring area of the union hall when Wilson came into the hall at approximately 11:30 a.m. Wilson impressed me as attempting to testify truthfully and with good recollection. He appeared very conscientious and was a forthright witness with a sincere and believable expression. Accordingly, I credit his testimony that no one was in the hiring hall when he entered the hall at 11:30 a.m. It would be mere speculation on my part to comment on where Johnson may have been at the time Wilson was in the hall on his first visit to the union hall on 22 August. The thing I am persuaded of is that Wilson did not see Johnson in the hiring area at the union hall during his 11:30 a.m. visit. I am convinced that if Johnson had been in the hall, Wilson would have seen him because he was anxiously seeking to find two additional workers so he could go to lunch and then report back to the port. The fact that Wilson had nothing against Johnson nor any reason not to want to hire him is borne out by the fact that Wilson specifically told Johnson about the remaining job during his second visit to the hiring hall on 22 August.

[19] Wiggins, although placing the time of the meeting somewhat differently than Wilson, corroborated in essential parts Wilson's testimony. Wiggins stated he could not work that day before 2 p.m. because he had to go to the post office and run an errand for his wife. Wilson stated he is a GAI longshoreman with an "A" classification after 1 p.m. daily.

[20] Wilson stated that when no one was in the hiring hall it was proper for him to hire in the manner he did. Johnson acknowledged that Wilson had the authority to hire necessary workers when the business agent or his assistant were not present in the hiring hall.

[21] Johnson places the time at 12:15 p.m.

> know, you know, and, you can probably get the job.[22]

Wilson then spoke with Vaught who was acting on behalf of business agent Hicks and told him he needed one additional longshoreman.[23]

Union President Sloan testified he spoke with Wilson at the hiring hall and that Wilson told him he needed a line handler for that afternoon and that Johnson was the only one in the hall so he guessed Johnson would probably be the one coming down to the docks.[24] Sloan testified he then walked over to the stage where Johnson was and told him:

> Buddy [Johnson], Leo [Wilson] said he had a line handling job down there, so you better go in and asked Vaught about that job . . . before somebody comes in here with a higher classification than you have.

President Sloan stated he asked Johnson if he was going to get the job and Johnson told him he did not know, that he was waiting on the announcement for the job. Sloan again told Johnson to go and ask Vaught for the job before someone came in with a higher seniority classification.[25] Sloan left the area while Johnson was still sitting on the stage in the hiring hall area.

Johnson testified he passed in front of Vaught's office two or three times to ask him about the job but each time he did so Vaught was on the telephone. Johnson testified he went to the door at the back of the hiring hall to see if there was any other longshoreman out there possibly with a higher classification than he had. Johnson stated he noticed Lee Clark (Clark) coming down the hill toward the hiring hall. Johnson testified he went back past Vaught's office door and Clark headed toward the dining area in the building. Vaught came out of his office and announced he needed a line handler.[26] Clark stated, "Well, I guess that's me." Vaught replied he guessed so since Clark was the senior man.[27] Clark got the job. Johnson told Vaught that both Wilson and President Sloan had mentioned the job to him.[28]

After Clark got the job, Johnson went upstairs to look for President Sloan to let him know what had happened and to tell him how Vaught had sat on the job and that he had not been given the job. When Johnson went upstairs, which was about 1:15 p.m., he saw Canaday, a regular work gang member. Johnson testified Canaday told him that header Pridgen needed three line handlers for that afternoon. Johnson stated he asked who had been selected and Canaday told him Wiggins and Corbette, and he did not know who Vaught had been able to get as the third longshoreman. Johnson asked Canaday about the circumstances of Wiggins being hired. Canaday told him he did not know. Johnson then went back downstairs and asked Vaught about Wiggins having been hired and told Vaught what Canaday had said. Vaught told Johnson he did not know what the situation was with Wiggins, but he was on his way to the docks and he would check it out. Thereafter, Vaught returned to the hiring hall and told Johnson Wiggins had been hired at the union hall.[29]

Johnson testified he then left the union hall and went to the docks to find Pridgen to see if Pridgen was aware of the procedure by which Wiggins had been hired for that day.[30] Johnson testified that after he arrived at the docks, he encountered Wiggins before he found Pridgen. Wiggins credibly testified Johnson approached him and asked him who had given him his job. Wiggins told Johnson Wilson had given him the job.[31] Johnson told Wiggins he was going to have that job, that Wiggins did not have any business at the docks, and asked where Wilson was. Wiggins told Johnson he did not know where Wilson was and added:

> Well, I didn't come down here for no hassle from you or anybody else . . . . If the job means that much to you, we don't have to argue about it. You can have it.[32]

Wiggins immediately went to where Pridgen was. Wiggins told Pridgen and Wilson he did not want to cause any problems and he was going home. Thereafter, Johnson came to where they were.[33] Wilson testified he told

---

[22] I credit Wilson's testimony that he did not tell Johnson he had the job. Wilson's explanation that he did not tell Johnson he had the job is very plausible. Wilson stated if he had told Johnson he had the job he would not have needed to inform Vaught of the position or have had Vaught make an announcement about the position.

[23] Vaught corroborated Wilson's testimony regarding his second visit to the hiring hall.

[24] After Wilson spoke with Sloan, he went home to eat lunch and then went directly to the docks.

[25] Johnson acknowledged that about 15 minutes after Wilson talked to him, President Sloan approached and told him an extra line handler was needed and said he should speak to Vaught about it immediately and not give Vaught time to call anyone else on the telephone. I specifically do not credit Johnson's denial that President Sloan mentioned anything about the possibility of someone coming in with a higher classification.

[26] Vaught made the announcement without using the public address system; however, there is no evidence that anyone else was in the hall other than Clark and Johnson and both of them heard the announcement.

[27] It is undisputed that Clark had a "C" classification whereas Johnson had a "F" classification.

[28] It is undisputed that, about noon, header Walter Nelson came to the hiring hall and told Vaught he needed an additional longshoreman. Johnson heard Nelson ask for the additional help and he heard Vaught announce the job. Johnson presented himself for that job; however, there was another longshoreman present with identical classification and the header chose the other longshoreman. There is no contention of any wrongdoing on the part of the Union or the header in selecting the other longshoreman.

[29] Johnson testified Vaught told him Wiggins said he had been hired by Wilson. I do not view this statement of Johnson to be inconsistent with Vaught's credited testimony.

[30] Wilson testified he let Pridgen know the gang had been filled and told him about Wiggins.

[31] Wilson testified he saw Pridgen, Clark, Wiggins, and Johnson at the docks and figured Johnson had been given a job at the hiring hall.

[32] Johnson contends he asked Wiggins if he knew about President Sloan's not allowing GAI dispatchers to accept employment before 2 p.m. when longshoremen were available and that GAI dispatchers were not to accept work outside their original work gangs. Although I have not credited Johnson's testimony when it was contradicted by others, I do not view this contention of Johnson to be in contradiction of any of Wiggins' testimony. Johnson acknowledged Wiggins told him he could have the job he (Wiggins) had been given.

[33] Johnson testified that after he approached the others, the only thing he heard Wiggins say to Pridgen was that he would catch him next time.

Wiggins he was the one that had hired him (Wiggins) and to make it right he (Wilson) would leave. Wiggins made no response to Wilson's comments and left. Wilson told Pridgen that he (Wilson) was responsible for hiring Wiggins and for getting the gang shaped up for that day and because of that he would leave and give his job to Johnson. Wilson then told Johnson he could have his job. Johnson told Wilson he could handle it.

Pridgen told Johnson he could have the job Wiggins had been given.

At approximately 3:30 p.m. when the larger vessel arrived at the dock and as Johnson was reaching for the ropes that the vessel crew threw over for the longshoremen to tie the vessel up with, Vaught approached and told Johnson he did not have a job because he had not gotten his job through the hiring hall. Vaught told Johnson he was trespassing and replaced him with Vince Spencer, a more senior longshoreman.[34]

2. Analysis and conclusion

The General Counsel has not established that the Union violated the Act in any manner with respect to its actions related to Johnson on 22 August. Wilson's hiring of Wiggins to work on the afternoon of 22 August was in keeping with established procedures at the hiring hall. Neither the business agent nor his assistant was present in the hall when Wilson hired Wiggins. No longshoremen were present in the hiring hall seeking employment when Wilson hired Wiggins. Wilson, Vaught, and Johnson all stated that when the business agent or his assistant was not in the hiring hall, a header (such as Wilson) could hire anyone he located in the hiring hall so long as he observed seniority classifications. Wilson needed additional longshoremen as soon as he could get them, and he employed the only person he could find at the hiring hall at that time, namely, Wiggins. Inasmuch as there were no business agents in the hiring hall and no one seeking employment, there was no requirement for, nor is there any evidence to suggest that it had ever been the practice for, a header or his designee to make an announcement about a job vacancy when no one was present. It appears such an act in futility had never been required. The actions related to Wiggins did not violate President Sloan's rule regarding GAI dispatchers accepting employment. President Sloan's rule regarding GAI dispatchers was simply that they could not go to work between 6 a.m. and 1 p.m., not that they could not accept work during that period if the work was to commence after 1 p.m. and if there were no longshoremen in the hall waiting for a job.

I note there is nothing to suggest that the referral of Clark to one of the jobs on 22 August was other than in accordance with the rules of the hiring hall. Vaught announced the job, albeit verbally instead of over the public address system, to the only two longshoremen in the hall. Clark had more seniority than Johnson and was properly given the job. Johnson did not make his availability for the job known to Vaught before Clark arrived at the hiring hall.[35]

Finally, it was within the hiring hall rules for Vaught to remove Johnson from the job at Waterfront on 22 August because he had not obtained his position through the hiring hall. Johnson knew he could not obtain employment by having a longshoreman walk off the job and he then be given that job without going through the hiring hall. Johnson clearly did not go through the hiring hall when he took the job Wiggins had been properly given earlier.

In summation, I am persuaded the record evidence demonstrates the Union followed its hiring hall rules in making referrals on 22 August. There is no contention the Union's rules were invalid in any manner. In accordance with applicable law, utilization, as was the case herein, in a fair and regular manner of facially valid hiring hall regulations establishes a sufficient defense to allegations of impropriety in the referral of applicants for employment. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the complaint allegations that the Union unlawfully refused to refer Johnson for employment with Waterfront on 22 August be dismissed.

E. The 30 December Referrals

1. Facts

Johnson reported to the hiring hall on 30 December at approximately 6:25 a.m. Johnson wrote out a "gang card" for header Soloman McKant because the longshoreman who writes out the gang card for a header is "usually" selected by that header to work on his work gang. Johnson was unable to work on McKant's gang because all the longshoremen McKant hired were senior to Johnson. Johnson asserts he tried to get on header Philip McCoy's gang but stated by the time he presented himself to McCoy, there was only one slot left on McCoy's gang and McCoy selected someone else for that remaining slot. According to Johnson, McCoy's gang was going to work on a tobacco laden boat that day.[36]

Johnson then left the hiring hall area and went upstairs to the office area around 8 a.m. where he met President Sloan at the water fountain. President Sloan testified he knew that all longshoremen that wanted to work that day would already be gone from the hiring hall by that time because jobs were plentiful, in fact so plentiful that 12 or 13 casuals had been referred for employment on [34] Johnson left the dock area and went to the union hall where he contacted Local Union President Sloan. President Sloan, Vaught, and Johnson met briefly that evening; however, I find it unnecessary in deciding the issues herein to consider what took place at the meeting between those three that evening.

[35] There is no evidence to establish that Clark was called to the hiring hall for the specific purpose of giving him the job in question in order to preclude Johnson from getting it.

[36] I do not credit Johnson's testimony that he sought employment with McCoy's gang that morning. McCoy's gang was, as just indicated, going to work on a tobacco laden vessel. Johnson admitted that when President Sloan asked him that morning if he was going to work that day, he told him: "[N]o, I didn't think I wanted to bother with tobacco. I'd been handling it for the last five days and I was having trouble with my back." Additionally, the uncontradicted testimony of President Sloan reflects that 12 or 13 casuals were hired to work on tobacco laden vessels that day and Johnson with a "F" classification could have been referred for employment ahead of any casual if he had wanted to work handling tobacco that day.

hat day. Sloan stated he observed that Johnson and one ther longshoreman Charles Knox (Knox), were still in he hiring hall. Sloan questioned Johnson about his still eing at the hiring hall, and asked, "Buddy [Johnson] ou're not going to work?" Johnson responded, "No, res. I've been handling that tobacco for five days and 'm not going to today." Sloan told Johnson, "Okay, vell, you know why I asked you this question don't ou?" Johnson asked, "Why?" and Sloan told him, Well, I'm asking you this question so if you come up hort of hours at the end of the year, you'll know vhy."[37] President Sloan then questioned Knox in the ame manner that he had questioned Johnson.[38]

At approximately 8:30 or 9 a.m., Vaught was notified hat an extra winchman was needed at once on one of he work gangs. Vaught made an announcement for the osition but there were no winch operators in the hiring all.[39] Vaught testified winch operators were in short upply, and as a result, they did not have one on each vork gang each day.[40] Vaught stated he had to leave he union hall and go to the docks to try and find a vinch operator. Vaught testified he asked Lanier Sloan, casual, if he would like to take a chance on making a witch that he had to go to the docks to try to locate a vinch operator. Vaught stated he took Lanier Sloan vith him to the docks so that he would have someone to swap out with the header of whatever crew he was able o secure a winch operator from. Vaught testified he did not observe Johnson in the hiring hall when he left; however, he stated he was not particularly looking for anyone because there were plenty of jobs that morning. Johnson made no mention to Vaught about wanting to go to work on 22 August. According to Vaught, any ongshoremen who wanted employment could have had a job on that day. Vaught stated he assumed that anyone who was still in the hall at the time he went to look for a winch operator did not wish to work that day.

Business Agent Hicks notified President Sloan of the need for an extra winch operator. Hicks told Sloan he had sent Vaught to the docks with an individual to swap out for a winch operator.[41]

Vaught visited at least two boats (a tobacco laden one and a steel laden one) at two different berths (4 and 8) before he was able to persuade header McKant to release longshoreman Richard Jenkins (Jenkins), a qualified winch operator. Vaught gave McKant Lanier Sloan as a replacement for Jenkins.[42] Vaught then transported Jenkins to the vessel that needed an extra winch operator and thereafter returned to the hiring hall.

After lunch that same day (30 December), Johnson spoke with Business Agent Hicks and then asked Vaught if he had made a swap out at the state docks that day.[43] Johnson testified he asked Vaught why he had not made an announcement about the job that he gave to Lanier Sloan. Vaught told Johnson he did not think it was necessary because he thought all longshoremen with any classification that wanted a job that day had already gone to work earlier that morning. Johnson told Vaught there were four longshoremen with classifications in the hall.[44] Johnson then met with President Sloan in Vaught's presence and told him what had taken place. President Sloan told Johnson there was nothing he could do about it at that time.[45]

2. Analysis and conclusions

I am persuaded the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Union unlawfully refused to refer Johnson for employment with WSC on 30 December for the following reasons. It is clear that job positions were plentiful at the shapeup on 30 December, and Johnson was present at shapeup. Twelve or more casuals were referred for employment on that day and any longshoremen, including Johnson, who wanted a job that morning could have obtained employment. At some point after shapeup, an extra winch operator was needed and an announcement was made about the position; however, there was no one in the hiring hall qualified as a winch operator.[46] Under the circumstances herein, it was not unreasonable for Vaught to ask Lanier Sloan, a casual, if he wanted to accompany him as a possible replacement for any winch operator he might find on any work gang at the docks. Johnson had clearly stated he did not want to work on a tobacco laden vessel that day. Vaught at the time he left the hall with Sloan did not know whether he would find a winch operator on a tobacco laden vessel or on some other type ship. Likewise, Vaught was justified in assuming that anyone who was still at the hiring hall at the time he left with Lanier Sloan did not [37] President Sloan stated he always asked Johnson and others when he observed them at the hiring hall when jobs were plentiful whether they desired to work that day or not. Sloan stated he questioned them so he could remind them when they did not get certain benefits at the end of the year based on a lack of hours that they had been too "choosy" about the jobs they accepted and as such they had not accumulated the necessary hours to receive the extra benefits.

[38] Knox told Sloan he had a shoulder injury and was not going to work that day.

[39] I do not credit Johnson's testimony that Vaught did not make an announcement about the winch operator's position. It is undisputed that Johnson was not qualified as a winch operator.

[40] Vaught stated the shortage came about because some of the longshoremen who had been trained as winch operators had retired, and others were simply not taking the training necessary for that type position.

[41] Hicks also informed President Sloan that Vaught had found a winch operator and had made a swap out with the work gang that he had taken the winch operator from. Sloan gave Hicks his okay.

[42] Jenkins did not want to be utilized as a winch operator, but after some persuasion agreed to the swap out.

[43] Johnson stated he saw Jenkins in the hiring hall about 11:45 a.m., and asked him what he was doing there so early. According to Johnson, Jenkins told him he (Johnson) could not do the job that he (Jenkins) was doing but he did not tell Johnson what it was he was doing. Johnson stated he learned from others that Vaught had taken Jenkins to another job and had replaced Jenkins with Lanier Sloan.

[44] Johnson testified that other than himself, Leroy Tidsdale, Knox, and William Brooks (Brooks) were in the hall. According to Johnson, Tidsdale, who had a "C" classification, was referred to a job pursuant to an announcement by Vaught at approximately 9 o'clock that morning. Knox, as noted earlier, told President Sloan he did not want to work that day. Brooks was not called as a witness and there is no evidence regarding his actual availability for referral other than Johnson's testimony that he was at the hiring hall. Brooks has a D classification according to Johnson.

[45] President Sloan testified that the worker who got the swap out job had been on the job for 4 hours at the time Johnson spoke with him. Sloan also stated Johnson could have gone to work that morning if he had wanted to.

[46] Johnson did not contend he was qualified as a winch operator.

want to work that day because there had been a large number of casuals referred for work that morning. The evidence clearly suggests Vaught was not trying to circumvent the policy of making an announcement for a job vacancy when he took Lanier Sloan with him because other position vacancies were announced that morning including the winch operator's position. Johnson did not express to Vaught any interest in working that day. Of the four longshoremen that Johnson contends were still in the hiring hall, Knox did not want to work that day, Tidsdale did work, and Brooks did not testify, therefore little, if anything, is known about his actual availability for work that morning. According to President Sloan, it was not unusual for longshoremen to be at the hiring hall and yet not be seeking employment. In fact, President Sloan testified he always questioned those who were present in the hiring hall when jobs were plentiful about their not going to work and even reminded them, as he did on this occasion, that if they came up short on hours at the end of the year, not to blame him but to simply recall that they had been too "choosy" in selecting jobs they would accept. The Union's failure to make an announcement about the possible replacement job was not an arbitrary or unlawful breach of its rules. Vaught could not have known at the time he left the hiring hall if a swap out would actually take place or, if it did, on what vessel it would take place. Therefore, there was really nothing for him to announce. Inasmuch as jobs were plentiful on the day in question, Vaught was justified in assuming that no one at the hiring hall had any interest in filling a vacancy that a possible swap out might create. Accordingly, after considering all the circumstances herein, I cannot find the Union acted unfairly, unreasonably, without justification, or in an arbitrary manner in its actions on 30 December. I shall, therefore, recommend that the complaint allegations that the Union unlawfully refused to refer Johnson for employment with WSC on 30 December be dismissed.

On the foregoing factual findings and conclusions, I reach the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Waterfront Services, Incorporated is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Wilmington Shipping Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

3. International Longshoremen's Association, Local 1426 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. The Union has not engaged in the unfair labor practice alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[47]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 6 June 1986 Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings. We further find totally without merit the Respondent's allegations of bias and prejudice on the part of the judge. On our full consideration of the record and the judge's decision, we perceive no evidence that the judge prejudged the case, made prejudicial rulings, or demonstrated a bias against the Respondent in his analysis or discussion of the evidence. We also find nothing improper in the judge's questions to the Respondent's witnesses.

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent failed to comply with the reinstatement provisions of the settlement agreement. In agreeing with the judge, we recognize that the Respondent experienced a significant reduction in orders for Cadaco game cards in 1985. The Respondent hired the discriminatees in May and June 1984 when its business was expanding dramatically because of the Cadaco contract. The employees were discharged in November 1984 and the settlement agreement was executed on 22 April 1985. By the summer of 1985, orders for Cadaco game cards had decreased, with a resulting decline in bindery work. Although the amount of bindery work available after the settlement agreement was substantially less than what existed in 1984, the record shows that the Respondent periodically produced game cards for Cadaco throughout 1985. The record further shows that on numerous occasions the Respondent bypassed the discriminatees and used employees with less seniority, including individuals referred by temporary employment services, to perform the Cadaco work. In view of this evidence, we find that the Respondent did not abide by the reinstatement provisions of the settlement agreement.

[2] We correct the judge's inadvertent error in par. 2(b) of his recommended Order, under which the Respondent is to notify the employees in writing that the discharges and warning will not be used against them in any way.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Middle Earth Graphics, Inc., Kalamazoo, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

A. Bradley Howell, Esq., and Richard F. Czubaj, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Francis T. Coleman, Esq., and Scott R. Merrill, Esq., of Washington, D.C., for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER H. MALONEY JR., Administrative Law Judge. The first nine of the consolidated cases initially came on for hearing before me on April 22, 1985, and they all came on for hearing ultimately on January 28, through February 5, 1986, at Kalamazoo, Michigan, on consolidated complaints[1] issued by the Regional Director of Region 7, which allege that Respondent Middle Earth Graphics, Inc.,[2] violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act and that it failed to comply with the provisions of a settlement agreement, thereby authorizing the Regional Director to set aside the agreement and to prosecute earlier unfair labor practices ostensibly settled therein. More particularly, the consolidated complaint alleges that the Respondent repeatedly threatened employ-

[1] The principal docket entries in the consolidated cases are as follows: Charges filed by James Cannon Jr., Lidell Ford Jr., Wayne Ford, Karen Root, Clark Olson, Patricia Ann Cole, Garry Wayne Root, and Lamar Edwards, respectively, against Respondent Middle Earth Graphics, Inc., between November 13 and 29, 1984, in Cases 7–CA–24013(1), 7–CA–24019, 7–CA–24013(2), 7–CA–24013(3), 7–CA–24030(1), 7–CA–24030(2), 7–CA–24030(3), 7–CA–24030(5), and 7–CA–24052; consolidated complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 7 against the Respondent on December 31, 1984; Respondent's answer filed on January 8, 1985; hearing scheduled for Kalamazoo, Michigan, on April 22, 1985; informal settlement agreement executed by all charging parties, the General Counsel, and the Respondent and approved by me on April 22, 1985; charges filed against the Respondent by Wayne Ford, Clark Olson, Lidell Ford Jr., United Paperworkers International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC (Union), and Karen Root, respectively, between August 2, and September 26, 1985, in Cases 7–CA–24856(2), 7–CA–24856(3), 7–CA–24914(2), 7–CA–24953, 7–CA–24914(1), 7–CA–24921, and 7–CA–25033; consolidated complaint issued against Respondent by Regional Director for Region 7 on September 30, 1985, and first amended consolidated complaint issued against Respondent by Regional Director for Region 7 on October 30, 1985; Respondent's answer filed on November 7, 1985; hearing held in Kalamazoo, Michigan, on January 28 through February 5, 1986; briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent on or before April 28, 1986.

[2] The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is a Michigan corporation that maintains its principal place of business in Kalamazoo, Michigan, where it is engaged in the commercial printing business. In the course and conduct of this business Respondent during the preceding 12 months sold and distributed from its Kalamazoo, Michigan place of business products valued in excess of $100,000, of which products valued in excess of $50,000 were shipped directly to points and places located outside the State of Michigan. Accordingly, Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

ees with plant closing if they unionized, created the impression among employees that their union activities were the subject of company surveillance; threatened to fire employees if they joined a union; threatened to discharge employees and require them to become employees of a temporary employment referral service if they continued to discuss unionization; attempted to suborn perjury by an employee in a Board proceeding; coercively interrogated employees, threatened to fire employees who supported the Union, and to prevent them from receiving unemployment compensation; threatened an employee with reprisal on returning to work if he engaged in union activities; issued disciplinary warnings to employees because they were union sympathizers; discharged James Cannon Jr., Lidell Ford Jr., Karen Root, Garry Wayne Root, Clark Olson, and Wayne Ford because of their union sympathies and activities; contracted out work in order to prevent unionization by removing union sympathizers from its payroll and placing them on the payroll of a temporary employment referral service; failed to recall Wayne Ford to work and discharged him because of his union sympathies and activities; harassed, demoted, and transferred Lidell Ford Jr. on his return to work because of his union sympathies and activities; and since September 1985 failed to recall Karen Root from layoff because of her union sympathies and activities. The Respondent denies the commission of any independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act; asserts that it discharged Lidell Ford Jr. because he sabotaged company machinery; discharged James Cannon Jr. because of his poor work performance; and discharged Garry Wayne Root, Karen Root, Clark Olson, and Wayne Ford because they refused to sign up with the temporary employment referral service that it had employed. It contends that it failed to recall employees because of lack of work and that Lidell Ford Jr. was demoted on his return to the job because he was unable to perform assigned work. The Respondent also contends that violations settled by an agreement concluded on April 22, 1985, are barred from prosecution by limitations. On these contentions the issues herein were joined.[3]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ALLEGED

Respondent Middle Earth Graphics, Inc. is a small printing firm located on the north side of Kalamazoo, Michigan. It is owned and operated by Louis Hall, who founded the business about 12 years ago. Until the spring of 1984, it employed about 10–15 individuals and was engaged principally in handling small and medium-sized commercial printing jobs. In the spring of that year, it obtained a contract from a Chicago firm, Great Cadaco Games, a Division of Rapid Mounting & Finishing Co. (Cadaco), to produce sets of question-and-answer cards used in a game modeled after Trivial Pursuit. The Cadaco game is known as "Bible Trivia." Subsequent orders received from Cadaco included printing of question-and-answer cards for two similar games, "Children's Bible Trivia" and "Catholic Trivia." Taking on these orders meant a rapid increase in the staffing of the Respondent's plant, particularly in unskilled employees in the bindery who performed such functions as merging, collating, and banding. The discriminatees involved in this case were hired in May or June 1984 when this upsurge in business began. Concurrently with the increase in staff, the plant began to operate on weekends and occasionally on an around-the-clock basis during the regular workweek. The initial Cadaco order was only for 25,000 sets of Bible Trivia cards, but, as that order was filled, other orders followed rapidly. Respondent continues to produce Cadaco game cards but not at the hectic pace it experienced in 1984. At the same point in 1984 Hall began to enlarge the physical facilities of his plant and to acquire new machinery for his expanded operation.

The bindery operation involves the cutting of large "signatures" or printed sheets into quarters, collating them on a nine-sheet collator, merging these collated sheets into larger bundles by what is, in effect, a hand-collating process, cutting or "trimming" the newly formed bundles of question-and-answer sheets into individual game sets, and then putting rubber bands around individual sets before they are boxed for shipment. In this operation, Lidell Ford Jr. operated a collator (sometimes called a Harris multi-stitcher); James Cannon Jr. was a merger; Karen Root was a bander; Lidell Ford's brother, Wayne Ford, worked as a merger and collator helper; and Karen Root's brother, Clark Olson, was a bander. Karen Root's husband, Garry Root, had a semi-skilled job as trimmer operator.

In June 1984, shortly after they had been hired, Garry and Karen Root were carrying on a conversation in the office with Hall. Hall had been talking with Jim English, a salesman from another print shop, Kalamazoo Label, and was repeating to the Roots what the salesman had said. Hall noted that Kalamazoo Label was running at about a third capacity because of union work rules and a high union scale. Karen Root asked Hall what would happen if a union came into Middle Earth Graphics. Hall replied that a union would never "get in here. I will close my doors before I will let a union in here."

Sometime in May or June, Lidell Ford was working with Hall at the collator and asked Hall if he would ever have a union in the shop. Hall replied that he would "close the g.d. doors" before he would permit a union to come into the shop. Ford had a similar conversation at this same point in time with Chalker. Chalker expressed the opinion that Hall would close the plant before he would permit it to become unionized.

During the summer of 1984, Wayne Ford was engaged in a conversation with Foreman Don Antolovich and fellow employee Mike Ibeck at Antolovich's home. Ford observed that, if the plant were unionized, the Company would stop a lot of activities that Ford objected to, such as 12-hour workdays and cutting incentive rates. Antolovich replied that a union would be nice but there was "no chance of it."

Early in the fall, K. Root became upset by an incident at the plant involving her son, employee Steven Kilburn. Kilburn was attacked by a dog that had been tied up ehind the plant and had been allowed to stay there for lant security reasons. Kilburn was not injured but had een frightened by the dog's aggressive behavior. On arning of this incident, K. Root complained to Plant anager Keith Tap and the General Foreman Rod halker, but received a rebuff. On returning to her job ation, she angrily shouted to employees in the merging ea of the plant, "Like hell we don't need a union." Anlovich was present when these remarks were made.

Shortly thereafter, K. Root phoned the office of the nited Paperworkers Union and sought information on w to go about organizing a union at the Respondent's ant. She did not follow up immediately on this infor-ation but, along with other employees, began to discuss e possibility of unionization. Much of this talk took ace at the merging line. On one occasion, Antolovich ld employees on the merging line that the Respondent as keeping a complete file on who talked union at the ant.

On Friday, November 2, 1984, the Respondent staged open house at the plant. Respondent had just complet-l an addition to the company premises, and this mile-one provided the occasion for the celebration. Custom-s, friends, and public officials were invited to view the larged building, see the plant in actual operation, and in Hall and others for a light lunch and a ceremonial bbon cutting. A humorous program booklet, prepared d for the open house, was introduced into evidence. mong the visitors was Patrick Allgood, the regional anager for Manpower, a supplier of temporary help. llgood suggested to Hall that Manpower could be of lp in providing him with extra help during peak peri-ls, and Hall was amenable to the suggestion. He told llgood to prepare a specific proposal and present it.

The following Tuesday, November 2, Allgood visited ll and presented a written proposal. The document in estion appears to have been derived from a word ocessor, with individual name changes on the cover d an individual quotation of a rate for temporary help $4.92 an hour. This figure represented the charge by anpower to Middle Earth Graphics. Although the pro-sal did not say so, record evidence indicated that this ure presumed an actual payout rate to employees of out $3.50 or $3.75 an hour. The balance represented ductions and supplements for withholding and insur-ce, payroll computations, and Manpower's profit. It came clear that Hall had in mind not merely procuring ditional help from Manpower but was interested in cing a number of his current employees on Man-wer's payroll, thus treating them as temporary help. ll insisted to Allgood that none of the employees he shed transferred from the Middle Earth Graphics pay-l to the Manpower payroll should experience reduc-ns in their hourly rate, although it is clear that eventu-y all of them lost benefits, inasmuch as they were cov-d by a health insurance program as Respondent's em-yees while Manpower had no such program for the nporary help it supplies. Both Hall and his manage-nt employees were quite evasive about the actual rly rate they were being called on to pay to Man-wer in order to maintain a $4 payout rate to current ployees. Eventually, another Manpower representative, Debra Kuhn, who assisted in the implementation of Manpower's contract with the Respondent, testified that for employees earning $4 per hour, Manpower charged the Respondent $5.65 per hour for existing employees being transferred to its payroll, and $5.88 for new employees supplied from Manpower sources. Billing records and invoices in evidence confirm this testimony. The differential in rates represented Manpower's recruiting costs. Higher rated employees were billed at other amounts. Kuhn testified that the Manpower markup was from 17–30 percent, although a simple arithmetic calculation makes it clear that the Manpower markup on the $4-an-hour employees was about 41 percent.

On the afternoon of Wednesday, November 7, Greg Henderson, a representative of Manpower, talked to the mergers in the merging area about signing up for Manpower. Both Chalker and Antolovich were present. There was some objection from Respondent's employees to the idea of leaving the Respondent's payroll and transferring to Manpower. The objections centered on the fear of losing their jobs and of receiving cuts in pay. As the discussion drew to a close, Lidell Ford, who was not a merger but who happened to be in the area, told the assembled mergers that if they signed up for Manpower their action would be tantamount to quitting Middle Earth Graphics, and they would have no standing to organize a union among the Respondent's employees. Antolovich admits reporting this or similar statements on the part of L. Ford to Hall.[4]

On the evening of the same day, Ford phoned Clare Annen, the Union's representative in the Kalamazoo area, told him what was happening at Middle Earth Graphics among the mergers, and arranged for Annen to meet with interested employees at Ford's home on Saturday, November 10. On the morning of Thursday, November 8, Hall summoned Ford to his office. In the course of a private interview, Hall told Ford that he was in possession of written proof that Ford had wilfully damaged the Respondent's collating machine and proceeded to fire Ford for doing so. Ford denied the accusation and asked to see the statements that Hall had referred to. He also asked Hall to produce the second-shift employees who had made the written allegations. Hall declined and said they would be given to him with his final paycheck. Ford protested this action and claimed he could run the collator better than any two employees. He told Hall to "cut out the bullshit" and accused Hall of using him as a scapegoat. Hall's only response was that nobody would run the Company but Hall himself. When Ford picked up his paycheck the following day, he asked Comptroller Joseph Hagenbarth for the statements, and Hagenbarth refused to produce them on advice of counsel. No such statements have ever been furnished, even in response to the General Counsel's sub-

[4] Although there is some confusion in the record concerning the sequence of events that surrounded the discharge of L. Ford, it appears, as detailed later, that damage had been done to a collator the previous afternoon or evening, which the Respondent attributed to Ford. Ford was discharged for this infraction on November 8, the morning following his statement to the mergers recited above.

poena. I conclude that they never existed in the first place.[5]

During the next few days, several supervisors made statements to various employees indicating that only mergers would be required to sign up for Manpower. On Friday, November 9, Chalker spoke to several employees, including Garry Root, near the trimmer and indicated to them that Manpower was only for mergers, explaining that mergers were part-time employees and that the Respondent was taking this action because it was not sure how long orders for Cadaco games would last so it wanted to be sure that the mergers had some alternative source of employment if the Cadaco contract ran out. Later on in the day, Garry Root spoke to Antolovich and asked him if Manpower was just for mergers. Antolovich assured him that this was so. On the same day, Patricia Ann Cole, a merger, came to the plant to pick up her paycheck. She spoke to Antolovich and asked him if she had to join Manpower. He told her that she would have to sign up and stated that this requirement applied only to mergers because they were regarded as part-time employees. Chalker had also told Clark Olson that only the mergers were being required to transfer to the Manpower payroll.

Debra L. Schrock worked as a collator helper on the evening shift.[6] On November 9 she asked Chalker if she had to sign up for Manpower. Chalker's reply was, "Not as long as you don't talk union." Later on in the following week, Tap asked Schrock if she had signed up for Manpower. Her reply was that Chalker told her that she did not have to sign up so long as she did not talk about "onions." She used the word "onions" to avoid mentioning the forbidden term "union." Tap told her at that time that everyone had to sign up, so she did the following day.

The mergers worked on Saturday, November 10. During the course of this workday, Cole made the observation to her fellow employees and to Antolovich that the only reason the Company was bringing in Manpower was because of union organizing activity. Antolovich's reply was, if there was any further mention of unions, employees would be laid off permanently and the plant doors would be closed. Antolovich admitted making this statement but explained for the record that he was just expressing his opinion. He also stated for the record that Hall was the "kind of guy who will cut off his nose to spite his face" and ventured the statement that "if he doesn't get his way, nobody will."

A union meeting took place the same evening at Lidell Ford's home. Among those who attended were the Roots, Olson, Cannon, and Wayne Ford. As noted previously, Ford had been discharged by this time. Among the questions discussed was whether employees should obey a directive to sign up for Manpower. Annen replied that it was up to each employee about whether he or she signed up, and each employee would have to make this judgment on the basis of what he could afford to do if faced with discharge. Annen expressed an opinion that it was an unfair labor practice for an employer to force employees off its payroll and felt it would be appropriate to file a charge. He did not state that he felt that employees who signed would be disenfranchised from participating in a representation election. Union authorization cards were distributed on this occasion and every employee who attended signed a card.

About this same time, Antolovich met Cole at a friend's house. I credit her testimony to the effect that Antolovich told her that the Company was trying to make a case against Lidell Ford and asked her how she would like to make $25? She flippantly replied, "What do I have to do—kill someone?" Antolovich told her that all she would have to do was to go into court and say she saw Ford tampering with machinery. Cole objected, saying that she did not know anything about the machinery. Antolovich replied that she could just say that she saw him tampering with valves and hoses. Cole refused, insisting that she would not lie either for or against Ford.

On Monday, November 12, Respondent's supervisors, including Hall, and Manpower representatives Allkins and Kuhn, met with all shop employees. At this time Hall announced that all employees, except for "the original ten," would be required to transfer from the Middle Earth Graphics payroll to the Manpower payroll. The "original ten" was Hall's way of describing the employees who had been working for him before the work force expansion took place in the spring of 1984. This number included the pressmen, all supervisors, and the office staff. The Manpower representatives were asked a series of questions about seniority and other matters. They answered some questions and were unable to answer others. Hall was asked why this was taking place and his only answer was, "No comment." Cole and Cannon then stated aloud that the only reason the transfer to Manpower was taking place was because of the Union. Hall said it was taking place so that he could protect himself from what Lidell Ford had done the preceding week.

Later on that day in a private conversation, Cole asked Hall what would happen if she refused to sign up for Manpower. He replied that she would be fired. She said that she did not want to become a "rent-a-jerk." Hall told her that he did not care if a union did come into the plant, observing that he had enough money, and could quit and close the doors. After consulting with her husband, Cole resigned.

[5] Respondent's second-shift employees, Mihally Csiszar and Schrock, gave diametrically opposed statements concerning making written statements on November 11. Csiszar, who is Hungarian and has trouble writing English, testified that he and Schrock prepared a joint statement in their own handwriting on being questioned by management about vandalism performed on the collator and turned the statement over to their supervisor. Schrock testified that she prepared no such statement and, in fact, was never interviewed by management concerning the events of November 6 until, on November 14, she and Csiszar were presented with a typewritten statement, dated November 12, detailing the damage done to the collator and accusing Ford by necessary implication of doing the damage. She insisted that the statement be modified before she would sign it and it was changed. This statement, signed both by her and by Csiszar, is in evidence. At the hearing in this case, Hall admitted that he had been "mistaken" when he said that he had statements in his possession alleging Ford's responsibility for vandalism before Ford was fired.

[6] At a much later point in time Schrock became a merger.

On the following day Cannon was terminated just fter he reported for work. When Antolovich gave him he news his reply was, "I knew it was coming." Antolo-ich told Cannon that he had found a number of mis-akes in Cannon's work the day before. Cannon argued hat Antolovich was in no position to complain about Cannon's work when Antolovich's brother, Walter, also merger, was "goofing off." Antolovich said that he would divide up the mistakes that had been found be-ween Cannon and his brother. However, Walter Anto-ovich was not disciplined.

On Wednesday, November 14, a third meeting was eld between a Manpower representative and the pro-uction and maintenance employees. Kuhn represented Manpower on this occasion. She attempted to answer employee questions that had been left unanswered during previous meetings. Thereafter, she conducted private nterviews at which time she solicited applications from hose who were being required to transfer.

On November 14 Tap called Garry Root into his office and asked Root if he had heard about any union ctivities. Root replied that he had talked to someone bout the Union the previous week. Tap asked Root whom he had talked with, but Root refused to answer. Tap went on to ask Root if he had seen any union cards. Root replied untruthfully that he had not seen any.

About this same point in time, Tap had a conversation with Lamar Edwards, the janitor and maintenance man. He asked Edwards if Edwards had signed for the Union. Edwards replied that he had not done so. Tap then asked Edwards if Edwards had received a union card from Garry Root. Edwards had in fact received a union card from Garry Root. After engaging in a conversation with another employee named Dove, Edwards showed the card to Tap. Tap asked if he could make a copy of the card and Edwards consented. Tap then asked Edwards if Garry Root had signed him up on company property. Edwards replied that Root had come to his house and had signed him up there. Tap then told Edwards that Garry Root had "lied to save his own ass" because Root had told Tap something else. He then instructed Ed-wards to return to the merging line.

On the morning of Thursday, November 15, both Roots and Olson came to work wearing union buttons. They had attended a union meeting the night before and presumably had obtained the buttons at the meeting. Ha-genbarth asked them when they arrived whether they had signed up for Manpower. All three replied that they had not done so. Hagenbarth told them that if they had not signed with Manpower, they would have to leave the plant. Garry Root replied that he did not work for Manpower, "I work for Middle Earth Graphics." Ha-genbarth told Root that he could not give him his check until he signed for Manpower. Root told Hagenbarth to go get someone with authority.

K. Root went to her job and began to work. Some of her fellow employees asked her if she had signed up for Manpower. She replied that she had not done so and that she was not going to so do because she was trying to get a union into the plant. Not long thereafter, Root heard Antolovich report this conversation to Hall in Hall's office. Antolovich told Hall, "You've got to do something. Those people are downtalking Manpower and talking union. We've got to them them out of there."

Before long, Hall, Tap, and Antolovich came into the bindery and went up to Garry Root. Hall asked Root if he had signed up for Manpower. Root said that he had not done so, adding that he was working to get a union into the plant. Hall stepped toward Root, backed him into a machine, and called him an s.o.b. Root said taunt-ingly that Hall would love to have an excuse to hit him. Hall replied that he knew a hundred people in Kalama-zoo who would like to hurt Root. Hall then instructed Tap to call the police. Shortly thereafter, they arrived. Hall pointed to both Roots and to Olson and asked the police to remove them. As the police began to do so, Root asked one of the officers why she was being re-quired to leave and he replied, "Trespassing." She ob-jected, telling the officer that she had punched in and was just doing her job. Hall insisted that she be removed as well and she was.

Wayne Ford had originally signed an application for Manpower but then withdrew it on November 16 by calling the Manpower office. On November 19 when he went to work, Tap asked him if he had signed for Man-power. W. Ford replied that he had done so but had withdrawn his application. Tap then told him that "we no longer need you," whereupon W. Ford left the plant. Manpower's invoices for the first 2 weeks of its contract with the Respondent indicate that it supplied the Re-spondent with 11 newly recruited employees during this period: Lynne M. Alston, Sheila A. Forney, James A. Feringa, Marilyn J. Hosteller, Michael J. Stanfill, Gerald L. Stump, Veronica D. Swi-, Deborah E. Talley, Cheryl A. Heighton, Julie K. Kimball, and Jerome W. Phelps. They also indicate that 19 former Middle Earth Graphics employees were transferred to the Manpower payroll: Walter Antolovich, James H. Butler, Dale E. Croy, Houston B. Ford, Bonnie K. Garton, Mary Ann Hollis, Michael J. Ibach, Scott R. Kellogg, Lamar Ed-wards, Mytris McCants, Ricardo Nunn, Margaret A. Ross, Debra L. Schrock. Calvin C. Shafer Jr., Brenda K. Van Tilberg, Charles J. Deneau, Tamara Stickney, Janet M. Van Tilberg, and Phyllis J. Narlock.

Between November 13 and 29, the first series of unfair labor practice charges in this dispute were filed. On No-vember 21 the Union filed a representation petition seek-ing to represent the Respondent's production and mainte-nance employees. That petition is still pending, having been blocked by the outstanding unfair labor practice charges against the Respondent.

Lidell Ford's brother Houston Ford continued to work at the Respondent's plant on the Manpower pay-roll. Sometime late in November, Hall spoke with H. Ford about his brother's discharge. He told H. Ford that he hated to fire Lidell but that Lidell had been harassing employees and had tampered with the collator, so that others who worked on the machine were prevented from operating it to full capacity, and making their full piece-work incentive rate. Hall added that Lidell was trying to bring a union into the plant, and there was "no way in hell" that he would permit a union to come into the Company.

Hall also had a private conversation with Lamar Edwards in late November, in the course of which he told Edwards that he did not want to give anyone any trouble and he did not want anyone to give him any trouble. His words were that if someone gave him trouble, "he would give it to him back," mentioning that he had an employee who was a real troublemaker. Shortly thereafter, Hall told Edwards that he would be laid off for lack of work. Edwards said that he would quit and apply for unemployment compensation.

The original consolidated unfair labor practice complaint was issued by the Regional Director on December 31, 1984. The case was set for hearing on April 22, 1985. On that date, the parties executed an informal settlement agreement, which included an undertaking on the part of the Respondent to pay specified sums of money to both Roots, Olson, Wayne Ford, Lidell Ford, and Cannon in settlement of the outstanding complaint. It also obligated the Respondent to offer these six individuals "full and immediate reinstatement to their former jobs without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed" and to cease and desist from committing further unfair labor practices.

There is no dispute that the Respondent paid to the six discriminatees the sums required under the settlement agreement or that it posted the required notice. At issue is whether the Respondent offered these individuals full and immediate reinstatement to their former jobs and whether it refrained from committing further unfair labor practices. Of the six discriminatees who were parties to the April 22 agreement, only three ever worked for the Respondent thereafter. Two did not begin to work until June 28 and the third did not start back to work until August 19. Neither was working when the case came on for hearing again on January 28, 1986.

On May 9, 1985, Hall wrote identical letters to all six discriminatees who were involved in the settlement agreement. The letter read:

> Pursuant to the terms of the settlement agreement entered into between Middle Earth Graphics, Inc., and the National Labor Relations Board, on April 22, 1985, you are hereby notified that you are reinstated to your former position as an employee and any reference to your discharge and/or layoff has been removed from your file.
> Due to lack of production requirements, there is no work available for you at this time. However, you will be given the normal notice when that does occur. Therefore, you should keep us advised of your current address.

During this same period of time, the Respondent transferred nine former employees whom it was continuing to utilize on the Manpower payroll back to their former status as Middle Earth Graphics employees. These included Ann Ross, Charles Deneau, Beth Breed, Debra Schrock, James Butler, Scott Kellogg, Bonnie Garton, Calvin Schaeffer, and Brenda Van Tilberg. Some resumed their places on the Middle Earth Graphics payroll on or before June 26, 1985, when the first two discriminatees came back to the plant. All were back by August 19 when the third discriminatee returned. Chalker explained that he had bee. told by Hagenbarth that it was more expensive to maintain these individuals on the Manpower payroll, with the attendant markup for Manpower's services, than to employ them directly as Middle Earth Graphics employees. Hagenbarth testified that the anticipated savings in administrative costs in the preparation of payrolls did not materialize. Hall was asked why he transferred these individuals from the Respondent's payroll to Manpower and then back again. He said that he assumed that it was for a reason other than cost effectiveness but he could not quite recall what that reason was.[7] Nobody explained why it took the Respondent over 6 months to come to the conclusion that it was costing more to employ former employees on the Manpower payroll than it cost to hire them directly.

K. Root was recalled on June 28 to her position as a bander. She was laid off again on July 2. She was recalled a second time on July 30 and worked about 2 weeks, when she took sick leave. She returned again on August 20 and worked until September 20, when she was laid off ostensibly for lack of work. She has not worked since that time.[8]

Late in July when K. Root was notified a second time to report for work, her brother, Clark Olson, was at her home. On learning of his sister's recall, Olson phoned Chalker and asked him if he should come back to work as well. Chalker informed Olson that there was no work for him and that there would be no work for him in the near future. About August 9, an office employee, identified only as Brenda, phoned K. Root's home and asked for Olson. He was not there. On receiving this information, Olson phoned Chalker, who informed him that he had to keep the office updated as to his current phone number. Olson told Chalker that he had the correct phone number. Chalker said nothing about Olson's reporting for work. He admitted at the hearing that he had no work for Olson at that time. Shortly thereafter, Olson received a letter, dated August 10 and signed by Hall, in which Hall simply noted that Company records indicated that Olson's phone number was the same as his sister's number and reminded Olson that it was his responsibility to keep the Respondent informed as to any change in his address or phone number. It said nothing about reporting for work. A few days later, Olson received a letter from Hall, dated August 20, informing him that he was being discharged, effective August 20, for his failure to report to work on August 19.[9] Olson insisted at the hearing that he never received any letter or other communication instructing him to report for work on August 19 or any other date. Respondent insists that it mailed Olson such a letter a few days before this date. Although the Respondent was able to produce copies of other similar correspondence with its employees, it failed, in response to a subpoena by the General Counsel, to produce a copy of the disputed notification letter to Olson. I conclude that no such letter ever existed or was ever sent.

[7] Hall had a very selective memory and professed absence of recollection on crucial matters relating to events in this case. He also was evasive in the answers he did give. I note also his profane outburst during the hearing, the fact that he was photographing witnesses in the hallway outside the hearing room as they sat waiting to testify, and that he was coaching a company witness in the hallway, prior to her testimony, notwithstanding the existence of a sequestration order. In short, his partisanship at trial was unrestrained and out of control. I discredit his testimony.

[8] K. Root testified that, during this period of her employment, she wore a union button to work.

[9] Chalker stated at the hearing that he had only a day or two of work for Olson on August 19 and that the purported offer was for temporary work.

On June 24, 1985, Csiszar, who by this time had become a supervisor, phoned the Root house for the purpose of requesting Garry Root to return to work. He spoke with K. Root. On learning of the call, Garry Root returned it and was told by Csiszar that there was work available on a 6-hour-a-day basis and requested Root to report the following morning. Root said he could not do so, since he was working for Merchant's Publishing Company and would be obligated to give them a 2-week notice. Csiszar informed Root that the job in question would last only 2 weeks. Hall testified that Root was only being offered a couple of days' work. Root told Csiszar that he would have to have 2 weeks' notice of any offer to return and further informed Csiszar he would not come back to work for the Respondent on a 6-hour-a-day basis because he regarded such a job as part-time. On the following day, Garry Root received a letter from Hall, in which Hall stated:

> This letter is confirming the telephone conversation Mike Csiszar had with your wife Karen on Monday, June 24. You were advised to report to work on Tuesday, June 25, 1985, no later than 8:00 a.m.

Root did not report for work on June 25. Instead, he wrote Hall a letter on that date that stated:

> This letter is to acknowledge my conversation that I had with Mr. Csiszar late in the afternoon of June 24, 1985.
> As you are aware, I am presently employed and it is my contention that less than twenty-four hours notice to return to work is less than adequate.
> As stated in the settlement agreement, I am to be reinstated to my former position with benefits as a fulltime employee. Mr. Csiszar informed me that his offer was for a six-hour shift which is less than full time, and consequently without benefits.
> Therefore, I am advising you that at this time your offer is unsuitable and does not constitute compliance with the settlement agreement. However, if and when a position of fulltime employment does open, I would expect to be properly notified within (sic) a timely fashion.

Root has heard nothing from the Respondent since that time.

On June 26, 1985, Hall sent a certified letter to Cannon instructing him to report to work no later than Friday morning, June 28, at 8 a.m. The letter was sent to Cannon at 207 Alamo Hills, Kalamazoo. At that time Cannon had temporarily moved back to his parents' home in Grand Rapids in order to assist in caring for his father, who was ill. When Cannon eventually received the letter, he phoned the shop and spoke to a secretary identified only as Sandy. He asked to speak with Hall and with other supervisors. He was told by Sandy that they were busy and could not speak with him. This is the last communication that he has received from the Respondent.

A letter, dated June 26, was sent by the Respondent to Wayne Ford instructing him to report for work on June 28 no later than 8 a.m. W. Ford did so and was assigned to run the collator. Later that day, Chalker moved him to the merging line. W. Ford was employed as a collator operator before his discharge. This was an incentive job on which he was able to earn about $7 an hour, including the piecework rate which was attached to it. However, a merging job pays a straight $4 an hour, without incentive. W. Ford worked as a merger until July 2 when he was laid off. At that time he asked Antolovich when he would be recalled. Antolovich told him that he would give him a call or stop by his apartment to inform him when work would again be available.

W. Ford heard nothing more from the Respondent for nearly a month, so he went to the plant and spoke with Chalker. Chalker told him at this time that in order to come back to work he would have to have a phone so that he could be notified at short notice that work would be available. Ford pressed Chalker to learn when work would be available. Chalker's only reply was to let him know when he had a phone installed in his apartment because he did not want to have to go through third parties in order to call him back to work. On August 9 W. Ford received the following letter from Hall:

> Rod Chalker called your phone number on August 7, 1985, that you have given us to call. He received a recording stating that the number had been disconnected.
> The scheduling of the work that you qualified for does not allow the time to notify you by mail.
> It is your responsibility, as an employee, to inform Middle Earth Graphics, Inc. of any changes of your address and/or phone number.

Respondent sent W. Ford another letter, dated August 13 and signed by Hall. It read:

> This letter is to confirm Rod Chalkers instruction of August 12 when you came into the shop, that we need a phone number to reach you when there is work.
> Our work load does not permit the time to notify people by letter.
> If we do not hear from you by Monday the 19th, we will assume that you do not want to work here.

On Monday, August 19, about 3:50 a.m., Chalker gave W. Ford a call from his home. Chalker had just returned from a social engagement and, before going to sleep, attempted to contact W. Ford to tell him to come to work that morning. Chalker reached a neighbor of Ford who lived in a downstairs apartment. He told the neighbor that he was Ford's boss and wanted to speak with him.

The neighbor went upstairs, knocked on the door of Ford's apartment, and awakened him to relay this message. Meanwhile, Chalker was placed on hold. By the time that Ford had dressed and had come downstairs to take the phone call, Chalker had hung up without disclosing to anyone the substance of what he wanted to say to Ford. Ford went back to bed. The next day, Ford received a letter, dated August 20 and signed by Hall, that stated:

> This is to inform you that your failure to report to work by Monday, August 19, 1985, results in the termination of your employment Middle Earth Graphics [sic] as of August 20, 1985.

Chalker stated in his testimony that he had only 1 to 3 days' work available for W. Ford at that time.

In mid-July, Lidell Ford complained to the Board agent who was supervising compliance with the settlement agreement that he had not been recalled to work. On August 1, 1985, Production Manager Douglas B. Harris wrote L. Ford a letter that stated as follows:

> This letter is to inform you that as of August 1, 1985, Middle Earth Graphics is giving you a two week notice to report to work.
> There is presently work available for you. If you desire work, please let us know immediately and report to work no later than 7:30 a.m. August 19, 1985.

Shortly after receiving this letter L. Ford called the plant and spoke with Chalker. He told Chalker that he would like to come back to work on August 12 but was not sure that he could make it by that date because he was having car trouble and wanted to get his car repaired before starting work. He also told Chalker that if he could not make it by August 12 he would certainly be back to work by the August 19. Chalker told him that he should simply call the plant during business hours and let the Company know the date on which he would actually return. Ford then asked Chalker if he would experience any trouble after he came back. Chalker replied that he would have no trouble "as long as [he] did his work, kept [his] nose clean, and didn't talk union." About August 15, Ford called the plant, talked to a clerical employee named Brenda, and told her that he would be in on August 19 at 7:30 a.m.

When Ford reported for work on August 19, Chalker told him to go to work on the collator he had used before being discharged but instructed him to set it up in the stitcher mode for a practice run. While operating this machine (sometimes called a Harris multibinder) in 1984, Ford had used it only for collating pages of the Cadaco games into sets of nine. With the addition of different accessories, the multibinder can also be used to fold pages of printed material and to stitch or staple the folded pages together into booklets. To operate the machine in a stitcher mode, it is necessary to attach the stitcher head, insert a spool of wire used for stitching, attach different receiving trays, and make various adjustments in order to permit the machine to perform these facets of the operation in proper sequence. Timing is of critical importance in setting up the machine in the stitcher mode.

Ford had never before set up the machine in the stitcher mode, nor had he operated it as such. His familiarity with the machine was limited to its use as a collator. During the interim while the discriminatees were away, the Respondent had purchased a new collator that assembled packets of 20 pages rather than 9 pages, so it used its new collator for this purpose and relegated the older machine to occasional use as a stitcher. The only person employed by the Respondent who was skilled in setting it up and operating it in the stitcher mode was Csiszar. He was on vacation on August 19. Chalker was familiar with this aspect of the operation but did not regularly operate the machine for stitching.

Hall had instructed Chalker to assign Ford to the stitcher on his return to the plant. Chalker admits that he had reason to believe that Ford would have difficulty in setting up the machine and in operating it in the stitcher mode. He was correct in his assumption. After working on the machine for several hours, Ford was unable to set it up and to get it into operation. He could not attach the collator to the stitcher. On several occasions, he asked Chalker for assistance in setting it up and each time Chalker refused to help him, claiming that he was too busy with other matters. Ford asked for the machine manual and Chalker brought it to him, but Ford was unable to complete the set up work with the assistance of the manual. Two other employees, including Houston Ford, came over to help L. Ford on their lunch hour but Chalker told them to leave L. Ford alone.

By early afternoon, Ford still did not have the machine in operation and Chalker reported this fact to Hall.[10] He told Hall that Ford could not set up the machine and was not getting out any production. Respondent then made up a written statement, dated August 20, 1985, that read:

> I cannot set up and run the multibinder that Rod Chalker has asked me to set up and run.

There was a place following this statement for Ford's signature and the signature of a witness.

Chalker took the blank statement to Ford and asked him to sign it. Ford insisted that he could get the machine in operation and declined to do so. After Ford had worked unsuccessfully for another hour or so on the multibinder, Chalker again presented the paper for Ford's signature and insisted that he sign it. Ford did so but told Chalker that he was signing it under protest. Chalker then summoned Margaret Ann Ross to the machine and asked her to sign the statement as a witness.

At this time, Ford was reassigned to become a collator operator's helper. Chalker explained that this was the only other job available. In doing so, he took a cut in pay from $5.50 to $4 an hour, without incentive bonuses.[11] Ford continued to work at this job until September 20, when he was laid off, ostensibly for lack of work. He has not worked at the plant since that time.

[10] There is no contention that Ford was malingering. Chalker testified that he felt that Ford was making his best effort to get the stitcher in operation.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

In order for the Board to set aside the settlement agreement of April 22, 1985, it is necessary for it to find that the conduct of the Respondent following the execution of this agreement either violated specific undertakings set forth therein, or that the Respondent committed additional unfair labor practices, which, in general terms, it also agreed to avoid when it signed the settlement. As discussed in more detail, infra, the Respondent failed utterly in its obligation to offer the six discriminatees full and immediate reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent positions. Moreover, the Respondent committed additional unfair labor practices that also vitiated any protection it might otherwise enjoy from prosecution for unfair labor practices committed before the settlement was signed. In order to treat the events in this record in approximate chronological sequence, the analysis of the record should begin with a consideration of the Respondent's presettlement conduct.

A. Evidence of Animus

Quite apart from any specific violations of the Act alleged and found in this case, the Respondent demonstrated clear evidence of animus that should be considered in placing the events described herein in proper focus. Among the documents in the record is a large multicolored brochure that the Respondent has printed and circulated to advertise the capability of its new multicolor press. The document is a humorous elaboration of Hall's tongue-in-cheek proposal for a new 51st state, to be carved out of the existing state of Michigan and named Six-One-Six after the telephone area code for Western Michigan. Entitled "A New State. A New Start." the brochure features Hall as its centerfold, dressed in regal attire and holding a sword and scepter. Also portrayed on this page are two cartoon figures, dressed as attendants from an insane asylum, who are chasing Hall and are making ready to apprehend him and place him in a straightjacket. Inside the brochure is a large map of Michigan. The eastern half is portrayed as a barren wasteland while the western half—State Six-One-Six—is shown as a flourishing, verdant paradise. At the center of State Six-One-Six is its capital, Kalamazoo. Access to Six-One-Six from Eastern Michigan is limited to a drawbridge over a moat. This feature is captioned:

> Access to the State of Six-One-Six will be severely restricted. Drawbridges will be raised to keep out such undesirable elements as labor organizers, dead beats, carpetbagging politicians, and itinerant lawyers.

When asked at the hearing if he was opposed to unions, Hall replied: "Just in Six-One-Six."

B. Independent 8(a)(1) Violations

1. When, in June 1984, Hall told the Roots that a union would never come into the plant and that he would close the doors before letting a union come in, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. When, in late May or June 1984, Hall told Lidell Ford that he would "close the g.d. doors" before he would permit a union to come into the shop, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. When, during the same period of time, Chalker told Lidell Ford that he felt that Hall would close the plant before he would permit it to become unionized, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. When, on November 9, Chalker told Debra Schrock that she did not have to sign up for Manpower if she did not talk union in the shop, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. When, on November 10, Antolovich told the mergers that any further talk of unionization would cause the Respondent to close the plant doors and lay off its employees permanently, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. When, about November 9, Antolovich solicited Patricia Ann Cole to commit perjury in order to support the Respondent's case against Lidell Ford, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. When, on November 14, Tap coercively interrogated Garry Root in his office about whether Root had heard about any union activities, with whom he had discussed unionization, and whether he had seen any union cards, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. When, about November 14, Tap asked Edwards if he had signed a union card and when he asked Edwards if he could duplicate a copy of a union card in Edwards' possession, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. When, in the course of the same conversation, Tap told Edwards that Garry Root had lied about Root's union activities "to save his ass," the Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

9. When, in late November, Hall told Houston Ford that he had fired Ford's brother in part because he was trying to bring a union into the plant, and when he told H. Ford that there was "no way in hell" that a union would come into the plant, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

10. When, in August 1985, Chalker told Lidell Ford in the course of a phone conversation that there would be no reprisals against Ford when he returned to the plant so long as Ford did his work, kept his nose clean, and did not talk union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

C. The Discharges of both Roots, both Fords, Olson, and Cannon in November 1984

All six discriminatees named in the original complaint and made parties to the settlement agreement were union supporters. Except for Lidell Ford, all had signed union

[11] In addition to demoting Ford, Chalker then gave him a disciplinary writeup, which he dated August 13. The writeup stated:

> Lidell called me at my mother's house on 8–3–85 and said that he would come to work on . . . 8–12–85. He didn't call in a day later. He has had 2 verbal warnings before and 1 wk. suspension.
> Action taken: 3rd verbal warning. Next action taken will be suspension and after that termination.

cards before they were discharged. K. Root was the original contact between the Respondent's employees and the Union. Ford had renewed this contact the night before he was discharged. All were discharged by an irascible and outspoken Employer whose intense and implacable antiunion sentiments have been itemized and documented above.

All six were also known to the Respondent to be union sympathizers. K. Root made known her views in September when, in the presence of Antolovich, she shouted angrily to other employees that they needed a union because she could obtain no redress of a grievance concerning the maintenance of the watchdog behind the plant. Lidell Ford warned mergers on the afternoon of November 7 that they would forfeit their right to organize the Middle Earth Graphics plant if they became Manpower employees. His remarks were immediately reported to Hall. In a private conversation in the summer of 1984, Wayne Ford had made his prounion sympathies known to Antolovich. Moreover, his close family relationship with Lidell certainly placed him under suspicion that he harbored the same sentiments which his brother expressed. Cannon voiced prounion sentiments on the merging line in Antolovich's presence and again at a meeting of employees attended by Hall and other supervisors. Olson and Garry Root were close relatives of Karen Root and, like Ford's brother, likely candidates for company suspicion that they engaged in union activities. Garry Root was the subject of considerable interrogation by Tap and also the subject of Tap's statement to Edwards that G. Root had lied about union activities "to save his ass." Both Roots and Olson wore union buttons to work the day they were discharged. I have also credited a reported statement in the record by Antolovich that the Company was maintaining a complete record of who talked union at the plant. Certainly such a record must have contained the names of most, if not all, of the above-named employees because they did discuss unionization at the plant.

The discharge of Lidell Ford was a clumsy fabrication from beginning to end. Apparently someone vandalized the collator on November 6. The Respondent admits that anyone in the plant could have damaged the machine. Having heard of Lidell Ford's union outburst the following day, he then became the likely candidate, and was the subject of an investigation designed not to find out who actually damaged the machine but to pin a rap on Ford as the guilty party. Following the procedure of "verdict first, trial later," three supervisors came to the conclusion that Ford was the culprit. He was never asked if he was the one who damaged the machine. Hall admitted lying to Ford during the discharge interview by telling Ford that he had in his possession written statements naming Ford as the guilty party. He had no such statements. Serious efforts were taken to obtain such evidence in the days following Ford's discharge. One supervisor asked another employee to lie about seeing Ford tamper with the collator. Two other employees—whose stories were at wide variance—ultimately signed a paper implicating, though not directly naming, Ford as the one who damaged the machine. However, this statement was not in company hands until long after Ford was discharged. Like the hearing examiner at the Michigan Employment Security Commission who heard this same defense during an unemployment compensation case, I conclude that there is not a shred of evidence that Ford damaged the Respondent's collator, either deliberately or through negligence. Moreover, the behavior of the Respondent makes it abundantly clear that it had no reasonable grounds to believe that Ford had done so and was scurrying about to find an evidentiary basis to support an action it had already taken. Later on, Hall admitted to Ford's brother that Ford's union activities played a partial role in his discharge. Coming as it did 1 day after Ford had urged mergers to refrain from signing up for Manpower so they could continue their organizing efforts, Ford's discharge was the direct result of Ford's union activities, which were the only reason for his termination. By discharging Ford the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The next to go was Cannon. Like L. Ford, he was discharged within 24 hours after making a prounion statement in the presence of supervisors. He complained publicly, in the presence of Hall and others, that the only reason for bringing Manpower into the plant was to stymie the organizing effort. The asserted reason for Cannon's discharge was errors made on the merging line. There is no doubt that he made some errors the day before in selecting collated packets of game sheets for merging into a full or completed packet. The exact number of errors is unknown, as is the magnitude of these errors in the context of the Respondent's operation. Antolovich's brother was guilty of similar errors on the same day and this fact was brought to the attention of Cannon's supervisor when the discharge was announced. The only reply made by D. Antolovich was that he would divide up the errors found and attribute an equal number to the other merger. However, he did not exact the same penalty from his brother that he did from Cannon.

Cannon had been an employee of the Respondent for nearly 6 months. His virtues and failings as an employee were well known. His discharge follows the familiar pattern of a marginal employee whose deficiencies could be overlooked until he became interested in union activities, at which time they were no longer tolerable. Fisher Stove Works, 235 NLRB 1032 (1978); Markle Mfg. Co., 239 NLRB 1142 (1979); Buffalo Concrete, 276 NLRB 839 (1985). Because an expression of union sympathies was what triggered the removal of James Cannon, Jr., I conclude that his discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The decision of the Respondent in November 1984, to require all of its employees other than the "original ten" to sign up for Manpower bears considerable scrutiny. Expressions in the record about "signing up for Manpower" tend to obscure the fact that all of the affected employees were in fact discharged by the Respondent. Whether or not any such employee signed up for Manpower after being discharged simply indicated whether or not he or she continued to perform work in the Respondent's plant. Those who opted for this route were no longer Middle Earth Graphics employees any more than were those who left the plant. Properly viewed, the question at issue is whether the decision of the Respondent to discharge all except its long-time employees was discriminatorily motivated, or was it prompted by considerations falling within the scope of business judgment.

This decision was taken at the same point in time that union activity began to surface at the Respondent's plant. Moreover, the economic benefits and cost effectiveness of the move were only casually considered by the Respondent before the decision was taken, if, indeed, such matters were even considered at all. Third, at the beginning of May 1985, many of the employees who were required to become Manpower employees were taken back on the Middle Earth Graphics payroll. One of the reasons advanced by supervisors for this contrary move was that it was costing the Respondent more to maintain individuals on the Manpower payroll than it was to employ them directly. Hall stated in his testimony that the later move in 1985 was taken for reasons other than cost effectiveness. A fourth consideration relates to some of the reasons offered by Hall for making the move in the first place. Beginning in May 1984, Respondent had experienced a sudden expansion of its work force. Many of its new employees proved to be unreliable and it was occasionally faced with shortages of unskilled (and sometimes semiskilled) help to get out Cadaco orders. As Manpower representatives might well have pointed out, this was a situation in which a supplier of temporary help could be of assistance by providing, at short notice, additional employees to supplement absences or vacancies in an existing work force. Supplying temporary help for peak production periods or to replace absentee employees is one of the principal functions served by such companies. Hectic production problems fail to answer the question why the Respondent not only asked Manpower for additional help to get it through peak periods and to compensate for absenteeism among its regular work force but also placed some 19 of its regular employees on the Manpower payroll under circumstances that admittedly proved more costly than simply keeping them on as Middle Earth employees and supplementing their efforts from time to time with temporary workers supplied by an outside firm.

The only excuse that lends any credence to the legitimacy of this decision is Respondent's excuse that it was trying to provide its regular employees with a source of income and employment if and when the Cadaco job ran out. Actually, the evidence in the record indicates that the Cadaco jobs continued to be produced in large quantities throughout the fall and winter of 1984–1985. Moreover, it is also clear from the record that the Respondent's own income nearly doubled in 1985 over 1984. It had many commercial accounts other than the Cadaco job and it continued to service those accounts.

The record discloses that at the time a union organizing drive surfaced a bitterly antagonistic employer fired several key inhouse organizers, and discharged the bulk of its new employees, informing them that they could continue to earn a livelihood in its establishment only as the employees of another employer. Six months later, when it was faced with the prospect of bringing union sympathizers back to its payroll, it then transferred back to the same payroll, admittedly for reasons other than cost effectiveness, a number of former employees who had continued to work for it throughout the winter without engaging in any union activities. The effect of the second move—packing a prospective bargaining unit with employees of another employer (Manpower) to offset the return of union sympathizers—is simply reverse spin on the same tactic it followed in November. Respondent manipulated its staff to prevent unionization in November by transferring employees out and, faced with a contrary situation in May, took the opposite tack for the same underlying reason.

As the General Counsel points out, the Respondent's original intention was simply to use Manpower employees to replace its merging employees. When evidence evolved that union sentiment was spreading throughout the plant, the Respondent enlarged on its original plan and discharged all of its bindery employees. By subcontracting this work to Manpower to avoid the unionization of its employees the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The General Counsel does not seek a remedy for all of the employees who were treated in this fashion. However, both Roots, Wayne Ford, and Olson were seen as prominent in the union effort and were discharged as a part of this defensive scheme. Accordingly, their discharges violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The fact that any or all of them could have applied for and obtained jobs with Manpower is an irrelevancy that bears, if anything, only on the remedy in this case, not on a determination of whether in fact a violation of the Act took place when they were discharged.

D. Reinstatement and Postsettlement Activity

It is well settled that presettlement activity of a respondent may be examined and relied on in assessing its conduct following the execution of the settlement agreement to determine if any postsettlement conduct amounts to an unfair labor practice. Laborers' Local 185 (Joseph's Landscaping), 154 NLRB 1385 (1965); Lawyers Publishing Co., 273 NLRB 129 (1984). To warrant setting aside a settlement agreement, the General Counsel must establish that following the execution of the agreement, the Respondent either failed to comply with its specific terms or that it engaged in subsequent unfair labor practices. If the General Counsel is successful in establishing either or both of these facts, then the settlement agreement may be treated as if it had not been executed, and the original complaint, as well as any subsequent complaint, may be prosecuted as if the settlement had never taken place. Contrary to contentions made by the Respondent, the mere execution of a settlement agreement constitutes neither the withdrawal nor the dismissal of a complaint and does not bar future prosecution if the settlement is not honored.

The Respondent agreed on April 22, 1985, to offer to the six named discriminatees full and immediate reinstatement to their former or to substantially equivalent employment in the event that their former jobs no longer existed. What constitutes a valid offer of reinstatement has been the subject of extensive litigation extending over a long period of time. In order to constitute a valid offer of reinstatement, the offer of work must be specific, unequivocal, and unconditional.[12] The work offered must entail similar skills, similar pay, and similar working conditions.[13] A mere inquiry, directed to an employee for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he is available for work, does not constitute an offer of reinstatement.[14] Asking employees to come back to work and then telling them that business had not picked up sufficiently to permit reinstatement is a contradiction that amounts to no offer of reinstatement at all.[15] An uncommunicated offer of reinstatement is no offer of reinstatement at all.[16] An employee has no obligation to decide whether he wishes to return to work until he has received a valid offer of reinstatement.[17] Only when an offer of reinstatement has been unequivocally rejected is an employer relieved of his duty to reinstate an employee.[18] An offer of a few days' work or an offer of part-time work to a full-time employee does not constitute an offer of reinstatement.[19] An employee must be given a reasonable time in which to accept a valid offer of reinstatement. Two and four days, respectively, as well as 3 weeks, have been held not to be a reasonable time to accept such an offer.[20] Conditioning reinstatement on avoidance of future union activities is not a valid offer.[21] If an employer asserts an economic defense, such as unavailability of jobs, to justify not making a valid offer of reinstatement, the burden is on it to establish such a defense by a preponderance of credible evidence.[22] Tested by these principles, the Respondent herein has yet to make a valid offer of reinstatement to any of the six discriminatees in this case, with the possible exception of Karen Root.

Under certain circumstances, an economic defense may serve to toll the backpay liability of an employer who is under an obligation to offer reinstatement to designated employees and does not do so. However, no economic defense short of plant closing serves to erase the reinstatement obligation of an employer who is required to offer reinstatement and has failed to do so. In this case, the Respondent played games with the six discriminatees in an effort to strike them from its rolls on a permanent basis while giving lip service to the obligation it incurred when it signed the April 22 settlement. The letter that the Respondent wrote to the six discriminatees on May 9, offering reinstatement but no jobs, was patent nonsense. Whether it tolled a backpay liability will be discussed infra. As satisfaction of a reinstatement obligation it was a nullity.

It should be noted that all six discriminatees were permanent full-time employees. The definitions of permanent employee and full-time employee are contained in the Respondent's handbook, either explicitly or by necessary inference. The handbook defines probationary employee as one who has worked more than 3 months. By implication anyone who had served more than 3 months was no longer in this status. If he was also a full-time employee, he was eligible for certain stated company benefits. All of the discriminatees had worked at least 5 months at the time of their respective discharges and were eligible for company benefits. A full-time employee is defined in this booklet as anyone who works an average of 36 hours a week or more. This definition fitted all of the discriminatees, many of whom were complaining because they had been working 50 or 60 hours a week. When the Respondent began referring to them and to others similarly situated as part-time employees, it was not only violating common usage in the English language but the definition contained in its handbook.

The offer of a few days' work to Karen Root late in June 1985 did not constitute reinstatement to her former or substantially equivalent employment. It was only an offer of a few days' work, not permanent employment. Her recall late in July was arguably reinstatement to a permanent position. However, she worked only 6 more weeks before she was laid off again. She has not been recalled since that layoff. When she was laid off again in September, Plant Manager Harris told her that the layoff would be short, that he was going to operate on a skeleton crew for a week, and that she would be called back in order of seniority. In fact, throughout the fall of 1985, others with less seniority than K. Root continued to work along with employees who were brought in from time to time from various temporary services. Despite the fact that the Respondent has continued to prosper and to produce substantial numbers of Cadaco games along with its regular commercial work, K. Root has not been working. I conclude that the layoff of Karen Root on September 20 was discriminatorily motivated, as was her discharge 10 months earlier, and that by laying her off and failing to recall her, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Wayne Ford was recalled to work for 2 or 3 days late in June. Because it was a recall to temporary work, it did not satisfy the Respondent's reinstatement obligation. Moreover, the letter that he received at that time giving him only a day's notice to report was not sufficient to satisfy a reinstatement obligation, notwithstanding the fact that Ford was able to respond to it.

In early August, W. Ford called the plant and asked for work. He was told there was none available. However, he was told that he would have to maintain a telephone in order to be eligible for recall. This instruction was confirmed by a letter that was sent the next day. Placing such a condition on Ford's right of reinstatement violated the terms of the settlement agreement as well as settled Board law. The call to W. Ford at 3:50 a.m. for the asserted purpose of having him report for 2 or 3 days' work at 7:30 a.m. on the same day likewise is not a valid offer of reinstatement. Inasmuch as Chalker never told Ford to report or even transmitted such a message through a third person, the call was not an offer at all. It was merely an act of harassment. Accordingly, I conclude that the Respondent failed utterly in its obligation to offer W. Ford reinstatement to his former or substantially equivalent work. Moreover, the Respondent was not satisfied merely to leave W. Ford in the position of an unreinstated employee. When he did not report at 7:30 a.m. in response to an offer that he did not receive, either actually or technically, it discharged him in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Late in June, Csiszar spoke with Garry Root and offered him what was essentially part-time employment of a temporary nature. The offer failed to give Root a reasonable opportunity to conclude his present employment and report for work. The excuse used with respect to him as well as other employees, namely, that the Respondent could not give much advance notice or written notice to report to work because of the sporadic nature of its operation, simply illustrates that the offers that it was making to the six discriminatees were not bona fide offers of permanent employment but were merely attempts to remove the discriminatees from its rolls while offering colorable compliance with the settlement agreement. I conclude that the overture made to Garry Root was not a bona fide offer of reinstatement and that the Respondent has failed to comply with the terms of the settlement agreement with respect to his employment.

I have concluded that as a matter of fact Olson was never sent a letter of any sort that offered him employment of any kind. Moreover, Chalker testified that the work available for Olson when the disputed letter was sent was of 2 or 3 days' duration. Accordingly, Olson was never given a bona fide offer of reinstatement, as required by the terms of the settlement agreement.

Hall's letter to Cannon, dated June 26, instructing him to report for work no later than June 28, was insufficient notice to constitute a valid offer of reinstatement. The fact that the letter did not reach Cannon until several days after June 28 merely compounds the failure of the Respondent to honor its contractual commitment. When Cannon responded to the letter, the management of the Respondent refused to speak to him, thus demonstrating that the Respondent was simply trying to avoid bringing him back to work while laying a paper trail suggesting compliance with the settlement.

As noted above, a valid offer of reinstatement must be made to the same position or to a substantially equivalent one. In the case of Lidell Ford, he was brought back to work on August 19 at a job that required the exercise of substantially greater skill than the one that he vacated when he was discharged. The Respondent had reason to believe that Ford was not capable of performing the tasks to which he was assigned on August 19 because he had never performed that job before. As anticipated, Ford was not up to operating the collator in the stitcher mode nor was he able to set it up for stitching. The reason he was assigned this was was obvious. The Respondent wanted to embarrass Ford and to put him in a position in which he would either quit or take a lower paying job. Ford chose the latter route. Chalker then decided to rub it in by giving him a reprimand for reporting late for work when in fact he was told in writing that he had until August 19 to report. The reprimand recites allegations that were factually false and does so in such a manner that laid a groundwork for a discharge for cause. The reason for both of these moves was the Respondent's abiding hostility to unionization and to Ford, whom it continued to regard as a principal cause of the union effort in its plant. The August 19 recall does not amount to reinstatement and the reprimand, motivated as it was by antiunion considerations, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Because the Respondent has yet to offer Ford a reinstatement that comports with its obligations under the April 22 settlement agreement or under the Act, that obligation remains in order to remedy the unfair labor practice that it committed on November 8, 1984. During August and September, Ford continued to promote the union cause actively. On September 20, 1985, he was laid off along with Karen Root. As in the case of Karen Root, Ford was told at this time that the layoff was prompted by lack of work and that he would be called back in order of seniority when work again became available. Respondent has not recalled Ford but continued to employ individuals with less seniority, including persons referred by temporary employment services, throughout the fall of 1985. During this period of time, it has continued to perform a large amount of work both for Cadaco and for its other customers. As in the case of Karen Root, I conclude that this layoff was discriminatorily motivated and, as such, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The second complaint alleges that certain of the Respondent's actions violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act. There is no doubt that the six discriminatees herein and others filed charges and that certain unlawful acts were committed by the Respondent following the filing of those charges. However, there is some doubt that the filing of charges added anything but context to the actions taken by the Respondent, i.e., but for the filing of the charges, the settlement agreement could never have taken place. However, Respondent's underlying motive was, and remained, its implacable opposition to unionization and to those who engaged in union activities. The fact that these individuals sought redress with the Board added nothing to the Respondent's determination to get rid of them. Accordingly, I would dismiss so much of the consolidated complaint that alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.

On the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record considered as a whole, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Middle Earth Graphics, Inc. is now, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Paperworkers International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging James Cannon Jr., Lidell Ford Jr., Wayne Ford, Karen Root, Garry Wayne Root, and Clark Olson because of their union sympathies and activities; and by subcontracting work to another employer; and discharging employees in order to prevent the unionization of the plant, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

4. By the acts and conduct set forth in Conclusion of Law 3; by threatening employees that the Respondent would close the plant if it became unionized; by coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities and the union activities of other employees; by telling an employee that she would not be discharged if she did not talk union in the plant; by soliciting an employee to commit perjury in order to support the Respondent's version of a discharge; by telling an employee that another employee lied to prevent reprisals from being taken against him for his union activities; by telling an employee that it had fired another employee because of his union activities; by telling an employee that no reprisals would be taken against him if he did not talk about the union; and by issuing a reprimand against an employee in reprisal for union activities and for the purpose of laying the groundwork for his eventual discharge, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices have a close, intimate, substantial, and adverse impact upon the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has committed certain unfair labor practices, I will recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take other actions designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Because the violations of the Act found herein are repeated and pervasive, and because they demonstrate an attitude on the part of this Respondent to behave in complete disregard of the rights of its employees, I will recommend to the Board a so-called broad 8(a)(1) remedy designed to suppress any and all violations of that section of the Act. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). I will also recommend that the Respondent be required to offer to James Cannon Jr., Lidell Ford Jr., Wayne Ford, Karen Root, Garry Wayne Root, and Clark Olson full and immediate reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or to other rights that they previously enjoyed, and that they be made whole for any loss of pay or benefits that they may have sustained by reason of the discriminations practiced against them, to be computed in accordance with the Woolworth formula,[23] with interest thereon at the adjusted prime rate used by the Internal Revenue Service for the computation of tax payments. Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 246 (1980); Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). I will recommend that the Respondent be required to remove from its records any reference to the unlawful discharges or unlawful disciplinary warnings relating to the discriminatees, and that it notify these employees in writing that such acts have been done and that their unlawful discharges and unlawful discipline will not be used as a basis for future disciplinary actions against them. I will also recommend that the Respondent be required to post the usual notice, advising its employees of their rights and of the results of this case.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[24]

ORDER

The Respondent, Middle Earth Graphics, Inc., Kalamazoo, Michigan, its officers, agents, supervisors, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities and the union activities of other employees.

(b) Threatening to close the plant if the employees become unionized.

(c) Telling employees that they will not be discharged or suggesting that reprisals will not be taken against them so long as they refrain from talking about the union.

(d) Soliciting employees to commit perjury in order to support the Respondent's version of a discharge.

(e) Telling employees that other employees lied to prevent reprisals from being taken against them for their union activities.

(f) Telling employees that it had fired another employee because of his union activities.

(g) Issuing reprimands against employees in reprisal for their union activities or for the purpose of laying the groundwork for an eventual discriminatory discharge.

(h) Discouraging membership in and activities on behalf of United Paperworkers International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC, or any other labor organization, by discharging employees, contracting out their work, or otherwise discriminating against them in their hire or tenure or in their terms and conditions of employment.

(i) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to James Cannon Jr., Lidell Ford Jr., Wayne Ford, Karen Root, Clark Olson, and Garry Wayne Root full and immediate reinstatement to their former positions or, in the event that such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or to other rights which they formerly enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of pay or benefits that they may have suffered by reason of the discriminations found herein, in the manner described above in the remedy section.

(b) Remove from its personnel records any reference to the discriminatory discharges of the above-named employees and the unlawful disciplinary warning given to Lidell Ford, Jr., and notify each employee in writing that these discharges and warning will be used as a basis for future discipline against them.

(c) Post at its Kalamazoo, Michigan plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[25] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED insofar as the consolidated complaint herein alleges matters not found to be violative of the Act, the said consolidated complaint is hereby dismissed.

[25] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Micro-Chart Company and Linda J. Johnson and Teresa Stan. Cases 9–CA–23251–1 and 9–CA–23251–2

19 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 17 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board had delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Micro-Chart Company, New Carlisle, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Members Johansen and Cracraft, who did not participate in Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882 (1986), agree that the activity was concerted and protected.

James E. Horner, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Gary L. Maxton, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARION C. LADWIG, Administrative Law Judge. These cases were tried at Dayton, Ohio, on 17 September 1986.[1] The charges were filed by two discharged employees on 24 June, and the complaint was issued 1 August and amended at the trial.

In a meeting on 23 May employees Teresa Stan and Linda Johnson led protests that the Company was failing to pay the employees on time four paydays in a row. On 18 June, on the completion of a large overdue microfilming job, President Gary Maxton summarily discharged them.

[1] All dates are in 1986.

The primary issues are whether the Company, the Respondent, (a) unlawfully threatened Stan with discharge for questioning the delayed pay at the meeting, (b) threatened to close the facility if the employees sought a union, and (c) discharged employees Stan and Johnson for engaging in protected concerted activity at the meeting, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after considering the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Company, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, an Ohio corporation, microfilms records at its facility in New Carlisle, Ohio, where it annually provides over $50,000 in services to nonretail enterprises that annually meet the Board's jurisdictional direct inflow standard. The Company admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Threats

On 23 May, about 30 minutes after Supervisor Sharon Fugate conducted the employee meeting, employee Teresa Stan told Fugate that "we're not trying to cause problems. We just want to know why we're not getting paid on time." Fugate first responded that employee Dee Gantt had "come back here and told me that you girls were getting upset because you weren't getting paid, and that [Fugate] ought to go out there and say something to them or go get [President] Gary Maxton." As credibly testified by Stan (who impressed me most favorably as an honest, forthright witness) (Tr. 34):

> Sharon Fugate also said that "if Gary finds out about today's meeting, you'll get fired."
> And I said, "Why? Just for asking questions about our pay?"
> And she said, yes, that Gary considers that grounds for dismissal, and that when I was hired, I was told "You do not ask questions."

Fugate claimed to the contrary (Tr. 174–175) that after the employee meeting Stan apologized for her conduct and that although she accepted Stan's apologies, she told her that her conduct "could possibly be grounds for discharge." I discredit Fugate's version of the conversation. (By her demeanor on the stand, Fugate appeared less than candid.)

I find that Supervisor Fugate's statements to employee Stan constitute a threat to discharge her for engaging in what I find was protected concerted activity at the meeting. The threat clearly violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

About 3 weeks earlier microfilm camera operator Debra Sipe was talking to Supervisor Fugate about the film and footage on one of the jobs. As she credibly testified, she asked Fugate what would happen if someone "called up a union and asked them to come in. Fugate answered, "Well, Gary would shut it down." Sipe asked why and Fugate answered, "Because he wouldn't . . . pay us all equal pay." (Tr. 68–69, 72, 74–75.) I discredit Fugate's denials (Tr. 170, 176). (Sipe appeared to be an honest witness.)

I find that this threat to close the facility if the employees sought a union also clearly violated Section 8(a)(1).

B. The 18 June Discharges

1. The protected concerted activity

Teresa Stan and Linda Johnson were microfilm camera operators who were summarily discharged at quitting time on 18 June. The General Counsel contends that they were discharged for engaging in protected concerted activity at the employee meeting on 23 May.

At noon on 23 May, after employee Gantt had checked the incoming mail, she told other employees that no checks had come in and it "looks like we're not getting paid again." About 1:30 p.m. employees Stan and Johnson were discussing not getting paid on time with Gantt and employees Sipe and Alicia Jones. Stan suggested drawing up a petition to get a meeting to discuss why they were not getting paid on time. She did so and she, Johnson, Sipe, and Jones signed it. But when she turned to hand it to Gantt to sign, she saw Gantt walking toward Supervisor Fugate. (Tr. 28–29, 33, 65, 83–84, 183.) (The General Counsel contends that Gantt "apparently has a tendency to play both sides against the middle.")

In a few minutes Fugate came and called a meeting. She told the employees, "You're not getting paid today. No checks came in the mail, and I don't know what else to tell you." She asked for questions and Linda Johnson asked: "When is this going to stop? This is four paydays in a row that we haven't been paid on time." Teresa Stan then said that Dee Gantt had told the employees that a $5000 check had come in the previous Saturday from Christ Hospital "and it seems" that if a check "does not come in on our payday, no matter how many come in during the week, we don't get paid." Fugate explained that Maxton has a small business, that he had just paid $1500 for film, and that other obligations, such as light bills, "come first before he can meet the payroll." Johnson asked, "Why doesn't Gary come down and tell us himself" a few days ahead of time so "we would know what to expect on payday" and "could juggle our bills." Stan said, "When I was hired, I was told that it would happen once in awhile" but "this is four paydays in a row that we're being paid late." Other employees also spoke up, but Stan and Johnson led the protests. It was an orderly meeting. (Tr. 22, 30–32, 55, 65–68, 84–88, 184, 201.)

Although Supervisor Fugate claimed (Tr. 173) that employees Stan and Johnson were "harsh and bitter" and employee Gantt claimed (Tr. 150) that Stan and Johnson were "pretty loud," I find that their conduct at the meeting was protected concerted activity. (Gantt appeared willing to fabricate anything to help the Company's cause.) Fugate was obviously aware that Stan and Johnson were protesting the late pay both on their own behalf and on behalf of other employees.

About 30 minutes after the meeting, as found above, Fugate told Stan that asking questions about their pay was "grounds for dismissal" and that if Maxton "finds out about today's meeting, you'll get fired."

President Maxton did find out about the meeting. But at that time, the Company was behind schedule in completing a large microfilming job for Christ Hospital because of the lack of film. He discharged Stan and Johnson on completion of that job. (Tr. 38–40, 68, 71, 88–90.)

2. The discharges

a. Teresa Stan

Stan was one of the Company's best microfilm camera operators. She was often praised by Supervisor Fugate on her roll book for doing work that was "Good!!" "Super Great!!!!" "Great! Great! Great!" and (twice in the week before her discharge) "Super Duper Good!" (G.C. Exh. 3, Tr. 45–48). It is undisputed that "on many occasions" Fugate told her "She was surprised that I could put out the footage as fast as I have" (Tr. 44). It is also undisputed that Fugate had offered, and Stan had agreed to take, the job of assistant supervisor when that position would be vacated in September (Tr. 50). Stan was never reprimanded or disciplined or given any warning of any kind (Tr. 51, 180) except on 23 May, after the employee meeting, when Fugate threatened her with discharge for asking questions about not being paid on time.

On 17 June Supervisor Fugate told Stan and employees Johnson and Gantt that "we're all caught up" on the Christ Hospital microfilming job. About 4 p.m. the next day, in the office with Fugate and Supervisor Sandra Wiley, President Maxton told Stan (in her words, Tr. 41–43):

> "Teresa, I am terminating your services as of today because you have been making several complaints about your pay."
> And I said, "No, sir. I made only one complaint."
> And he said, "Well, one complaint—that's all it takes." And shrugged his shoulders.
> And I said, "I don't understand why you're firing me . . . . I've always been a good employee. I've come to work on time. I've always gotten . . . my footage. I did above-average than anybody else."
> And he says, "Yes, you are a good worker."
> And I said, "And . . . when I was hired, I was told . . . that getting paid late would only happen once in awhile."
> And Sharon Fugate said, "Yes, once in awhile."
> . . . .
>
> . . . I said "Gary Maxton, is Dee Gantt getting fired?"
> And he said, "Well, I can't tell you that."
> I said, "Well, she was complaining about pay just as much as anybody else was, and she was checking the mail to see if any [checks] had come in, and was getting everybody else upset."

And he said, "Well, I can't tell you that."

And I turned around and walked away.

Supervisor Wiley did not testify, and Supevisor Fugate did not dispute Stan's testimony about what was said. President Maxton claimed at the beginning of the trial (Tr. 18–19) that when he discharged Stan, "I said it appeared that she was unhappy at Micro-Chart Company." He did not testify later to deny Stan's account of what was said. I credit Stan's testimony about the meeting.

Maxton claimed (Tr. 19) that he drew the conclusion that Stan was unhappy because Supervisor Wiley reported that Stan had been "harassing" employee Gantt. He claimed that he "asked what generated this, and they said that Mrs. Stan was unhappy with Mrs. Gantt because [Gantt] had supported the Micro-Chart Company during a meeting that was held on May 23rd." (To the contrary, Stan's and Gantt's immediate supervisor, Fugate, admitted (Tr. 175) not being aware of any problems between Gantt and the other employees after the meeting; "I would check the girls, and there didn't seem to be any dispute going on.") Regarding the 23 May meeting, Maxton testified (Tr 19) that he learned that Stan and Linda Johnson "had requested a meeting with Mrs. Fugate" and "that apparently there was a lot of undercurrent, maybe loud talking, general disruption on the 23rd." He acknowledged (Tr. 20) that the main topic of the meeting was "that the company had not received any payments from the customer and the payroll would have to be delayed."

I note that despite the evidence that the Company frequently paid the employees late or not in full (Tr. 24, 79–82; G.C. Exh. 2), President Maxton testified (Tr. 15) that he would say "90 percent of the time" in the last 12 months he had been able to pay the employees "in full and on time." (He impressed me as a witness who was less than candid.)

b. Linda Johnson

Johnson was in good health when she started working 8 February. She had a cyst on her arm, but it did not cause her any trouble on the job until early May when it became swollen. On 28 May she picked up a heavy box, causing much pain, and Supervisor Fugate sent her home. She had surgery on 30 May and was off a total of 6 days and 1 partial day after that. She worked 5 hours Saturday, 14 June, to make up part of the time and told Fugate she would work 5 hours again Saturday, 21 June (not knowing that she would be discharged that Wednesday). Fugate "said that was fine." (Tr. 94–100, 105–107, 125; G.C. Exh. 6.)

Sometime in April Supervisor Fugate had held a meeting and told the employees that President Maxton said there had been too much absenteeism, that it had to stop, and that if it continued, "you would be warned verbally first, then would be given a written warning, and then you would receive a three-day suspension without pay" (Tr. 101). Similarly a notice near the timeclock provided for progressive discipline: an oral warning, a written warning, and then a 3-day suspension without pay for unexcused absences (Tr. 105). None of Johnson's absences, however, were "unexcused" (G.C. Exh. 6; Tr. 140–144). Fugate gave Johnson permission each time to be absent. Fugate never indicated that her sick leave would be a problem and Johnson never received any warning for her absences or any reprimand or discipline for any reason. (Tr. 95, 98, 100–101.)

Supervisor Fugate showed only concern for Johnson. As Johnson credibly testified, "every day that I was absent, I called [Fugate] every morning around 8:00 o'clock and told her, and she was very concerned about the cyst; and 'what did the doctor say,' and 'what is he doing,' and 'how are you feeling,' and 'we're all worried about you here,' and 'we want you to get better.' It was all concern. There was never anything negative." (Tr. 97.)

On one occasion, as employee Stan credibly testified, Supervisor Fugate said, "Just as long as Linda Johnson calls in and lets me know what's going on, she doesn't have to worry about her job." On another occasion Fugate was standing with President Maxton's wife Gerry in the processing room when Stan walked up. Fugate asked about Johnson and told Stan "that Gerry Maxton said that anything about a lump scares me . . . and she really felt for Linda and that Linda Johnson didn't have to worry about her job when she comes back. She didn't have to film; that we could have her prep . . . . We could find something for her to do." (Tr. 217.)

When Johnson returned to work, Fugate told her not to do anything that would cause her any pain or trouble "and that if that did, to let her know, and I could do something else." Johnson resumed her microfilming work and never requested other work. (Tr. 107.)

On the morning of 18 June (the date that Johnson was summarily discharged at quitting time) Gerry Maxton again showed some concern for her. When checking the roll books (showing production the day before) Gerry Maxton asked Supervisor Fugate whether the fast job that Johnson was on should be given to employee Alicia Jones, who was on a slow job that would be easier on Johnson's arm. As Fugate reported to Johnson, she told Gerry Maxton that Johnson had requested to stay on that job to build up her speed (after working on a slow index card job) and "Linda knows that if any job . . . causes her any pain or discomfort to her arm, all she has to do is tell me" and she can "either slow down or prep, or whatever" she needs to do. (Tr. 77–78, 91.)

Instead of slowing down that day, Johnson "was trying to see how fast" she could go and ran 315 feet of film. Going above 300 feet was unusual for her. When she took off the last roll of film she went back and jokingly told Supervisor Fugate she "expected a party the next day for doing that." But "Fugate acted real funny at the time. She wouldn't look me in the face." (Tr. 91–92, 108.)

At 3:55 p.m., a few minutes later, Johnson was called to the office (with employee Stan) and discharged without any prior warning. In the presence of Supervisors Fugate and Wiley, President Maxton told her: "I'm terminating your employment here as of today due to your health . . . when you applied here, on your application, you stated that you were in good health, but you had [known] about the cyst for the past two years." Johnson insisted that "it never caused me any trouble until it became inflamed in May," but Maxton responded that "you're missing too much work by going to the doctor." She asked if that was all and she left. (Tr. 92–93.) This testimony is undisputed.

3. Contentions and concluding findings

Relying on Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493, 497 (1984), reaffirmed 281 NLRB 882 (1986), the General Counsel contends (a) that employees Stan and Johnson were engaged in protected concerted activity at the 23 May employee meeting, (b) that President Maxton knew at the time he discharged them that they were the leading protagonists at the meeting, complaining about the Company's pay practices, and (c) that his motivation for discharging them was this protected concerted activity.

As proof of this motivation, the General Counsel points out that Maxton terminated Stan and Johnson at the same time, that Supervisor Fugate told Stan after the 23 May meeting that if Maxton "finds out about today's meeting, you'll get fired" for asking questions about the pay, and that Maxton told Stan she was being discharged for "making several complaints about your pay." The General Counsel argues that Maxton could not discharge the two employees immediately for their protected concerted activity at the 23 May meeting because the Company "was behind in its production due to the absence of microfilm." But on 18 June, the very next day after completion of the Christ Hospital job, he summarily fired them "for the rankest of pretextual reasons." She points out that "nowhere is there any testimony that any supervisor made any recommendation to Gary Maxton that these two women be summarily discharged for any transgression." She also cites their good work records, the absence of complaints toward them by any supervisor before their discharge, and the favorable comments and offer to promote Stan as additional factors, establishing a prima facie case of unlawful discharge.

The Company contends in its brief that Stan and Johnson were discharged for "good and proper reasons . . . not connected with the events of May 23." Disregarding the evidence to the contrary, the Company also contends: "It should be noted that Counsel for the NLRB made no attempt to relate the discharge of June 18, 1986, with the events of May 23, 1986."

When summarily discharging employees Stan and Johnson at quitting time on 18 June without any prior notice or warning, President Maxton revealed to one of them that he was motivated by the complaining at the 23 May meeting. He informed Stan that he was discharging her for making several complaints, and when she responded that she made only one complaint (at that meeting), he stated "that's all it takes." As found, Stan and Johnson led the protests about the late pay at that meeting, and the Company was aware that they were protesting both on their own behalf and on behalf of other employees, engaging in protected activity. Also as found, Stan was warned after the 23 May meeting that "you'll get fired" if Maxton finds out about the meeting. Maxton did find out, but as the General Counsel contends, he waited until the Christ Hospital job was completed before discharging the two leaders of the protests at the meeting.

The evidence is clear that Fugate, the two employees' immediate supervisor, was not recommending their discharge. Fugate was praising Stan for her high production and was planning to promote her. Fugate gave assurances that Johnson's sick leave, caused by the removal of the cyst, would not affect her job, and Johnson was working again at top speed and on Saturdays. None of her sick leave was considered unexcused absences, and she had not been given any oral or written warning or suspended for 3 days as required by the rule before discharging an employee for excessive absences, even if her absences had been unexcused.

I agree with the General Counsel that she has established a prima facie case under Meyers that the protests about late pay made by Stan and Johnson at the 23 May meeting on their own behalf and on behalf of other employees were "concerted," that the Company knew of the concerted nature of this activity, that the activity was protected by the Act, and that their discharge was motivated by this protected concerted activity. I also find that the Company has failed to rebut the prima facie case by carrying its burden to demonstrate that it would have discharged them in the absence of their protected conduct. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). Accordingly I find that the Company unlawfully discharged Stan and Johnson in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. By discharging Teresa Stan and Linda Johnson on 18 June 1986 for engaging in protected concerted activity, the Company engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By threatening to discharge an employee for engaging in protected concerted activity, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1).

3. By threatening to close the facility if the employees sought a union, the Company further violated Section 8(a)(1).

Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having unlawfully discharged two employees, it must offer them reinstatement and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of discharge to date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, Micro-Chart Company, New Carlisle, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against any employee for engaging in protected concerted activity.

(b) Threatening to discharge any employee for engaging in protected concerted activity.

(c) Threatening to close the facility if the employess seek a union.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Teresa Stan and Linda Johnson immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in New Carlisle, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply. To determine or secure compliance with the Order, the Board or any authorized representatives may obtain discovery from the respondent, its officers, agents, successors, or assigns or from any person having knowledge of any compliance matter, as provided in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedures. The discovery shall be conducted under the supervision of the United States Court of Appeals enforcing the Order and may be on any matter reasonably related to the compliance.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against any of you for engaging in protected concerted activity.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge any of you for engaging in such activity.

WE WILL NOT threaten to close our facility if you seek a union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Teresa Stan and Linda Johnson immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify them that we have removed from our files any reference to their discharge and that the discharge will not be used against them in any way.

MICRO-CHART COMPANY

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[3] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. and Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 410, AFL–CIO and Harry Joe Walters. Cases 7–CA–23493, 7–CA–24227, and 7–CA–23718

19 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 14 April 1986 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc., Grand Rapids, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Howard M. Dodd, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Anthony P. Gauthier, Esq., of Grand Rapids, Michigan, for the Respondent.
John R. Van Noller, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, for the Union.
Harry Joe Walters, of Wyoming, Michigan, pro se.

DECISION

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding involves one alleged discharge in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., and alleged violations of Section 8(a)(5) by unilateral changes and reductions of terms and conditions of employment and failure to execute a written contract embodying a collective-bargaining agreement. The relevant docket entries are as follows: The charge in Case 7–CA–23494 was filed by Charging Party Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 410, AFL–CIO (Union) on 31 May 1984 and in Case 7–CA–24227 on 28 January 1985. The charge in Case 7–CA–23718 was filed by Charging Party Harry Joe Walters on 6 August 1984. A complaint in Case 7–CA–23493 issued on 26 June 1984; an amended consolidated complaint issued on 25 September 1984, consolidating Case 7–CA–23718; and on 30 April 1985 a second amended consolidated complaint issued, consolidating Case 7–CA–24227. The hearing was held in Grand Rapids, Michigan, on 4 December 1985.

I find, as Respondent admits, that Respondent Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc., a corporation duly organized and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of Michigan, maintains its principal office and place of business in Grand Rapids, Michigan, where it is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of fabricated sheet metal products for industry. During the year ending 31 December 1984, a representative period, Respondent purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its Grand Rapids facility, sheet metal and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, of which goods valued in excess of $50,000 were transported and delivered to its Grand Rapids facility directly from points located outside Michigan. I conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. I further conclude, as Respondent admits, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The Union represents the following unit, which is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees of Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. engaged in but not limited to the (a) manufacture, fabrication, assembling, handling, erection, installation, dismantling, conditioning, adjustment, alteration, repairing, and servicing of all ferrous or nonferrous metal work and all other material used in lieu thereof and of all air-veyor systems and air handling systems regardless of material used including

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and brief adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We correct the judge's inadvertent error in fn. 4 of his decision in referring to "the delay between 3 May and 5 July . . . ."; the phrase should read, "the delay between 31 May and 5 July . . . ." We also correct the judge's inadvertent error in stating in the third to last paragraph before the remedy section of his decision, "Furthermore, when Walters was paid off on 3 October . . . ."; the phrase should read, "Furthermore, when Walters was paid off on 3 August . . . ."

[3] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by implementing unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment without bargaining with the Union, we additionally find that the Respondent failed to give sufficient notice to the Union of the changes prior to their implementation. See Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981 (1983), enfd. 715 F.2d 441, 444–445 (9th Cir. 1983).

We also adopt the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by discharging employee Walters. In so doing, we find that the General Counsel has established a prima facie case by showing that Walters' complaint under the collective-bargaining agreement that he was not paid for his overtime work led to his discharge. We further conclude, based on our agreement with the judge's findings of fact concerning the Respondent's asserted defense that Walters was discharged for working on his toolbox on company time, and the judge's rejection of that defense, that the Respondent has not met its burden of establishing that it would have discharged Walters in the absence of his protected concerted activity. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

> the setting of all equipment and all reinforcements in connection therewith; (b) all lagging over insulation and all duct lining; (c) testing and balancing of all air-handling equipment and duct work; (d) the preparation of all shop and field sketchs used in fabrication and erection, including those taken from original architectural and engineering drawings or sketches; and (e) all other work included in the jurisdictional claims of Sheet Metal Workers' International Association.

For approximately 20 years prior to the fall of 1983, Respondent was a member of the Sheet Metal Employers Association of Western Michigan (Association).[1] As a result, Respondent and the Union were parties to successive collective-bargaining agreements, the last of which (before the agreement in dispute), dated 1 May 1980, expired by its terms on 1 May 1984. On 21 November 1983 the Association wrote to its Michigan members, including Respondent, enclosing a form authorizing it to bargain for the membership for signature. The record does not indicate that Respondent replied to this letter. When the Association sent another authorization form to Respondent by letter dated 17 February 1984,[2] Anthony P. Gauthier, Respondent's attorney wrote back on 1 March 1984 returning the unsigned form and advising that:

> Ray Lantz and Vern Johnson have retained us to negotiate a new contract with the union. Accordingly, Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. will not be represented by SMACNA in the upcoming negotiations.

No copy of this letter was sent to the Union, which had notified the Association on 4 January of its intent to reopen the contract. But the Union was informed by Gauthier in a letter dated 28 February that:

> Vern Johnson and Ray Lantz have asked us to respond to your letter of January 4, 1984 concerning reopening the contract between Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. and your Union. Constructive Sheet Metal also desires to reopen the contract for wages, hours and other conditions of employment, and will be pleased to meet with you to negotiate these issues.
> We will contact you within the next few weeks to arrange for meeting dates and times.

Gauthier again wrote to the Union on 30 March after negotiations between the Union and SMACNA for a new contract had commenced, as follows:

> I am writing on behalf of Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. to restate our willingness to negotiate a new contract with your Union. As I told you today during our phone conversation, Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. has informed SMACNA that it will participate in the multi-employer bargaining. I trust that your Union will honor my client's right and decision to withdraw from the multi-employer bargaining, and consider yourself on notice of that decision.
> In other words, Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. will not consider itself bound to any new agreement negotiated between SMACNA and Local 410. If your Union desires to negotiate a new contract with Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc., please contact me at your earliest convenience concerning the time, location and subject matter of the proposed contract.

The Association refused to permit Respondent to withdraw from it; and it represented to the Union that Respondent was still a member, for which the Association was bargaining. In a letter dated 20 April, the Association's attorney stated that Respondent's purported 1 March withdrawal was untimely because it had to be made 60 days prior to the commencement of contract negotiations, stated in the letter as 6 March, and improper because it had been mailed to the executive director of the Association, rather than the president, as required. Reacting to that letter, Gauthier wrote to the Union on 25 April, as follows:

> As you know, we have beeen retained by Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. to represent them in contract negotiations with Local 410. As you also know, we have withdrawn from SMEA and SMACNA their authority to bargain for Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc., and I am writing to restate my client's willingness to enter into contract negotiations with your Union acting on behalf of my client's employee members.

On the same day, Gauthier wrote to the Association and complained that its 20 April letter was the first response to Respondent's notice of withdrawal and that it could not "justify waiting to object to our withdrawal until the day they submit their final offer to the Union." On 10 May the Association decided not to contest Respondent's withdrawal.

In the meantime, on 1 May Respondent implemented unilaterally the following changes in the terms and conditions of employment of its employees: it reduced the hourly wage of its employees to $11.49 per hour and ceased making payments to the pension, vacation and savings, national training, educational, SMACNA industrial, and life insurance funds—a savings of $5-labor costs per hour for each employee. Those changes were announced for the first time in a letter to the Union dated 30 April. On 5 May the Union filed in response an unfair labor practice charge in Case 7–CA–23418 complaining that Respondent "failed to give adequate written notice within the time perscribed in the existing contract for withdrawal from negotiations." In that charge, the Union's business manager, John Van Noller, stated: "Constructive Sheet Metal Company advised Sheet Metal Workers' Local Union No. 410, through its attorneys on February 28, 1984, that it would not participate in multi-employer negotiations with the Sheet Metal Employers of Western Michigan and Sheet Metal Workers' Local Union No. 410."

[1] The Association (referred to in one letter quoted below as SMEA) is the Michigan Chapter of the Sheet Metal and Air Conditioning Contractors National Association, referred to in some of the correspondence quoted below as SMACNA. I have treated both as the Association.

[2] All dates hereinafter set forth refer to the year 1984, unless otherwise stated.

In light of this statement, "true to the best of [Van Noller's] knowledge and belief," I find that Van Noller understood that Respondent was withdrawing the Association's bargaining authority. Gauthier's letter of 1 March to the Association withdrew from the Association the authority to bargain on Respondent's behalf. The return of the unsigned authorization form and the statement in the letter that Gauthier's law firm was retained to negotiate the contract could hardly have been interpreted as anything but a withdrawal. The last two sentences of Gauthier's 28 February letter to the Union state that Respondent desired separate negotiations with the Union, asking to meet with the Union to negotiate, and promising to contact the Union to arrange for meeting dates and times. Thus, Respondent sought to negotiate with the Union separate from multiemployer negotiations. Fairly read, the Association was not to represent Respondent. Of equal significance, the unfair labor practice charge demonstrates that the Union knew on 28 February that Respondent had withdrawn from the multiemployer negotiations.[3]

Under the Board's rule in Retail Associates, 120 NLRB 388, 394 (1958), "The decision to withdraw must contemplate a sincere abandonment, with relative permanency, of the multiemployer unit and the embracement of a different course of bargaining on an individual-employer basis." Respondent timely withdrew from the Association. Its notice to the Union was in writing and was made prior to 23 March, when the Association and the Union first exchanged bargaining proposals. Although the notice may not have been as clear and unequivocal as might be desired, the letter to the Union was intended to be read by Van Noller, and he read it, as the clear and unequivocal notice that Gauthier was attempting to send. His objection appeared to be only that Respondent did not give 90 days' notice, as required by the expiring collective-bargaining agreement, an objection that the General Counsel has not pursued in this proceeding.

Therefore, despite the fact that the complaint alleges that the Association reached full and complete agreement on a new contract on 20 June, Respondent was not bound by those negotiations and did not violate the Act when it refused the Union's request of 20 December to execute the Association contract. In addition, accepting this allegation of the complaint as true, the charge in Case 7–CA–24227 is barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. Preston H. Haskell Co., 238 NLRB 943 fn. 1 (1978), enf. denied on other grounds 616 F.2d 136 (5th Cir. 1980), holds that the 6-month limitation period for the refusal of an employer to execute an agreement through multiemployer bargaining must relate back to the date that the new agreement was reached. The agreement was reached on 20 June 1984 and the charge was not filed until 28 January 1985. The charge is, therefore, barred by Section 10(b).[4]

However, there is simply nothing here that entitled Respondent to change its terms and conditions of employment on 1 May. If it was still a member of the Association, the Association was still engaged in bargaining on that date and no impasse had been reached. If Respondent was not a member of the Association for bargaining purposes, then it had a duty to bargain with the Union, a duty that it has implicitly conceded by its filing of 8(b)(3) charges against the Union. The duty to bargain in good faith, protected under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, is defined by Section 8(d) as the duty "to meet . . . and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." "[A]n employer's unilateral change in conditions of employment under negotiation is . . . a violation of Section 8(a)(5), for it is a circumvention of the duty to negotiate." NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743 (1962). It is axiomatic that an employer violates Section 8(a)(5) by unilaterally implementing a change while negotiations are still in progress and impasse has not been reached. See, e.g., Winn-Dixie Stores, 243 NLRB 972 (1979).

There are exceptions to this rule. In Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981, 982 (1982), the Board wrote:

> [I]t is true that when an employer has diligently and earnestly sought to engage in bargaining and the union has continually avoided or delayed bargaining, the employer is justified under certain circumstances in implementing unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment. See, e.g., AAA

[3] The cases cited by the General Counsel are distinguishable. In Northern Petroleum Equipment Co., 244 NLRB 685 (1979), the employer's letter to the union merely stated that he had retained counsel and asked that future correspondence be sent to him. No request for separate bargaining was made. In Players Restaurant, 246 NLRB 63 (1979), enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Hoover, 639 F.2d 789 (9th Cir. 1981), the employer notified the union only that it wished to terminate the association contract at its expiration. It indicated no intention "to act contrary to the multi-employer council." Id. In Groton Piping Corp., 246 NLRB 99 (1979), no notice was sent to the union.

[4] For this reason, it is unnecessary to decide Respondent's other 10(b) defense, which presents some weighty issues. I merely note that the Regional Director in Case 7–CA–23418, which was timely filed, found that Respondent's withdrawal was timely and unequivocal and dismissed the charge. (Contrary to the contention of the General Counsel, an untimely attempt to withdraw from a multiemployer group may constitute an unfair labor practice. Teamsters Local 378 (Capitol Chevrolet Co.), 243 NLRB 1086 (1979).) Respondent then allegedly requested repeatedly that the Union bargain with it, but the Union refused to bagain, so Respondent filed an 8(b)(3) charge against the Union in Case 7–CB–6218. The Regional Director found that the Union had not bargained because the Association insisted that Respondent was still its member. When Case 7–CA–23418 was dismissed, the Union then realized that it was obligated to bargain with Respondent and on 5 July contacted Respondent to set up a date for bargaining and 26 July was agreed on as the date to begin. Respondent's charge was dismissed, the delay between 3 May and 5 July being "not so substantial" in light of the Union's willingness to meet on 26 July; and bargaining did commence and continued for several months. (In light of these peculiar circumstances, I do not conclude that the Union waived its position that Respondent had not properly withdrawn from multiemployer negotiations. It was forced into individual bargaining by reason of the Regional Director's disposition of these unfair labor practice charges. It also took that action because Respondent agreed to restore the wages and benefits it had unilaterally reduced. See fn. 5.) For some reason, which I do not understand, Respondent filed another unfair labor practice charge in Case 7–CB–6328 on 29 October, which again alleged that the Union failed to bargain in good faith between 31 May and 5 July. Again, the Regional Director dismissed the charge, but this time he reconsidered his earlier position and found that Respondent never gave a proper notice that it was withdrawing from the Association to begin with. That dismissal on 29 November prompted the filing of the charge in Case 7–CA–24227.

Motor Lines, Inc., 215 NLRB 793 (1974).[2] However, one of the circumstances which the Board insists upon in such cases is that the employer's unilateral change must be consistent with the employer's previous proposal to the union of changes in the expired contract. Ace Galvanizing, Inc., 217 NLRB 144, 146 (1975); Allen W. Bird II, Receiver for Caravelle Boat Company, a Corporation, and Caravelle Boat Company, 227 NLRB 1335, 1358 (1977). Here, Respondent never provided the Union any type of written or detailed proposal of changes in the expired contract. As the Union and Respondent did not reach a bargaining impasse, and the Union did not waive its right to bargain about the changes which were implemented, and Respondent did not implement changes which were consistent with any previously rejected offer, Respondent's implementation on July 1 of the changes in terms and conditions of employment violated its duty to bargain. Dial Tuxedos, Inc., 250 NLRB 476 (1980); cf. AAA, supra at 794.[3] Accordingly, we hold that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act since July 1, 1980, by ceasing to make contributions to the union health and welfare and pension fund and by implementing the company-funded medical insurance plan.

[2] In AAA, the employer in April timely notified the union of its intention to terminate the contract and submitted its proposed contract to the union along with a request to commence bargaining. For 2-1/2 months thereafter, the union refused to meet or bargain with the employer. Upon expiration of the contract, the employer unilaterally implemented changes in terms and conditions of employment. All the changes were consistent with the employer's detailed contract proposal, which the union had in its possession for 2-1/2 months.

[3] Our dissenting colleague does not question the long line of Board decisions holding that any changes unilaterally implemented by an employer following contract expiration must, inter alia, be consistent with the prior proposal made by the employer during bargaining. See cases cited in the text herein, plus Peerless Roofing Co., Ltd., 247 NLRB 500, 503–504 (1980). In light of that principle, we are at a loss to understand our dissenting colleague's analysis. In effect, he would find that an employer had unlawfully made a unilateral change that is consistent with its prior proposal though it has made no prior proposal. It is this internal contradiction that causes us to reject our colleague's analysis.

Additionally, our decision serves to foster and promote stable labor relations. The important functions of informing the union what changes in the contract are sought by the employer and putting the union on notice that after a reasonable period of time union inaction might result in the employer's unilateral implementation of these proposed changes have led the Board, and leads us, to require that an employer provide a union with a written copy of its proposed contract changes prior to unilaterally implementing them. Peerless Roofing, supra at 503; Allen W. Bird, supra at 1358; M & M Building and Electrical Contractors, Inc., d/b/a M & M Contractors, 262 NLRB 1472 (1982).

Despite Gauthier's letter that he would telephone to set up meetings, there is no evidence that he ever did so. Only 2 months had lapsed between Respondent's notice to the Union that it desired to bargain and the unilateral reductions. No bargaining had taken place. No proposals had been made. There was no impasse by 1 May and no impasse through the period ending 14 July, after which Respondent restored the prior terms of employment.[5] Without an impasse, and with Respondent's duty to bargain, either through the Association or by individual bargaining, there is no excuse for Respondent's unilateral change of conditions of employment without a prior proposal, without discussion of union rejection, and without union waiver. I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The final alleged violation concerns employee Harry Joe Walters, who was fired from his job on 3 August 1984 at 11:45 a.m. David Lantz, then shop foreman,[6] testified that he took Walters outside the door and told him that he no longer worked there. Walters testified to something vastly different, that Lantz told him that Lantz was getting rid of him because he was a "trouble causer . . . everytime [he] went on a job [he] was causing trouble over overtime pay." Lantz said, "[Y]ou're paid until noon, get your tools and get the hell off my property." Walters said fine, but asked Lantz whether he worked for his overtime. Lantz said, "[Y]es"; and Walters said, "I want my damn money." At some point in the conversation, Lantz said that he had men who worked for Respondent for years and did overtime work for straight-time pay. It is this conflict that gives rise to the instant dispute, whether Walters was discharged for grieving about Respondent's failure to pay him overtime pursuant to the union contract.

I find that Respondent violated the Act. I am convinced that Walters accurately related his conversation with Lantz on August 3. I am equally convinced that Lantz would not merely have told Walters when he terminated him that he no longer worked there. Some reason would have been given for firing Walters in the middle of the day, but Lantz stated none. Instead, he relied at the hearing on events that allegedly occurred that morning, that Walters was constructing a toolbox, which was personal work and was not allowed to be performed on company time. Although Lantz said he saw Walters performing his work all morning, on six separate occasions, Lantz testified that he become angrier and angrier, but he never said anything to or warned Walters. That is most strange, if indeed Walters was actually doing it. Yet, no one other than Lantz said he was.[7] Walters said that he was performing his assigned work, and that testimony was corroborated by Robert Veenstra, who was in charge of a crew, which included Walters, welding a hood. Veenstra did not see Walters doing anything but his assigned work.

There is no doubt that Respondent had a rule that an employer could not work on personal projects during company time. That rule, however, was breached from time to time by employees, including Lantz' son, without their being fired. Even Lantz admitted that he had performed some layout work on employees' personal equipment during working hours. Furthermore, Walters admitted working on a toolbox the day before or the day that he was fired, but he did so only before work and during breaks, when there is no question that he could properly do so. His testimony was corroborated by another employee, Robert Howard, who helped Walters bend metal to make trays and to prepare corner clips. Lantz' testimony, to the contrary, was uncorroborated; and I found his testimony concerning when he saw Walters building his toolbox so vague and at times so argumentative and brusque that I do not credit him.

[5] On 7 and 8 May Gauthier advised the Union's attorney that as soon as the Union agreed to bargain in good faith for a new contract with Respondent, the wages and benefits would be restored. The Union's attorney promised to and did convey this message to the Union.

[6] His father was co-owner of Respondent. At the time of the hearing, Lantz was a co-owner of Respondent.

[7] Walters candidly admitted that he sheared two small clips during working hours that morning, while he was otherwise engaged in Respondent's work. Lantz testified that he never saw Walters doing this work.

Accordingly, I conclude that at the end of July, Walters and Bruce Felton left Grand Rapids at 5 a.m. for an assigned job in Petosky, Michigan, and returned at 2 a.m. the following day. Walters was not paid off overtime and complained to Respondent's bookkeeper. Getting no satisfaction, he complained to Van Noller, who agreed to look into the matter. Shortly after that, Walters and employee Louis Phillips were assigned to work at Westinghouse, where they had to work nights after the day shift had gone home. Walters called Van Noller to find out how they were supposed to be paid. Van Noller said that there was straight time, time-and-a-half, and double time, but the employees were paid only 10 hours for 8 hours worked. Later, during the week before he was fired, Walters told Van Noller that he had not been paid according to the contract. Van Noller told Phillips to make sure that Walters received his money. Phillips said that Respondent had never paid it before and was not going to start then. Walters said that he wanted his "damn money" within earshot of Lantz' office. Van Noller pursued both complaints with Respondent's co-owner on 26 July and raised the matters with Gauthier on 1 August. Gauthier agreed to consult Respondent about them.

Accordingly, Lantz, despite his denials, must have become aware of Walters' overtime complaints because he mentioned them to Walters as the reason for Walters' termination. Furthermore, when Walters was paid off on 3 October, he was paid the overtime on the Petosky job that was due to him. I do not credit Lantz' denial that he was wholly unaware of any overtime dispute, a denial I found feigned.[8] There is nothing in this record that justifies Walters' discharge, other than his complaint under the collective-bargaining agreement that he was not paid for his overtime work. I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Interboro Contractors, 157 NLRB 1295 (1966), enfd. 388 F.2d 495 (1967), approved in NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984).[9]

On 27 December, the Union began a strike and picketing against Respondent, and the strike and picketing continued up to the date of the parties' stipulation dated 31 July 1985. The General Counsel contends that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike, but Van Noller testified that the sole reason that the strike was called was because of Respondent's failure to execute the Association's collective-bargaining agreement. Because I have found that Respondent's refusal to execute that agreement was not a violation of the Act, I conclude that the strike was not called to protest the existence of unfair labor practices. That I have found other violations of the Act is immaterial. There has been no proof of a causal connection between that illegal conduct and the strike. Amber Delivery Service, 250 NLRB 63, 72 (1980), enfd. in relevant part 651 F.2d 57 (1st Cir. 1981); Walker Die Casting, 255 NLRB 212, 216 (1981), enfd. as modified 682 F.2d 592 (6th Cir. 1982).

The unfair labor practices found above, occurring in connection with Respondent's business, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having concluded that Respondent unlawfully engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action. Specifically, I shall order Respondent to offer Harry Joe Walters full and immediate reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of wages or other rights and benefits he may have suffered as the result of the discrimination against him in accordance with the formula prescribed in F. W. Woolworth, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[10] I shall also order Respondent to remove from its records any reference to Walters' unlawful discharge and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of his unlawful discharge will not be used against him in any way.

Having found that Respondent, from 1 May to 14 July 1984, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by ceasing to make contributions on behalf of its bargaining unit employees to the various funds, I shall order Respondent to make the required contributions to the respective funds and to transmit to the appropriate funds the contributions it has failed to make for the period of its unlawful cessation of payments.[11] In addition, I shall order Re-

[8] Lantz denied knowing about any overtime dispute until after Walters had left. When Lantz was initially asked whether he ever knew that Walters had complained that he was not paid overtime, Lantz answered, "I don't really pay a whole lot of attention to pay."

[9] In light of this finding, it is unnecessary to consider whether Walters' discharge also violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act.

[10] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[11] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of the proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. I leave to the compliance stage the question whether Respondent must pay any additional amounts to the funds in order to satisfy this "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, when there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful withholding action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of fund withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

spondent to make whole the employees in the unit for the loss of wages they suffered due to Respondent's unilateral reduction of their wages, with interest computed as set forth above.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondent, Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc., Grand Rapids, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 410, AFL–CIO by unilaterally reducing the hourly wages of its employees and discontinuing payments to the pension, vacation and savings, national training, education, SMACNA industrial, and life insurance funds, without bargaining with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All employees of Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. engaged in but not limited to the (a) manufacture, fabrication, assembling, handling, erection, installation, dismantling, conditioning, adjustment, alteration, repairing, and servicing of all ferrous or nonferrous metal work and all other materials used in lieu thereof and of all air-veyor systems and air handling systems regardless of material used including the setting of all equipment and all reinforcements in connection therewith; (b) all lagging over insulation and all duct lining; (c) testing and balancing of all air-handling equipment and duct work; (d) the preparation of all shop and field sketches used in fabrication and erection, including those taken from original architectural and engineering drawings or sketches; and (e) all other work included in the jurisdictional claims of Sheet Metal Workers' International Association.

(b) Failing and refusing to make contributions on behalf of its employees in the above-described unit to the pension, vacations and savings, national training, educational, SMACNA industrial, and life insurance funds, as required by its expired agreement with the Union.

(c) Unilaterally reducing the hourly wages of its employees in the above-described unit.

(d) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against its employees because they engage in concerted and protected activities by filing grievances or complaining about their rate of pay.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing any employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request of the Union, bargain collectively with it as the exclusive representative of the employees in the above-described unit with respect to wages and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) On request of the Union, rescind the unilateral reduction of hourly wages and make payments of such amounts to the employees who were not paid, with interest as provided in the remedy section, and make payments to the pension, vacation and savings, national training, educational, SMACNA industrial, and life insurance funds, as required by its expired agreement with the Union, all for the period from 1 May to 14 July 1984.

(c) Offer immediate reinstatement to Harry Joe Walters to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of pay or any other benefits he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in accordance with the provisions set forth above in the remedy section.

(d) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Harry Joe Walters and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of his unlawful discharge will not be used against him in any way.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its Grand Rapids, Michigan facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[13] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 410, AFL–CIO by unilaterally reducing the hourly wages of our employees and discontinuing payments to the pension, vacation and savings, national training, educational, SMACNA industrial, and life insurance funds, without bargaining with the Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All employees of Constructive Sheet Metal, Inc. engaged in but not limited to the (a) manufacture, fabrication, assembling, handling, erection, installation, dismantling, conditioning, adjustment, alteration, repairing, and servicing of all ferrous or nonferrous metal work and all other materials used in lieu thereof and of all air-veyor systems and air handling systems regardless of material used including the setting of all equipment and all reinforcements in connection therewith; (b) all lagging over insulation and all duct lining; (c) testing and balancing of all air-handling equipment and duct work; (d) the preparation of all shop and field sketches used in fabrication and erection, including those taken from original architectural and engineering drawings or sketches; and (e) all other work included in the jurisdictional claims of Sheet Metal Workers' International Association.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to make contributions on behalf of our employees in the above-described unit to the pension, vacations and savings, national training, educational, SMACNA industrial, and life insurance funds, as required by our expired agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally reduce the hourly wage of our employees in the above-described unit.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against our employees because they engage in concerted and protected activities by filing grievances or complaining about their rate of pay.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request of the Union, bargain collectively with it as the exclusive representative of our employees in the above-described unit with respect to wages and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL, on request of the Union, rescind the unilateral reduction of hourly wages and make payments of such amounts to our employees who were not paid, with interest, and make payments to the pension, vacation and savings, national training, educational, SMACNA industrial, and life insurance funds, as required by our expired agreement with the Union, all for the period from 1 May to 14 July 1984.

WE WILL offer immediate reinstatement to Harry Joe Walters to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of pay or any other benefits he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Harry Joe Walters and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of his unlawful discharge will not be used against him in any way.

Lo-Pri Plumbing & Heating, Inc. and Plumbers Local Union No. 5, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the U.S. and Canada, AFL–CIO. Case 5–CA–8242

21 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by the Union, Plumbers Local Union No. 5, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the U.S. and Canada, AFL–CIO, 29 July 1986, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 4 November 1986 against the Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Company was properly served copies of the charge and complaint. The Company then filed an answer, but by letter dated 10 February 1987 withdrew it.

On 24 February 1987 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 4 March 1987 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Company filed no response. The allegations in the motion are therefore undisputed.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 10 days of service, "all the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board."[1]

The Company withdrew its answer to the complaint and notices of hearing. The Company has not filed a request for extension of time to file a new answer.

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, or a request for extension of time, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company is engaged in the business of installing and repairing plumbing and heating systems at its facility in Tuxedo, Maryland, where it purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Maryland. We find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Since at least 1966, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All journeymen plumbers and their apprentices employed by Respondent excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Since at least 1966, the Union and the Company have been parties to successive collective-bargaining agreements, and the Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act. The most recent agreement is effective by its terms for the period 1 September 1985 through 31 August 1987.

Since about 15 February 1986, the Respondent changed the terms and conditions of employment for its employees in the unit by failing to make contributions into the pension fund, medical fund, apprentice fund, industry fund, and vacation fund, doing so without prior notice to the Union and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain with it as the exclusive representative of the unit employees with respect to such changes. In addition, since about 24 June 1986, the Respondent has refused to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement. We find that the Respondent, by such acts and conduct, except for its failure to make contributions into the industry fund,[2] has refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[1] Sec. 102.20 of the Board's Rules was amended 29 September 1986 to provide for 14 days to file an answer. The complaint erroneously stated that the Company had 10 days to file an answer. This error, however, does not affect the results of this decision.

[2] As industry promotion funds are permissive, nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, it is not an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain over them. See Finger Lakes Plumbing Co., 254 NLRB 1399 (1981).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By failing and refusing to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement and by failing to make contributions to the pension fund, medical fund, apprentice fund, and vacation fund, the Company has failed and refused to bargain in good faith with the Union and has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist, to bargain on request with the Union, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to transmit the required contributions to the pension fund, medical fund, apprentice fund, and vacation fund; any interest applicable to such payments should be made in accordance with the criteria set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979). The Respondent shall also be ordered to make whole its unit employees for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from its failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Lo-Pri Plumbing & Heating, Inc., Tuxedo, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement effective 1 September 1985 through 31 August 1987 executed with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following unit:

> All journeymen plumbers and their apprentices employed by the Employer excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Failing and refusing to make contributions into the pension fund, medical fund, apprentice fund, and vacation fund, as required by the collective-bargaining agreement between it and the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Abide by the terms and conditions of the 1 September 1985 through 31 August 1987 collective-bargaining agreement between it and the Union and make whole its unit employees for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from its failure to abide by the agreement in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this Decision and Order.

(b) Remit to the pension fund, medical fund, apprentice fund, and vacation fund past and currently due contributions pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement between it and the Union, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this Decision and Order.

(c) Post at its facility in Tuxedo, Maryland, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.[4]

[3] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[4] The General Counsel in the complaint has requested a visitatorial clause. In the circumstances of this case, such a clause is unwarranted.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement with the Plumbers Local Union No. 5, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the U.S. and Canada, AFL–CIO, the Union, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All journeymen plumbers and their apprentices employed by Respondent excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to make contributions to the pension fund, medical fund, apprentice fund, and vacation fund pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement between ourselves and the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement and make our unit employees whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of our failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement between ourselves and the Union, plus interest.

WE WILL remit to the pension fund, medical fund, apprentice fund, and vacation fund past and currently due contributions pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement between ourselves and the Union.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 10 May 1985 Administrative Law Judge Michael D. Stevenson issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a reply brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The record shows that on 12 March 1984[2] the Respondent purchased the assets of Diamond International Corporation.[3] Diamond's employees were laid off. At that time, the Union had been the representative of Diamond's employees since 1937, and Diamond and the Union were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement due to expire in July 1985. About the time of the sale, the Respondent's plant manager, Peruman, began interviewing candidates for employment, including a number of Diamond's employees. During the course of these interviews, several applicants, who were former Diamond employees, made unsolicited negative comments about unions in general and the Charging Party in particular. As of 16 April the Respondent had hired a complement of 83 unit employees, 78 of whom were former Diamond employees.

By letter dated 17 April, the Union's president Holm informed the Respondent that the Union represented a majority of the Respondent's employees, that this majority consisted of former Diamond employees, and that, as a successor to Diamond, the Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union. The letter also requested that the Respondent contact Holm to arrange a meeting for the purpose of collective bargaining. On 23 April the Respondent's personnel manager agreed to meet with Holm and other union officials to discuss the Union's position, but not to negotiate. This conversation was confirmed by letter from the Respondent to the Union dated 25 April. At a meeting held 27 April, the Respondent expressed doubt regarding the Union's claim that it represented a majority of the Respondent's employees.[4] Holm again asserted the Union's claim as to its majority status and requested bargaining. The Respondent then proposed, inter alia, an expedited election on this matter, but did not accede to the demand for bargaining.

Following the Union's request for bargaining on 17 April, the Respondent continued to receive reports of employee dissatisfaction with the Union, from both employees and supervisors. On 20 July the Respondent held a poll for the purpose of determining employee support for the Union. The results of the poll showed 21 votes for, and 75 votes against, continued union representation.

The judge found that the Respondent's refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union was justified on the basis that the Respondent had relied on evidence sufficient to establish a reasonably based doubt of the Union's majority status as of 17 April 1984. The judge also found the 20 July 1984 poll of employees was not unlawful as it was untainted by unfair labor practices and similarly was based on objective factors which placed the Union's majority status in doubt. We disagree for the reasons below.

We find insufficient support for the Respondent's claim that it had a reasonably based doubt of the Union's majority status on 17 April. In order to find a reasonably based doubt, the Board has long held that the asserted doubt must be based on objective considerations and raised in a context free of unfair labor practices. See, e.g., Golden State Habilitation Convalescent Center, 224 NLRB 1618 (1976); Terrell Machine Co., 173 NLRB 1480 (1969), enfd. 427 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1970).

The record shows that the Respondent based its withdrawal of recognition on 17 April on the fact that approximately 15 former Diamond employees had made unsolicited declarations to the Respondent regarding their dissatisfaction with the Union or union representation.[5] Of these 15 employees, 6

[1] The General Counsel and the Charging Party have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] All dates are 1984 unless noted otherwise.

[3] The judge found that the Respondent is a legal successor to Diamond International and there were no exceptions taken to that finding.

[4] The evidence that formed the basis for the Respondent's claim is discussed below.

[5] The judge indicated that Peruman received such comments from "many" employees. He then specified 12 employees. The judge indicated that Supervisor William Reidenhauer had said he also spoke to "many" stated in employment interviews that they no longer wished to be working in a union shop because unions discriminated against good employees, and 6 stated in employment interviews that they did not wish to be represented by the Union. Additionally, two employees, including Sanders, a former union shop steward, expressed the hope to Supervisor Reidenhauer that the employees would not get the Union back, and one employee, Charles Harker, a former member of the Union's negotiating committee, expressed the view to Reidenhauer that a majority of employees, including himself, did not want the Union.

The record also shows that Robert Thayer, a former union vice president and trustee, testified that sometime after he was hired on 16 April, he spoke to between 30–45 employees who did not want the Union and approximately 15 employees who indicated that the Union might be better than "nothing." Thayer conveyed these sentiments to the Respondent sometime in late April or early May (after 17 April but before the 20 July poll).

The foregoing demonstrates that as of 17 April, the day on which the Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union, the evidence of employee dissaffection with the Union known to the Respondent consisted of the statements of approximately 15 employees.[6] We find these 15 cited instances of employee sentiment, without more, and representing the views of less than 20 percent of the complement of 83 employees, insufficient to support the Respondent's claim of a reasonably based doubt of the Union's majority status.[7] Thus, we find that the Respondent's refusal to bargain with the Union as of the time of the Union's request on 17 April to be unlawful.[8]

The judge also found that the 20 July poll was lawfully predicated upon an objective basis for doubting the Union's majority status. In light of the foregoing, however, we find that the Respondent's unlawful refusal to bargain on 17 April undermined any objective basis that it otherwise might have had to conduct the 20 July poll of its employees. Accordingly, we find that the poll violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[9]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Louisiana Pacific Corporation, Chico, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Millmen's Local No. 1495, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Chico, California facility, excluding clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Polling or otherwise interrogating its employees to ascertain their union views in the absence of employees who made unsolicited comments about their desire not to be represented by the Union. He named 6 employees, 3 of whom were already included in Peruman's total of 12. Thus, a total of 15 different employees were named by the Respondent.

[6] With respect to the statement of employee Harker purporting to represent the views of other employees, we find that little weight can be accorded to such a statement. Otherwise, "a few antiunion employees could provide the basis for a withdrawal of recognition when in fact there is actually an insufficient basis for doubting the Union's continued majority." Golden State Habilitation Convalescent Center, supra at 1619–1620.

The Respondent contends that evidentiary weight should also be given to 27 April reports of a lack of employee support from the Union's president Holm, relying on J & J Drainage Products Co., 269 NLRB 1163 (1984). Holm's statements to management regarding the degree of employee support for the Union were made at a meeting on 27 April, some 10 days after the Respondent refused to recognize the Union. It is well settled that an employer is not entitled to rely on reports of employee disaffection with the union to support a claim of reasonable doubt as to the union's majority after it has withdrawn recognition. See, e.g., First Food Ventures, 229 NLRB 1228, 1230 (1977). Further, to the extent that the Respondent relies on J & J Drainage Products to suggest that the testimony regarding employee disaffection with the Union from former Union Officials Harker and Sanders likewise warrants greater weight, we find no merit to this contention. In J & J Drainage Products, the Board found that statements by a union officer that most of the unit employees did not want the union were entitled to greater weight where the report came from one of two current shop stewards in a relatively small unit of 32 employees. Here, the individuals making the reports were a former negotiating committee member and a former union shop steward whose term expired approximately 3 years before the events in issue. We see no reason to impute special knowledge regarding current employee union sentiment to these two individuals because of their former positions.

[7] See, e.g., Cornell of California, 222 NLRB 303, 306 (1976), enfd. 577 F.2d 513 (9th Cir. 1978).

In reaching a contrary conclusion, the judge relied on Riverside Product Co., 242 NLRB 615 (1979); and U-Save Food Warehouse, 271 NLRB 710 (1984). We find these cases inapposite. In those cases, unlike here, the employer based its claim of a reasonably based doubt of the union's majority status on the views expressed by a clear majority of the employees.

We find that Sofco, 268 NLRB 159 (1983), also relied on by the judge, is inapposite. In Sofco, virtually all the employees told the plant manager that they desired to be rid of the union. Further, as noted in fn. 10 of Sofco, "testimony concerning conversations directly with the employees involved, as here, is much more reliable than testimony concerning merely a few employees ostensibly conveying the sentiments of their fellows. See NLRB v. Middleboro Fire Apparatus, 590 F.2d 4, enfg. 234 NLRB 888 (1978)." In the present case, the Respondent's impressions of employee sentiment, inferred from that of a few employees, does not rebut the presumption of continued majority status.

[8] The judge found that Thayer's testimony set forth above, although not directly related to evidence regarding the lack of union support before 17 April tended to corroborate the testimony of other witnesses who informed the Respondent of antiunion sentiment. Contrary to the judge, we find such evidence irrelevant to a determination of whether the Respondent had objective considerations sufficient to support a reasonably based doubt as to the continued majority status of the Union, where the evidence concerns conversations occurring after the Respondent had unlawfully failed to bargain and where the Respondent's action may have contributed to an erosion of employee support for the Union. See, e.g., Orion Corp., 210 NLRB 633, 634 (1974), enfd. 515 F.2d 81 (7th Cir. 1975).

[9] We need not pass on the General Counsel's contention that the manner in which the poll was taken was unlawful.

objective considerations warranting a reasonable doubt of the Union's continuing status as the collective-bargaining representative of the majority of its employees.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Chico, California facility, excluding clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Post at its Chico, California facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

I agree with the judge that even assuming it was a successor employer the Respondent had on 17 April 1984 a sufficient objective basis for doubting the Union's majority status. Therefore, the Respondent did not act unlawfully when it refused to bargain with the Union. Accordingly, I would adopt the judge's recommendation that the complaint be dismissed.

[10] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
>
> To form, join, or assist any union
>
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Millmen's Local No. 1495, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, as the exclusive representative of our employees in the bargaining unit found below.

WE WILL NOT poll our employees or otherwise ask them about their union views, in the absence of objective considerations warranting a reasonable doubt of the Union's continuing status as the collective-bargaining representative of the majority of our employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the bargaining unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by us at our Chico, California facility, excluding clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

LOUISIANA-PACIFIC CORPORATION

Sally Spencer, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Charles S. Loughran, Esq., of Walnut Creek, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL D. STEVENSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me at Chico, California, on 10

January 1985,[1] pursuant to a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 20 on 30 August 1984, and is based on a charge filed by Millmen's Local No. 1495, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (the Union) on 20 June. The complaint alleges that Louisiana Pacific Corporation (Respondent) has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Issues

(1) Whether Respondent is a successor to Diamond International Corporation and is therefore legally required under the Act to recognize and bargain with the Union, the designated exclusive bargaining representative of a production and maintenance unit at Diamond.

(2) Whether, at all times relevant, Respondent possessed a good-faith doubt that the Union represents a majority of unit employees.

(3) Whether Respondent violated the Act by taking a poll of unit employees about 20 July.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record of the case, and from my observeration of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. Respondent's Business

Respondent admits that it is a Delaware corporation engaged in the processing and wholesale distributing of lumber and related products and having a plant located in Chico, California. It further admits that during the past year, in the course and conduct of its business it has purchased and received products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers outside the State of California. Accordingly, it admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. The Labor Organization Involved

Millmen's Local No. 1495, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[2]

III. The Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

A. The Facts

About 12 March, Respondent purchased the assets of Diamond International Corporation (Diamond) wood remanufacturing plant located at Chico. Prior to the sale, Diamond had a collective-bargaining relationship with the Union for a production and maintenance unit extending back several decades. The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of Diamond employees in 1937. The last collective-bargaining agreement executed on 12 July 1983, ran from 1983 to 1985 (G.C. Exh. 2).

The first and only witness for the General Counsel was Karl Holm, president and business representative for the Union for the past 5-1/2 years. Before his present position and that of union organizer for 6 months, Holm worked for Diamond in its Chico plant for 10 years. Holm held various jobs in the plant including setup man, millworker, and box factory employee. Between his jobs with the Union and for Diamond in the plant, Holm was familar with the various employee classifications in the plant.

Regarding the plant itself, the parties stipulated to the operations contained therein under Diamond and the number of employees employed in each:

(1) National wholesale sales—three hourly employees represented by the Union under a separate contract covering that operation.

(2) Apiary supply (provided beekeeping supplies)—three hourly employees represented by the Union under a separate contract covering the operation.

(3) Trucking operation—13 employees under a separate collective-bargaining agreement with the Teamsters Union.

(4) Prefinished plant facility—18 employees under a separate collective-bargaining agreement with the Teamsters Union.

(5) Remanufacturing plant (the process of reprocessing finished lumber into higher valued products such as window frames, door jambs, etc.)—approximately 150-160 employees represented by the Union pursuant to General Counsel's Exhibit 2.

It is further stipulated that Respondent did not carry on the operations described in paragraphs 1–4 above, and therefore it did not hire any employees in those categories (R. Br. 134–135).

About 1 month before the sale, Holm began to hear rumors about it. The first hard news did not reach Holm until Saturday, 10 March, when Holm met with a company official named Cummings, who was vice president of industrial relations for Diamond. The latter informed Holm that the 130–150 unit employees then working in the plant could complete their shift for the day and work normal shift the following day. On Monday, 12 March, Cummings said the men would report as usual, be paid for 2 hours showup time, and then be laid off by Diamond. This is exactly what happened.

Almost immediately after the sale of assets, and possibly even before, Respondent began its hiring process of new employees. The selection of new employees was done by Nathan Peruman, who was as of 12 March Respondent's plant manager and a witness at hearing. Before assuming his present job, Peruman was production sales coordinator at Respondent's Red Bluff plant, located about 40 miles from Chico. Peruman also previously worked for Diamond in the Chico plant for a period of 5 years until November 1978, when he left to work for Respondent.

[1] All dates refer to 1984 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] See Diamond International Corp., 271 NLRB 1051 (1984).

During the first 3 weeks after Respondent purchased the assets of Diamond, Peruman personally interviewed every applicant for employment spending about 15 minutes with each applicant. Advertisements for openings had been placed in local radio and newspapers. Because Respondent desired to hire experienced employees, most persons hired were former Diamond employees. Peruman made a point of speaking to former Diamond supervisors to inquire about the job applicants who had worked at Diamond and ascertain who was the most competent. During the interviews, Peruman explained the differences between the new operation and the old and asked each applicant about his prior background and experience. Although Peruman never mentioned the subject of unions, several applicants made negative comments about unions in general or Charging Party in particular. More about the conversations during the job interviews will be provided below.

The parties agreed that as of 16 April, out of 83 unit employees, 78 were former Diamond employees and members of the bargaining unit represented by the Union and were members of the Union (R. Br. 8–9). By 17 April Peruman had interviewed about 110 applicants. It was also agreed that as of 20 July, out of 97 employees, 83 were former bargaining unit employees.[3]

Concerning supervisors, the parties agreed that the plant manager under Diamond was changed. However, four out of five supervisors of production and maintenance under Diamond were hired by Respondent (R. Br. 10–11). The four were Ron Bolton, Gerald Sharp, Virgil Schlect, and Bill Reidenhauer.

Regarding the plant operation, the location stayed the same under both Diamond and Respondent. Certain changes were made by Respondent, however, in the product mix and in the customers serviced. These changes will be discussed in detail below.

After the changeover began, Holm and other union officials contacted the membership by telephone, to ensure that they submitted applications for new employment. According to Holm, he attended to other details as well, such as on 16 April, engaging in a telephone call with Don Gritz, Respondent's personnel manager at the Red Bluff plant. Allegedly, Holm followed the prior instructions of union attorneys and told Gritz that because Respondent was a successorship, the Union was demanding bargaining as it represented a majority of Respondent's unit employees at Chico. Holm testified that Gritz responded by agreeing with him, saying that by law, Respondent did have a duty to bargain with the Union. Gritz promised to consult with Peruman to arrange a meeting and get back to Holm.

On 17 April, Holm wrote a letter to Peruman that read as follows:

> Louisiana-Pacific Corporation
> Sierra Division - Chico Operations
> West 16th Street
> Chico, CA 95926
> ATTN: Nathan Peruman, Plant Manager
> Dear Mr. Peruman:
> Millmen's Union Local 1495, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, represents a majority of the employees who have been hired at the Chico facility. This majority is composed of former employees of Diamond International Corporation which sold the facility to your Company. As a successor employer you are obligated to recognize and bargain with Local No. 1495 over the terms and conditions of employment of these employees
> Please contact the undersigned at once in order to arrange a meeting for the purpose of Collective Bargaining.
> Very truly yours,
> /s/ Karl L. Holm

I note that this letter makes no reference to the alleged conversation with Gritz 1 day earlier. Nor is it clear why Holm wrote the letter because he supposedly had agreement from Gritz that the Union's position was valid. Holm testified on cross-examination that he never mentioned to Gritz later, nor to anyone else from Respondent, the alleged concession from Gritz on 16 April. Holm volunteered on cross that a union business agent assigned to Respondent's Red Bluff plant. John Smith, had told Holm that Gritz had made the same statement to Smith. Smith was never called as a witness.

Respondent, however, called Gritz as a witness. He denied making the statements attributed to Holm and even denied talking to Holm on 16 April,[4] Gritz did admit that he spoke to Holm on or about 23 April and agreed to meet with Holm and other union officials in order to discuss the union position, but not to negotiate. On 25 April, Gritz wrote a letter to Holm confirming their conversation 2 days before. The letter reads as follows:

> Mr. Karl L. Holm
> Business Representative
> Millmen's Local Union No. 1495, A.F.of L.
> P.O. Box 3069
> Chico, CA 95927
> Dear Mr. Holm:
>
> This will confirm my telephone discussion with you on Monday, April 23, 1984 and Mr. Peruman's later telephone call to you, agreeing to a general discussion meeting to be held in the conference room of Louisiana-Pacific's Remanufacturing Plant, Chico, California on Friday, April 27, 1984 at 9:00 A.M.
>
> In the event any of the above does not correctly reflect your understanding please contact me at once.
> Very truly yours,
> /s/ Donald L. Gritz

[3] These figures compare to 115 production and maintenance unit employees that had been employed by Diamond.

[4] Gritz also denied the alleged similar conversation with Smith.

I credit Gritz here and find that on this major point and one other to be discussed immediately below, Holm was not truthful. Essentially Holm's testimony was not only uncorroborated, but significantly impeached by his own conduct and the testimony of Respondent's witnesses. I find that the Union's first demand for bargaining was contained in Holm's 17 April letter above.

If Holm was merely incredible above, his other testimony, to which I now turn, was totally preposterous. On 27 April a meeting was held in Respondent's conference room in Chico. For the Union, there was Holm and a man named Haskell, who never testified because he was allegedly in the hospital.[5] For Respondent, there was Gritz, a company official named Merlow, who did not testify, Peruman, and Respondent's counsel at hearing, Charles S. Loughran. According to Holm, Peruman began by expressing serious doubts whether the Union represented a majority of Respondent's unit employees at Chico. Peruman explained that in the course of interviewing applicants for employment and while in the plant, several employees had expressed unsolicited negative comments regarding the Union. Holm stated he was not surprised at this because he had told several persons who were applying for jobs with Respondent, to say anything during the interview that might help get the job, including that the person did not like the Union. At this meeting, Holm again claimed to represent a majority of Respondent's Chico employees and demanded to bargain with Respondent over a new contract. According to Holm, Attorney Loughran in the presence of three company officials, then told Holm that he had a choice: First, the Union could agree to an expedited NLRB election by stipulation without having to solicit authorization cards; or, the Union could file charges with the NLRB claiming Respondent was a successorship. Loughran allegedly added that while the Union would probably win under option two, it would take 6 months down the road.

Loughran denied the latter part of Holm's testimony, testifying that he never suggested that the Union had a good case or that it would win before the Board. Loughran did agree that he discussed an expedited Board election. To this proposal, Holm replied that he would have to discuss it with union attorney, Mike Roger. Roger was not present at hearing and was never called to testify. Loughran testified further that about 18 May, Roger called him at which time the election proposal was again discussed. Roger was noncommital.

Loughran concluded his testimony by describing his association with Respondent. He provides industrial relations and labor law advice to Respondent that has 40–50 operations located on the West Coast. About 25 of these facilities have contracts with various unions. However, six plants are currently experiencing strikes. Both Gritz and Peruman also denied in their testimony that Loughran stated the Union would probably win an unfair labor practice case before the Board.

[5] No one ever requested a continuance of the case due to the unavailability of Haskell, Smith, or anyone else. Nor was the affidavit of any witness ever offered.

As indicated above, I credit Loughran on this point. Not only was he corroborated while Holm was not, but also it is beyond common sense that a company attorney would purport to give legal advise to a union, contrary to the best interests of the Company—while company officials were present.

I turn now to decide the various issues in the case.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Was Respondent a successor to Diamond International and, if so, what duty did Respondent owe to the Union?

In Contee Sand & Gravel Co., 274 NLRB 574, 584–585 (1985), the Board approved a statement of the administrative law judge about the legal test for a successorship:[6]

> In determining whether an employer is a successor of another employer, the Board has used the following criteria: (1) whether there has been a substantial continuity of the same busines operations; (2) whether the new employer uses the same facilities; (3) whether the new employer has the same or substantially the same work force; (4) whether the same jobs exist under the same working conditions; (5) whether the alleged successor employs the same supervisors; (6) whether the same machinery, equipment, and processes are used; and (7) whether the same product or services are offered. J-P Mfg., 194 NLRB 965, 968 (1972); Miami Industrial Trucks, 221 NLRB 1223, 1224 (1975). The Board does not require that all of these factors be present to find successorship, but only enough to warrant a finding that no basic change has occurred in the employing industry. Lincoln Private Police, 189 NLRB 717, 720 (1971). Nor does the Board require that the entire business of the predecessor be taken over by the successor, it being sufficient if a part of the old operation survives in the successor. Miami Industrial Trucks, supra; Avenue Meat Center, 184 NLRB 826 (1970).

In evaluating the above-listed factors to determine whether a successorship has occurred, the Board does not accord these factors equal weight. In Airport Bus Service, 273 NLRB 561, 562 (1984), the Board stated:

> Although all the circumstances are considered, the key factor in making a successorship determination is whether a majority of the new employer's bargaining unit employees were members of the predecessor's unit work force at or near the time it ceased operations.

At page 12 of its brief, Respondent appears to concede this central point.[7] Professor Gorman opines that it is possible to read the case of NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S 272 (1972), to hold that such a "successor majority" (regardless of work similarity) is sufficient in itself to find a duty to bargain.[8] In this case it is unnecessary to consider whether this interpretation of Burns is correct because a host of other factors supports a finding of sucessorship.[9] I turn to consider these, beginning with a second concession from Respondent.

In its brief (Br. 12), Respondent admits that the business location remained the same. To these two concessions, I add findings of my own. First, Respondent has substantially the same supervisory staff—four out of five line supervisors. Next, Respondent uses essentially the same machinery, equipment, and processes. I also find that there has been a substantial continuity of business operations.[10] Before turning to still other factors that on balance also support successorship, but are more difficult to ascertain on this record, I merely note that a compelling case for sucessorship has been established up to this point.[11]

In reviewing the record, I note that no representative of Diamond testified. Although Peruman formerly worked for Diamond and made periodic visits to the Diamond plant at Chico while he worked for Respondent at Red Bluff, his knowledge of the Diamond operation was to a degree limited. On the other hand, while Holm may have had greater contact with Diamond in his role as a union leader, I nevertheless find his credibility to be generally suspect.

As noted in section III,A, above, Respondent continued only one out of five of the Diamond operations in Chico. These discontinued operations accounted for approximately 37 employees compared to the 150–160 employees for the remanufacturing plant that was continued. It is doubtful whether these facts are even relevant to the question of successorship because the four discontinued operations had employees represented under separate contracts and in two cases with an entirely different union. Accordingly, they are entitled to little or no weight in deciding successorship. Furthermore, as noted above, it is sufficient if a part of the old operation survives in the successor.

Prior to Diamond's sale of assets to Respondent, it had experienced poor financial conditions. In fact, it had closed or substantially reduced operations for up to a year in the early 1980s. During this time many unit employees were laid off. Accordingly, when Respondent took over, it was aware that certain changes were necessary to increase the chances of success. One of these changes was to change the product mix. Although the raw material, lumber, remained essentially the same and most of the machines and the skills required to operate them remained the same, the final product varied. Thus, Diamond manufactured window frame parts, molding and millwork, and solid lineal moldings. Diamond sold many products to a few customers.

By contrast, Respondent is now manufacturing industrial cut stock that involves taking the lumber (a different type of lumber than usually used by Diamond) and cutting the lumber up into different widths and lengths to specified orders. In addition, Respondent uses wood planks that are fabricated for other manufactures. Finally Respondent manufactures carpenters moldings and millwork. Respondent also discontinued the operation of a box factory that was staffed by a few unit employees under Diamond.

With the change in product mix, Respondent's marketing of necessity changed. It did not purchase a customer list from Diamond and currently sells a few items to many customers. Out of 1900 customers listed on a 1980 Respondent customer list only about 10–15 were customers of Diamond prior to the sale.

Respondent's evidence also showed some minor differences in work schedules.

Holm described certain machines used by Diamond employees, and Peruman admitted their use by Respondent employees in the same premises: finger joint machine, resaw, molder, cutoff saw, multirip saw, forklift. Other machines used by Diamond were not used by Respondent: the band-rip machine, back corner machine, boring machine, the dry kiln, the diptank, and belt and tieup machines.[12] The employees who worked on these latter machines under Diamond were apparently assigned to other machines under Respondent that were used in the processing of the final products.

After considering the totality of the evidence, I must conclude that the General Counsel has established a successorship under the Burns case by a preponderance of the evidence.[13] ployees was employed when the union demanded bargaining. Respondent does not elaborate nor indicate what result would follow from his assertion, if true. Contrary to Respondent, I find that as of 17 April, a representative complement was employed by Respondent. That is, 78 out of 83 unit employees working for Respondent at Chico had been employed by Diamond. By 20 July Respondent had hired 97 employees, of whom 83 were former Diamond unit employees. See Pre-Engineered Building Products, 228 NLRB 841 fn. 1 (1977), enf. denied 603 F.2d 134 (10th Cir. 1979). NLRB v. Jeffries Lithograph Co., 752 F.2d 459, 467 (9th Cir. 1985).

[8] R. Gorman, Labor Law, p. 121 (1977).

[9] Of course, an employer has no general obligation to hire its predecessor's employees. Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, 417 U.S. 249, 262 (1974). It did so in this case because it required the skills possessed by the former Diamond unit employees. Of those few not rehired, there is no claim by the General Counsel of any discriminatory motivation.

[10] Thus a hiatus between the operations of the former employer and the purchaser is a significant factor because, as it lengthens, employees expectations of hire by the purchaser diminish. Mondovi Food Corp., 235 NLRB 1080, 1082 (1978). The record is not clear exactly when production under Respondent began. However, if there was a break it was not more than 1–2 weeks. When the Diamond employees were laid off, they had every expectation of employment with Respondent because they were "experienced." Cf., Radiant Fashions, 202 NLRB 938 (1973); Norton Precision, 199 NLRB 1003 (1972).

[11] See New London Convalescent Home, 274 NLRB 1442 (1985); NLRB v. Jeffries Lithograph Co., supra, 752 F.2d 459.

[12] In those few instances in which the record contains a description of the function of these various machines, I omit it here on the grounds that such description does not really contribute to an understanding of the legal issues presented in the case.

[13] I find that the changes in the employing industry during the transfer from Diamond to Respondent have not been substantial and material. See Mondovi Foods Corp., supra, 235 NLRB at 1082; see also NLRB v. Jeffries Lithograph Co., supra, 752 F.2d 459.

2. Did Respondent have a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status based on objective considerations and, if so, when?[14]

Although it is clear to me that based on established law of the Board and courts Respondent is a successor, there is still an additional issue presented by the case concerning the union's majority support and Respondent's view of it.[15]

To begin, I accept the General Counsel's statement of the law that, having established a successor, the General Counsel is entitled to rely on a rebuttable presumption that the Union enjoys continued majority support.[16] I also agree with the General Counsel that Respondent must show a good-faith doubt by clear and convincing proof.[17] Not only must Respondent show sufficient credible evidence to establish a doubt of the Union's majority status, but such evidence must exist in a context free of unfair labor practices.[18]

I find here that Respondent's evidence was acquired under circumstances free of unfair labor practices. To put this in another way, I find that at all times relevant on or before 17 April, Respondent acted in good faith. Although the General Counsel alleged that the taking of a poll about 20 July violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, this can be considered only after the threshhold question of what Respondent knew on or before 17 April.[19] By that time Peruman had interviewed approximately 12 employees.

Peruman testified that during his interviews of prior Diamond employees applying for jobs at Respondent, many made unsolicited negative comments regarding the Union. Their remarks appear to fall into two categories:

(1) Employees who told Peruman that they did not care to work in a union shop because unions discriminated against good employees; Buzz Madden, Bob Heidinger, Donna McVey, Rodney Sharp, Dan Duggins, and Ron Coleman.

(2) Employees who told Peruman that they did not care to be represented by Local 1495; Larry Schlecht, Larry Wellert, Lee German, Rocky Comfort, Richard Estrada, and Jerry Sanders.

I find that the conversations referred to above by Plant Manager Peruman are "objective identifiable acts on which the Respondent was entitled to rely and they can form the basis for employer's doubts."[20] These statements are especially reliable here when considered in light of other evidence tending to corroborate the employees' apparent disaffection with the Union.

a. Respondent's employee witnesses

In Sofco, Inc., fn. 9 above, the Board made clear that the respondent there as here was not required to elicit, directly from employees, the comments about the union made to the plant manager.[21] Nevertheless, Respondent called several employee witnesses to corroborate the testimony of Peruman. From group 1, Respondent called Madden, McVey, and Heidinger; all three fully corroborate Peruman's testimony regarding the antiunion sentiments expressed to him during the interview process.

From group 2, Respondent called Wellert and Sanders as witnesses. They also corroborated Peruman's testimony.[22] I credit all of Respondent's witnesses referred to above.

b. Supervisory testimony regarding employee union sentiment

Respondent called Supervisor William Reidenhauer, who was hired by Peruman on 12 March. He testified that after the sale, many employees made unsolicited comments to him regarding their desire not to have the Union represent them. He named Heidinger, Harker, Thompson, Comfort, German, and Thayer. Prior to 17 April, the witness reported these negative comments to Peruman on about six occasions and Peruman relied on these reports as part of the basis for an objective doubt of the Union's majority status.

As a general rule, supervisory impressions of employee sentiment are not viewed with favor by the Board and courts.[23] In this case, however, Respondent also called some additional employee witnesses who had talked to Reidenbauer. For example, Charles Harker, a former member of the union negotiating committee, expressed the view that a majority of employees including himself did not want the Union. Donald Thompson, Reidenhauer's brother-in-law for 18 years, also told him that he hoped the employees would not get the Union back. Third, Jerry Sanders, a shop steward between 1975 through 1981, testified that within a week after he was hired by Peruman on 2 April, he asked his supervisor Reidenhauer if the Union was going to come back in. When Reidenhauer replied that he did not know, Sanders stated that he hoped it did not come back because the Union did not treat people fairly and did not back him up over grievances.

[14] Respondent does not purport to show loss in fact of union majority status, but only its good-faith doubt.

[15] In Harley-Davidson Co., 273 NLRB 1531 (1985), the Board recently held that even if the successor recognizes a union certified for a year or more, the union enjoys a rebuttal presumption of majority status only. In making its ruling, the Board overruled prior authority to equate the rights of successors who never recognized the union as in the instant case, with the rights of successors who did recognize the union. Both may withdraw recognition if the successor can show union loss of majority status in fact, or merely a good-faith doubt of union majority status.

[19] It is not sufficient if the Respondent learned of the evidence regarding the Union's majority status after it refused to recognize and bargain with the Union. To be effective, the evidence must be known at the time of the refusal. See Orion Corp. v. NLRB, 515 F.2d 81 (7th Cir. 1975).

[21] See Naylor, Type & Mats, 233 NLRB 105, 107–108 (1977).

[22] Peruman did not specifically mention Sander's name as someone who talked to him. However, he said there were some employees who talked against the Union whose names he could not recall. I credit Sander's testimony that he spoke to Peruman on 2 April, when he was hired regarding his thoughts on the Union.

[23] See Valley Nitrogen Producers, 207 NLRB 208, 214 (1973); NLRB v. Cornell of California, 577 F.2d 513, 516 (9th Cir. 1978).

The final witness who testified in the case was Robert Thayer, a former vice president of the Union for 3 years and former union trustee for 6 years. He testified that he was hired on 16 April. Sometime after that, he testified that he spoke to between 30–45 employees and they did not want the Union. Approximately 15 employees said the Union might be better than nothing. Thayer conveyed these sentiments to Peruman and Reidenhauer sometime in late April or May, before the poll was taken.[24]

c. Lack of credibility of the General Counsel's single witness

I have detailed in section III,A two instances when Holm was not truthful in his testimony. I now turn to two other instances. According to Holm, the negative comments about the Union by union members during job interviews were part of a ploy suggested by Holm to enhance the applicant's chances of getting hired. Not a single person was called by the General Counsel to corroborate this testimony. Respondent's witnesses consisting of several union members and former union officials, who were hired by Respondent, all denied that Holm had made such a statement to them. I further discredit this testimony because there is no bargaining history or other evidence to explain why Holm believed that making negative comments about the Union at Respondent's job interviews would enhance the chances of a union member being hired.

By contrast, the record does show why the employees no longer desired to be represented by the Union. During 1982–1983, Diamond was experiencing economic problems and all or most union employees were laid off, some up to a year. When recalled, many of the employees lost their seniority, and there was a pervasive feeling that the Union was responsible.

Another instance of Holm's lack of credibility concerns a second representation he made at the 27 April meeting attended by Peruman, Loughran, and Gritz and further described above. In his testimony at hearing, after referring to Loughran's offer to participate in an expediated Board election, Holm said:

> I said that I had already started signing cards. I believe I said I had about 30. I didn't quite have that many. It was quite a bit less than that, in fact, about 19 [R. Br. 34].

Later Holm attributed this misrepresentation to a simple mistake. In his testimony, Peruman recalled that Holm stated at the meeting that he had cards signed by 40 percent of the membership. In either version of Holm's representation, Holm was not credible and all of his testimony should be carefully scrutinized as I have done.

d. Failure of the General Counsel to call any rebuttal witnesses[25]

All of these circumstances tend to make Respondent's witnesses very credible.

In conclusion, as the Board stated in Safco, Inc., supra, 268 NLRB at 159–160:

> even when a particular factor considered alone would be insufficient to support a good-faith doubt of a union's majority status, the "cumulative force of the combination of factors" may be adequate to support such a doubt. In this regard, we note that a respondent does not bear the burden of proving that an actual numerical majority opposes the union. However, it must demonstrate that it had objective reasons for doubting the union's majority status. [Emphasis added.]

Based on the totality of the evidence as reflected in the above discussion, I find that as of 17 April, Respondent did have good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status based on objective factors.[26]

3. Did Respondent's poll of unit employees about 20 July violate Section 8(a)(1)?

On 20 July a poll of Respondent's unit employees at Chico was conducted by Arthur Anderson & Co. Employees were asked, "Do you wish to be represented by Millmen's Local Union No. 1495 for purposes of collective bargaining." The results of the poll indicated 21 votes in support of the Union and 75 votes opposed to the Union (R. Exh. 4). In this case, the General Counsel alleges that the taking of the poll per se violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

To decide this question, I must consider some additional brief background. Between 17 April, the date of the Union's demand for bargaining, and the date of the poll, Peruman continued to receive antiunion reports from employees directly, and indirectly through supervisors, who were contacted by employees and told that substantial numbers of employees did not wish to be represented by the Union. For example, Peruman talked to Supervisors Ron Bolton, Virgil Schlecht, Bill Ridenhauer, and Gerald Shire. Talking to Ridenhauer was Thayer as reported above, Harker, Sanders, Thompson, Heidinger, and McVey. Harker also talked to Bolton, who did not testify. Peruman was contacted three different times in May by a leadman in shipping named Scott Elliott, who reported that he and people he talked to had no interest in the Union. Elliott did not testify, but Peruman testified that the name of Sanders was mentioned by Elliott as someone who did not want the Union. Peruman also spoke directly to Willert regarding the latter's lack of interest in the Union.

[24] Technically Thayer's testimony does not directly relate to the lack of union support on or before 17 April, because he was not hired until 16 April. However, I include it here because it tends to corroborate the testimony of other witnesses who informed Peruman and Reidenhauer of antiunion sentiment and on which Respondent bases its good-faith doubt.

[25] Orion Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 515 F.2d at 84–85.

[26] See Riverside Produce Co., 242 NLRB 615 (1979); Glosser Bros., 271 NLRB 710 (1984). Compare First Food Ventures, 229 NLRB 1228, 1230 (1977), in which sum total of evidence of employee disaffection available to Respondent was discovered after Respondent's initial refusal to bargain.

About 29 June, Peruman held a group employee meeting for the purpose of planning a Fourth of July celebration. After the meeting, Thayer and two nontestifying employees named Glenda Burks and Gary Scott made antiunion comments to Peruman. Thayer told Peruman at this time that he had taken a personal poll of employees and found very little support for the Union.

Based on the several employee and supervisory reports received, and based on the Union's refusal to agree to a Board-conducted election, Respondent decided to arrange for a poll to be taken.

Before a poll like that in issue in this case can be lawful, an employer must have an objective basis for doubting the union's majority status.[27] This is the same test used for determining the lawfulness of an employer's withdrawal of recognition from an incumbent union after the expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement.[28] I assume without finding that it is also the same test used to determine the lawfulness of a successor employer's refusal to recognize and bargain with a union that was never certified to represent unit employees in the successor's employ. At Diamond the last certification occurred in 1937.

I find based on the evidence in this case that Respondent did have an objective basis for doubting the Union's majority status sufficient to justify the taking of the poll. The evidence regarding union majority status that existed on or before 17 April and summarized in the preceding section increased between 17 April and 20 July. When the employer causes a lawful poll of employees to be taken and the union does not win a majority, the result may, in an appropriate context, serve as support for an employer's refusal to recognize and to bargain.[29]

In this case, I have found above that Respondent also had a reasonable basis as of 17 April to doubt the Union's majority status. Because there is no evidence that Respondent committed any unfair labor practices prior to 20 July, the date of the poll, the results of the poll serve two purposes:

(1) They relate back to 17 April to corroborate with even additional evidence my finding regarding the Respondent's reasonable basis to doubt the union's majority status.[30]

(2) If it is found on review that Respondent did not have a reasonable basis to doubt the Union's majority status as of 17 April, then clearly by 20 June Respondent did have a reasonable basis. Although an unfair labor practice would have been committed, Respondent would nevertheless be free to withdraw recognition and refuse to bargain from 20 June forward.

In conclusion I turn to the case of Struksnes Construction Co., 165 NLRB 1062 (1967). The General Counsel contends that for an employer-conducted poll to be lawful, it must meet certain procedural safeguards contained in that case (G.C. Br. 28). The General Counsel further argues that Respondent did not meet these standards.

The Board, however, has not expressly extended its precertification poll standards enumerated in Struksnes to polls taken in refusal to recognize situations. Nor can I find, contrary to the General Counsel's claim, Board authority requiring an employer to give the union advance notice of the time and place of the poll. Accordingly, it is unnecessary to decide whether Respondent met the standards of Struksnes when it was not required to do so.

For all the reasons stated above, I will recommend to the Board that this case be dismissed.[31]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Louisiana-Pacific Corporation, is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaging in commerce and in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[28] Id. at fn. 9. It should be noted, however, that three circuit courts of appeals have disagreed with the Board and have held that the objective evidence, while it must be substantial, need not meet the high standard necessary to justify a withdrawal of recognition. Forbidden City Restaurant v. NLRB, 736 F.2d 1295 (9th Cir. 1984); NLRB v. A. W. Thompson, Inc., 651 F.2d 1141 (5th Cir. 1981); Thomas Industries v. NLRB, 687 F.2d 863 (6th Cir. 1982).

[29] See Tafi Broadcasting, 201 NLRB 801 (1973).

[30] In refusing to enforce the Board's decision in Forbidden City Restaurant, supra at 1297, the court stated the following:

> The Board relied on Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc., 210 N.L.R.B. 717, (1974), in which an employer was found to have violated the Act by conducting a poll without sufficient objective considerations to warrant a reasonable doubt of the union's majority status. Sufficient objective considerations for a private poll, concluded the Board, must be such as would occasion the grant of an employer's petition for a Board election. Montgomery Ward, 210 N.L.R.B. at 724. The criteria for a Board election are the same as those that determine whether the employer may withhold recognition from an incumbent union. Id. Thus, under the Montgomery Ward rule, the same evidentiary standard applies to an employer's conducting its own poll, successfully petitioning the Board for an election, or withdrawing recognition from the union. By the Board's reasoning, an employer in doubt of the union's majority status would be allowed to take a poll only when it had no actual need to do so, that is, when it already has sufficient objective evidence to justify withdrawal of recognition.

The unusual situation described by the court in its final sentence quoted above is exactly what happened here. Respondent took a poll on 20 June, when it already had, as of 17 April, sufficient objective evidence to justify refusal to recognize the Union. Thus under either the Board decision or the court's, Respondent must be held not to have violated the Act by taking the poll.

[31] In light of this decision, it is unnecessary to consider Respondent's argument (R. Br. 27–28) that assuming Respondent's bargaining obligation, the Union may have waived or forestalled its bargaining demand by considering Respondent's proposal to stipulate to a Board-conducted election.

Electronic and Space Technicians Local 1553 and Hughes Aircraft Company and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 2295, AFL–CIO, CLC. Case 31–CD–295

26 May 1987

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY MEMBERS BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 11 February 1987[1] by the Employer, alleging that Electronic and Space Technicians Local 1553 (EAST) violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 2295, AFL–CIO, CLC (IBEW). The hearing was held 16 March 1987 before Hearing Officer Helen M. Spence.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

Hughes Aircraft Company, a Delaware corporation, manufactures aerospace and related equipment at its Hawthorne, California facility, where it sells and ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that EAST and the IBEW are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

Since 1977 the Employer's Radar Systems Group advanced manufacturing technology section has used two types of mechanized assembly equipment to make electronic modules for radar sets: the HPS 300 and the ALCAS. Employees represented by EAST and the IBEW perform maintenance work on both machines.[2]

In 1985 the Employer began designing the MCAS, another mechanized assembly machine. Unlike HPS 300 and ALCAS, the MCAS has a series of computers, has better optical capability, uses a programmable robotic arm rather than fixed automation, and "has a few other devices . . . such as [an] automatic fluxing system, and it also has a much more sophisticated component verification system."

The Employer's engineers maintained the MCAS equipment from 1985 to February 1987.[3] In 1987 the Employer's engineers trained an unrepresented employee "hired from the outside" to maintain the MCAS.

During negotiations between the Employer and IBEW for a successor to their collective-bargaining agreement, which expired 17 January, the IBEW requested that the contract's "certification be expanded" to include employees working on all "automated equipment including robotics equipment," which covered the MCAS machine.

On 30 January EAST wrote the Employer that it had learned the IBEW had filed two grievances claiming the MCAS work and demanded the work in its current negotiations. EAST stated the assignment of such work to IBEW-represented employees would be inappropriate because the work was already covered in various EAST classifications. It further told the Employer it would establish picket lines if the work was assigned to the IBEW-represented employees. The Employer then filed the 8(b)(4)(D) charge which gave rise to the instant proceeding.

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves the maintenance of the MCAS at the Employer's Radar Systems Group, El Segundo, California facility.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer[4] contends that reasonable cause exists to believe that EAST violated Section 8(b)(4)(D). It contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to the unrepresented employee currently performing the work. In the event the work in dispute is awarded to bargaining unit employees, however, the Employer prefers that it be awarded to employees represented by EAST based

[1] All dates are in 1987 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Manager Mark Weber testified that each machine has "3 functions that are performed by EAST [mechanics, plumbers, and computer maintenance] and 1 by IBEW [electricians]."

[3] The engineers were not represented by EAST, IBEW, or any other union.

[4] The Employer and the IBEW did not file briefs in this proceeding.

on its collective-bargaining agreement, employer preference, relative skills, and Board certification. The Employer further requests that any award of the disputed work by the Board should be extended to cover "equipment that is similar to MCAS or incorporates the technology used in the MCAS machine . . . ."[5]

The IBEW and EAST argue that employees they represent should be awarded the disputed work.[6]

D. Applicability of the Statute

It is undisputed that EAST's representative Robert Davis in a letter dated 30 January threatened to establish picket lines if the Employer assigned the disputed work to employees represented by the IBEW.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred. No party contends that there is an agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certifications

The employee currently performing the disputed work is not a member of any bargaining unit certified by the Board. On 31 March 1949 the Board certified the IBEW to represent all "maintenance and construction electricians, including helpers, designated as Electricians 'A,' 'B,' and 'C,'" and also certified Local 1553, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL, now EAST, to represent all remaining production and maintenance employees. Certification is not a helpful factor in determining this dispute.

2. Collective-bargaining agreements

EAST and the IBEW have long-established collective-bargaining relationships with the Employer. The collective-bargaining agreement that expired 17 January between the IBEW and the Employer states that the IBEW is the sole and exclusive bargaining agent for the following classifications: industrial electronics electrician journeyman; electrician maintenance journeyman; electronic maintenance journeyman; electrician maintenance man; electrician; maintenance working leader and fixture cleaner.[7] As noted, the IBEW withdrew from the hearing and presented no evidence in support of its claim for the disputed work.

The Employer's collective-bargaining agreement with EAST expiring 5 November 1988 sets forth EAST's jurisdiction as "all production [and] maintenance" employees, including, among other classifications, maintenance mechanic A, plumber maintenance B, mechanic numerical controls, electromechanical technician A, and electronic service technician senior.

The employee currently performing the work is not a member of any bargaining unit represented by a union having a collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer. Weber testified that in designing the disputed work's job description, "automated equipment technician," he reviewed 20–30 existing job classifications in both the IBEW and EAST collective-bargaining agreements. According to Weber, the closest job description was EAST's "electromechanical technician A," which played the "largest role" in drafting the new job description. Glen Hunter, the Employer's head of compensation for the Radar Systems Group, further testified that the Employer primarily used seven different job classifications: five EAST (maintenance mechanic A, plumber maintenance B, mechanic numerical controls, electromechanical technician A, and electronic service technician senior); one IBEW (industrial electronics electrician journeyman); and a nonbargaining unit "computer systems" classification. Hunter stated the Employer found "deficiencies" in the old classifications and decided it was necessary to create a new classification that "incorporated all of the requirements that the new machinery required from a maintenance standpoint."

[5] Weber testified that two MCAS machines are currently in production, that another machine will be operating "within the next few days or a week," and that a fourth MCAS machine "is a month behind it." Weber further testified that three more MCAS machines "are budgeted, or planned to be budgeted" in the future.

[6] The IBEW withdrew from the hearing but did not disclaim interest in the work in dispute. EAST seeks all maintenance work on the MCAS to be awarded to employees it represents.

[7] Kenneth King, the Employer's manager of labor relations, testified that although the contract with the IBEW expired 17 January, the parties have extended it on a day-to-day basis since that date.

Finally, in addition to the job classifications discussed above, EAST also entered into the record job descriptions of several other classifications it argues cover the disputed work: instrument technician A, instrument technician senior, optomechanical technician senior, optomechancial technician A, test equipment fabrication technician senior, test equipment fabrication technician A, test technician micro circuit senior, test technician micro circuit A, and machinist maintenance.

This evidence indicates that while the IBEW contract may cover part of the work in dispute, the description of EAST's jurisdiction in its collective-bargaining agreement covers most, if not all, of the work in dispute. In these circumstances, we find that the factor of collective-bargaining agreements favors an award to the employees EAST represents.

3. Employer preference

Since February 1987 the Employer has assigned the disputed work to a nonbargaining unit employee and concededly prefers to maintain such an assignment. The Employer at the hearing, however, stated that if the Board believes the work should be awarded to employees represented by either EAST or IBEW, it would prefer that the disputed work be assigned to employees represented by EAST as they are "more qualified." Although the Employer favors assignment of the disputed work to the nonbargaining unit employee, we do not find this controlling. The Employer by alternatively requesting that employees represented by EAST be assigned the work implies that this assignment would not adversely affect its operations. Valley Plate Glass Co., 196 NLRB 1140, 1142 (1972).

4. Employer past practice

The testimony indicates that the MCAS' integrated assembly system is one of the latest technological advancements of its kind and that the Employer has not had a long-standing or consistent past practice in assigning maintenance of this system to a particular group of employees. We therefore find this factor does not favor an award to any particular group of employees.

5. Employee skills

Employees who perform the tasks involved in maintaining the MCAS must possess considerable skills. The record, however, fails to show that any group of employees is unqualified to perform the work. Accordingly, this factor is inconclusive.

6. Economy and efficiency of operation

As noted above, Weber testified that a nonbargaining unit employee "hired from the outside" is currently performing the disputed work. The Employer's project manager Jeffrey Strong further testified that having only one employee maintaining the machine would reduce the Employer's cost, as there would be no need "to have all this other interface [between different unions] and have the machine down, waiting."[8]

Weber also testified that the Employer plans to add at least seven more MCAS machines. Therefore, if the Employer utilizes new employees, it will continue to hire, and train, additional employees to perform the disputed work.

On the other hand, the Employer admits that EAST employees could be trained to perform all of the maintenance work, and no party seeking the disputed work has requested a composite crew perform the work.[9] Thus, rather than increasing the size of its work force, the Employer could more economically train its existing employees to perform the disputed work. We therefore find the factor of economy and efficiency of operation favors an award to employees represented by EAST.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by EAST are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the Employer's collective-bargaining agreement with EAST, and economy and efficiency of operation. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by EAST, not to that Union or its members.

Scope of the Determination

The Employer requests that the Board issue a broad work order award applicable to the maintenance of all "robotic and other integrated" electronic equipment. The Employer argues such an award is necessary because the MCAS is merely the first of a projected long line of equipment incorporating this "new type of technology." Because the technology will be improving "year by year," the Employer claims a broad award is necessary to avoid further jurisdictional disputes in the future.

---

[8] Weber and Strong both testified that the maintenance on the HPS 300 and ALCAs required two or three technicians because of "different technologies" in each machine. As a result, when a machine has a problem, an engineer would investigate, determine the problem, and then assign responsibility for its repair. Weber testified this maintenance arrangement affected the machine's "down time" and slowed repair. Strong further testified that of a machine's 80 percent maintenance downtime, 50 percent was due to union jurisdictional assignment problems.

[9] Although Weber and Strong testified to employee "interface" on the HPS 300 and ALCAS, no evidence was presented on the employee "interface," if any, on the MCAS.

We find that a broad work order award is unwarranted. The work in dispute only concerns the MCAS' maintenance and the Employer is seeking a broad award of work that does not yet exist. Further, no group claiming the work has made a continuing demand for future similar work, and we have found that employees represented by the charged Union are entitled to perform the work in dispute. Therefore, we find a broad order is not warranted and limit our present determination to the particular controversy which gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute. Employees of Hughes Aircraft Company represented by Electronic and Space Technicians Local 1553 are entitled to maintain the MCAS machine in the Radar Systems Group, El Segundo, California.

DECISION, ORDER, AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 28 January 1986 Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The Respondent filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions, to adopt the recommended Order, and to certify the results of the election.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for Lumber & Sawmill Workers, Local Union 2652, Lumber, Production & Industrial Workers Union, AFL–CIO, and that it is not the exclusive representative of these bargaining unit employees.

Patricia Milowicki, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Robert G. Hulteng, Esq. and Thomas Dowd, Esq. (Littler, Mendelson, Fastiff & Tichy), of San Francisco, California, for the Respondent.
Russell Richeda, Esq. (Bunch & Andrews), of San Francisco, California, for the Charging Party.
Harlan Bernstein, Esq. (Jolles, Sokol & Bernstein, PC), of Portland, Oregon, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GERALD A. WACKNOV, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to notice, a hearing with respect to this matter was held before me in Sonora, California, on 29 and 30 April; 1, 2, 3, 20, 21, and 22 May; 10, 11, 12, 24, 25 June and 16 July 1985. The initial charge was filed on 18 October 1984 by Lumber & Sawmill Workers, Local Union 2652, Lumber, Production & Industrial Workers Union, AFL–CIO (Union). Thereafter, on 21 December 1984 the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing alleging a violation by Fibreboard Corporation, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Louisiana-Pacific Corporation (Respondent) of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act. On 15 February 1985 the Regional Director issued an amended complaint, adding additional alleged discriminatees.

Pursuant to a decertification petition filed on 24 July 1984 by David Hanreich, an individual, in Case 32–RD–608, an election by secret ballot was conducted on 14 September 1984. The tally of ballots reflects that of approximately 271 eligible voters, 18 employees cast ballots for the Union and 95 cast ballots against the Union. Additionally, there were 149 challenged ballots. Thereafter the Union filed timely objections to the election, which objections were overruled by a Decision, Direction, and Order of the Board, dated 12 March 1985. Further, the Board directed a hearing on the challenged ballots. On 17 April 1985 the Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases and notice of hearing, consolidating both the unfair labor practice case and representation case for purposes of a hearing before an administrative law judge.

The parties were afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of the hearing, briefs have been received from the General Counsel, counsel for Respondent, and counsel for the Charging Party.

[1] The General Counsel and the Union have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We note that Community Motor Bus Co., 180 NLRB 677 (1970), enf. denied 439 F.2d 965 (4th Cir. 1971), on which the General Counsel relied in arguing that the Respondent had generally condoned strike misconduct, is distinguishable on its facts from the present case. In Community Motor Bus, an agent of the employer had offered reinstatement to all 18 striking employees who blocked entrance to the plant in a single incident of mass picketing. Notwithstanding that offer, the employer later discharged 12 strikers for their involvement in that same incident. On these facts the Board found that the employer had condoned the mass picketing incident and could not thereafter lawfully discharge strikers for it. In the present case, by contrast, a series of different incidents were involved, and the agents of the Respondent who allowed strikers Joice, Houck, and Metcalfe to return reasonably believed that they lacked sufficient evidence of participation in serious misconduct to bar their reinstatement when they offered to return.

On the entire record, and based on my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a Delaware corporation, with an office and place of business in Standard, California, has been engaged in the milling and wholesale distribution of lumber. In the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent annually sells and ships goods or provides services in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California.

It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is admitted that the Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issue

The principal issue raised by the pleadings is whether the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing to reinstate and by discharging employees accused of strike-related misconduct, following their unconditional application to return to work on the termination of the strike.

B. The Facts

The strike commenced on 24 June 1983 following a breakdown of bargaining negotiations. Some 19 of Respondent's facilities were struck. There was significant and extensive violence during the strike, including fire bombings of plant premises and an attempt to blow up an electrical substation. The two plants directly involved, the Standard plant, then managed by Jim Costello, and the Keystone plant, then managed by Mel Barber, are located some 20 miles apart. The Standard plant was among the two or three locations where the misconduct was most widespread. The strike resulted in the complete shutdown of both plants.

On 29 June 1983 Respondent obtained a temporary restraining order in the Tuolumne County Superior Court against the Union and various individuals. Thereafter a preliminary injunction was issued, followed by the entry of a consent contempt decree against the Union and various individuals because of continued violation of the court's order.

During this period, Charles Loughran, director of corporate industrial relations, advised the various plant managers that individuals who had been involved in substantial misconduct or some aspects of violence would be ineligible for reinstatement, but that specific discharge action should not be taken until the Respondent was faced with offers to return to work. Meanwhile, the Respondent compiled available information, including reports and newspaper articles, regarding the misconduct of specific employees.

The Keystone facility was one of the first plants to resume operation during the strike, opening in late September 1983. In October, Plant Manager Barber[1] hired Peter Joice, who had previously worked at the Standard facility. Don Gritz, personnel industrial relations manager for the Sierra Division of Louisiana Pacific, testified that Barber alone made the decision to hire Joice, prior to any correspondence or communication with Gritz. There is no evidence that Barber was aware of Joice's strike misconduct. Sometime thereafter, Gritz learned that Joice had been hired at Keystone and advised that an investigation should be made.

Joice was interviewed by Mel Barber and Emma Lackey, personnel assistant, apparently on 13 October 1983. Lackey prepared a detailed typewritten summary of the interview and submitted it to Gritz.

On 2 November 1983 Gritz directed the following memo to various management representatives:

> In order to assure that we implement a consistent policy towards employees participating in acts of misconduct, violation of court orders and other unacceptable actions since June 24, it is requested that you compile and forward to my attention a list of employees involved in misconduct, a brief summary of their involvement, and if any court or legal action has occurred or is scheduled relative to their misconduct. Of course, add any comments you believe to be appropriate.

On 5 January 1984, on completing the investigation of Joice, and after consultation with other corporate representatives, Gritz issued the following report:

> Disciplinary action—Peter B. Joice
> Information:
> On 08–08–83 Pete was on picket duty at the plywood gate, Standard Plant. Mickey Metcalfe was also there. Sheriffs verbal information and APS written reports indicate Pete had been drinking. He was arrested by the Tuolumne County Sheriff Department for trespassing and verbally hassling law enforcement personnel. Later after being released from jail but during the same "picket shift" he was arrested for throwing rocks at and hitting an APS[2] guard. He was not immediately released this time. While in jail he was charged with grand theft of a portable radio. It was the property of APS and disappeared during the time Pete was on picket duty. Pete was later released from jail and after three court appearances he entered a guilty plea to three reduced charges. He was fined $1500 and served or is serving 45 days on a work furlough program.

[1] Barber is on long-term disability retirement due to a heart condition, and was represented to be unable to testify in this proceeding.

[2] American Protective Services, a private agency hired by Respondent during the strike.

Comments:

Pete, by his own statements, APS reports and sheriff comments was a voluntary participant in activities considered misconduct while on picket duty. Review of the events leading to the decision noted below include a statement by Pete, APS incident reports, discussion with representatives of the Tuolumne County Sheriff's department, management personnel of Louisiana-Pacific and news articles. The acts of hostility and misconduct by Pete were not directed against L-P employees, L-P rolling stock, equipment or material being shipped or received. His activities were not at the L-P plant where he is presently working. However, his actions cannot be overlooked or condoned.

Decision:

After receiving input from numerous sources and evaluating the impact and significance of all information received, it is the opinion of L-P management that Pete Joice has committed acts of misconduct for which disciplinary action is appropriate. Furthermore it is management's opinion that his acts were not gross misconduct for which termination would be the appropriate remedy. Mr. Joice shall be suspended, without pay, for ten (10) working days. In addition Mr. Joice shall participate in a meeting where management shall explain its position and reasons for this disciplinary decision, the alternatives which were considered, and our sincere desire to make it clear that his actions were serious and unacceptable. Mr. Joice shall be afforded an opportunity to offer any comments and statements he wishes.

A copy of this report shall be placed in Mr. Joice's personnel file.

On the same day, 5 January 1984, Joice was called into the office and met with Barber, Lackey, and two additional supervisors. He was handed a warning notice to read and sign, and was advised of his 10-day suspension. At this meeting Lackey told him that "The decision . . . was a result of much discussion and his work record and his desire to work played a big part in the decision made."

At the hearing Gritz testified that there were several reasons for suspending, rather than terminating Joice: He had been very candid and forthright and did not deny his involvement in the misconduct; there appeared to have been some provocation by the guard;[3] he had been drinking and his actions did not appear "premeditated"; they were not taken against employees who were trying to go to and from work nor was there an attempt to impede materials and supplies; and, an important additional reason was to prevent a possible morale problem with the plant manager who was "attempting to get an operation going under very difficult circumstances. I was very aware of the importance attached to support of the managers that have to make decisions."

In early November 1983, during the strike, employee James Houck approached Standard Plant Manager Costello and offered to return to work. Costello was aware of Houck's alleged misconduct—striking and injuring a security guard with a rock—and advised Houck that he would have to evaluate the evidence regarding the matter. Houck denied that he had thrown the rock.

On 14 July 1983, in the aforementioned contempt proceeding, Costello signed a declaration stating, inter alia, as follows:

> On July 8, 1983, at approximately 7:45 a.m., a picket threw a rock which hit Plaintiff's security guard Jack Zickert on the head causing serious injury. I did not personally witness this incident, but I am informed and believe on that basis, that the picket who threw the rock is James Houck. This conduct, for which James Houck is personally responsible, violates paragraphs c and h of the temporary restraining order.
> On July 8, 1983, at approximately 8:00 a.m., security guard Ramirez was physically restrained by the picket who threw the rock causing injury to security agent Zickert. The picket threatened to take the life of security guard Ramirez. Other pickets threatened Ramirez' life at that time as well. These actions violate paragraphs c, d and h of the temporary restraining order.

Costello was present during the contempt hearing, on 12 August 1983, and heard Ramirez testify with respect to the Houck incident.[4] Zickert was not available for the contempt hearing, and Ramirez testified, according to Costello, that he had not personally witnessed the rock-throwing incident by Houck. After Zickert was hit, however, he called to Ramirez and pointed to Houck. Ramirez pursued and attempted to arrest Houck, and said, "When are you going, buddy?" Houck replied, according to Ramirez, "I'm going to kill you, motherfucker."[5]

On Houck's request to return to work, Costello telephoned the district attorney's office regarding the matter, and visited the sheriff's office to discover any additional information. Costello believed that he had no conclusive evidence that Houck did throw the rock as Houck's guilt had not been established in the court proceeding, and testified that Houck's apparent sincerity impressed him. Houck was reinstated on 11 November 1983. Thereafter, Loughran and Gritz instructed Costello to conduct a more thorough investigation. As a result, on 14 November 1983, Costello sent the following letter to Houck:

> You were called back to work based upon your signing of an "Unconditional Offer to Return to

[3] Lackey's aforementioned 13 October report of the interview with Joice contains the following: "The second time he was arrested as a result of 'getting into it' with a security guard. . . . Pete said the security guard called his mother some bad names, i.e., 'whore.'"

[4] The contempt proceeding did not result in a court resolution of contested issues as the parties, prior to the completion of testimony, entered into a consent contempt order.

[5] Costello testified that he did not recall Ramirez' testimony regarding this threat.

> Work" and by virtue of the fact that you are the senior qualified person for the work available.
> I am obligated to inform you that a strike related incident allegedly involving yourself is still under investigation and that the outcome of that investigation may result in disciplinary action, from suspension to and including termination. You should, therefore, consider yourself a probationary employee.

On 17 November 1983 Costello received calls from two employees who had been near Houck, along with six or seven other employees, during the rock-throwing incident. They told him that they did not see Houck throw a rock. On 18 November, another employee phoned Costello and advised him that he was also present, and confirmed that Houck was leaving the area to move his vehicle off the road pursuant to instructions of sheriffs' deputies, rather than in an effort to escape being apprehended for throwing a rock.

Also on 17 November 1983, Costello, Gritz, and Walt Hanson, Costello's superior, flew to San Jose, California, in a company jet for the purpose of interviewing the two guards, Zickert and Ramirez. The interview lasted 2 hours, and Respondent's officials became convinced from Zickert's inconsistent recollection that Zickert did not observe who threw the rock at him.

Thereafter, on 22 November 1983, Costello wrote the following memo:

> The allegation is that Houck threw a rock at Security officer Zickert on July 8, 1983 at the L-P log truck gate.
> The only witness testifying that Houck threw the rock is Zickert. His description of the incident is a little inconsistent in that he says he was hit—then turned and saw Houck. Later in his testimony he says he saw Houck throw the rock and then attempt to leave the scene. His testimony certainly incriminates Houck as one of 7 or 8 people in the area, but does not provide anything conclusive. Furthermore, we had several difficulties with the Royal Investigation Security employees during that week—enough to cause some concern for the credibility of their testimony.
> I have received evidence from three witnesses; Hank Hix, John Bettanini and Todd Cozort who will testify that Houck did not throw the rock.
> The sheriff department filled out a report and forwarded it to the D.A.'s office. The D.A.'s office investigated the incident and found insufficient evidence to pursue a charge against Houck.
> When Houck was interviewed he flatly and convincingly denied having thrown the rock. He did admit being on the scene when it happened and did go to his truck when asked by the sheriff's office to do so. He denied having left the scene to get away.
> I interviewed two members of the sheriff office present on that day. Neither witnessed the incident but they did confirm that Houck was asked to move his vehicle, thus explaining Houck's actions described by Zickert as "attempting to leave the scene."
> Based on evidence and testimony, it is my recommendation that no disciplinary action be taken against Houck. Furthermore, it would be inconsistent to continue to pursue the Houck incident in the T.R.O. contempt hearings. It may even weaken the rest of the case if we leave it in. Therefore, I also recommend the allegations be dropped with respect to Houck.[6]

The Respondent had collected and retained various newspaper articles regarding the strike activity, and was in possession of a newspaper article naming Mickey Metcalfe as having been arrested for interfering with the arrest of Peter Joice, supra, by challenging the arresting officer to a fight. The criminal charges against Metcalfe brought by a deputy sheriff were dismissed, and Respondent had no independent evidence of Metcalfe's alleged misconduct. The decision to reinstate Metcalfe was made by Lumber Superintendent Richard Davis rather than by Plant Manager Costello, who was not at that time involved in the hiring process as he had tendered his resignation prior thereto. Davis testified that he rehired Metcalfe and several other employees at the same time, about 12 December 1983, and was not aware that Metcalfe had been arrested or accused of misconduct. Costello, who had tendered his resignation to Respondent on 29 November 1983, testified that he does not recollect whether he had become aware of Metcalfe's reinstatement prior to the time he actually left Respondent's employ.

On 24 July 1984 a decertification petition was filed in Case 32–RD–608 involving the Standard collective-bargaining unit. On 31 July 1984 the Union made an unconditional application for reinstatement on behalf of all the striking employees. On 20 August 1984 a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election was approved by the Regional Director. Shortly thereafter, Charles Loughran instructed then Standard Plant Manager Dave Vculek to discharge former strikers regarding whom there was adequate evidence of strike-related misconduct. The purpose of this instruction was to ensure that the ballots of those employees could be challenged should they decide to vote. See Connecticut Foundry Co., 247 NLRB 1514 (1980); Servomation of Columbus, 219 NLRB 504 (1975). Vculek, who had no personal knowledge of the employees or their involvement in strike misconduct as he did not become plant manager until mid-January 1984, made the decision to discharge the remaining employees. He based his decision on documents that had previously been compiled, including guards' incident reports, employees' reports, newspaper articles, and conversations with staff. Thereafter he sent letters to each of the employees, dated 16 August 1984, outlining the reason for their respective terminations. Only one of these employees, Floyd De Anda, responded to Vculek's letter. De Anda maintained that he was innocent of throwing any rocks. Vculek did not contact any of the employees whose names had been furnished by De Anda as witnesses in support of his assertion that at the time in question De Anda had not thrown any rocks. Rather, Vculek elected not to believe De Anda's claim of innocence and relied on the information available to him, including the arresting officer's report.

[6] There is no further evidence in the record regarding Houck's threat to security officer Ramirez, on being arrested. Presumably, as Respondent's representative believed that Houck did not throw the rock, his spontaneous outburst on being wrongly apprehended was deemed excusable.

The letters of termination specify the following reasons for termination:

> Melvin J. Slate—terrorizing a salaried L-P employee and doing physical damage to his vehicle on 19 July 1983.
> Jim Schawnego—being accused by APS security of throwing nails on the Keystone driveway during the Keystone start-up of 26 September 1983.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel argues that the Respondent, by its reinstatement of the aforementioned employees, Joice Houck and Metcalfe, during the strike, condoned the strike-related misconduct of any and all employees, and that therefore Respondent's discharge of the employees who may have engaged in similar misconduct, but who continued to support the strike until it was ended by the Union, is violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Further, the General Counsel argues that by its aforementioned disparate treatment of the employees, the Respondent has evidenced an intent to discriminate against those employees who did not elect to return to work during the strike.

In support of her position the General Counsel cites as the "controlling decision" Community Motor Bus Co., 180 NLRB 677 (1970), enf. denied 439 F.2d 965 (4th Cir. 1971). In that case some 18 employees engaged in alleged strike-related misconduct consisting of mass picketing and blocking the use of the employer's entrance and exits at the outset of the strike. Thereafter, one of the employer's officials specifically advised the union that the men were not being fired for such misconduct, but rather were needed and that the employer wanted them back. Later, on the termination of the strike, the employer reinstated 6 of the 18 employees, but refused to reinstate the remaining 12 because of the aforementioned misconduct. The Board found that under these circumstances the employer condoned any unprotected strike activity, and violated the Act by refusing reinstatement to the remaining 12 employees. The Fourth Circuit, however, specifically reversed this decision, finding that the reassurances made by the employer were made primarily to keep the peace during a time when emotions were dangerously high, and fell short of condonation as they did not constitute a clear willingness to "wipe the slate clean." The court then stated at 439 F.2d at 968, regarding the employer's failure to treat all the strikers equally:

> Although we accept as supported by substantial evidence the Board's findings concerning the conduct of the 18 employees, we believe its conclusion overlooks the distinction drawn by NLRB v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp., 306 U.S. 240, 259, 59 S.Ct. 490, 83 L.Ed. 627 (1939), between what an employer may do and what it must do. In Fansteel, the Court held illegal strike activity absolved the employer of any duty to reemploy, but the company "was nevertheless free to consider the exigencies of its business and to offer reemployment if it chose. In so doing it was simply exercising its normal right to select its employees." 306 U.S. at 259, 59 S.Ct. at 498.

The same is true here. The company was free to discharge or rehire any or all of the strikers whose misconduct forfeited reinstatement rights. Any other rule, especially in the absence of anti-union animus, would confront the employer with an all-or-none rehiring choice, which is not required by the Act or by the doctrine of condonation. Kohler Co., 128 NLRB 1062, 1105 (1960), enf'd in part and remanded sub nom. Local 833, UAW-AFL-CIO, International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America v. NLRB, 112 U.S. App. D.C. 107, 300 F.2d 699, cert. denied, 370 U.S. 911, 82 S.Ct. 1258, 8 L.Ed.2d 405 (1962).

In Longview Furniture Co., 100 NLRB 301, 306 (1952), the Board, citing Fansteel, supra, stated as follows:

> In our opinion the reinstatement of Harold Clampitt by the Respondent does not indicate condonation, as suggested by the Trial Examiner. For, assuming that the Respondent may have believed that Clampitt had engaged in conduct like that attributed to the 13 here involved, it is settled that where serious acts of misconduct are involved, an employer does not waive or condone the misconduct of all participants when it rehires some of them.[13] For the same reason no inference of condonation may be drawn from the fact that the Respondent retained in its employ certain nonstrikers who may have been guilty of serious misconduct during the strike.

[13] See, for example, NLRB v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp., 306 U.S. 240; Precision Castings Company, Inc., 48 NLRB 870.

The law is clear that condonation of unprotected activity is not to be readily inferred, but rather must be based on clear, convincing, and positive evidence that the employer has agreed to forgive such misconduct and desires to continue the employer-employee relationship as though no misconduct had occurred. Marquette Cement Mfg. Co., 219 NLRB 549, 553 (1975); NLRB v. Marshall Car Wheel Co., 218 F.2d 409, 414 (5th Cir. 1955).

The General Counsel asserts that Respondent's rehiring of the three aforementioned employees constitutes condonation of the other employees' misconduct. I conclude that this contention is without merit. The employees who were rehired were never told that whatever misconduct in which they may have engaged had been forgiven. In fact the Respondent's probation of Houck while the investigation of his alleged misconduct was being undertaken, and the disciplinary suspension of Joice, together with the warning letter advising that Houck's misconduct was deemed serious and unacceptable, conclusively demonstrates, in my opinion, that Respondent was not willing to extend carte blanche forgiveness to the remaining employees, an indispensable element in any theory of condonation. Rather, Respondent's approach to the reinstatement of those employees, in conducting an investigation into their alleged wrongdoing even after they had commenced working, demonstrates that it was not willing to "wipe the slate clean" with regard to the misconduct of any employees. Therefore, I find that the record does not contain the necessary clear and convincing evidence to support the General Counsel's condonation theory.

The General Counsel asserts, and the complaint alleges, that the Respondent engaged in disparate treatment of the employees for discriminatory reasons. Thus, according to the General Counsel, the Respondent, on rehiring Joice and Houck during the strike, took extensive measures to investigate their alleged wrongdoing in order to discover or contrive reasons for exculpating or forgiving such misconduct; in contrast, it discharged in a perfunctory manner those employees who elected to continue exercising their protected right to strike.

I credit the testimony of Respondent's witnesses and find that Houck was reinstated by Standard Plant Manager Costello, and Joice was hired by Keystone Plant Manager Barber without the knowledge of higher management officials. Indeed, the fact that the officials, on learning of the reemployment of these individuals, required the respective plant managers to conduct an extensive investigation into the employees' alleged misconduct provides convincing evidence of this. Further, such a sequence of events, I find, clearly shows that the plant managers possessed and exercised a substantial degree of authority and autonomy, as Respondent maintains. It seems clear that the ensuing investigations, mandated by Respondent's officials, were undertaken to determine whether these individuals, once rehired, should be retained. Thereafter, personal interviews with these individuals and, in the case of Houck, his accusers, resulted in their continued employment, for the various reasons set forth above. I credit Don Gritz, Sierra Division personnel/industrial relations manager, who appeared to be a very forthright individual and find that Respondent's various reasons for suspending rather than discharging Joice were based on an honest evaluation of the circumstances rather than, as the General Counsel suggests, a contrived effort to reward an employee for abandoning the Union. Further, I credit Plant Manager Costello and Gritz, and find that after a laborious investigation of the matter, Respondent simply believed that Houck was innocent of any wrongdoing.[7]

The discharge of the remaining employees in August 1984, some 8 to 10 months following the reinstatement of Joice, Houck, and Metcalfe, was undertaken by a new plant manager, Vculek, who had played no part in the reinstatement of the aforementioned employees. The record clearly shows that Vculek, pursuant to instructions and in a routine and fairly mechanical manner, discharged the employees in question, basing his determination only on various documents that had been compiled. Thereafter, only one of these employees, De Anda, protested his discharge. Vculek perfunctorily chose to disbelieve his claim of innocence, and did not pursue any investigation of the matter.

[7] It appears that Metcalfe's reinstatement simply did not come to the attention of higher management representatives, and therefore no investigation of his alleged misconduct was initiated.

The record evidence establishes that the Respondent, from the outset, regarded any type of strike misconduct as impermissible and engaged in significant efforts to identify the wrongdoers. Further, in this endeavor, it compiled and maintained whatever material existed to document and support its belief that certain employees were culpable, obviously for the purpose of supporting whatever disciplinary measures it should later decide to invoke. On the rehire of Joice, and later of Houck, it undertook an extensive investigation into their alleged misconduct. As a result, it exonerated Houck and found mitigating circumstances that warranted only a suspension of Joice.

It seems apparent that had Joice and Houck not been rehired during the strike, they would have been among those later discharged. However, the evidence, in my opinion, does not support the General Counsel's contention that they were reinstated as a result of a conscious effort on the part of Respondent to forgive employees who abandoned the strike. Rather, it appears that their reinstatement was the direct result of a series of fortuitous circumstances, particularly Respondent's thorough investigation of their alleged misconduct. Moreover, Joice's situation was unique for the various reasons that the Respondent in good faith deemed to be mitigating circumstances, including Joice's sincerity and his confession of guilt, the fact that he was provoked by the security guard, and the difficult situation that Respondent was then experiencing in starting up its Keystone operations.

On the termination of the strike and the filing of the decertification petition, the Respondent decided to rely on the information then available to it and summarily discharged the remaining employees. In this determination the Respondent elected to take the position that if in fact its information was incorrect, and any particular employee was not guilty of misconduct, for whatever reason, subsequent Board proceedings which the Union or the employees would undoubtedly attempt to institute could resolve the matter. Rubin Bros. Footwear, 99 NLRB 610 (1952); Crown Zellerbach Corp., 266 NLRB 1231, 1237 (1983). The fact that the Respondent undertook an investigation of Joice and Houck on their being rehired does not, in my opinion, mandate that the Respondent has thereby committed itself to embark on an extensive investigation into the circumstances surrounding the misconduct of each accused employee in an effort to discover possible mitigating circumstances. The General Counsel has cited no cases warranting such a rule, and it appears that to require an employer to adhere to such a requirement would have an inhibiting effect on an employer's decision to reinstate employees who had been accused of misconduct during a strike. Moreover, anything other than a most cursory investigation could not have been accomplished within the short time between the Union's request for reinstatement and the date of the election; and Board law would have precluded Respondent from challenging the ballot of any employee who had not been discharged prior to the election date. Connecticut Foundry Co., supra at 1520, and cases cited therein.

The record includes extensive evidence regarding the culpability of each of the terminated employees involved in this proceeding. The General Counsel has not maintained, with the exception of employee De Anda, that in fact any particular employee did not engage in the misconduct attributed to him, nor does she maintain that such misconduct was not sufficiently egregious, under applicable Board precedent, to warrant termination. Therefore it appears unnecessary to recount the record evidence regarding the misconduct of the discharged employees.

Regarding the case of De Anda, the only employee who has disputed any involvement in wrongdoing, I credit the testimony of Thomas Lee Kaufman, an investigator with the Tuolumne County sheriff's department, who appeared to have an accurate recollection of the events in question. Kaufman convincingly testified that on 26 September 1983, during strike activity, he observed an individual throw a rock approximately 2 inches in diameter, large enough to shatter a windshield or cause damage to vehicles that were exiting the plant. He at all times thereafter kept his attention directed on the individual, who was a large man, distinctively dressed with rainbow-colored suspenders over a white T-shirt. He then arrested the individual, De Anda. I do not credit the testimony of any witnesses to the extent that such testimony may differ with that of Kaufman. I find that De Anda did in fact engage in unprotected conduct and that he was therefore lawfully discharged.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that the evidence is insufficient to show that the discharge of the strikers who did, in fact, engage in misconduct warranting termination was motivated by unlawful considerations. I shall therefore dismiss the complaint.

IV. THE REPRESENTATION CASE

A. Underlying Issues

The Union's primary argument regarding the great majority of ballots that were challenged by the Respondent on the basis that the employees had been permanently replaced or that their jobs had been eliminated, involves the status of the sawmill on the date of the election, 14 September 1984. Prior to the strike the sawmill operated with 48 employees. The sawmill has not operated since the strike and at the time of the hearing was undergoing extensive modification.

Shortly prior to the election the Respondent prepared manning tables for each job classification that would exist in the new sawmill. The projection indicated that the new sawmill would operate with a total of 27 employees, and would produce approximately the same daily number of board feet as the former sawmill.

The Union takes the position that as of the date of the election the plans for the new sawmill had not been finalized nor had construction begun. Therefore, according to the Union, at the time of the election the Respondent could have decided to reopen its existing plant that had formerly operated with a complement of 48 employees. From this premise the Union argues that at the time of the election there would have been no way of determining whether any particular employee, in any department, had actually been permanently replaced during the strike because, under the Respondent's seniority system, the 48 sawmill positions could have been filled by any striker regardless of whether he or she had formerly worked in the sawmill. Stated another way, the Union maintains that although there were some 125 strikers who wanted to return to work at the end of the strike and only a limited number of available positions, it would be impossible to determine which specific strikers had been permanently replaced, in any department, until Respondent had either hired or commenced operating with a complete complement of employees in all departments, including the sawmill. Therefore, the Union apparently contends each of Respondent's challenges must be overruled on the basis that each challenged ballot was cast by an employee who, potentially, could have occupied a position in the sawmill[8] until such time as the employee had been offered, and declined, such a position.

I find the Union's argument to be without merit. Voluminous testimonial and documentary evidence, which need not be set forth herein, conclusively demonstrates that the Respondent had engaged in exhaustive research, both prior to and during the strike, in an effort to determine which type of sawmill would best suit Respondent's changing business needs. At the time of the election the proposal for the construction of the new sawmill had been completed to the extent that Respondent's officials were in a position to specify with certainty the number of employees and job classifications needed to operate it. Although, as the Union argues, the final proposal was not officially adopted by the Respondent's board of directors until late October 1984, a month and a half after the election, nevertheless the record shows that on the date of the election, 14 September 1984, the reopening of the sawmill as it then existed was not under consideration, and the plans for the new sawmill had been in essentially final form since late July 1984. Moreover, at the time of the hearing the construction of the new sawmill was progressing as planned, and there have been no modifications in its staffing requirements. Thus I conclude, and the record abundantly demonstrates, that the Respondent's projections as of the date of the election conclusively establish that the new sawmill, when it becomes operative, will be staffed by only 27 employees. Moreover, the identity of each individual who would fill one of the 27 sawmill positions was ascertainable as of the election date, infra.

The Union also contends that certain employees who worked at Respondent's Keystone plant but voted in the Standard election were not eligible voters. The record shows that certain Standard sawmill employees who requested to return to work during the strike were given various jobs at the Keystone plant pending the reopening of the new Standard sawmill. Indeed, although these employees were placed on the eligibility list for the Keystone election on the basis that they had an interest in the outcome of the election, the Union challenged their ballots during the Keystone election on the basis that they were Standard, not Keystone, employees. I do not credit the testimony of various witnesses for the Union who stated or implied that at the Keystone preelection conference the Respondent represented that these particular employees were permanent Keystone employees and had forfeited their seniority at Standard. Rather, I credit Respondent's witnesses who testified that these employees specifically opted to work at Keystone pending the completion of the new Standard sawmill, and that they were assured of positions and the retaining of their seniority at the Standard sawmill when it reopened. I further find that the Respondent's representative said nothing to the contrary at the Keystone preelection conference.

During the strike the Respondent eliminated certain positions or classifications in various departments without prior notification to the Union. The Union maintains that such unilateral elimination of unit positions constituted, in effect, unlawful conduct violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, precluding the Respondent's challenge to the ballots of various employees on the basis of job elimination. Respondent presented evidence that it had historically taken the position that it was not required to bargain about such matters, and that its position in this regard had been, in effect, sustained in various arbitration determinations between the parties.

The record herein shows that the elimination of jobs or job classifications prior to and during the strike was, in all instances, economically motivated. Most importantly, there is no complaint allegation that such job eliminations are unlawful. Absent any contention in the unfair labor practice proceeding that Respondent's elimination of various jobs was violative of the Act, such job elimination must be presumed to be lawful. Accordingly, I find the Union's argument to be without merit. See Spray Sales & Sierra Rollers, 225 NLRB 1089 (1976); Texas Meat Packers, 130 NLRB 279 (1961).

B. The Challenged Ballots

1. Department 1 (sawmill)

The sawmill did not operate during the strike. Rather, the Respondent discontinued its sawmill operations, and engaged in extensive plans to build a new sawmill that would incorporate recent technology. At the time of the election the plans for the redesigned sawmill were sufficiently finalized to the extent that the number of employees needed to staff its operations had been accurately determined. The old sawmill had operated with a total of 48 employees. As noted above, extensive and convincing record evidence clearly demonstrates that the new sawmill will operate with a total of 27 employees.

The following 11 employees offered to return to work at the sawmill prior to the Union's general unconditional offer. Because the sawmill had not reopened, these individuals were put to work either in other departments at Standard, or at the Keystone sawmill, pending reopening of the Standard sawmill:

[8] It appears that positions in all departments other than the sawmill had been filled, many with permanent replacements, at the time of the election.

Salvador Gamez	Tim Alvarez
James Marr	James Lane
Bill Adcock	Roger Edwards
Lucio De La Torre	Bob Kiar
Genera Martinez	Miguel Cisneros
Carl Hix

The remaining 16 employees whom I find would have occupied positions in the sawmill, at the time of the election, were:

Tom Riuz	Roy Higgins
Robert Icenogle	George Spraggins
Donald Higuera[9]	Benny Tarango
James Campbell	Ronald Barton
John Bettanini	Daniel Espinosa
Michael Emerald[10]	Stephen Norris[11]
Jesus Ramirez	James Fernandez
Gary Hodges	Mark Mutzner[12]

I sustain the challenge to the ballots of the following former sawmill employees on the basis that their jobs have been eliminated and they had no reasonable expectation of future employment:

John Morris	James E. Lane Jr.
Tony Treto	Ronald Neri
Charles Belemecich	Riley Hamilton

The following former sawmill employees were lawfully discharged due to strike-related misconduct, as determined in the unfair labor practice proceeding. The challenges to their ballots are sustained:

Nacho C. Padilla	Robert E. Hamilton
Galen A. Sawyers	Robert J. Williams

The challenge to the ballot of Robert A. Williams is sustained by agreement of the parties.

2. Department 2 (lumber department)

The lumber department will operate with a total of approximately 22 employees. At the time of the election this department was fully staffed with 24 individuals.

The challenges to the ballots of the following individuals are sustained as the record shows that their jobs had been eliminated or they were permanently replaced and had no reasonable expectation of future employment at the time of the election:

Clifford Dunbar	Cristobal F. Robles
Vernon Shaw	Clifford R. Knowles
Leon S. Casas	Jesus T. Garcia
Joe Petro	Guido L. Guissi
Antonio Bettanini	Anthony Da Gama
Andrew S. Artzer	Norean L. Martin
Louis W. Capuccini	James R. Morris
William Camire	John J. Holderman
Clyde V. Foote

The challenges to the ballots of the following employees are sustained as the employees were lawfully discharged due to strike-related misconduct:

Steve Serrano	Claudia Grimes
Floyd De Anda	David L. Munson
Dennis H. Ponder	Thomas Norris
Gerald Gutierrez

The challenge to the ballot of John D. Gonzales is sustained as he advised Respondent of his retirement prior to the election, and it is clear that he had no intention of returning to work.

2. Department 3 (transportation)

All jobs in this department were eliminated prior to the election. Therefore, the challenge to the ballots of the following employees who were formerly employed in the transportation department, are sustained: Stanley R. York and Donald York

4. Department 5 (machine shop)[13]

The decision to eliminate the machine shop was made prior to the election. Accordingly, the challenge to the ballot of Vernon C. Wyllie, former machine shop employee, is sustained.

5. Department 6 (powerhouse)

The powerhouse will apparently operate with a total of nine employees. At the time of the election the powerhouse was operating with a full complement of employees, including permanent replacements.

The Respondent's challenge to the ballots of the following employees, who were permanently replaced during the strike and had no reasonable expectation of employment at the time of the election, are therefore sustained:

James R. Hembree	John Kinest
William E. Tolar	Norman F. Pangracs
William B Stevens	James L. Pierce

6. Department 7 (electrical department)

The record establishes that three sawmill electricians will sufficiently staff this department.

The Respondent's challenge to the ballot of Jewell Kelley is sustained, as his job has been eliminated. The Respondent's challenge to the ballot of Jim Hockett is sustained, as he was lawfully discharged due to strike-related misconduct.

[9] Respondent's challenge to Higuera's ballot is overruled, as the record shows that his interim employment at lower wage and with lesser benefit at Hateler Enterprise was not substantially equivalent to his intention to abandon his position with the Respondent.

[10] Respondent's challenge to the ballot of Emerald, who had interim employment with Snider Lumber Company, but at lower wages and with fewer fringe benefits, is overruled.

[11] I credit Norris' testimony that he would have returned to Respondent's employ at the time of the election, particularly due to his seniority with Respondent's despite contrary statements he made to the plant manager of Snider Lumber Company, his interim employer. The Respondent's challenge to his ballot is overruled.

[12] I credit Mutzner's testimony that he would have returned to work for Respondent at the time of the election. His wages and fringe benefits were inferior to those of the Respondent. The challenge to his ballot is overruled.

[13] Department 4 does not exist.

7. Department 8 (yard shops)

The record shows that former yard shop employees, Raymond Antonini and Gregory Long, were permanently replaced during the strike. The Respondent's challenges to their ballots are sustained.

8. Department 9 (plywood department)

The record establishes that the plywood department has operated with 68 employees during the strike and that as of the date of the election there was no reasonable expectation of future employment for the former plywood department employees who had been permanently replaced. Therefore, the Respondent's challenges to the ballots of the following former employees are sustained:

Ray Esparza	Charles L. Belemecich
Walter Strong, Jr.	Valdemar Vega
William McPherson	Edward Neri
Duane Montgomery	Efren Meza
Stanley Painter	Gary Grazioli
Wayne Ratliff	Marvin Icenogle
Lloyd Beaty, Jr.	Donna Johnson
Robert Tarango	Jeri Wagner
Juan Ramirez	Robert Griffiths
Dennis White	Daniel Babbit

The challenges to the ballots of the following employees, who were lawfully discharged due to strike-related misconduct, are sustained:

Jimmie E. Shawnego	Roy E. Clayton
Harley E. Engle	Melvin J. Slate
Richard E. Engle	Thomas A. Barajas, Jr.
Wyatt L. Parke

The Respondent's challenges to the following ballots are sustained for the reasons indicated: Thomas H. Cooper—Agreement of the parties.

Ben Flores—The record shows that Flores' disability precluded his reemployment.

Brandon Babbitt—The record shows that Babbitt submitted an application for early retirement prior to the election, and that there was no reasonable basis for believing that he would return to work.

9. Department 10 (log deck)

The Respondent's challenges to the ballots of the following employees are sustained for the reasons indicated: Clarence C. Ladley—Job eliminated; and Ralph A. Applequist—Permanently replaced

The Union's challenge to the ballot of Robert P. Zion is sustainedby agreement of the parties.

10. Department 11 (road construction crew)

The road construction crew was eliminated during the strike. The Respondent's challenges to the ballots of the following employees are sustained, as their jobs have been eliminated:

James E. Martinelli	Brady Brown
Richard P. Gladysz	Gerald J. Longeway
William A. Tirey

C. Summary

The tally of ballots served on the parties at the conclusion of the election shows that 18 ballots were cast for and 95 ballots were cast against the Union. A total of 149 ballots were challenged. As noted above, I have sustained, for the reasons indicated, various challenges as follows:

Sawmill	11
Lumber	25
Transportation	2
Machine Shop	1
Powerhouse	6
Electrical	2
Yard Shops	2
Plywood	30
Log Deck	3
Road Construction Crew	5
Total	87

As 87 challenges have been sustained, the remaining 62 challenges are insufficient in number to affect the results of the election. Therefore, it is recommended that the Board certify the results of the election.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[14]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the Board remand the representation proceeding to the Regional Director for Region 32 for the purpose of certifying the results of the election.

[14] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 3 October 1986 Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief to the exceptions. The Respondent also filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief to the cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel and the Respondent have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case in trial at Los Angeles, California, on June 23, 1986. Based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on March 17, 1986, by Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers, Division of the Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, Local Lodge D89 (the Union), the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing on May 1 against California Portland Cement Division, Calmat Co. (Respondent). The complaint alleges in substance that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, by refusing to furnish the Union with certain requested information allegedly relevant to the Union's performance of its duties as collective-bargaining representative of a unit of Respondent's employees.

All parties were given full opportunity to appear, to introduce relevant evidence and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a California corporation, has an office and principal place of business located in Los Angeles, California, and production facilities located at El Monte, Colton, Mojave, and Tehachapi, California, where it is engaged in the manufacture of cement. Respondent, in the normal course and conduct of its business operations, annually purchases and receives goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California.

Respondent admits, and I find that it is, an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Since at least 1981, the Union has been the exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining of Respondent's employees at the Colton, California facility, the only facility involved in this case. Respondent admits and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

As mentioned above, Respondent produces and manufactures cement at its Colton, California facility. Since at least 1981, the Union has represented Respondent's employees at Colton. The Union and Respondent were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement that was effective by its terms from May 1, 1981, through April 30, 1984. No successor contract has been reached.

On June 20, 1984, Respondent implemented its final contract offer unilaterally, after impasse was reached in its negotiations with the Union. Since June 20, 1984, Respondent has been operating as if its final contract offer had been accepted by the Union and has been treating its unilaterally imposed offer as a collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent has accepted and processed grievances under the implemented proposal in spite of the fact that the Union has not agreed to the contract.

The instant case arose out of the Union's request in October 1985 for information allegedly relevant to a grievance filed by Darryll Herndon, an employee at Respondent's Colton facility. About October 9, Herndon filed a grievance against Respondent alleging racial discrimination in that he "wasn't given a chance to prove that [he was] qualified for the position for powderman." On October 23, and on at least two subsequent occasions, the Union requested information regarding the hours and the rate of pay being paid to the person performing the powderman position instead of Herndon. Herndon had been offered the powderman position before Respondent decided to utilize a former employee to perform the work. The former employee was engaged through a temporary employment service. Respondent maintains the work being performed by the former employee is the same work that it offered to Herndon. Herndon turned down the work because Respondent refused to either pay him 30 cents an hour more than the contract rate or to give him more job security (in the form of a full-time position or a supervisory position).

Although I am not concerned with whether the grievance has merit in order to determine the issue of whether the rate of pay paid by Respondent to the temporary labor service is relevant and necessary, I must examine the underlying grievance.

Darryll Herndon has been employed by Respondent for approximately 12 years. In September or October 1985, Herndon was working for Respondent as a laborer, labor grade 1. In late September, Respondent learned that its current powderman at its Colton facility, Andy Garcia, did not have sufficient experience to qualify for a California state blaster's license. Respondent had only three state licensed individuals among its employees: Dominic Chiaro, quarry supervisor; Joaquin Granado, assistant safety supervisor; and Herndon. Chiaro determined that neither Granado nor himself had the time to be present with Garcia at the time blasting was done. Therefore, Chiaro offered Herndon the opportunity to work with Garcia on a part-time, temporary basis as a powderman, labor grade 15.

It is undisputed that Chiaro offered Herndon powderman work, on a temporary basis of approximately 3 days a week, 3 weeks a month. Chiaro explained to Herndon that Respondent needed Herndon's state license present at the blasting site to conform to state law and to give Garcia the opportunity to obtain a needed year of experience for Garcia to obtain his license. Herndon rejected Chiaro's offer and attempted to negotiate a better deal for himself. Herndon wanted a full-time position as powderman, a supervisory position, or a higher rate of pay. Herndon sought 30 cents an hour above the powderman rate on the basis that he was overseeing the powderman. Chiaro would not agree to Herndon's counterproposal.

Chiaro reported to Gary Thornberry, plant superintendent, that Herndon did not accept the powderman job on a temporary basis. Rather than force Herndon to perform the job, Thornberry and Chiaro decided to offer the work to Tony Perez, a retired employee who possessed the necessary state license.

On October 9, prior to the filing of Herndon's grievance, Respondent notified the Union that it intended to subcontract the powderman work because Herndon had turned it down. The Union proposed that Respondent give Herndon a full-time position as powderman or pay him 30 cents per hour more than the powderman rate, on a part-time basis. Respondent refused to do so. Respondent contended that it had recently agreed with the Union to raise the powderman rate because that employee had to oversee other employees and it would not again increase that rate. Further, Respondent had no need for a powderman in addition to Garcia, it only needed an employee with a license, on a part-time basis, when actual blasting was being done.

Shortly after the Respondent-Union meeting of October 9, Herndon filed his grievance alleging that he was not given a chance to prove that he was qualified for the position of powderman or foreman.

On October 23, Respondent and the Union met and discussed Herndon's grievance. The Union requested the hours and rates of pay that Tony Perez was receiving for performance of the powderman duties. Respondent refused to provide this information. On November 13, the Union requested Perez' hours worked and his rate of pay so it could "thoroughly investigate and properly address the grievance." Respondent offered to provide Perez' hours to demonstrate that the subcontracted work was the same temporary, as-needed work that Herndon had rejected. The Union refused to accept Respondent's offer. The company position was that Herndon was qualified for the position of powderman, but that it would not pay Herndon 30 cents per hour over the agreed-on wage rate.

The next meeting was held on January 8, 1986. At this meeting, the Union told Respondent that its refusal to provide the information regarding Perez was "hindering [its] grievance procedure to address the issues." Respondent offered to provide Perez' hours of work to demonstrate that the subcontracted work was the same work Herndon had refused, but Respondent refused to provide the information regarding Perez' wages. At this meeting, Respondent told the Union that Perez was working through Manpower, Inc., an outside labor contractor. The Company maintained that Perez was doing the work that Herndon had previously refused.

The final meeting regarding Herndon's grievance occurred on January 22, 1986. The Union reiterated its request for information on Perez' wages and stated that it would file unfair labor practice charges based on the Company's refusal to provide the information. Respondent again offered to provide information regarding Perez' hours, but not the wage information requested by the Union. Thereafter, on March 17, the Union filed the instant charge with Region 31 of the Board.

Mauricio "Max" Rubio, president of the Union, testified that he believed that the wage rate paid Perez for his subcontract work was essential to the Union's determination of whether Respondent had violated the contract. However, Rubio testified that Respondent violated the implemented proposal whether Perez was paid more or less than Herndon.[1] Rubio filed two grievances

[1] Rubio relies on the following contract language:

All production and maintenance work customarily performed by the Company in its own plants and quarries and/or mines and with its own employees shall continue to be performed by the Company with its own employees except when, in the exclusive judgment of the management, it is more efficient or economically advantageous to contract the work or when the Company does not have the necessary equipment or qualified employees available on straight time to against Respondent for its failure to provide the information regarding Herndon's grievance. The first grievance was filed on November 27, 1985, and alleged that Respondent had committed an unfair labor practice by failing to provide the Union with Perez' wages so that the Union could process Herndon's grievance. Respondent refused to accept this grievance. Thereafter, on July 29, 1986, Rubio filed a second grievance asserting that Respondent had forfeited Herndon's grievance because Respondent had failed to give the Union the requested information. Respondent again refused to accept the grievance on the ground that the information was not subject to the grievance procedure.

At no time prior to the hearing did Rubio or the Union give any reason for requesting Perez' wages other than to process Herndon's grievance. For the first time, during closing argument of this case, counsel for the General Counsel and for the Union contested that the information was relevant for bargaining over the subject of subcontracting. There is no contract between the Union and Respondent at the present time. Finally, there is no evidence that the Union and Respondent have engaged in bargaining since June 1984.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

It is well settled that an employer has a statutory obligation to provide a union, on request, with relevant information the union needs for the proper performance of its duties as a collective-bargaining representative. NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149, 152 (1956); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 435–436 (1967); Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979). In determining whether an employer is obligated to supply particular information, the question is only whether there is a "probability that the desired information [is] relevant, and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities." NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., supra at 437. The Supreme Court has characterized the standard to be applied in determining the union's right to information as "a broad discovery type standard," permitting the union access to a broad scope of information potentially useful for the purpose of effectuating the bargaining process. NLRB v. Acme Industrial, supra at 437 and fn. 6.

A union's right to relevant information is not limited to the period during which the employer and the union are engaged in negotiations for a collective-bargaining agreement. The union is equally entitled to relevant information during the contract's terms, in order to evaluate or process grievances and to take whatever other bona fide actions are necessary to administer the collective-bargaining agreement. Electrical Workers IBEW v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 18, 25 (D.C. Cir. 1980); J. I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 253 F.2d 149, 153 (7th Cir. 1958). The failure of either an employer or a union to give the other information necessary to enable the requesting party intelligently to evaluate its contract rights may constitute an unfair labor practice. NLRB v. Acme Industrial, supra at 435–436; NLRB v. Safeway Stores, 622 F.2d 425, 429 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied 450 U.S. 913 (1981). Where the union's request deals with information pertaining to employees in the unit, which goes to the core of the employer-employee relationship, the information is "presumptively relevant." Shell Development Co., 441 F.2d 880 (9th Cir. 1971). Where the information is presumptively relevant, the employer has the burden of proving the lack of relevance. Prudential Insurance Co., 412 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1969). "But where the request is for information with respect to matters occurring outside the unit, the standard is somewhat narrower . . . and relevance is required to be somewhat more precise. . . . The obligation is not unlimited. Thus, where the information is plainly irrelevant to any dispute there is no duty to provide it." Ohio Power Co., 216 NLRB 987, 991 (1975), enfd. mem. 531 F.2d 1381 (6th Cir. 1976); Doubarn Sheet Metal, 243 NLRB 821, 823 (1979). Where the requested information deals with matters outside the bargaining unit, the union must establish the relevancy and necessity of its request for information. San Diego Newspaper Guild Local 95 v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 863 (9th Cir. 1977).

A union should not be forced to process a grievance without the "opportunity to evaluate the merits of the claim." See NLRB v. Acme Industrial, supra at 438. On the other hand, "the bare assertion that information is needed to process a grievance does not obligate the party from whom it is requested to turn it over." See Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 318 (1979). NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 497, 795 F.2d 836 (9th Cir. 1986).

The Union asserts that the information is necessary for processing the Herndon grievance, but that assertion does not withstand scrutiny. Herndon was seeking to bargain directly with Respondent to obtain a deal better than that provided for in the imposed proposal. Respondent was under no obligation to pay Herndon a wage higher than that agreed to with the Union nor was it obligated to create a full-time position for Herndon. By necessity, the Union had to change the theory of Herndon's grievance to have a viable case.

Here, the Union contended that Respondent violated the subcontracting clause if the wages paid to Perez were higher than that offered to Herndon. However, Respondent never justified its subcontracting on the basis of cost, but rather on the fact that Herndon had refused the job. The wage rate paid to Herndon appears irrelevant to a grievance based on such a theory. Moreover, Rubio admitted that if the wages paid to Perez were lower than that paid to Herndon, he would still contend that the very same subcontracting provisions were violated because Herndon was available to do the work. Respondent's position, obviously, is that Herndon was not available to do the work because he had flatly refused to perform the very work in question. For purposes of analysis, I treat the case as if the Union needs the information to determine whether to process the grievance to arbitration.

The question then becomes whether a grievance regarding subcontracting is arbitrable. The contract states Respondent may call in a subcontractor when, in the perform the work in the time required. [The emphasis is in the original and signifies a change from the expired collective-bargaining agreement.]

Company's "exclusive judgment," it is more efficient or economically advantageous to do so. Respondent contends that it has the exclusive judgment to decide whether to use a subcontractor and therefore the issue of subcontracting is not grievable.

The implemented proposal is not a bargaining agreement. The Union has not accepted the agreement and apparently has given no consideration for the arbitration clause. Although Respondent has accepted grievances and apparently will arbitrate disputes under the implemented agreement, there appears to be no way the Union can compel Respondent to arbitrate the issue of subcontracting. The General Counsel argues that under AT&T Technologies,[2] the question is "whether the parties agreed to submit disputes over the meaning of the language in question to arbitration." The answer to that question is no. The Union never agreed to arbitrate anything because it never agreed to the contract and Respondent never agreed to arbitrate over subcontracting when it unilaterally placed subcontracting in its exclusive jurisdiction.

Similarly, in another context, the Board in Arizona Portland Cement Co., 281 NLRB 304 fn. 2 (1986), found that there was no contract in existence between this same Respondent and Union, "under which the parties are mutually bound by an agreed-upon grievance-arbitration procedure."

At the hearing, the General Counsel and Union argued for the first time that the information was relevant to bargain about subcontracting. At no time relevant to this case did the Union urge that the information was to be used for those purposes nor is there any evidence that the Union is pursuing bargaining over subcontracting or any other purpose. I, therefore, find no violation of the Act based on this belated argument. See Bohemia, Inc., 272 NLRB 1128 (1984), in which the Board dismissed a refusal-to-bargain charge based in part on the union's failure to indicate to the employer which contract provision was alleged to have been violated. Here, the Union repeatedly sought the information for processing a grievance that was not arbitrable—a reason the employer could reject—and never indicated a valid reason for requesting the information. The recent basis urged by counsel was not presented to the employer during the time period that was the subject of the instant litigation.[3]

For the foregoing reasons, I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as alleged, when it refused to furnish information regarding the wages paid to Perez or Manpower for the powderman work.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

It having been found and concluded that the Respondent, California Portland Cement Division, Calmat Co., Colton, California, has not engaged in unfair labor practices, the complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

---

[2] AT&T Technologies v. Communications Workers, 121 LRRM 3329 (1986).

[3] In its posttrial brief, the Union argued for the first time that the information was relevant to a determination of whether Respondent committed an unfair labor practice under the Act. No specific unfair labor practice was mentioned. For the reasons stated above, I reject this argument as well.

[4] All outstanding motions inconsistent with this recommended Order are denied. If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 14 December 1982 Administrative Law Judge Robert Giannasi issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the Charging Party, and the General Counsel all filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The Respondent filed a brief in reply to the exceptions of the Charging Party and the General Counsel, and the General Counsel filed a brief in reply to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified.

The issue in this case is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to comply with certain terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. More specifically, the Respondent is alleged to have violated the Act by (1) failing to make contractually mandated fringe benefit contributions on behalf of all of its employees; (2) failing to pay its employees the contractual wage rates; and (3) supplying nonunion employees with the union membership cards of other employees in order to deceive the Union into believing that the Respondent was complying with the contractual union-security provisions. For the reasons discussed below, we find that the Respondent has violated the Act as alleged.

I. FACTS

At the outset of the time material (1977–1982), the Union had a collective-bargaining agreement with the Chicago Roofing Contractors' Association (CRCA), a multiemployer association which, inter alia, negotiated collective-bargaining agreements on behalf of its members.

The Respondent is a roof cleaner in the construction industry. The Respondent has a stable work force and does not hire on a project-by-project basis. The Respondent was not, at the outset, a member of the CRCA. In August 1977 the Respondent and the Union entered into a "Supplemental Agreement" which incorporated by reference the terms of the Union's collective-bargaining agreement with CRCA, provided that the Respondent was now a party to that agreement, and extended the period of the agreement through 31 May 1978. The Union-CRCA collective-bargaining agreement to which the Respondent had become a party contained a union-security clause that required all employees to be union members or to become members within 7 days of being hired or of the effective date of the agreement. The contract also established wage rates, and required employers to make contributions (or, in one respect, deductions from wages) to specified benefit funds,[3] in a contractually established amount per hour for each hour worked by each employee during each month. Thus, the Respondent was required to list all unit employees on the monthly reporting forms used to make contributions to the fringe benefit funds. The Union-CRCA collective-bargaining agreement also provided that it would continue in force and effect from year to year following 31 May 1978, unless either party desired a change and served notice in writing of that desired change on the other party at least 90 days prior to any anniversary date of the agreement (i.e., at least 90 days prior to 31 May of years subsequent to 1978).

In 1978 and 1980 the Respondent entered into subsequent supplemental agreements with the Union, in each case incorporating by reference the terms of the current master agreement between the Union and CRCA, and particularly renewing the Respondent's contractual obligations in the areas of union security, wages, and contributions to fringe benefit funds. In February 1980 the Respondent joined the CRCA, and remained a member throughout the remainder of the time period in question here.

On 1 June 1981 the Union and the CRCA (of which the Respondent was by then a member) entered into a supplemental agreement to their collective-bargaining agreement. This supplemental agreement increased wage rates and employer contributions to fringe benefit funds. It also provided that all provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement would be in force and effect from 1 June 1981 through 31 May 1982, and would continue in force and effect from year to year thereafter, unless either party served notice in writing to the other party of any desired changes at least 90 days prior to any anniversary date.[4]

[1] The caption is amended to include Unico, Ltd. as a party Respondent, based on the Respondent's admission at the hearing that American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. and Unico, Ltd. are a single or joint employer. Both parties are jointly referred to as the Respondent.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The fringe benefit funds are the Roofers' Unions Welfare Trust Fund, Roofers' Pension Fund, Roofers' Reserve Fund, the Chicago Roofers' Apprenticeship and Training Fund, and the Roofers' Industry Advancement and Research Fund.

The Respondent regularly filed monthly fringe benefit fund contribution reports, ostensibly reporting all the hours worked by all the Respondent's unit employees. During this time, the Respondent also kept in force a contractually required $5000 (later $10,000) wage and fringe benefit surety bond, under the terms of which the Respondent acknowledged that it was operating under a collective-bargaining agreement and that it had agreed to pay the contractual wage and fringe benefit fund contributions for all unit employees. As early as July 1978, the Union had received information that the Respondent was not paying contractual wage rates at all times and that some of the Respondent's employees had not become union members. On 4 August 1981 the Union filed the unfair labor practice charge in the instant case.

The Respondent concedes that it did not pay contractually required wages; that it did not report all its employees, and all their work hours each month, on the fringe benefit fund contribution reports; that it did not comply with the contractual union-security clause requiring unit employees to be or become union members; and that instead it paid for the union membership of some of its employees and then distributed their union membership cards among other unit employees who were not union members.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

In defending itself against the allegations of unlawful activity arising from its failure to comply with contractual wage, fringe benefit, and union-security provisions, the Respondent contended that it was not obligated to bargain with the Union about these matters because, inter alia, (1) the Union did not represent a majority of the Respondent's employees, and (2) each of its contracts with the Union were prehire agreements under Section 8(f) of the Act, and the Respondent was therefore privileged to repudiate those contracts at any time prior to the achievement of majority status by the Union (that the Respondent contends the Union did not achieve in this case).

The judge rejected these defenses.[5] He found (1) that the successive collective-bargaining agreements between the Respondent and the Union, starting in August 1977 and continuing throughout the time material herein, raised a dual presumption of initial and continuing union majority status, which presumption the Respondent had not rebutted, and (2) that, assuming the successive collective-bargaining agreements between the Respondent and the Union were prehire agreements authorized under Section 8(f) of the Act, the record nevertheless establishes that the Union achieved majority status in the appropriate unit in September 1977, thus converting the parties' collective-bargaining relationship from one permitted by Section 8(f) to one cognizable under Section 9(a) of the Act, and one therefore governed by the provisions of Section 8(a)(5). Accordingly, the judge found that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act as alleged in all respects.

We agree with the results reached by the judge, for the reasons discussed below.

Recently—and subsequent to the judge's issuance of his decision—the Board issued its decision in John Deklewa & Sons,[6] in which we decided that we would no longer apply the conversion doctrine, relied on by the judge in the instant case, to collective-bargaining agreements/relationships permitted under Section 8(f) of the Act.[7] In doing away with the conversion doctrine, as applied to collective-bargaining agreements permitted under Section 8(f), we held in Deklewa that in light of the legislative history of Section 8(f), and the prevailing practice in the construction industry, the party to an 8(f) relationship that asserts the existence of a collective-bargaining relationship under Section 9(a) of the Act would have the burden of affirmatively proving the existence of such a relationship, through either (1) a Board-conducted representa-

[4] The complaint alleges that this collective-bargaining agreement is effective by its terms for the period 1 June 1981 through 31 May 1982.

[5] The Respondent also contended that it was not bound by the terms of its successive contracts with the Union, on the grounds that (1) the original contract, in August 1977, was obtained through coercion, and that (2) an oral understanding between the Respondent's secretary Brian Flanagan and the Union's business representative Joseph Miller, at the time of signing of the Respondent's initial (August 1977) agreement with the Union, relieved the Respondent of its obligations under the literal terms of the contract in the areas in which the Respondent is alleged to have breached the contract in this case.

The judge also rejected these contentions, on the grounds that (1) the Respondent's allegation of coercive inducement is timebarred by Sec. 10(b); that (2), in any event, the credible evidence fails to support this contention; and (3) Flanagan's testimony about the existence and extent of an oral modification of the contract was not credible. (The judge credited Miller's denial of any such oral agreement.) We agree with and affirm the judge's disposition of these matters.

[7] Under the conversion doctrine, a collective-bargaining relationship/agreement permitted under Sec. 8(f) could convert into one cognizable under Sec. 9(a) simply on the basis of a showing that during a relevant period the union enjoyed the support of a majority of the employer's employees in an appropriate unit.

tion election or (2) a union's express demand for, and an employer's voluntary grant of, recognition to the union as bargaining representative, based on a showing of support for the union among a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit.[8] As a corollary to our abandonment of the conversion doctrine, as applied to collective-bargaining agreements/relationships permitted by Section 8(f), however, we held in Deklewa that a union signatory to an agreement permitted by Section 8(f) acquires limited status as a representative under Section 9(a), to the extent that the 8(f) agreement may not be unilaterally repudiated during its term, and may be enforced during its term under the provisions of Sections 8(a)(5) and 8(b)(3).[9]

No party has excepted to the judge's finding that the Respondent is an employer in the construction industry. The record establishes that the parties entered into their initial agreement in August 1977 without regard to whether the Union had the support of a majority of the Respondent's employees. Further, in the instant case, there is no contention, nor is there any evidence, that a Board election was held or that there was a demand for and voluntary grant of recognition to the Union at any time premised on a showing of support for the Union among a majority of the Respondent's employees. Also, the initial agreement and the successive agreements between the parties required, as a condition of employment, that employees had to become members of the Union within 7 days of being hired. In light of these facts, we find that under the circumstances at all times material the Respondent and the Union were parties to successive collective-bargaining agreements permitted under Section 8(f) of the Act. We further find that the Respondent substantially repudiated its 1981–1982 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union during the term of that agreement by failing to pay contractual wage rates; failing to make contractually required fringe benefit contributions on behalf of all employees; and supplying nonunion employees with the union membership cards of other employees in order to deceive the Union and circumvent the contractual union-security provisions. Accordingly, we conclude that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged.[10]

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order that it cease and desist, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to comply with the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union from 4 February 1981[11] through the expiration of the agreement on 31 May 1982. Also, we shall order the Respondent to make the employees and the Union whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to comply with the collective-bargaining agreement from 4 February 1981 through its expiration on 31 May 1982. The Union and the employees shall be made whole for their losses in the manner prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest, as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See also Pacific Intercom Co., 255 NLRB 184 fn. 6 (1981). Additionally, we shall order the Respondent to make the appropriate fringe benefit funds whole for losses suffered as a result of the Respondent's delinquencies in failing to make contractually required contributions to these funds. We note, however, that one of the fringe benefit funds in question is the Roofers' Industry Advancement and Research Fund. Inasmuch as industry advancement funds are permissive, nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, it is not an unfair labor practice for an employer unilaterally to discontinue its contributions to such funds. See F.M.L. Supply, 258 NLRB 604 fn. 3 (1981); Finger Lakes Plumbing Co., 254 NLRB 1399 (1981). Accordingly, the Respondent is not required as a part of the remedy in this case to make delinquent payments to the Roofers' Industry Advancement and Research Fund.

We also note that the applicable collective-bargaining agreements in this case provide that all delinquent contributions to the fringe benefit funds are subject to a mandatory liquidated damage assessment of an additional amount equal to 10 percent of the delinquent amount required to be submitted. Accordingly, we shall order the Respondent to pay into each of the contractually specified fringe benefit funds, except the Roofers' Industry Advancement and Research Fund, as liquidated damages, an additional sum amounting to 10 percent of the delinquent contributions due those funds. See F.M.L. Supply, supra; Finger Lakes Plumbing Co., 253 NLRB 406 (1980).

[10] John Deklewa & Sons, supra. Chairman Dotson agrees with his colleagues that the Respondent substantially repudiated the collective-bargaining agreement and violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its overall course of conduct. Accordingly, Chairman Dotson finds it unnecessary to pass on the question of whether a failure to make contractually required fringe benefit contributions, standing alone, would be an unfair labor practice. See Chairman Dotson's dissenting opinion in Rapid Fur Dressing, 278 NLRB 905 (1986). The Chairman also notes the judge's discussion in fn. 16 of the latter's attached decision in the instant case.

[11] We affirm the judge's resolution of the 10(b) issue raised by the General Counsel, as discussed in sec. III,B,3 of the attached decision. Chairman Dotson accepts the judge's resolution of this matter, in the absence of exceptions to the judge's failure to find that the complaint is barred in its entirety under the provisions of Sec. 10(b).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. and Unico, Ltd., Mokena, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Repudiating its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union during the term of that agreement by failing to pay contractual wage rates; failing to make contractually required contributions to fringe benefit funds on behalf of all employees; and supplying nonunion employees with the union membership cards of other employees in order to circumvent contractual union-security provisions.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole the above-described employees, the Union, and fringe benefit funds, in the manner set forth in the remedy, for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the contract from 4 February 1981 through 31 May 1982.

(b) Pay into the specified fringe benefit funds (except the Roofers' Industry Advancement and Research Fund) an additional sum amounting to 10 percent of the delinquent contributions due those funds.

(c) Comply with the terms and conditions of the above-described collective-bargaining agreement from 4 February 1981 through 31 May 1982.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Mokena, Illinois office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by the Union, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT repudiate our collective-bargaining agreement with United Slate, Tile and Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers' Association, Local Union No. 11 of Chicago, Illinois, International Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO, during the term of that agreement.

WE WILL NOT fail to pay wage rates established in a collective-bargaining agreement between us and the Union.

WE WILL NOT fail to make contractually required contributions to fringe benefit funds on behalf of all our employees covered by a collective-bargaining agreement between us and the Union.

WE WILL NOT provide nonunion employees with the union membership cards of other employees in order to circumvent the union-security provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement between us and the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole our employees, the Union, and the fringe benefit funds for any losses they may have suffered as a result of our failure to comply with our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, from 4 February 1981 until the expiration of the agreement on 31 May 1982.

WE WILL pay into the specified fringe benefit funds (except the Roofers' Industry Advancement

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GIANNASI, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Chicago, Illinois, for 5 days in April and May 1982. The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by making unilateral changes in the middle of its existing agreement with the Charging Party Union, more specifically, by failing to make fringe benefit contributions for all its employees as required by the agreement, by failing to pay its employees the contractual wage rates, and by supplying nonunion employees with union cards of other employees "to hide its employment of non-Union employees from the Union." Respondent denied the essential allegations of the complaint. All parties filed briefs that I have read and considered.

On the entire record, including the testimony of the witnesses and my observation of their demeanor, I make the following[1]

[1] After the close of the hearing, I was presented with three technical matters that I dispose of as follows:

(1) Respondent's counsel sent me directly copies of exhibits that were properly removed from the formal exhibit file and reproduced. I have no way of knowing, however, whether these are accurate reproductions of the exhibits produced at trial. The proper course would have been to return the copied documents to the official reporter. Neither the General Counsel nor the Charging Party has objected to the reproductions. Therefore, I shall include them as part of the official record in this case.

(2) The General Counsel has filed a motion to correct transcript in certain respects. The motion is not complete because this transcript is replete with errors to a degree unmatched in my experience. I believe, however, that the substance of what transpired was not significantly distorted. The General Counsel's motion was unopposed and no other party focused on correction of the transcript. I therefore grant the motion and reproduce the corrections as Appendix B to this decision. [Omitted from publication.]

(3) The Respondent attached to its brief two letters that were purportedly sent to the Union and the Chicago Roofing Contractor's Association after the commencement of this hearing. Presumably, Respondent wants these letters to be placed in evidence. The General Counsel and the Charging Party have not responded to this attempt to augment the record. My view is that the record is already sufficiently developed on this matter and the letters add nothing of value to an issue that was not the subject of a complaint allegation and may be litigated, if necessary, in compliance proceedings. I will therefore leave the letters where they are.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Respondent, American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., an Illinois corporation, is engaged in the operation of the industrial vacuuming and cleaning of roofs. Its main office is located at 8110 West 185th Street, Mokena, Illinois. In the past year, Respondent provided services valued in excess of $50,000 for other enterprises within the State of Illinois, which enterprises were themselves engaged in interstate commerce and which enterprises meet the Board's jurisdictional standards other than the indirect inflow or indirect outflow standards. The Respondent admitted the above in its answer. Accordingly, I find that Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

It is also admitted that Respondent Unico, Ltd., which was added as a party Respondent in an amendment to the complaint on motion granted during the last day of the trial, constitutes, with American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., a single and/or joint employer. Both companies will be referred to jointly as Respondent.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Charging Party (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE ALLEGATIONS

A. The Facts

Respondent's employees normally work in teams of two employees assigned to one vacuuming machine. Respondent's secretary, Brian Flanagan, testified that, at times, Respondent had a third employee on jobs when there was an "extreme amount of shoveling" to be performed. Supervisor Gary Carlson, who was hired in 1978, testified that Respondent utilized three men per machine at that time, but he was apparently referring to situations when "we needed safety men on the ground."

In August 1977, Respondent operated two vacuuming machines, according to Brian Flanagan. There is some dispute concerning the number of individuals employed by Respondent at this time. In any event, the work force remained relatively constant until October or November 1977 when, according to Flanagan, it expanded somewhat. However, Respondent continued to utilize two vacuuming machines until the spring of 1978 when it added one machine.

Respondent's work force suffers some turnover of employees, but the number of positions is relatively constant. Most employees are hired for an indefinite period and not on a project-by-project basis. They continue working throughout the season, which begins in the spring and peaks in the fall, and they "often" continue working "through subsequent years," according to Flanagan.

On August 23, 1977, Respondent and the Union entered into a supplemental agreement that incorporated by reference the terms of the Union's standard working agreement that became effective June 1, 1974. The standard agreement provides for recognition of the Union in a unit description essentially composed of "all employees" engaged in the application and installation of roofing material "and all other work in connection with or incidental thereto." The standard agreement also includes a union-security clause that provides that employees are to become members of the Union within 7 days following the commencement of their employment or the effective date of the agreement. The standard agreement also provides for the payment of certain wage rates and for payments on behalf of all employees covered by the agreement to union trust funds for various fringe benefits, such as pensions, welfare, and training funds.

The supplemental agreement signed by Respondent provided that it became party to the standard agreement but made certain modifications in the matter of wages, fringe benefit contributions, and dues withholding payments. The supplemental agreement provided that it was to remain in full force and effect until May 31, 1978, and from year to year thereafter unless timely notice of change was given at least 90 days before the expiration date. It also provided that all other terms of the standard agreement were to remain in force until May 31, 1978.

After execution of the agreement, Respondent was supplied with fringe benefit reporting forms and filed reports and made payments for employees each month from September 1977 through at least March 1982. On occasion Respondent paid additional sums as penalties for late payment in accordance with provisions in the standard agreement and on the forms themselves. Instructions on the monthly reports state that all hours for foremen, journeymen, and apprentices "must be reported regardless of the kind of duties performed."

The standard agreement in effect when the August 23, 1977 agreement of the parties was signed had been negotiated between the Union and the Chicago Roofing Contractors' Association (CRCA), one of whose purposes, according to its bylaws, is to negotiate bargaining agreements with labor organizations. CRCA and the Union signed a new standard agreement in 1978 to extend through May 31, 1980.

On August 2, 1978, Respondent and the Union entered into another supplemental agreement, effective retroactively to June 1, 1978, incorporating modifications negotiated in the new standard agreement and readopting the original standard agreement. This supplemental agreement was to remain in full force and effect until May 31, 1980.

In 1980, the Union negotiated a supplemental agreement with CRCA modifying the earlier standard agreement. Respondent executed a similar supplemental agreement dated June 9, 1980. This supplemental agreement, which was signed by Respondent's president, John Flanagan, was to expire on May 31, 1981, and continue in full force and effect from year to year thereafter unless timely written notice of change was given at least 90 days prior to the anniversary date.

In February 1980, Respondent applied for membership in CRCA and was admitted. Respondent made an initial dues payment on February 1, 1980, and continued to pay dues and remained a member in good standing of CRCA until April 1982.[2]

The Union thereafter negotiated another supplemental agreement with CRCA that was effective June 1, 1981, and extended through May 31, 1982, and from year to year thereafter unless timely notice of change is given at least 90 days prior to the anniversary date. At this point, Respondent was included as an employer member of CRCA. The Association listed Respondent as a member in a list sent to the Union prior to the commencement of negotiations. CRCA routinely sends letters to its members notifying them that it intends to negotiate with certain unions for them unless a member gives timely notice of its desire to withdraw. CRCA sent such a letter to all its members, including Respondent, on December 17, 1980. There is no evidence that Respondent elected to withdraw from multiemployer bargaining. Nor is there any evidence that Respondent sought to alter the 1980 supplemental agreement it signed with the Union that renewed itself by its terms each year.

In addition to filing monthly fringe benefit reports, Respondent signed and kept in force throughout the period from September 1977 to April 1982, except for brief lapses, a wage and fringe benefit bond. The first bond, which replaced a $5000 check deposited with the Union at the time of the execution of the August 23, 1977 agreement, was dated September 12, 1977. The bond acknowledged that Respondent was operating under a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and had agreed to pay the wages and fringe benefit contributions for all union members "or other employees" working pursuant to the Union's bargaining agreement. If Respondent failed to do so, the American Druggist Insurance Company agreed to be liable for the amounts.

It is conceded that Respondent did not fully report to the union trust funds all the hours of all the employees who worked for it. It is also conceded that Respondent did not pay the contractual wage rate to its employees. It is also conceded that Respondent did not require all its employees to become union members, but instead paid for the cards of some union members and distributed them to different employees who were not union members.

It is further conceded that, at all material times, Respondent paid its employees with paychecks either from the American Thoro-Clean account or the Unico account, depending on which company had available funds at the time.

As early as July 12, 1978, the Union, through one of its representatives, John Martini, learned that Respondent was not paying the contractual wage rate and that some of its employees were not union members. Apparently, as a result of this or other reports of noncompliance, the Union filed a grievance against Respondent and, on September 8, 1978, the Joint Adjustment Board, convened under the standard working agreement, considered the grievance that alleged that Respondent had not paid wages or fringe benefits in accordance with the contract and had not deducted union dues for its employees and forwarded them to the Union as required by the contract. The Union apparently caused an investigation and an audit to be made to ascertain Respondent's compliance with the contract that by this time had been renewed in August 1978.

[2] In April 1982 after the hearing in this case opened, Respondent withdrew from CRCA and also withdrew recognition from the Union. The issues that may be presented by these actions are not the subject of this case because the complaint was not amended to address such issues. To the extent such conduct could be thought to limit Respondent's liability in this case, the matter may be considered in compliance proceedings.

On September 6, 1978, Respondent, in a letter written by Brian Flanagan to a trust fund auditor or official, addressed the dispute. Flanagan listed several categories of employees and stated his position about whether they were covered under the agreement of the parties. The first was a list of employees taken from Respondent's September 30, 1977 quarterly tax report that he alleged were "employed by our firm prior to the executions of our binding agreement with the union" and thus were exempt from dues and payments. The second category of employees included those who allegedly worked on maintenance of the machinery and thus exempt from coverage. The third group allegedly worked outside the jurisdiction and the fourth included employees listed as union members and which, according to Flanagan, were covered under the agreement.

The dispute over compliance continued in 1979 because, on February 20, 1979, Flanagan sent another letter to trust fund officials.[3] He repeated the arguments set forth in his September 6, 1978 letter, although the named employees were different in some respects from those listed in the earlier letter. He also added a new category of employees that he asserted were exempt from coverage because they worked less than 7 days, an apparent reference to the union-security provisions of the applicable agreement. The letter apparently dealt with the same timeframe as the earlier letter, namely, the period immediately following the execution of the August 23, 1977 agreement.[4]

[3] Union officials also serve as union trustees to the trust funds and therefore communications with the trust funds undoubtedly came to the attention of the Union.

[4] Respondent objected to the admissibility into evidence of the Flanagan letters on the grounds that they were addressed to trust fund officials who were not parties to these proceedings and because they were sent in the course of settlement discussions. I reaffirm the admissibility of these letters. First of all, the letters were introduced after Respondent had introduced into evidence a September 1979 letter from a union official to its attorney advising him to file a breach of contract suit against Respondent. Secondly, the Flanagan letters revealed an inconsistency with his testimony that suggested a very limited bargaining relationship with the Union. Third, although it appears that a lawsuit was filed as a result of the contractual dispute between the Union and Respondent, Flanagan was unable to specify when it was filed. The record contains no elaboration on this point. Fourth, the letters themselves do not amount to an offer of compromise. They state Respondent's position concerning the employment of certain categories of employees at different times and in different circumstances. They thus set forth specific facts. Accordingly, I do not believe that the letters are inadmissible as evidence of compromise or offers of compromise.

Rule 408 of the Federal Rules of Evidence supports my ruling. The rule excepts from its scope "evidence otherwise discoverable" and evidence relating to the credibility of a witness. Moreover, the advisory note accompanying the rule makes clear that "evidence of unqualified factual assertions is admissible." I perceive no policy considerations—and none have been cited to me in brief—that require the exclusion of these highly relevant letters, particularly in view of Flanagan's testimony in this case.

About September 25, 1979, Union Representative Martini checked another of Respondent's jobs and found two nonunion employees working on the job. They said they had been working for Respondent for about 2 weeks and that they were earning less than the contractual wage rate then in effect. Martini told them "this is the second or third time that I have caught you here with non-union people on the job" and he asked the employees to have a management official call the Union.

On September 26, Martini wrote a letter to the Union's attorney notifying him of the above job check. He named the two individuals working for Respondent by name, including David Majestic, and stated that they did not have union identification and that they had been working at less than the contract rate. He ended the letter by stating, "The Union received no calls concerning these two men. We wish to file a breach of contract against this firm. The firm has done this on many occasions."

In March 1980 one of the employees who was checked by Martini, David Majestic, was working at another jobsite when a union representative approached him and Supervisor Gary Carlson while they were repairing a vacuuming machine. He asked if Majestic had a union card and Carlson replied that Majestic was a company mechanic on a service call. Majestic actually performed vacuuming work and, after completing the repairs on the vacuuming machine, Majestic went back to his normal work duties. After Majestic returned to the office that night, Majestic was issued a union card with the name David Sobut on it and he was told by Carlson to carry it at all times and to show it to union officials who checked the jobsites. Sobut was a salesman for Respondent and was not performing roofing work at this time.

The next day, Majestic was checked by union officials. He showed them Sobut's card. At this time, two of Respondent's employees were removed from the job because they did not have union cards. After the union representatives left, the two employees returned to work. Later the union representatives returned and the employees were again removed from the jobsite.

Majestic continued to be issued a union card under another person's name, either by Carlson or Brian Flanagan. He showed the cards to union officials who checked for them at various jobsites. Other employees were also issued cards by Carlson. Gary Carlson acknowledged that he gave Majestic and other employees the union cards of other individuals, including his own.

The minutes of a November 25, 1980 meeting of the Joint Adjustment Board reveal that the Union once again filed a grievance against Respondent for violation of the union-security and bonding provisions of the contract.

On July 16, 1981, shortly after he quit Respondent's employ, Majestic wrote a letter to the Union notifying it of Respondent's issuance to him of union cards of other employees. He also confirmed that he did not earn the contractual wage rate and stated that hours and wage rates were not written on his check stubs after October 1979. Thereafter, the Union continued to check Respondent's jobs and determined that nonunion employees were carrying the fully paid union cards of other employees.

On August 4, 1981, the Union filed the unfair labor practice charge that spawned this case.

The complaint issued on September 15, 1981, and, on September 30, 1981, Respondent filed its original answer. The answer admitted certain allegations, including allegations that it was a member of CRCA and that CRCA was authorized to bargain on its behalf. The answer also admitted that since "at least on or about June 1, 1978 and at all times material herein, the Union has been the designated exclusive collective bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees" although it questioned whether its employees were included in the complaint's unit description.

On April 1, 1982, the first day of hearing in this case, Respondent appeared through a new counsel who moved to postpone the hearing in this case. I granted the motion. Respondent was also permitted, over the objections of the General Counsel, to file a new and amended answer that altered the earlier answer and denied the allegations set forth above that had been admitted. Respondent also denied other allegations that had previously been admitted and was permitted to interpose affirmative defenses not pleaded in the original answer.

At the hearing, Respondent's counsel also announced that Respondent was withdrawing from CRCA and notified the Union that it was terminating "the present agreement to the extent we may have one." Respondent apparently served CRCA with written notification that it was withdrawing from the Association. Minutes of a CRCA meeting dated April 15, 1982, show that CRCA viewed such notification, which was served on April 1, as tardy and determined that Respondent "fall[s] under the Agreement as signed."

B. Discussion and Analysis

1. The Union's status as bargaining representative

As shown in the factual statement, Respondent, at all times material, was party to collective-bargaining agreements with the Union. Respondent nevertheless argues that the Union did not have representative status and that, consequently, Respondent had no obligation to bargain. I reject these contentions.

It is well settled that "the existence of a prior contract, lawful on its face, raises a dual presumption of majority—a presumption that the union was the majority representative at the time the contract was executed, and a presumption that its majority continued at least through the life of the contract." Barrington Plaza & Tragniew, 185 NLRB 962, 963 (1970), enf. granted in part and denied in part 470 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1972). Moreover, a labor organization's continuing majority "may not be questioned during the term of a contract." Ibid. See also Hexton Furniture Co., 111 NLRB 342 (1955).

In 1977, 1978, and 1980, Respondent signed agreements with the Union that contained valid union-security clauses. In June 1981 and thereafter, Respondent was bound by the agreement negotiated on its behalf by CRCA.[5]

Even if the CRCA agreements were not considered binding, Respondent was bound by the June 1980 agreement that had been renewed automatically for another year in June 1981 and would still have been operative at the time of the hearing. Respondent never sought to withdraw from the 1980 agreement. Nor at any time during the period from August 1977 until the commencement of the hearing in this case did Respondent seek to alter or terminate its existing collective-bargaining agreements with the Union or take the position that it was not bound by a collective-bargaining agreement. Indeed, quite the contrary is true. It continued to file fringe benefit reports and make fringe benefit payments and to carry a bond to guarantee such payments. It signed successive agreements and assumed, in its communications with the Union, that it had binding agreements with the Union.

Thus, under ordinary circumstances, Respondent would be precluded from asserting that it could, during the term of its agreements, question the Union's representative status.

Respondent seeks to avoid the effect of the 1978, 1980, and 1981 agreements by contending that the original August 23, 1977 contract was obtained through coercion and that it did not accurately reflect the agreement of the parties. These contentions are completely without merit.

First of all, the allegation that the original contract was secured by coercion is barred by the statute of limitations set forth in Section 10(b) of the Act. No unfair labor practice charge was filed at the time and Respondent is thus precluded from raising the issue at this late date. See Pacific Intercom Co., 255 NLRB 184, 191 (1981), enf. granted 679 F.2d 900 (9th Cir. 1982). Nor does the record support such a finding in any event. Brian Flanagan testified that Union Representative Miller told him in August 1977 that Respondent was working on a union job and that if it did not sign an agreement, the Union would "picket us and other things." Miller denied making any such threat. I credit Miller who im-

[5] The overwhelming documentary and testimonial evidence supports this finding. As shown in the factual statement, Respondent became a member of CRCA whose bylaws made clear that it was bargaining on behalf of its members. CRCA sent letters to its members prior to the commencement of negotiations and gave them an opportunity to withdraw if they so desired. Respondent continued to pay CRCA dues and did not seek to withdraw from CRCA until the first day of the hearing in this case.

Flanagan's testimony to the effect that Respondent did not receive communications from CRCA and that he did not know that CRCA represented Respondent in negotiations is not only implausible but the product of an unreliable witness, as documented elsewhere in this decision. In addition, Flanagan's testimony is contradicted by the statement of his own attorney. Although I permitted Respondent to amend its answer after it engaged new counsel, the original answer filed by its counsel admits the allegation that it was a member of CRCA and that CRCA was authorized to bargain on its behalf. Thus, although it "cease[d] to be [a] conclusive judicial admission," the Respondent's original answer "still remains as a statement once seriously made by an authorized agent, and as such it is competent evidence of the facts stated, though controvertible, like any other extra-judicial admission made by a party or his agent." Contractor Utility Sales Co. v. Certain-Teed Products Corp., 638 F.2d 1061, 1084 (7th Cir. 1981), quoting from established authorities.

pressed me as a candid, reliable, and disinterested witness who had been retired from the Union's employ for some 4-1/2 years at the time he testified. Flanagan, on the other hand, seemed to me to be tailoring his testimony to conform to a litigation theory. His testimony contradicted in some respects prior statements and letters and he seemed less forthcoming when questioned by the General Counsel than when questioned by his own counsel. His vague reference to "other things" hardly demonstrates reliability. Moreover, it falls far short of a threat. Flanagan's reference to picketing is likewise ambiguous because a union is certainly entitled to picket a jobsite either to protest the presence of nonunion contractors or to seek recognition so long as an election petition is filed within 30 days. In short, Respondent's coercion argument is unavailing.

Respondent's other argument, also based on Flanagan's testimony, is that Miller agreed with Flanagan that Respondent need only employ "some" union members and it need only employ union members on so-called union jobs. Miller also denied this aspect of Flanagan's testimony. I find that Flanagan's testimony in this respect is likewise not credible. First of all, the common sense parole evidence rule makes such evidence unreliable in refuting a clearly worded written agreement. See Precision Anodizing & Plating, 244 NLRB 846, 857 (1979). In the instant case, Flanagan's alleged understanding of the bargain—with the vague reference to "some" union members—is contradicted by the written agreement he signed on August 23, 1977, as well as by all the other documents he signed shortly thereafter and indeed throughout the next 4-1/2 years, including successive agreements, bonds, letters, and fringe benefit reports. Moreover, as I have indicated, I found Miller to be a more reliable witness than Flanagan. Flanagan's testimony is not only implausible but rampant with inconsistencies. For example, Flanagan testified that he and Miller never discussed rates of pay or benefits for employees. Yet he handed over a $5000 check and later secured a bond to ensure the payment of wages and benefits under the agreement. Flanagan also testified that after August of 1977 he unilaterally decided which employees would be required to become union members under the alleged agreement that "some" were to become union members. Why, if, as Flanagan testified, Miller coerced him into signing a contract, would he orally give Flanagan a break and agree to alter a written agreement and indeed to give Flanagan carte blanche to decide who would become union members? Why would Miller insist on a bond and why would Flanagan obtain a bond which clearly recognized that Respondent was covered by a collective-bargaining agreement for "all employees?" Why, if Miller had agreed that only "some" employees should be union members, did Respondent conceal its use of nonmembers by having the cards of union members used by other individuals who were not union members? Why would Flanagan write a letter to the union trust funds in 1978 acknowledging that he executed a "binding agreement" in August 1977? And why would an intelligent businessman sign a contract and a surety bond which directly contradict his so-called understanding of his relationship with the Union and, indeed, sign another contract a year later? Flanagan's testimony in this respect is beyond belief.

Respondent also contends that the initial agreement of the parties and each of the successive agreements were prehire agreements under Section 8(f) of the Act. It thus seeks to avail itself of the doctrine that an employer may cancel an 8(f) agreement at will during its term unless the union has achieved majority status. See Iron Workers Local 103 (Higdon Contracting), 216 NLRB 45 (1975), enf. denied 535 F.2d 87 (D.C. Cir. 1976), reversed 434 U.S. 335 (1978); and see R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693, 695 (1971), reversed and remanded sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973).

There is precedential support for the proposition that the above doctrine applies only to initial 8(f) agreements and does not apply where successive agreements have governed the relationship of the parties. See Bricklayers Local 3 (Eastern Washington AGC), 162 NLRB 476, 478–479 (1966), enf. granted 405 F.2d 469 (9th Cir. 1968); Williams Enterprises, 212 NLRB 880, 885 (1974), enf. granted 519 F.2d 1401 (4th Cir. 1975).[6] The Board has never explicitly overruled Bricklayers, but it has repeatedly sidestepped the case and, in effect, overruled it sub silentio by requiring an inquiry into majority status even where successive agreements have defined a long-term bargaining relationship. See Precision Striping, 245 NLRB 169 (1979); Construction Erectors, 252 NLRB 319, 324 (1980); Haberman Construction Co., 236 NLRB 79 fn. 1 (1978); and Carmichael Construction Co., 258 NLRB 226 fn. 1 (1981). See also The General Counsel's 1979 Guidelines for Handling Section 8(f) Cases reported in the 1979 BNA Labor Relations Yearbook at pp. 355–358 when the then General Counsel took the position that Bricklayers is no longer Board law. An orderly development of the law and proper guidance to litigants and the public demands that the Board independently analyze the General Counsel's position and either explicitly overrule Bricklayers or explain its continued validity.[7]

[6] As the Board stated in the Bricklayers case:

> It is apparent from the foregoing that the bargaining between AGC and the Union presents the situation of a continuing bargaining relationship; a situation quite different from that which Congress had in mind when enacting Section 8(f)(1), to wit, an initial attempt by a union and an employer in the construction industry to commence such a relationship. Thus, the entire legislative history of Section 8(f)(1) is couched in terms of "prehire agreements," a reference which can have no meaning in the situation where, as here, the parties are continuing an existing bargaining relationship under which employees have previously been hired. Particularly is this so where, as in this case, the previous agreement contained a lawful union-security provision. Additionally, one of the most frequently cited portions of the legislative history of Section 8(f) reveals that the Congress envisioned its prehire provisions as applying only to the situation where the parties were attempting to establish a bargaining relationship for the first time.
> In the instant case, of course, Respondent Union had for many years been the recognized bargaining agent of the employees of the employers comprising AGC. We hold, therefore, that the tests to be applied in determining the fulfillment of the bargaining obligations of the parties herein are those generally used under Section 8(a)(5) and 8(b)(3) and, therefore, it is unnecessary to pass upon the scope of bargaining obligations under Section 8(f).

[7] In neither R. J. Smith nor in Higdon did the Board discuss the Bricklayers case, although in R. J. Smith the trial judge did so. Nor did the

An inquiry into majority status is extremely difficult when, as here, it deals with events that have occurred some years before the alleged refusal to bargain. Nevertheless, I read the authorities to require such an inquiry in this case despite the unbroken string of agreements between the parties.

Assuming that the initial agreement of the parties on August 23, 1977, was an 8(f) agreement,[8] the available evidence shows that the Union attained majority status shortly after the agreement was signed.[9]

Pursuant to the August 1977 agreement, Respondent filed a fringe benefit report for its employees in September 1977. All the employees listed were union members, according to Brian Flanagan. This report is the best available evidence of the size of the unit. Respondent failed to provide its payroll records for the several months after the execution of the August 23, 1977 agreement because, according to Respondent, those records were unavailable. Two other pieces of evidence—quarterly tax reports and letters of Respondent attempting to explain its liability for the fringe benefit and dues payments—are less reliable in and of themselves, but offer some support for the finding when considered together with other evidence. Flanagan's testimony that attempts to reconstruct the employee complement some 5 years before is likewise unreliable, although parts of it support rather than detract from a finding of majority status.

Respondent's employee fringe benefit report for September 1977, signed by Brian Flanagan, lists four employees: Mueller, Frohlich, Ferek, and Bleuthner (Bleuthner's name is misspelled on the report). All four of these employees were union members. Documentary evidence shows that Ferek, Frohlich, and Mueller signed union application cards in September and that Bleuthner made an initial dues payment on October 4, 1977. Flanagan testified that all employees he reported on the fringe benefit forms were union members.[10] Both the collective-bargaining agreement and the Respondent's bond make clear that fringe benefit payments are to be paid on behalf of all employees. The instructions on the reverse of the fringe benefit forms also provide that all hours of all foremen, apprentices, and journeymen should be reported. In these circumstances, it is reasonable to conclude that the fringe benefit report was an accurate reflection of the employee work force and that all these employees were union members.[11]

Flanagan testified that in August 1977, when he signed the agreement with the Union, he had a work force of six employees, including Mueller whom he identified as a supervisor. However, other testimony by Flanagan suggests that Respondent only had four employees at this time. Thus, Flanagan testified that Respondent operated two machines with two employees each until a third machine was acquired in the spring of 1978. This would be consistent with the number of employees listed on the September 1977 fringe benefit report.[12]

An analysis of the other available evidence reinforces rather than refutes the finding of majority status.

Respondent submitted as evidence quarterly tax reports for the third quarter and for the fourth quarter of 1977. Those reports list the names of all employees who worked for Respondent in each quarter and the wages earned by them. The reports list 10 employees who worked in the third quarter and 21 who worked in the fourth quarter. There is no indication, however, concerning when each employee was hired or when he left Respondent's employ. Many of these individuals worked only a short period during the quarter. There is thus no way to compute, from these reports, the permanent employee complement at the end of September or at the end of October, or, indeed, at any particular point in time. The evidence is thus inconclusive, in and of itself, on the issue of how many employees were in the unit from which to compute majority status.[13]

Also in evidence are two letters—one written in September 1978 and another in February 1979—where Respondent, through Brian Flanagan, attempted to explain the quarterly tax reports to officials of the Union and the fringe benefit trust funds. Respondent's third quarter tax report, dated September 30, 1977, lists 10 employees who worked for wages at some point during the quarter. In Flanagan's September 1978 letter, Respondent stated that a group of named employees, all whom were listed in the September 30, 1977 tax report, were employed "prior to the executions of our agreement with the union."

Supreme Court do so in its decision in Higdon that basically approved the Board's R. J. Smith rationale. However, it is not clear to me that either of these cases is inconsistent with Bricklayers. In both cases there was a significant hiatus between previous contracts and those under consideration as 8(f) contracts. There was thus no continuous bargaining relationship based on an unbroken string of agreements as in Bricklayers (see 191 NLRB 693 and 216 NLRB 45).

[8] Respondent is clearly an employer in the construction industry and the parties signed the agreement without regard to whether the Union had a preexisting majority.

[9] The appropriate unit in this case is that alleged in the complaint and set forth in the applicable standard working agreements and the supplemental agreement of the parties. Respondent conceded at the hearing, and does not dispute, that an appropriate unit consists of all Respondent's employees engaged in work related to its roof vacuuming operation except supervisors, guards, and office clerical employees.

[10] In light of this concession, Respondent's contention that these individuals were not union members because they did not complete the payment of their initiation fees is specious. In any event, majority support need not be based on a strict finding of union membership. See Terrell Machine Co. v. NLRB, 427 F.2d 1088, 1090 (4th Cir. 1970), cert. denied 398 U.S. 929.

[11] Respondent also contends that payments to the trust fund could not properly have been made prior to Bleuthner's becoming a member of the Union and that Bleuthner did not become a member until October 4, 1977. This contention is unavailing. The agreement of the parties provides for trust fund payments for all employees. The date that Bleuthner signed a union application card is unclear in the record; the record reveals he signed a dues payment card on October 4. However, Flanagan's testimony is that he reported only union members on the fringe benefit reports. In any event, even if Bleuthner is not counted, the three remaining individuals on the September fringe benefit report, including Mueller, whom Flanagan described as a supervisor, were clearly union members. All had signed cards in September 1977.

[12] At still another point Flanagan testified that he had five or six employees at this time and brought two or three down to the union hall to sign application cards. The documents in evidence shows that at least three individuals signed cards in September.

[13] I also note that the quarterly tax reports were introduced into evidence through Flanagan and not the accountant who purportedly compiled them. Flanagan testified they were prepared from canceled payroll checks and a list of employees supplied to the accountant by Respondent. It appears that the documents were limited to those of American Thoro-Clean and did not include documents of Unico whose checks were also used to pay employees.

Indeed, of the 10 employees listed on the tax report, 8 were alleged in the letter to have been employed prior to the execution of the August 23, 1977 contract. Of these 10 employees, only Dan Frohlich and Andrew Mueller were admittedly employed after August 23, according to Flanagan's letter. Both were, of course, union members and both were listed on the September fringe benefit report.

In his testimony, Flanagan attempted to identify Respondent's employees as of August 23, 1977. He referred to Respondent's quarterly tax report and named six people: Larry Bitter, Dean Buhlos, Joe Bonass, Jeff Cunningham, Andrew Mueller, and Dan Frohlich. He also testified that two individuals who were listed as having worked in September 1977 on the employee fringe benefit report, signed by Flanagan and sent to the trust funds, were not in fact employed in September. These individuals were Ferek and Bleuthner, whose names appear on the September fringe benefit report but do not appear on the September 30, 1977 quarterly tax report.

Flanagan's testimony in this respect is no more reliable than other aspects of his testimony that I have already rejected. First of all, his specific identification of employees employed as of August 23, 1977, seems to be contradicted by a letter sent by him to union and trust fund officials in September 1978 that stated that Bitter, Buhlos, Bonass (misspelled as Bannis), and Cunningham were employed "prior to the executions of our binding agreement with the union." In the February 1979 letter, Flanagan suggested that proof of this statement could be established by comparing "our August payroll register and our year end pay register." None of these individuals were listed in the September 1977 fringe benefit report or in any of the other fringe benefit reports thereafter filed in 1977. It is thus reasonable to infer that these individuals were not employed in September 1977.

Regarding Flanagan's testimony that Bleuthner and Ferek were not employed in September, this contradicts the September fringe benefit form that Flanagan himself signed. There is no reason to give that report less weight than the quarterly tax report that fails to list these employees. Independent documentary evidence shows that Ferek signed a union application card on September 16, 1977,the same date that Mueller and Frohlich signed similar cards. It is thus likelythat Ferek was employed in September, as reflected in the fringe benefit report. It would be unlikely that he would have signed a union card before being employed. And because Ferek's name was mistakenly left off the quarterly tax report for September, it is conceivable that Bleuthner's name was similarly omitted from that report. The September 1977 fringe benefit report that lists both men as employees is more reliable than Flanagan's own testimony, of course, because, in September 1977, he had no interest in disputing the Union's representative status. Moreover, the fringe benefit report signed by Flanagan has a certain inherent reliability because it would be unlikely that an employer would deliberately, or even mistakenly, make payments on behalf of people who were not employed at the time payments were required to be made.

Finally, as indicated above, the contract of the parties contained a union-security clause that required employees to become union members within 7 days after the contract was signed or after they became employed. Although there is evidence in this record that Respondent circumvented employed individuals who were not union members and later circumvented this very union-security clause, it is unlikely that the clause was violated in September 1977, the month after the contract was signed. Of the 10 employees listed in the September 1977 quarterly tax report, 8 were admittedly employed prior to the execution of the August 23, 1977 agreement and the other two were clearly union members. Moreover, the four employees listed on the September 1977 fringe benefit report were union members. Thus, it appears that the union-security clause was complied with at least through September 1977 and this offers further support to the finding that the Union attained majority status. See Custom Sheet Metal & Service Co., 243 NLRB 1102, 1108 (1979), enf. denied on other grounds 666 F.2d 454 (10th Cir. 1981).

In sum, although the absence of relevant payroll records and the passage of time renders certainty elusive, an analysis of the available evidence leads to a fair conclusion that the Union attained majority status shortly after the execution of the August 23, 1977 agreement.[14]

Because the Union had attained majority status shortly after the signing of the August 1977 agreement, Respondent's subsequent membership in and authorization of CRCA to bargain on its behalf on a multiemployer basis operates to merge that unit into the larger unit. Accordingly, Respondent may not question the Union's representative status during the term of the 1981 CRCA agreement. See Authorized Air Conditioning Co., 236 NLRB 131 (1978), enf. granted 606 F.2d 899 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied 445 U.S. 950 (1980).[15]

[14] The Respondent also contends that the Union must demonstrate its majority on each jobsite rather than on a companywide basis. This contention is without merit. It is clear that there is a distinction between those employers who hire their employees on a project-by-project basis and those who do not. When the employer hires a permanent and stable work force to work on a multisite basis, a union seeking to convert an 8(f) agreement into a 9(a) bargaining relationship needs only to show it achieved majority status in that work force and the employer is obligated to recognize the union at all subsequent jobsites. In contrast, where an employer hires on a project-by-project basis, with little or no carryover from site to site, the union must demonstrate its majority status at each jobsite. See Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60, 62 (1980).

Here, it is clear that Respondent does not hire on a project-by-project basis. Flanagan's testimony was that he hired employees for an indefinite period and employees remained from season to season. These employees generally went from site to site since many of Respondent's jobs lasted only 2 or 3 days. Indeed, some jobs had only two employees on them since the evidence shows that Respondent only had two vacuuming machines at this time, each with two employees assigned to it. Respondent's relationship and contracts with the Union also confirms that it did not consider itself a project-by-project employer. There is absolutely no evidence that Respondent hired only on a project by project basis. Because the record is clear on this point, there is no need to consider the turnover of employees, as Respondent suggests, to divine the nature of Respondent's operation or to determine whether Respondent hired on a project-by-project basis. Accordingly, Corrugated Structures, 252 NLRB 523 (1980), cited by Respondent, is distinguishable on its facts. In any event, the asserted turnover occurred after the Union attained majority status in September 1977.

[15] Thus, the appropriate unit after June 1981 is as follows:

All employees employed by the employer members of the Chicago Roofing Contractor's Association who are engaged in roofing work

2. The violation

It is undisputed that Respondent did not pay its employees the contractual rate set forth in the collective-bargaining agreement. It is also undisputed that Respondent failed to make fringe benefit payments for all hours worked for all its employees. The applicable agreements clearly show that such payments were required. Respondent's conduct constitutes a unilateral change of existing agreements and is violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979); Pacific Intercom Co., 255 NLRB 184 (1981); and Sun Harbor Manor, 228 NLRB 945, 946 (1977).

Respondent also does not dispute that it supplied its nonunion employees with the union cards of other employees. By such conduct Respondent attempted to circumvent the union-security provisions of the applicable agreement and further violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[16]

3. The 10(b) problem

The charge herein was filed on August 4, 1981. Thus, under ordinary circumstances, application of Section 10(b) of the Act would preclude an unfair labor practice finding prior to February 4, 1981, 6 months before the filing of the charge. From February until June 1981, Respondent was bound by its 1980 contract signed by John Flanagan, president of Respondent. From June 1, 1981, and thereafter Respondent was bound by the contract signed on its behalf by CRCA. To the extent that Respondent did not comply with these agreements by not paying contract rates and fringe benefit payments and by having nonunion employees work under the cards of other individuals, in violation of the union-security clause, Respondent unilaterally changed existing agreements and in effect repudiated them in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The General Counsel requests an unfair labor practice finding and a remedy for the period beyond February 4, 1981, to the date of the initial agreement on August 23, 1977. The basis of his request is that Respondent allegedly fraudulently concealed its contractual noncompliance from the Union and that the Union did not fully understand the depth of Respondent's noncompliance until July 1981 when employee Majestic notified it of the use of union cards by nonmembers.

The General Counsel's attempt to reach beyond the 10(b) period and indeed to reach the expired and superseded agreements of 1977 and 1978 would ordinarily not be permitted. However, the General Counsel correctly points out that Section 10(b) does not begin to run until the aggrieved party "knew or should have known that his statutory rights were violated," quoting from Wisconsin River Valley District Council (Skippy Enterprises) v. NLRB, 532 F.2d 47, 53 (7th Cir. 1976). The General Counsel is also correct in his reference to the principle that fraudulent concealment operates to toll the statute of limitations, citing Pacific Intercom, supra.

The above principles do not apply in the instant case. The Union knew as early as July 1978 that Respondent was not paying the contractual wage rate to employees. Moreover, the Union knew throughout the period from 1978 to 1980 that Respondent was not fully complying with the fringe benefit provisions of the contract of the parties. It caused audits to be undertaken and there was apparently an exchange of communications on the extent of Respondent's fringe benefit responsibilities. The September 26, 1979 letter of Business Representative Martini suggests the filing of a lawsuit. In addition, that letter clearly shows that the Union was on notice of Respondent's failure to live up to the union-security provisions of the applicable agreement. Indeed, in his letters of September 1978 and February 1979, Flanagan alerted the Union of his position that union dues were not payable for certain employees. In these circumstances, I conclude that the Union did indeed know or should have known of Respondent's noncompliance with the contract. The equitable estoppel principles referred to in Pacific Intercom thus do not apply here.

No such widespread knowledge of Respondent's noncompliance was present in Pacific Intercom. The General Counsel's evidence of alleged concealment herein is insufficient to excuse the Union from filing charges earlier if it wanted to seek a Board remedy for pre-February 4, 1981 unfair labor practices. It is true, as the General Counsel points out, that Respondent paid its employees wages both from its American Thoro-Clean account and from its Unico account. But there is no further evidence on this point from which it could be concluded that these dual payments were used to conceal Respondent's noncompliance with the wage or fringe benefit provisions of the contract. The General Counsel did seek to subpoena Unico's records but none were submitted into evidence. It is difficult, in any event, to see how employee paychecks from different companies could have concealed Respondent's noncompliance because the Union clearly knew and focused on Respondent's noncompliance with the wage and fringe benefit provisions of the contract.

Nor did Majestic's July 1981 letter concerning the misuse of union cards reveal anything that would excuse the filing of an earlier charge. In September 1979, after Business Representative Martini checked one of Respondent's jobs, he mentioned Majestic's name to the Union's attorney as one who did not have a union card and who was not being paid the contractual wage rate. According to Majestic's testimony, the day after the first job check, he used Sobut's card and withstood another union job check. The Union clearly knew Majestic by name but it made no effort to seek his union affiliation or cure his failure to join the Union. The Union surely or work incidental thereto, as described in the Chicago Roofing Contractor's Association contract with the Union, excluding guards, supervisors and clerical employees.

[16] Respondent's contention that the Board should stay its hand and leave the parties to their contractual remedies is without merit. The allegations herein do not simply involve a difference in interpretation of contract. They go to the very heart of the bargaining relationship, and, if true, demonstrate a repudiation of that relationship, conduct which the Act proscribes. See Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063, 1064 (1973), enf. granted 505 F.2d 1302 (5th Cir. 1974). Thus, even though the Union may have a right to enforce its agreements in district court, the Board retains jurisdiction to enforce the bargaining obligations of the Act. See NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 428–430 (1967); cf. Smith v. Evening News Assn., 371 U.S. 195, 197 (1962).

cannot argue that it did not know Majestic was not Sobut. In any event, Majestic's letter did not deal with the wage rate and fringe benefit issues that had been in dispute continuously since 1978. Insofar as the letter referred to Respondent's noncompliance with the union-security provisions of the contract, the Union knew of this as well since 1978 and indeed knew of Majestic's failure to join the Union in September 1979.

In these circumstances, I find that the General Counsel may not reach beyond the 10(b) period and may not resuscitate expired or superseded agreements in order to litigate and remedy unfair labor practices that have lapsed. My findings and remedies will thus be limited to the period after February 4, 1981.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By failing to make fringe benefit contributions for all its employees, by failing to pay contractual wage rates and by supplying nonunion employees with union cards of other employees since February 4, 1981, Respondent has unilaterally altered the terms of the collective-bargaining agreements in effect between it and the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

2. The above violations are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act after February 4, 1981, I shall order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action that is designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Respondent shall be ordered to comply with the terms of the agreements in effect on and after February 4, 1981, until such time as it has given timely notice of withdrawal from said agreements. Employees and the Union shall be made whole for the losses they have incurred as a result of Respondent's failure to abide by the terms of said agreements. See Pacific Intercom Co., supra, 255 NLRB at 185 and fn. 6 at 184–185. Backpay is to be computed in a manner consistent with the Board's policy as set forth in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest thereon as set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). Additionally, Respondent is required to make the appropriate trust funds whole for losses suffered as a result of Respondent's failure to adhere to the fringe benefit provisions of the agreements set forth above. See Pacific Intercom, supra, and Pullman Building Co., 251 NLRB 1048 (1980).

American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. and Unico, Ltd. and United Slate, Tile and Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers' Association, Local Union No. 11 of Chicago, Illinois, International Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO. Case 13–CA–22573

26 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 19 December 1983 Administrative Law Judge David S. Davidson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief and a motion that the Board consider a related case involving these same parties (Case 13–CA–21389) and the instant case, Case 13–CA–22573, together before the same Board panel. The General Counsel and the Charging Party each filed briefs in response to the Respondent's exceptions and each filed motions to strike certain portions of the Respodent's exceptions and brief. The General Counsel also filed a response in opposition to the Respondent's motion, and the Charging Party also filed a motion that the Board impose sanctions against the Respondent's counsel. The Respondent filed a response in opposition to the motions of the General Counsel and the Charging Party. The Charging Party filed a motion to strike the Respondent's response in opposition to the motions of the General Counsel and the Charging Party.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The issue in this case is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating its collective-bargaining agreement with, and withdrawing recognition from, the Union; failing to pay contractually required wages; and failing to make contractually required contributions to various fringe benefit funds.

I. FACTS

This case is a sequel to American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., 283 NLRB 1107 issued today (American Thoro-Clean I), involving the instant parties. In American Thoro-Clean I, the Board applied its recent decision in John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), and found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating its 8(f) collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, by substantial noncompliance with that contract during its term. Some of the facts established in American Thoro-Clean I are material to the resolution of the instant case.

As found in American Thoro-Clean I, beginning in 1977 the Respondent and the Union entered into a series of collective-bargaining agreements permitted under Section 8(f) of the Act. In February 1980, the Respondent became a member of the Chicago Roofing Contractors' Association (CRCA), a multiemployer association which, inter alia, negotiated collective-bargaining agreements on behalf of its members. On 1 June 1981 the CRCA (of which the Respondent was then a member) and the Union entered into a collective-bargaining agreement for the period 1 June 1981 thru 31 May 1982. As found

[1] Inasmuch as the instant case is being considered by the same three-member panel that considered Case 13–CA–21389, we find it unnecessary to rule on the Respondent's motion.

Following the hearing, the Respondent attached a posthearing affidavit and three exhibits (two of them dated posthearing) to its brief to the administrative law judge. One of the exhibits had been ruled inadmissable at the hearing and placed in the rejected exhibits file. In fn. 3 of the attached decision, the judge granted the joint motion of the General Counsel and the Charging Party to strike these attachments from the Respondent's brief to the judge. The Respondent has attached the same affidavit and three exhibits to its brief to the Board in support of exceptions to the judge's decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party have filed motions to strike these attachments from the Respondent's brief to the Board. We affirm the judge's ruling striking this posthearing affidavit and exhibits from the Respondent's brief to the judge, and we render that same ruling here: the motions of the General Counsel and the Charging Party to strike the attachments to the Respondent's brief in support of exceptions are granted. We note, in any event, that consideration of the stricken material would not have led us to a different result than that which we reach in this case.

The General Counsel and the Charging Party also filed motions to strike certain portions of the Respondent's exceptions and brief to the Board in support of exceptions. In this regard, the General Counsel and/or the Charging Party contend that the Respondent, in its exceptions and supporting brief, has improperly attempted to reopen argument on the issues addressed in earlier Case 13–CA–21389; improperly argued that the Charging Party acted unlawfully in filing the instant unfair labor practice charges against the Respondent; filed frivolous exceptions; failed to comply with the Board's procedural requirements for materiality, specificity, conciseness, and clarity of grounds for exceptions; and misstated or mischaracterized the judge's decision or record evidence. The motions to strike are denied; however, consideration of the challenged portions of the Respondent's exceptions and supporting brief has not affected the result we reach in this case.

The Charging Party has also moved the Board to impose sanctions against the Respondent's counsel for alleged procedural improprieties in his litigation of this case. More specifically, the Charging Party requests that the Respondent or its counsel be ordered to compensate the Charging Party for the assertedly excessive costs, expenses, and attorneys' fees incurred by the Charging Party as a result of the Respondent's allegedly dilatory, frivolous, and bad-faith tactics. Although we do not endorse all the litigation tactics employed by the Respondent's counsel, we nevertheless, do not find that these tactics reached the level of bad-faith litigation and willful abuse of judicial process to warrant imposition of such sanctions as requested by the Charging Party. See generally Roadway Express v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752 (1980). Accordingly, the Charging Party's motion for the imposition of sanctions is denied.

Finally, the Charging Party filed a motion to strike the Respondent's responses in opposition to the earlier motions of the General Counsel and the Charging Party. This motion is denied.

in American Thoro-Clean I, this, too, was an 8(f) agreement.

On 1 April 1982,[2] at the hearing in American Thoro-Clean I, the Respondent, through its attorney, stated its position that the successive collective-bargaining agreements between the Respondent and the Union were prehire agreements (i.e., permitted under Sec. 8(f) of the Act); that at no time since the inception of those agreements had the Union ever achieved the support of a majority of the employees in the unit; and that, therefore, in accordance with the Respondent's view of the law, the 1 June 1981 thru 31 May 1982 contract was voidable. The Respondent's attorney then gave oral notice to the Union that the Respondent intended to "cancel and terminate" its existing 1 June 1981 thru 31 May 1982 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union; withdraw recognition from the Union; and withdraw from membership in the CRCA.[3] The same day, 1 April, the Respondent gave written notification to the Union and to the CRCA that the Respondent was withdrawing its recognition of the former and its membership in the latter.

After 31 May the Respondent neither paid the wage rates required by the expired collective-bargaining agreement nor made contributions to the various fringe benefit funds, as specified in the expired contract. In July, the Respondent modified the employees' health insurance.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSION

As we found in American Thoro-Clean I, the 1 June 1981 thru 31 May 1982 contract in effect between the parties was a collective-bargaining agreement permitted under Section 8(f) of the Act. In Deklewa, supra, we held that although a collective-bargaining relationship permitted by Section 8(f) may not be unilaterally repudiated during its term, and may be enforced during its term under the provisions of Sections 8(a)(5) and 8(b)(3), such an 8(f) relationship may lawfully be unilaterally repudiated by either party upon the expiration of its term.[4] Thus, the Respondent's failure to pay contractual wages and to make contractually required contributions to fringe benefit funds since 1 June (i.e., following the 31 May expiration of the contract) and its modification of health insurance coverage in July are not unlawful under Deklewa.

However, the Respondent's 1 April repudiation of the collective-bargaining agreement and withdrawal of recognition of the Union were prior to the 31 May expiration of this 8(f) collective-bargaining agreement and were therefore in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[5]

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[6]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. and Unico, Ltd., Mokena, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Repudiating its 1 June 1981 thru 31 May 1982 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and withdrawing recognition of the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees covered by that agreement, during the term of that agreement, through 31 May 1982.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Mokena, Illinois office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[2] All subsequent dates are 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[3] There is no allegation that the Respondent's notifications of intent to cancel the contract and withdraw from the CRCA were untimely.

[4] 282 NLRB at 1375, 1376, 1382.

[5] John Deklewa & Sons, supra.

[6] As part of our remedy for the Respondent's unfair labor practices in American Thoro-Clean I, we have ordered the Respondent to comply with the terms of its 1 June 1981 thru 31 May 1982 collective-bargaining agreement for the duration of its term and to make employees whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to comply with the agreement until it expired. Inasmuch as that is the same obligation that we would impose on the Respondent as a remedy for its 1 April repudiation of the contract and withdrawal of recognition in the instant case, we shall not require a make-whole remedy or compliance with the contract in this case.

[7] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(b) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by the Union, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT withdraw recognition from, or repudiate our collective-bargaining agreement with, United Slate, Tile and Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers' Association, Local Union No. 11 of Chicago, Illinois, International Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO, during the 1 June 1981 thru 31 May 1982 term of that agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

AMERICAN THORO-CLEAN, LTD. AND UNICO, LTD.

Melvyn Baran, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Gerard C. Smetana, Esq., of Chicago, Illinois, for the Respondent.
Margo R. Newman, Esq., of Chicago, Illinois, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID S. DAVIDSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Chicago, Illinois, on May 16 and 17, 1983. The charge was filed by United Slate, Tile and Composition Roofers, Damp and Waterproof Workers' Association, Local Union No. 11, of Chicago Illinois, International Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO (Local 11) on September 22, 1982, and the complaint issued on November 4, 1982.[1] The only issue in this case is whether Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union on April 1, 1982, and made unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

On the entire record,[2] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the parties,[3] I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. is engaged in the business of industrial vacuuming and cleaning of roofs. Respondent Unico, Ltd. is engaged in the business of leasing automobiles, trucks, and other goods. At all times material, American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. and Unico, Ltd. have been affiliated business enterprises with common officers, ownership, directors, management, and supervision. They have formulated and administered a common labor policy with respect to the employees of both operations, have shared common premises and facilities, have provided services for and made sales to each other, and have interchanged personnel with each other. American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. and Unico, Ltd. constitute a single-integrated business enterprise and a single- employer. They are referred to jointly as Respondent in this decision. They provide annual services valued in excess of $50,000 for other enterprises that are themselves engaged in interstate commerce and that meet Board jurisdictional standards. Respondent admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. I find further that Local 11 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

1. Background

This case is a sequel to American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., Case 13–CA–21389 decided by Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Giannasi on December 14, 1982, and presently pending before the Board on exceptions. The facts in that case can be briefly summarized. On August 23, 1977, Respondent and the Union entered into a col-

[1] This case was later consolidated with Case 13–CA–22666 but was severed from that case after it was settled.

[2] The General Counsel has filed a motion to correct the record. As the corrections requested appear to be warranted, the General Counsel's motion is granted.

[3] Respondent attached an affidavit and three exhibits to its posthearing brief. Counsel for the General Counsel filed a motion to strike these attachments that the Charging Party joined. Respondent filed a motion for leave to file opposition to the General Counsel's motion to strike and to file a reply brief, which the General Counsel opposes. For the reasons set forth by the General Counsel in his motion to strike, that motion is granted. To the extent that Respondent's reply brief states the basis for Respondent's opposition to the General Counsel's motion to strike, Respondent's reply brief has been considered. However, Respondent's motion for leave to file a reply brief is otherwise denied for the reasons set forth in the General Counsel's response in opposition. Although Respondent contends that a reply brief is in order because it appeared to Respondent during the trial that the General Counsel did not press his contention as to the appropriate remedy for the alleged unilateral discontinuation of dues payments by Respondent, the transcript shows that on the second day of the hearing counsel for the General Counsel clearly stated the same position that he took in his posthearing brief.

lective-bargaining agreement for a unit of all employees engaged in the application and installation of roofing material and all other work in connection with or incidental to that work. With one renewal that agreement continued in effect until May 31, 1980. In February 1980 Respondent became a member of the Chicago Roofing Contractors Association (CRCA), and from June 1, 1980, until May 31, 1982, Respondent's employees were part of the Association unit under agreement between CRCA and the Union.

Under the terms of the successive agreements in effect from August 23, 1977, through May 31, 1982, Respondent's employees were required to become members of Local 11 within 7 days after the beginning of their employment or the effective date of the agreement, and Respondent was obligated to pay wage rates specified in the agreement and to make payments on behalf of all bargaining unit employees to various union trust funds, including pension, welfare, and training funds.

As found by Judge Giannasi, during the period the contracts were in effect, Respondent did not fully report to the Local 11 trust funds all hours worked by all its employees nor did it pay the contractual wage rates to its employees. Furthermore, Respondent did not require all employees to become union members, but paid for union cards for some employees and supplied them to others than the employees whose names were on them so that they could show them to union agents when they worked on union jobs. In July 1978, Local 11 learned that Respondent was not paying contractual wage rates and that some of its employees were not union members. Local 11 filed a grievance against Respondent and caused an investigation and audit to be made to determine Respondent's compliance with the contract. On a few later occasions, union agents checked Respondent's jobsites and again discovered similar practices.

On August 4, 1981, Local 11 filed the charge in Case 13–CA–21389, and the complaint issued thereafter alleging that Respondent had unilaterally changed fringe benefit contributions, wage rates, and the union-security provisions of the agreements without bargaining. Respondent contended, among other things, that it was not obligated to bargain with Local 11 because the original August 23, 1977 contract was obtained through coercion, because it did not accurately reflect the agreement of the parties, and because all the agreements were prehire agreements under Section 8(f) of the Act that were therefore cancellable at will in the absence of evidence that Local 11 had achieved majority status.

Judge Giannasi rejected these contentions. Specifically, he found that Local 11 had obtained majority status shortly after the August 23, 1977 agreement was signed and that Respondent therefore was barred from questioning the Union's representative status during the term of the agreement between Local 11 and CRCA and from repudiating that contract. Accordingly, Judge Giannasi found that the undisputed failure of Respondent to pay its employees the contractual wage rates, to make fringe benefit payments for all hours worked by its employees, and to enforce the union-security provisions of the agreement were unilateral changes that violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

As a remedy Judge Giannasi recommended that Respondent be ordered to bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees and to comply with the terms and conditions of the CRCA agreement, including the payment of back wages and other monetary obligations, retroactively to a date 6 months before the filing of the charge and prospectively until such time as Respondent gave proper and timely notice of its withdrawal from the CRCA agreement.

2. Respondent's withdrawal from Association bargaining

On April 1, 1982,[4] at the hearing in Case 13–CA–21389 Respondent's counsel orally gave notice to Local 11 that Respondent intended to withdraw from CRCA effective immediately and to cancel and terminate the CRCA agreement to the extent that Respondent might be bound by it. Respondent's counsel stated that Respondent "will bargain in good faith for a new agreement individually in the event the Union represents a majority in an appropriate unit." On the same day Respondent's counsel delivered a letter to Local 11 stating that he had been instructed to notify the Union that Respondent terminated any obligation it might have under the current collective-bargaining agreement and that it wished to bargain individually for a new collective-bargaining agreement "if your labor organization represents a majority of employees employed by American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., in an appropriate bargaining unit." At its conclusion, Respondent's counsel stated, "We will, under separate cover, within the next few weeks inform you of our suggestions for a proposed agreement and appropriate times when we may be able to meet."

On April 2 the Union answered Respondent by letter stating its position that the notice of withdrawal from the Association unit was untimely.

On May 19 Respondent's counsel wrote the Union to amplify its position. In his letter, he stated Respondent's position that the April 1 letter was a timely notice of termination of any contract to which Respondent might be bound, that the CRCA contract was not applicable to Respondent because Local 11 had never represented a majority of employees, and that in any event even if it should be determined that Local 11 represented a majority of its employees Respondent had given timely notice of termination of the existing contract. The letter stated further that Respondent "is prepared to negotiate directly with Roofers Local No. 11 for a new collective bargaining agreement for its employees for the period commencing June 1, 1982." However, it concluded: "Nothing in this letter should be taken as an admission by American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., that a majority of its employees in fact desire to be represented by Roofers Local No. 11 for purposes of bargaining. Prior to sitting down with Roofers Local No. 11 for contract negotiations, we trust you will be able to furnish us with proof of your majority status in an appropriate bargaining unit."

On May 19 Respondent also posted a notice to all employees that stated that on advice of counsel, Respondent would no longer make any payments for dues or initiation fee installment payments to the Union without written authorization from each employee, that employees were free to make such payments directly to the Union without reimbursement by Respondent, and that if any employee desired Respondent to withhold money from their paychecks for the payment of dues or initiation fees the employee must furnish Respondent with written authorization to do so.

On May 23 Respondent received a letter from the Congress of Independent Unions (CIU) asking Respondent to recognize CIU as the bargaining agent of its employees,[5] and on June 17 CIU filed a representation petition in Case 13–RC–16033 seeking an election in the unit of "all employees employed by the employer at its facility located at Tenley Park, Illinois," with customary exclusions.

On June 24 Local 11 sent Respondent a one-line letter enclosing the newly negotiated agreement between Local 11 and CRCA describing it as "the contract to which you are bound until May 31, 1983."

On June 30 the Regional Director for Region 13 notified CIU that the pending 8(a)(5) charge in Case 13–CA–21389 precluded finding that a question concerning representation existed and that he was therefore dismissing the CIU petition subject to Petitioner's request to reinstate it if the unfair labor practice charge was later dismissed.

On July 12 CIU again wrote Respondent stating that it had in its possession applications for membership from a majority of Respondent's employees and renewing its request for recognition of CIU as the representative of Respondent's employees. At the end of the letter, CIU stated: "Due to the unfair labor practice charge filed in the National Labor Relations Board blocking the Company from recognizing CIU on projects in the jurisdiction of Roofers Union Local No. 11, we will expect to represent your employees working out of Local No. 11's jurisdiction."

On July 23 Respondent entered into an agreement with CIU for a 1-year term. Two or three weeks later a second agreement bearing the same date was executed and substituted for the initial agreement. Both agreements purported to apply to any area outside Local 11's jurisdiction. As renegotiated, the agreement provided hourly rates of pay of $9 for journeymen, $8 for semi-journeymen, and $7 for laborers. It also provided that crew leaders would be paid 50 cents per hour above the regular rate of pay and that an insurance plan would be provided employees.

On July 26 Respondent filed a request for review of the Regional Director's dismissal of the CIU representation petition.

On August 19 Respondent's counsel wrote the manager of the Local 11 trust funds stating its position that it was not bound by the June 1, 1982 agreement between Local 11 and CRCA and that it was unlawful for Respondent to contribute to the funds until the appeal in the representation case was resolved. On the same day, Respondent replied to Local 11's June 24 letter, reminding Local 11 that Respondent terminated any collective-bargaining agreement that it might have been bound and had offered "to negotiate with you for a new agreement in the event that you in fact represented a majority of the employees employed by American Thoro-Clean, Ltd." The letter continued, "You have not responded that you do, in fact, represent a majority of the employees of American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. If you, in fact, do so, please notify us by telegram and be prepared to present proof of current union authorization cards and dues check-off requests." The letter went on to state that as a result of the representation case pending before the Board Respondent had been confronted with a demand for recognition by CIU, that Respondent had been informed that CIU had authorization cards representing a majority of its employees, and that based on discussion with CIU, Respondent had entered into a collective-bargaining agreement for all its employees working in the jurisdiction not covered by the agreement between CRCA and Local 11.

On October 26 Local 11 filed a charge in Case 13–CA–22666 alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act by recognizing and entering into an agreement with CIU. In settlement of that case Respondent terminated its agreements with CIU.

On December 7 Respondent's counsel by letter offered to bargain with Local 11 individually for a new contract, stating, among other things:

> We hereby inform you that we no longer predicate such bargaining request upon your demonstrating to us that you represent a majority of the employees of American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., however, it is our position as a matter of law that such prior letters asking that you demonstrate majority do not constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(5) because at the time we were also confronted with a claim of majority representation from another labor organization. To make it clear, we are now unconditionally offering to bargain with you for a new collective bargaining agreement without the need of your demonstrating to us that you represent a majority of American Thoro-Clean, Ltd.'s employees.
> It is our position that, had you demonstrated majority to us previously, we could have sat down to negotiate an agreement with you which was a full collective bargaining agreement under Section 9(a) of the Labor Act. We are now prepared to sit down and negotiate a collective bargaing agreement without asking whether or not you represent a majority of the employees of American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., and we understand that such agreement can be negotiated and entered into even if you do not represent a majority of employees under Section 8(f) of the Labor Act.

The letter also stated that the NLRB Regional Office had decided that Respondent's withdrawal from CRCA was timely and therefore that the letter of June 24, 1982,

[5] After receiving this letter Respondent's manager, Brian Flanagan, held a meeting with some of Respondent's employees. It is unnecessary to resolve a dispute as to what he said at this meeting because the result is the same in any event.

from the Union enclosing a copy of the Association agreement was not applicable to Respondent.

On December 22 the Board affirmed the Regional Director's dismissal of the petition filed by CIU, concluding that no substantial issues had been raised that warranted reversal of the Regional Director's action.

In February 1983, Respondent and the Union entered into a new contract applicable to Respondent's employees that was to remain in effect until May 31, 1983.

Between April and August 1982, there were no other communications from Respondent to Local 11 concerning its intention to enter into agreement with the Union.

3. Changes in terms and conditions of employment after expiration of the CRCA agreement on May 31, 1982

From June 1, 1982, until Respondent and Local 11 reached agreement in February 1983, Respondent made no payments to the various union trust funds. During that period Respondent paid the wage rates provided in the CIU agreement to all employees for doing roofing work, whether they were working inside or outside the jurisdiction of Local 11.[6]

Before April 1, 1982, Respondent had provided some hospitalization insurance for some employees. After the CIU contracts were executed, restrictions on qualifications for insurance were eased, and insurance benefits became more available to employees.

Following execution of the CIU contracts, Respondents deducted money from the pay of employees for CIU dues and initiation fees, which it remitted to CIU. It did not require its employees to become or remain members of Local 11.

B. Concluding Findings

For purposes of this decision, I rely on the findings and conclusions of Judge Giannasi in Case 13–CA–21389 with respect to the unfair labor practice committed by Respondent before the issues in this case arose. To be sure, if his decision should be reversed in any substantial part, the underpinnings of this case may well disappear. However, whether affirmed or reversed by the Board or a court of appeals, the decision in that case will be res judicata as to the issues decided in it, and they are not subject to relitigation in this case. Thus, that decision establishes that Local 11 was the majority representative of Respondent's employees prior to April 1, 1982, that Respondent unilaterally changed the terms provided by the collective-bargaining agreements in effect between CRCA and the Union from February 4, 1981, through April 1, 1982, by failing to make fringe benefit contributions for all its employees, by failing to pay contractual wage rates, and by supplying nonunion employees with the union cards of other employees. Further premises are that these unilateral changes violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, and the appropriate remedy for these violations included an order requiring Respondent to bargain with Local 11 and to comply retroactively with the terms of the CRCA agreement.

It is undisputed that from April 1, 1982, until February 1983, Respondent did not bargain with Local 11. The initial question to be decided is whether Respondent had any obligation to do so.

On April 1, 1982, at the hearing in the earlier case, Respondent took two positions as to its future relationship with Local 11. First, it announced its withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining through CRCA and, second, it announced that it would bargain with Local 11 for a new agreement in the event Local 11 represented a majority in an appropriate unit.

Although Local 11 took the position in correspondence with Respondent thereafter and at the hearing in this case that Respondent's withdrawal from CRCA was untimely, the Regional Director agreed with Respondent's position that withdrawal was timely, and Local 11's effort to raise the issue at the hearing as an alternative theory to support the complaint was rejected as an attempt by the Charging Party to amend the complaint. Thus, the only question is whether Respondent had any obligation to bargain with Local 11 for an individual agreement.

The existence of the CRCA contract, which Judge Giannasi found had become a 9(a) agreement, established a presumption during the term of that agreement that the Union was the majority representative of Respondent's employees. Respondent's timely withdrawal from CRCA did not destroy the presumption. Rather, following its withdrawal the presumption continued that the Union represented a majority in a unit of Respondent's employees with the same composition as the CRCA contract unit. Chicago Magnesium Castings, 256 NLRB 668, 674 (1981).

On expiration of the CRCA agreement the presumption of the Union's continuing majority became rebuttable, and Respondent lawfully could withdraw recognition anticipatorily for purpose of negotiations for a new agreement "if and only if the employer can demonstrate that, on the date of withdrawal and in a context free of unfair labor practices, the union in fact had lost its majority, or respondent's withdrawal was predicated on a reasonable doubt based on objective considerations of the union's majority status." Abbey Medical/Abbey Rents, 264 NLRB 969 (1982).

Respondent asserts here that it had a good-faith doubt of the Union's continuing majority which it should have been allowed to establish as a defense to the General Counsel's contention that its bargaining obligation continued. The General Counsel and the Charging Party contend that Respondent's prior unfair labor practices provided the context that deprived Respondent of that defense.

Whether committed out of animus, ignorance, or simple economic self-interest, the unfair labor practices found by Judge Giannasi were of the kind that are inherently destructive of a collective-bargaining relationship. Respondent entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and then failed to live up to its terms by denying employees the benefits it had agreed to. It not only failed to enforce the union-security provision, but used subterfuge to conceal its violation from the Union. The unilateral denial of contract benefits to employees "graphically portrayed to the employees that Respondent was in a position to confer or withdraw economic benefits without regard to the presence of the Union." Guerdon Industries, 218 NLRB 658, 661–662 (1975). Respondent's unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment that had been established by agreement denied the Union its rightful status as bargaining representative of the employees and "necessarily tended to undermine the Union's authority among the employees, whose interest it was obligated to represent in such matters, with erosion of majority status the probable result." Id. at 662.

[6] Respondent had a single homogeneous group of employees who worked at all locations. It paid these employees at lower rates for time spent at yard work and driving to and from jobs. The rates paid by Respondent were not the rates provided in the expired CRCA agreement.

Respondent contends that in order for unfair labor practices to taint a doubt of a union's majority status, there must be a showing that the unfair labor practices caused the disaffection from the union or were designed to gain time to destroy the union's majority, citing Celanese Corp. of America, 95 NLRB 664, 673 (1951), and Guerdon, above. However, as Guerdon itself makes clear, the required proof is that the unfair labor practices were of "a character as to either affect the Union's status, cause employee disaffection, or improperly affect the bargaining relationship itself." Id. at 661. The unfair labor practices in this case meet the Guerdon test and were if anything more egregious than those in Abbey Medical, above. I find that because of the unfair labor practices found in the earlier case, Respondent could not lawfully rely on its alleged good-faith doubt of Local 11's majority to rebut the presumption of its continuing majority on expiration of the CRCA agreement. Therefore, I find that Local 11 continued as majority representative of Respondent's employees after June 1, 1982, and that Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union as the representative of its employees.

The question remains whether there was a refusal to bargain by Respondent. Before April 1, Respondent was a member of CRCA with which Local 11 was about to begin bargaining for a new agreement. Before Local 11 had any opportunity to request bargaining on an individual basis, Respondent simultaneously announced its withdrawal from the Association and told Local 11 that it would bargain for a new agreement "in the event the Union represents a majority in an appropriate unit." Respondent took the position that the expiring agreement was an 8(f) agreement and that Local 11 had never represented a majority of its employees. Respondent reiterated its position in later letters, specifying in May 19 and August 19 letters that before negotiating, it expected to be furnished with proof of Local 11's majority. For its part, Local 11 responded on April 2, 1982, that it regarded Respondent's withdrawal from CRCA as untimely, and on June 24 it sent Respondent a copy of the new CRCA agreement asserting that Respondent was bound by it until May 31, 1983.

Although Local 11 did not request bargaining on an individual basis after April 1, Respondent's position made such a request futile. Respondent's refusal to recognize and bargain with Local 11 preceded any indication of Local 11's position and were independent of it. Thus, the initial refusal occurred before Local 11 had an opportunity to react to Respondent's withdrawal. After Local 11 took the position that the withdrawal from Association bargaining was untimely, Respondent's only condition to bargaining remained that Local 11 prove its majority, not that the Union must make a formal request to bargain separately for Respondent's employees. Indeed, on December 7, 1982, without any request from Local 11 to bargain on an individual basis, Respondent unconditionally offered to bargain with the Union on an individual basis, and bargaining began not long thereafter.

I conclude that Respondent's obligation to bargain with Local 11 continued at all times material and that Respondent was not relieved of its obligation because of the Union's failure to request bargaining on an individual basis because such a request would have been futile before Respondent's December 7 letter. Richardson Chemical Co., 222 NLRB 5, 6 (1976); Old Town Shoe Co., 91 NLRB 240 (1950).

The remaining issue in this case is whether Respondent made unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment in violation of its bargaining obligation. The Order in Case 13–CA–21389 recommended by Judge Giannasi requires Respondent to abide by its agreement with CRCA effective until May 31, 1982, and to comply with its terms and conditions prospectively until Respondent gives timely and proper notice of withdrawal. Because such notice was given, that Order governs Respondent's obligations through May 31, 1982. Although the CRCA agreement terminated on May 31, 1982, Respondent had a continuing obligation to bargain with Local 11 and as part of that obligation Respondent was required to maintain in effect the terms and conditions of the expired contract until Local 11 was given an opportunity to bargain. Hen House Market No. 3, 175 NLRB 596 (1969), enfd. 428 F.2d 133 (8th Cir. 1970); Peerless Roofing Co., 247 NLRB 500 (1980), enfd. 641 F.2d 734 (9th Cir. 1981).

From June 1, 1982, on, Respondent did not maintain in effect the wage rates required by the expired Association contract or make contributions to Local 11 trust funds. In addition, Respondent made additional unilateral changes in insurance benefits as a result of its agreement with CIU. By failing to maintain these terms and conditions of employment, in effect Respondent unilaterally altered them in violation of its bargaining obligation.[7]

There remains for consideration Respondent's discontinuation of its practice of paying Local 11 dues and initiation fees for some of its employees. The General Counsel contends that these payments were a unilateral benefit provided by Respondent above and beyond contract requirements that, once granted, Respondent was obligated to continue until it had bargained about its termination. In the General Counsel's view, these payments simply constituted an additional form of remuneration to employees.

[7] The agreement creating the Local 11 pension fund specifically provides that the obligation to contribute to the fund shall continue while collective-bargaining agreements are being negotiated. The welfare trust fund agreement is silent as to the obligation to make payments during negotiation. The absence of such a provision does not relieve Respondent of the obligation to continue making the payments pending negotiation of a new contract. Hen House Market No. 3, above, Peerless Roofing Co., above.

The difficulty with this position, of course, is that Respondent did not provide these payments to the employees as additional remuneration, but provided them directly to Local 11 for Respondent's own purposes. Section 302 of the Act provides, with very limited exceptions, that it is unlawful for an employer to pay money to any labor organization representing his employees. The exception for employee dues extends only to dues deducted from the wages of employees who have given the employer written authorization to make such deductions. Although one may argue that direct payment of dues is tantamount to additional remuneration where a contract exists containing both union-security and checkoff provisions, the fact is that Congress was particular in its requirements concerning the enforcement of such provisions. Paying union dues may be made a condition of employment, but it is left to the employese to decide whether to meet that condition and how to do it. An argument similar to that made by the General Counsel here has been made by employers defending against charges of unlawful assistance, with the General Counsel successfully arguing the opposite position. Sweater Bee by Banff, 197 NLRB 805 (1972); Western Auto Assn. Store, 143 NLRB 703 (1963). The cited cases make it likely than in an appropriate proceeding, the Board would enjoin the very practice that the General Counsel now asks the Board to find was unlawfully stopped. Although employees may have had an unexpected windfall as a result of Respondent's practice, I find that it would be contrary to the policies of the Act to find its termination unlawful. Accordingly, I find that Respondent did not violate the Act when it stopped paying union dues on behalf of some of its employees.[8]

III. THE REMEDY

Respondent contends that even if it violated its bargaining obligation, no remedial order is needed because the parties negotiated an agreement in February 1983 and, Respondent asserts, entered into a 3-year renewal agreement following the close of the hearing in this case. Respondent also contends that it should not be required to make employees whole for losses they suffered as a result of unilateral changes because absent Local 11's position that Respondent was bound by the CRCA agreement, the parties would have reached a separate agreement earlier. However, I have already found that Respondent's refusal to recognize Local 11 as majority representative of its employees without a new demonstration of its majority made futile any further demand for bargaining by Local 11, and when Respondent finally changed its position with respect to recognizing Local 11, bargaining on an individual basis soon followed. I find that Respondent must bear responsibility for the interference with the bargaining process because of its unilateral changes found in the prior case, its refusal to recognize Local 11 after its withdrawal from the Association, and its failure after the expiration of the CRCA agreement to maintain its terms and conditions of employment pending negotiations.

Accordingly, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found in this case and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent shall be required to make its employees whole for any losses they may have suffered between June 1, 1982, and the effective date of the February 1983 agreement between Respondent and Local 11 as a result of Respondent's failure to pay them the wages required by the expired CRCA agreement. Backpay is to be computed in accord with the Board's decision in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), enfd. 444 F.2d 502 (6th Cir. 1971), with interest as set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). In addition, Respondent shall be required to make the appropriate trust funds whole for losses suffered as a result of Respondent's failure to make payments to them on behalf of its employees during the same period and for administrative costs, other expenses, and loss of interest incurred by them as a result of their acceptance of retroactive payments, as provided in Clerks & Checkers Local 1593 (Caldwell Shipping Co.), 243 NLRB 8 (1979), enfd. 644 F.2d 408 (5th Cir. 1981).

On the basis of the above findings of fact and the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. American Thoro-Clean, Ltd. and Unico, Ltd. constitute a single employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 11 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All employees performing roofing work and work incidental thereto for Respondent, excluding all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material, Local 11 has been and continues to be the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit described in paragraph 3 for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing to recognize Local 11 as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees on and after April 1, 1982, and by unilaterally failing to maintain in effect wages and insurance as required by an expired agreement and failing to make payments to fringe benefit funds without first bargaining with Local 11 following its expiration, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

[8] After June 1, 1982, there was no collective-bargaining agreement in effect covering Respondent's employees. Respondent had no obligation after that date to enforce the requirements of the expired contract as the union-security or checkoff provisions. Bethlehem Steel Co., 133 NLRB 1347 (1961), 136 NLRB 1500 (1962), enf. denied 320 F.2d 615 (3d Cir. 1963), cert. denied 375 U.S. 984 (1964).

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 13 August 1986 Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Gritta issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

We agree with the judge that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) by unlawfully interrogating employee Wise on 29 August 1985.[4] Although the judge failed to make specific credibility findings with respect to this incident, we find that even crediting Wise's testimony that Supervisor Hinson asked her "what we thought about the Union," to which Wise replied that she knew nothing about it, Hinson's inquiry did not violate Section 8(a)(1). Hinson's single question was unfocused, unaccompanied by coercive statements and was asked on the workroom floor instead of the more coercive management office setting. Moreover, Hinson was merely a first-line supervisor with whom Wise admittedly got along well. In all these circumstances, we find that Hinson's question did not violate Section 8(a)(1). Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984); Sunnyvale Medical Clinic, 277 NLRB 1217 (1985).

We also agree with the judge that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) when Supervisors Hinson and Seals and Vice President Thurman Johnson questioned Wise about the Union in October or November 1985. Thus, following Wise's discipline for verbal altercations with other employees, she initiated the conversations with Hinson and Seals, requested that the discussions not take place on the workroom floor, and volunteered the information that coworkers were harassing her about the Union. After Wise told the supervisors that she was concerned about her continued employment, she willingly agreed to Seals' suggestion that she discuss the matter with Thurman Johnson. Thereafter Johnson questioned Wise about the complaints she raised and asked her to identify the employees who were harassing her. Because this information was within the scope of that which Wise freely disclosed, and was the type of information Respondent logically would seek in any disciplinary matter, whether or not it related to the subject of unions, we find that Johnson's questions did not violate the Act. Accordingly, we dismiss this 8(a)(1) allegation.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Bates Nitewear Company, Greensboro, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraphs 1(b), (c), and (d).

"(b) Instructing or encouraging employees to report any efforts exerted on them to join a union or to report to the Respondent the identity of union supporters.

"(c) Promulgating a no-distribution rule for the purpose of discouraging employees' lawful union activities.

"(d) Suspending or otherwise discriminating against its employees because they have joined, supported, or assisted a union, or have engaged in protected concerted activities."

---

[1] The Respondent and the Charging Party have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We also correct the following inadvertent errors of the judge: (1) In sec. III.A, par. 3, the sentence beginning "Pursuant to his authority on 6 June 1984" is corrected to read "Pursuant to his authority on 1 June 1984"; (2) in sec. III.A, par. 3, the sentence beginning "Ruth Ayers, as a roving inspector, worked in Jean Harris' department" is corrected to reflect that Ayers worked in Jean Horne's department.

These minor corrections do not affect our decision.

[2] We agree with the judge's finding that Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1) by more closely watching employee Carolyn Johnson at work following her return from an unlawful suspension. In so doing, we read the judge's decision as holding that, although Johnson perceived that Supervisors Seals and Hinson more closely watched her following her suspension, the evidence fails to establish that heightened surveillance occurred. Absent such evidence, we agree with the judge that this 8(a)(1) allegation should be dismissed.

In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent's discipline of employees pursuant to its unlawful "Statement on Unionism" violated Sec. 8(a)(3), we also rely on Republic Aviation, 324 U.S. 793, 805 (1945).

[3] We have modified pars. 1(b), (c), and (d) of the judge's recommended Order to more closely reflect the violations found.

[4] Member Cracraft, noting that the administrative law judge failed to resolve the credibility conflict as to the statement allegedly made by Supervisor Hinson to employee Wise, would not pass on the 8(a)(1) allegation regarding the 29 August 1985 conversation between Hinson and Wise.

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with plant closure or loss of jobs because they want to assist the Union.

WE WILL NOT instruct or encourage employees to report any efforts exerted on them to join a union or to report to us the identity of union supporters.

WE WILL NOT promulgate a no-distribution rule for the purpose of discouraging employees' lawful union activities.

WE WILL NOT suspend or otherwise discriminate against employees because they have joined, supported, or assisted a union, or have engaged in protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make Ruth Ayers, Carolyn Johnson, and Gladys Lambert whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from our discrimination, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify Ruth Ayers, Carolyn Johnson, and Gladys Lambert that we have removed from our files any reference to their suspensions and that the suspensions will not be used against them in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GRITTA, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 13 and 14 January 1986 in Greensboro, North Carolina, based on charges filed by Central North Carolina Joint Board, affiliated with Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union (the Union) on 12 and 30 September 1985, and a consolidated complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region of the National Labor Relations Board on 5 November 1985.[1] The complaints allege that Bates Nitewear Company (Bates or Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by unlawful threats, interrogations, surveillance, imposition of new work rules and suspensions of its employees. Respondent's timely answer denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce evidence, and to argue orally. A brief was submitted by the General Counsel on 10 March 1986. The brief was duly considered.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor on the witness stand, and on substantative, reliable evidence considered along with the consistency and inherent probability of testimony, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION AND STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The complaints allege, Respondent admits, and I find that Bates Nitewear Company is a North Carolina corporation engaged in the manufacturing of nightwear in Greensboro, North Carolina. Jurisdiction is not in issue. In the past 12 months Bates Nitewear Company, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its Greensboro facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of North Carolina and shipped products from its Greensboro facility valued in excess of $50,000 to points located outside the State of North Carolina. I conclude and find that Bates Nitewear Company is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaints allege, Respondent admits, and I conclude and find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. BACKGROUND

Bates operates several plants in North Carolina including the Bessemer Avenue plant in Greensboro, the only facility involved herein. The Bessemer plant houses offices of Robert Thurman Johnson, the vice president of manufacturing, manufacturing staff offices, the trim warehouse, the sewing and stitching department, and two sewing rooms. The trim warehouse is supervised by Ron Gilbert. The sew and stitch department is supervised by Darryl Seals. One sewing room is supervised by Henry Bowman, the other by Mike McCray.

On 29 August the Union began an organizational drive to represent the plant employees. The first effort was a union leaflet distributed to employees as they left work in the afternoon. A second leaflet was distributed to employees on 5 September. This distribution was followed by the first organizational meeting of employees that evening. Union authorization cards were distributed at the meeting. Extra cards were given to employees attending the meeting for distribution to other employees. Gerald Lambert was the lead union supporter throughout the campaign.[2]

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. R. Thurman Johnson

R. Thurman Johnson testified that, as vice president of manufacturing, he is responsible for five plant operations. Johnson became aware of the union activity the first day the Union distributed leaflets to employees at Bessemer. Since the first distributions, the Union has handbilled employees just about every week. He has seen employees and union representatives distributing the leaflets.

Johnson stated that the sewing rooms are noisy and normal conversations must be conducted within 2 feet in order to hear.

Although the immediate supervisors are responsible to maintain order in their respective departments, Johnson has the final authority on all discipline and company policies. Pursuant to his authority on 6 June 1984, he had a "Statement on Unionism" posted on the bulletin board. The posting followed his acquisition of the statement at a trade show and an incident involving a recalcitrant employee who, during a verbal altercation on the plant floor, stated that the employees needed a union. The poster embodied Johnson's feelings concerning unions and after the incident he had copies made and posted in several of the plants, including Bessemer Avenue. With the advent of the Union's campaign in August 1985, Johnson had additional copies of the statement made and posted in the Bessemer Avenue plant because the union activity among employees was on the increase.

In early September, May Richardson went to Johnson's office and reported that she was being harassed at her work station by Ruth Ayers. Evelyn Overman also complained to Johnson that she was being bothered at her machine and harassed by Ayers. Overman stated that Ayers kept talking to her about the Union and wanted to know if there was anything that could be done to get her to stop. Olga Pepper also made a complaint to Johnson, but he could not remember which employee was the subject of the complaint. Johnson said there were other employees who made complaints but he could not remember who they were. He made no written record of the complaints or the specifics of the complaints. Johnson's reasons for making only mental notes was to preserve the confidentiality of the complaints.

Based on the complaints he had received, Johnson suspended Carolyn Johnson and Ruth Ayers on Friday, 6 September. Ayers was suspended early in the day and Johnson at the end of her shift at 4 p.m. Johnson called Ayers to his office and she was accompanied by Supervisor Mike McCray. Johnson did not solicit Ayers' version of the events nor allow her to tell her side of the story. He told Ayers that it had been reported to him that she was bothering people at their work stations concerning the Union and interfering with their work. Johnson told Ayers that she would be suspended for 3 days without pay. Ayers responded, "Okay," and Johnson implemented the discipline. Carolyn Johnson was suspended for taking up production time of employees and trying to force her opinion about the Union on other employees. Johnson did not ask for the employees' versions of the events nor did he allow them to give their versions. Johnson suspended Carolyn Johnson for 3 days and she responded by shrugging her shoulders and saying "Okay."

The suspensions of Ayers and Carolyn Johnson were pursuant to the "Statement on Unionism" that was posted in the plant despite the fact that the statement had not previously been enforced. The reason Johnson enforced the statement at this time was that "the Company will not allow some things. People have a right to be left alone and perform their jobs. These people are paid by production, and interference with their work takes money out of their pockets." If employees were harassed about Tupperware and half a dozen people complained about the harassment, Johnson would suspend the employees bothering people at their work station. Without regard for the posted "Statement on Unionism," there is no policy that proscribes solicitations by employees or supervisors during working hours in the plant for products such as Avon, Tupperware, peanuts, popcorn, PTA, or tickets for musical bands. Johnson himself has engaged in such retail solicitations among employees. Johnson would not consider such solicitations as interference with production or employees' worktime. Employees would be allowed up to 15 minutes to peruse catalogs or in some fashion to develop a sale among coworkers. Only if Johnson thought the selling approached harassment would he put a stop to it and consider discipline.

On 26 September, Supervisor McCray reported to Johnson that Geslia Garner, a sewing room supervisor, had disciplined Daisy, a roving inspector, for spending too much time at each machine. Daisy was talking to the operators rather than inspecting the product. Garner went to Daisy who was in the vicinity of Gladys Lambert and told Daisy, "You need to spend more time working and less time talking." Lambert, who was not involved, turned to Garner and asked, "What are you telling her that for." Whereupon Garner reported the incident to McCray. Both McCray and Johnson considered Lambert's conduct insubordination. Johnson called Lambert to his office and, without affording Lambert any chance to explain, suspended her that day. Johnson stated that with insubordination there is no discussion. Gladys Lambert is the spouse of Gerald Lambert.

The following day Johnson posted a memorandum prohibiting distribution of written materials in working areas of the plant. The posting was prompted by a rumor that the prounion employees intended to handbill employees inside the plant rather than outside as in the past. Johnson had observed Gerald Lambert, Helen May, and Judy Cayton distributing union literature outside the plant so he had additional copies of the memorandum printed and instructed his supervisors to personally give the memorandum to Lambert, May, and Cayton.

B. Helen May

Helen May testified that she has been a sewing machine operator for 8 years. May presently works in the sewing room supervised by Henry Bowman and Hilda Keiser. In late September while she was working, May overheard a conversation between Supervisor Keiser and the adjoining operator, Linda Cisson. Keiser told Cisson that if the Union got in, the plant would close down and the employees would have to look for other jobs. Sometime later Keiser came to May's work station with a clipboard containing the 27 September memorandum. Keiser gave the memo to May to read. After reading the memo, May asked Keiser what that had to do with her. Keiser replied that she was told that May had been passing out literature in the parking lot. May denied passing out literature and Keiser said, "Well, I told Henry that I didn't think you had." Later Keiser came to May's machine and said that the operators supervised by Ella Faison were the ones causing the trouble. Keiser said she did not think that her operators wanted the Union. Keiser told May that if the Union got in the plant would close down and that she was going to see if she could find another job. May did not reply and Keiser walked away.

During November, May had a telephone conversation with her sister, Jean Horne, a supervisor in the other sewing room. Horne told May that an operator had accused her of assigning the better production work to employees that were prounion and giving the nonunion employees work that was not productive of incentive pay. Horne reported the incident to McCray and he told her that she did not have to put up with that from the employees. The subject employee was not disciplined for having questioned the judgment of her supervisor, Horne.

C. Judy Cayton

Judy Cayton testified she worked in the trim department under the supervision of McCray and Horne for 2 years. Cayton read the memorandum prohibiting distribution of written materials when it was posted. Later she went to McCray for permission to use the phone and before he responded to her request, he held up the memorandum before her and told her she needed to read it to stay out of trouble. Later Cayton, joined by Deborah Turner, went to McCray. Cayton asked McCray if the working areas included the canteen, bathrooms, and parking lots. McCray told Cayton she knew what it meant and Cayton asked if it meant parking areas. McCray replied that was what it meant. Cayton was one of the employees who handbilled for the Union in the parking lot. She continued handbilling in the parking lot after her conversation with McCray without incident.

D. Ruth Ayers

Ruth Ayers testified she has worked 12 years at Bates and presently is a roving inspector under Supervisors McCray and Joe Minette. She first became aware of the union campaign when the employees were handbilled as they left work. May Robbins rode with her and they both got a leaflet as the organizers approached Ayers' car. Ayers immediately read the opening statement on the leaflet that said, "You need a union." Ayers explained aloud, "Good Lord, yes, we need a union." She then turned and saw Thurman Johnson standing 2 feet behind her. Ayers got in her car and read the rest of the leaflet. Johnson was policing the parking lot to keep the handbillers from encroaching on company property.

The following week a second leaflet was distributed and Ayers again got a leaflet. After receiving the leaflets she spoke with her coworkers in the lunchroom before work. Several employees told Ayers they wanted no part of a union. That same evening at lunchbreak she spoke with other employees about the Union. She and the employees discussed the propriety of going to the union meeting scheduled for that evening. The next day, Friday, 6 September, Ayers discussed the Union with Linda Robbins, a sewer, about 11 a.m. Robbins was sewing and Ayers was inspecting her work. Robbins brought up subject of the Union. Ayers asked Robbins if she was trying to get her to talk union so Robbins could go tell Thurman. Robbins said, "Ruth, I wouldn't do that." Robbins, "added if you all don't vote the union in, you're crazy." Ayers asked her if she would and Robbins said, "Yes." Robbins then asked Ayers if she would and Ayers responded, "yes." Ayers then moved to the next machine to inspect. The conversation with Robbins consumed 2 to 3 minutes and took place while Ayers inspected the work. Ayers' shift ended that Friday at noon.

At no time during the union campaign did Ayers distribute or solicit employee signatures on union cards. She did not possess any union cards at any time. Ayers attended the union meeting that evening and signed an authorization card for the Union. The following Monday, Ayers reported for work. At 7:15 a.m., McCray summoned Ayers to report to Johnson's office. In McCray's presence Johnson told Ayers she was suspended for 3 days for soliciting for the Union. Ayers was shocked at the suspension and said nothing. She just got up and walked out. This suspension was the first discipline Ayers had ever received. Ayers denied that she conversed about the Union with May Richardson, Evelyn Overman, or Olga Pepper during working hours. None of the three ladies work in Ayers' department nor has Ayers worked in their departments within the last year.

E. Deborah Turner

Deborah Turner testified she has worked at Bates for 2 years and works beside Judy Cayton. Turner was asked by Cayton to accompany her to McCray's office for a clarification of the 27 September memo on distribution of written materials in the plant. Turner accompanied Cayton to McCray. Cayton asked McCray does the memo mean the canteen, the bathroom, and the parking lot. McCray said she knew what it meant. Cayton asked again and received the same reply from McCray. Cayton asked a third time and McCray replied, "That's what it means." The conversation then ended.

F. Carolyn Johnson

Carolyn Johnson testified that she has been employed for 3 years and works as a recutter under supervisors Darryl Seals and Clara Hinson. Carolyn first became aware of the union campaign on 30 August when she reported for work. Several employees in the cafeteria before work asked her if she had gotten the union leaflet the day before. She had not seen the handbilling when she left work. At this time, she and the other employees discussed the Union. The next Tuesday at lunchtime in the cafeteria Carolyn joined her usual group and during lunch they again discussed the Union. On Thursday, as she was leaving after her shift, Carolyn Johnson did receive a union leaflet. She was seen by Thurman Johnson and Bill Hemphill getting the leaflet. In the cafeteria the following morning before work, Carolyn had a discussion about the Union with her coworkers. She was asked why she had not gone to the union meeting the night before. Carolyn explained that her car was not running so she had no way to go. Sue Wise, one of the employees, told Carolyn she had a union card for her and would give it to her later. When the employees met in the cafeteria on break, Sue said that she had the union card at her work table. Carolyn followed Sue to the work table, got the card, signed it, and returned it to Sue. Sue also gave Carolyn some additional cards that Carolyn put in her purse under her table. Although she had the extra cards, Carolyn did not solicit any employees to sign. She later threw the cards into her trash at home.

With the exception of the several union conversations in the cafeteria, Carolyn did not discuss the Union with other employees in the plant. That afternoon Hinson summoned Carolyn to Seals' office who in turn took her to Johnson's office. Johnson told Carolyn he was giving her oral notice of a 3-day suspension for soliciting for the Union on company time and company property. Carolyn said she did not understand and asked Johnson to explain the situation to her. Johnson said he did not have to explain anything to her and told her to leave his office. Carolyn said, "Fine," and left Johnson's office and returned to work. Seals then came to her and informed her she had to leave the plant right away and escorted Carolyn from the plant. Monday, the next workday, Carolyn called Seals at the plant. She asked for a written explanation of her suspension. Seals said he would talk to Thurman Johnson and told Carolyn to call him back. The next day Carolyn called Seals and he told her that Thurman said the suspension was oral and could not be put in writing. Seals then asked Carolyn if she would be reporting for work on Thursday. She said she would and the conversation ended.

When Carolyn returned to work, she was consciously aware that Seals and Hinson were watching her. Carolyn stated that it was obvious after her suspension compared with the conduct of Seals and Hinson before her suspension. Seals and/or Hinson would frequently appear behind Carolyn and stay in that position. Whenever Carolyn's eyes met those of Seals or Hinson, the supervisors would turn away. This situation lasted for a period of 2 weeks after Carolyn returned from her suspension.

Carolyn could not recall any past incidents when either Seals or Hinson had to verbally reprimand her for being out of her own work area or being in a work area where she did not belong. With the exception of an aborted no-talking rule of which the supervisors tried to impose departmentwide, Carolyn could not remember being reprimanded for talking to coworkers at her table.

G. Gladys Lambert

Gladys Lambert testified that she has worked at Bates for 1-1/2 years. She sews shoulders and is supervised by Geslia Garner and Mike McCray. Lambert was present when the first union leaflets were passed out. She joined the Union and passed out union leaflets and cards both inside the plant and in the parking lot. Inside the plant she distributed the union cards and leaflets in the cafeteria or restroom during her breaktime. She did this about a week before her suspension. Outside the plant she distributed union cards and leaflets for about an hour after her shift. Both Thurman Johnson and Mike McCray had observed her distributing the union handouts in the parking lot about 2 weeks before her suspension.

On 25 September about 2:40 p.m. Lambert was talking to Daisy Howe who was inspecting the work of the sewer behind Lambert. The two were talking about Pennsylvania, their home State. Lambert noticed that Garner and McCray were watching she and Daisy. Howe spent about 5 minutes inspecting the work and the two talked that period of time. As Howe moved to the next machine behind Lambert, Garner came to her and talked to her. After Garner left, Lambert asked Howe what Garner had said. Howe told Lambert that Garner told her to do a little more work and less talking. Lambert then got up from her machine and went to Garner. Lambert asked Garner why Howe could not talk to her when they both were doing their work. Garner replied that it was not just her, Howe had to stop talking to everyone. Lambert said, "Okay" and went back to work. The incident was not mentioned by Lambert or Garner again.

The next day Lambert noticed that Garner was watching her more closely than before. About midmorning Garner asked Lambert to accompany her to Thurman Johnson's office. Bill Hemphill and Mike McCray were also present. Johnson told Lambert that she was suspended for 3 days for insubordination to her supervisor. Lambert asked Johnson if she could tell her husband and give him his lunch before she left. Johnson said, "she could not." Lambert asked for her timesheet and was given a photocopy of the sheet. McCray then escorted Lambert out of the plant. Lambert went to the union hall and called her husband at the plant telling him she would meet him outside at lunchtime. Lambert did meet her husband at lunchtime and, while both were on the outside steps to the plant, Thurman Johnson and Mike McCray appeared and told Lambert she was suspended and would have to get off company property. Lambert's suspension of 26 September was the first discipline she had received during her employment.

H. Brenda Reed

Brenda Reed testified that she has worked at Bates for 5 years. Her mother, Helen May, and aunt, Jean Horne, also work at Bates. Reed became aware of the union activity at the plant when the Union distributed literature to employees. In mid-October, Reed was working at her machine and her supervisor, Hilda Keiser, spoke to her. Keiser asked Reed if she had found another job. Reed asked why. Keiser replied, "Because if the union got in, they would close the doors." Reed did not respond and Keiser said nothing more.

I. Daisy Howe

Daisy Howe testified that she has been a quality control inspector at Bates since September 1985. She is supervised by Geslia Garner and Mike McCray. Howe recalled a conversation with Gladys Lambert in late September while she was inspecting the work of the sewer behind Lambert. The two talked about Pennsylvania and the family both still have there. The conversation lasted between 5 and 10 minutes. During the conversation, Howe noticed first Garner watching her and Lambert then McCray joined Garner and both watched the two talk. After Howe finished inspecting, Garner came to her and told her to do less talking and more work. Howe told Gladys what Garner had said to her. Howe went about her work and did not see what Gladys did next. The following morning Howe told Lambert that Garner and McCray probably thought the two were talking union the day before. Garner had never admonished Howe for talking while inspecting before, however, Lambert was a more active union supporter than other employees. Lambert's union activity was known to management because they saw her distributing union cards to employees.

J. Carla Susan Wise

Carla Susan Wise testified that she has worked at Bates for 2 years under Supervisors Clara Hinson and Darryl Seals. Wise learned of the union campaign when handbilling of employees began. Less than a month later and following a company meeting in the cafeteria, Wise was working when Hinson came to the work area and asked the employees what they felt about the Union. Wise replied that she did not know anything about it. Sometime later, a group of employees were discussing the Union on the plant floor. Wise was in the group and felt the thrust from both prounion and antiunion employees. During the discussion, Hinson's name came up. Hinson overheard her name used and asked Wise how her name came into the discussion. Hinson and Wise had difficulty hearing each other so Hinson suggested that Wise call her on the phone. Wise did so and told Hinson that her name came up in the discussion because of her relation to Thurman Johnson. Shortly thereafter, Wise was walking through the plant and heard Seals talking to two bundle boys. Seals told the two bundle boys that if the Union got in, the plant would be closed. Wise later asked one of the bundle boys what Seals had said. He told Wise that Seals said that if the Union came in the plant would close.

Wise became troubled with her involvement in the union discussions and spoke to Hinson and Seals. She told them she did not want to quit nor did she want to be fired, and something had to be done about her problem. Without recalling how she got there she ended up in Thurman Johnson's office. Johnson asked her what the problem was and Wise said she was getting it from both sides. Thurman Johnson asked Wise if Carolyn Johnson was the employee harassing her. Several employees were mad because they thought she was giving their names to the Union. Wise told Johnson that it all started with a paper given her by the union representative. Johnson asked to see the paper and Wise retrieved the paper from her car and gave it to Johnson. The paper was the General Counsel's complaint. Johnson asked Wise for the names of any employees causing her trouble and Wise named Bertha Winstead and Jaynell Moore.

K. Gerald Lambert

Gerald Lambert testified that he had worked at Bates as a bundle boy under supervisor Jonell Minette and Mike McCray until the month of October. Lambert became active in the Union following the first union handout in the parking lot. He attended all the meetings, handbilled employees in the parking lot, distributed union authorization cards to employees, and engaged in discussions about the Union with employees. Three or 4 weeks after the first union distribution, Lambert and his wife Gladys passed out union authorization cards to employees in the parking lot. Several employees signed the cards on the spot and returned them to Lambert. While he and Gladys were distributing the cards, Thurman Johnson and Mike McCray came outside to observe them.

As a bundle boy, it was Lambert's job to pick up garments and move them from one department to another. He also distributed rework items mong several departments. On all occasions, his pickups and deliveries were made directly to the machine operators. Lambert was never told he could not talk to the operators while working, in fact, McCray told him to do whatever it took to keep the girls happy. Lambert stated that each time he was at a work station he engaged in conversation with the operator for 1 to 5 minutes. On only one occasion in September after the union campaign started, while he was talking to an operator in Garner's department, she came over to him and told him to move on out of her department. Lambert was not actually making a pickup or a delivery but was only passing through. That was the only time Lambert was told by a supervisor to leave any department.

When the distribution memo was about to be posted in the plant, Lambert was approached by McCray. Lambert testified:

> Q. Mr. Lambert, I will show you what has been marked and received into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit No. 2. Have you ever seen that document,General Counsel's Exhibit 2 before?
> A. Yes, I have.
> Q. Would you tell the Court how this document, General Counsel's Two, first came to your attention?
> A. Yes, I was working in the side closing department and Mike McCray and JoNell Minette came up to me. Mike had it in his hand and said, "Gerry, read this and it'll save you some trouble later on."
> He held it up in front of me. I wanted to reach it and hold it in my hand and he wouldn't let me take it. So, I read it. He said, "Did you read it?" I said yes, and he proceeded to put it up on the bulletin board.

L. Geslia Garner

Geslia Garner testified that she has been a supervisor 15 years and supervises Daisy Howe, Gladys Lambert, and, until recently, Ruth Ayers. On 24 September Garner was watching Howe as she inspected the operators' work. Howe was doing too much talking to the operators. On several occasions she stayed at an operator's machine for 30 minutes. The usual time to spend inspecting each operator is about 10 minutes.

The following day Howe was still talking so Garner reported it to McCray and told him to watch it for himself. After lunch that day, Garner observed Howe continuing to talk excessively and reported it to McCray. He told Garner to tell Howe to do more work and less talking. Garner continued to watch Howe and, after the afternoon break, Howe was standing behind Gladys Lambert's machine for 30 minutes. Garner went to Howe and told her she had to do a little bit more work and a little less talking. Howe said, "Okay," and Garner went back to her desk. Within a short while Gladys Lambert came to Garner and asked, "Why did you tell Daisy not to talk to me?" in a harsh and loud voice. Garner replied that she had not told Howe not to talk to Lambert. She just told her she had a job to do and could not do that much talking. As Garner was responding to Lambert, she was returning to her work station walking in an angry way. Lambert just turned away real quick and walked out.

Garner reported the incident with Lambert to McCray who decided to suspend Lambert. Garner did not recommend suspension, although the incident with Lambert was the first time an employee questioned Garner's decision about anything. Garner stated then she was offended by Lambert's conduct. Operators have in the past become upset over something and raised their voices to Garner and she immediately took them to McCray. He would tell the employees that it should not happen again and that ended it. No employee before has been suspended for becoming upset and raising their voice to Garner.

Garner recalled the incident when she asked Gerald Lambert to leave her section. Lambert was standing and talking to one of the machine operators. After he had been there for a few minutes, Garner went to him and asked him to leave her section. Lambert was not a bundle boy for Garner's section.

M. David Michael McCray

David Michael McCray testified that he is a departmental supervisor and has several section supervisors who report to him. Among those reporting to him are Geslia Garner, JoNell Minette, and Jean Horne. McCray previously worked for Blue Bell and while there learned a technique known as delay study to evaluate employees' performances. Simply put, the technique involves observation of certain employees at different times of the workday from different vantage points. McCray used this technique to observe Daisy Howe on 25 September after Garner had reported Howe's excessive talking. McCray observed that Howe was talking to operators rather than inspecting the work. McCray stated even though Howe picked up garments in her hands, she was not looking at them, but did go through the motions of turning the garments over in her hands. McCray later told Garner to instruct Howe to do a little more work and a little less talking. Garner did so and that afternoon reported to McCray that Lambert had come to her desk and asked, in a rather upset fashion, why Howe could not talk to Lambert. McCray asked Garner what answer she gave to Lambert. Garner said she told Lambert it was not just her, that Howe was to limit her talking to everybody. McCray said Garner was upset that Lambert had questioned a decision not directly related to Lambert but to another employee. McCray told Garner he would take it up with Thurman Johnson the next morning. McCray did go to Johnson and in spite of the fact that Lambert was a good employee with a good work history, he recommended Lambert be suspended for insubordination. Johnson told McCray to summon Lambert to the office, which he did, and Johnson suspended her, a notation of "suspension" was placed in Lambert's personnel file.

McCray received the distribution memo of 27 September to take to the production floor. He sought out Judy Cayton. McCray held the notice up in front of her and said, "Judy, I would like for you to read this. I think it would help keep you out of trouble." Cayton looked at it, shook her head, and walked off. McCray had seen Cayton handbilling in the parking lot but only heard that she would handbill inside the plant. McCray also heard that handbilling had actually taken place inside the plant and stated that the distribution memo was shown to the employees that we knew were involved in handbilling.

Later Cayton asked McCray what the notice meant. McCray told her she knew what it meant. Cayton asked, "Does that mean cafeteria, bathrooms, and parking lot?" McCray replied, "No ma'am. In all areas in which work is done." McCray then walked off. McCray stated the roving inspector worked in all departments with the exception of Daisy Howe who was hired for the one department. Ruth Ayers, as a roving inspector, worked in Jean Harris' department where Evelyn Overman and Olga Peppers worked.

McCray acknowledged that in the past when employees became upset, disrespectful, or raised their voices to Garner or other supervisors, he would discuss the situation with the employee and admonish them not to let it happen again. Previously only one employee had been disciplined for insubordination and that employee was terminated for refusing to do any assigned task. McCray reported the incident to Johnson who told him to do what he had to do. McCray then told the employee to perform the task and although the employee started the task he did not finish it. McCray then terminated him. McCray was aware of the circumstance couched in a rumor that Jean Horne was favoring prounion employees over antiunion employees by assigning the best work to the prounion employees. Olga Peppers had questioned Horne about the favoritism and Horne reported the incident to McCray. McCray treated Peppers' objections as a question and explained the procedure he had outlined for the department's production to Peppers. He did not discipline or reprimand Peppers for questioning her supervisor's job assignments. McCray stated, "Because it was placed as a question, I answered it as a question." An additional employee, Edward Smith, was disregarding Garner's instructions on delivery of bundles to be worked and was delivering bundles in the area with the expressed desires of the operators. Garner reported the incident to McCray and he simply told Smith that he should do what his supervisor tells him to do and not what the operators ask him to do otherwise he would get into trouble.

N. Hilda Keiser

Hilda Keiser testified that she supervises Helen May, Carol Reed, and Linda Cisson. Keiser denied that she had a conversation involving the Union with Reed or May. She further denied that May could have overheard a union conversation between Cisson and herself because May wears earplugs and listens to the radio all day like most of the other employees. Keiser did acknowledge that May, who normally sits six machines away from Cisson, was sitting directly across from Cisson because May's machine was broken and off the line. Reed and May have both worked for Keiser for 4 or 5 years. In September or October, Keiser did talk to May about the pay and benefits available at the Colosseum and May told her that Reed was going to apply. Keiser laughed and said she thought she might go too since they are paying that much. Keiser was then prompted to talk to Reed about the Colosseum employment. Keiser did admit to a conversation with Reed about applying for work at the Colosseum, but states that the conversation was limited to an inquiry whether Reed was going to apply for work with no mention of the Union. Keiser offered no suggestions to Reed in the conversation.

Keiser received a copy of the 27 September distribution memo from her boss, Henry Bowman. Bowman instructed Keiser to give it to Helen May because he had been told that May was distributing union literature in the parking lot and was going to start distribution inside the plant. Keiser, as instructed, presented the memo to May and told her what Bowman had said. May denied any distribution and asked, "Who told you that?" Keiser said she did not know who but it was one of Ella Faison's girls.

Keiser had seen Judy Cayton with union literature in the parking lot and reported it to Thurman Johnson several weeks after the union campaign was underway. Keiser had also received a handbill from a union organizer who was distributing them in the parking lot.

O. Clara Hinson

Clara Hinson testified that she has been a supervisor for 5 years. Carolyn Johnson and Sue Wise work in Hinson's department. Hinson had never disciplined Carolyn for talking, although she had told bundle boys and some operators to leave Carolyn's table. Carolyn's worktable is in the center of the department and she does recutting for any operator that needs the product recut. Hinson was not aware of any harassment in her department nor was she aware that Carolyn was soliciting for the Union. Hinson daily roams through the department checking the work of all the operators. Hinson did not know Carolyn was suspended until after it happened. Darryl Seals told Hinson that Carolyn had been suspended for 3 days for soliciting for the Union. Hinson has never suspended any employee, and Carolyn is the first employee to be suspended in her department. Carolyn has been a reliable employee and has not caused any problems.

Hinson recalled that she has had about four or five conversations with Sue Wise. The first conversation occurred the morning after the first union handbilling in the parking lot. Sue asked Hinson how she felt about the Union. Hinson replied, "Well, in my opinion, it's trash. I'm for Bates Nitewear, myself." That was all that was said. Hinson denied that she asked Wise how she felt about the Union. The second conversation occurred after the second union meeting about mid-September. Wise started the conversation by telling Hinson she had something to tell her but people were watching. Hinson suggested to Wise that the next time she goes to the bathroom to call her on the phone. Wise called Hinson on the phone. She told Hinson that she would not believe the things being said about her at the union hall. Hinson asked, "What things?" Wise said, "People are saying that because Hinson is Thurman Johnson's mother-in-law that she has no business being in management." Wise added that Hinson needed to watch herself because people were watching her. Hinson responded, "So what?" and the conversation ended.

Hinson testified about another conversation with Wise that same day:

> A. I think it was the same day she called me on the phone she told me that I wouldn't believe what one of the union men was trying to get her to do. I said, "What's he trying to get you to do?"
> She said, "Oh, well—," I said, "Well, what is it, Sue?" She said, he was trying to get her to get him some drugs. I said, "Well, did you?" She said no.
> She said that they was trying to get her to sign a paper saying that she would testify on Carolyn's behalf and she didn't want to do it, and that herand her mother had already seeked a lawyer.

Q. Was there anything else said in that conversation?

A. Then, a couple of days later, I asked her, I said, "Has your friend called you any more?" And she said, "Oh, yes. He calls quite often."

She said that she had got a letter and some things that she needed to memorize to say when they had the hearing and that she didn't want to do it.

She also asked me if I could get her out of having to come up here and appear at the hearing.

Q. Any other conversations that you had?

A. Well, she had been into two run in's out on the floor. One was her and some girls had got into it over some work out there, which we had to call to the office.

. . . .

Q. When you were calling Sue into the office, what was going on that you had to call her into the office?

A. Well, her and this other girl had got into it over the work or something and there was some cussin' going on out on the floor, I mean, it was out there.

Q. Did you hear her doing this?

A. Yes.

Q. Did she say anything ugly to you?

A. She did not.

Q. Did she raise her voice to you?

A. No, she didn't.

Q. You took her and the other girl into the office?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. Who was the other girl?

A. Bonita Winstead.

Q. Who did the talking to them?

A. Darryl Seals.

Q. Did Darryl tell them that it had better not happen again?

A. Yes, ma'am.

Q. Then, he sent them back to work?

A. Yes, ma'am.

Q. He told them that he was not going to put up with hollering and cussing out on the floor?

A. Right.

Q. He told them that he didn't do like that and he wasn't going to put up with them doing like that. Isn't that right?

A. He just said that he wasn't going to put up with it, out on the floor.

. . . .

Q. (by Mr. Pearlman) Were you involved in any other discussions Mr. Seals had with Ms. Wise?

A. Yes, I did. At one time, Sue and the bundle boy got into it. I heard it. They were discussing it, and I went to Darryl and told him that Sue and Roy Smith had got into it out on the floor, so he told me to go get them and bring them to the office, which I did. And, Sue was upset because she said that some of the union people was harassing her.

Q. Who did she tell that to?

A. To me, and Darryl.

. . . .

Q. They were taken to the office?

A. Yes, ma'am. We took them to the office.

. . . .

Q. Did she cuss and holler that time?

A. They were having words.

Q. Did you hear the words they were having? Was she cussing?

A. Yes, ma'am.

Q. Was he cussing?

A. Yes, ma'am.

. . . .

Q. You described a conversation where Sue said the union people were harassing her. Is that right?

A. That's what she said.

Q. When did that happen?

A. It was whenever there was a hearing coming up. I don't know whether it was to this one or another hearing they had.

Q. Do you remember the circumstances of Sue complaining to you that people were harassing her? Where were you when she did that?

A. At her machine.

Q. What were you doing at her machine?

A. I check, I browse through the room all day long, checking the work.

Q. How did it come up that Sue was being harassed?

A. Well, she just told me.

Q. What did she say?

A. She just told me that a lot of people was—that she had been called up to the union hall, and I believe she said Bethel Winstead and Jaynell Moore was up there and they was wanting her to sign a paper saying that she would testify on Carolyn's behalf.

Q. You said she said she could not tell you who was harassing her. Isn't that your testimony?

A. Well, that one time, she told me that, but this was at another time.

Q. Well, let's go back to the time she told you she couldn't tell you who it was.

A. Well, she didn't want to tell me, but she did.

Q. So, we are talking about one conversation where she said that people were harassing her. She did not want to tell you, but then she did?

Q. Did you ask her who was giving her a hard time?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. Is that when she told you who it was?

A. Yes, she did.

Q. But, she did not want to tell you at first? But, you asked her to go ahead and tell you?

A. I asked her, I said, Well, who is it?

Q. How long ago has that been?

A. Oh, I imagine about three or four weeks ago.

Q. For what purpose did you want to know who was harassing her?

A. I just wanted to know who was harassing her because I didn't know nothing about harassing nobody.

Q. To your knowledge, there was no harassing going on?

A. I didn't know nothing about it, no.

Q. As far as you know, there was not any harassing going on. Nobody was harassing anyone else out there?

A. That's right.

. . . .

Q. You were not aware of any problems that Carolyn was causing prior to being suspended, were you?

A. No, I wasn't aware of any.

. . . .

Q. Who told you that she had been suspended?

A. Darryl Seals.

Q. What did Darryl tell you?

A. He told me that she had been suspended for three days.

Q. For what?

A. For soliciting for the union.

Q. You were not aware of that, were you?

A. No, I wasn't aware of it.

. . . .

Q. Is there a great deal of foul language used out on the floor?

A. No, just once in a while. There might be an outburst.

Q. Do people sometimes use cuss words in their conversations out on the floor to your knowledge?

A. I'm sure, sometimes.

Q. Most people do it, don't they?

A. Yes.

Q. You have done it, have you not?

A. Haven't you?

Q. You have to answer my questions.

A. Yes, I've done it before, yes.

Hinson denied that she began watching Carolyn when she returned to work from her suspension. Hinson did not know that union solicitation had occurred and she was not curious as to how she could have missed it occurring.

P. Darryl Seals

Darryl Seals testified that he supervises Clara Hinson's department. Seals stated that Carolyn Johnson had been disciplined several times for talking too much. He has told Hinson to discipline Carolyn for talking and Hinson has also done so on her own. This discipline occurred in late September. Seals has also told employees Bertha Winstead, Bonita Winstead, Sue Wise, and Frank Price to leave Carolyn's work station and get back to their own station. Seals did not know that Carolyn was going to be suspended. Thurman Johnson called him and told him to bring Carolyn up to the office. Thurman Johnson told Carolyn she was being suspended for 3 days for bothering people about the Union at their work station on the job. He did not say anything else. Carolyn said she did not understand and Thurman said that was all he had to say. Thurman told her to get out of his office and she turned around and left. After Carolyn left the office, Thurman Johnson and Seals discussed the suspension, but Seals denied that he was told to keep an eye on Carolyn when she returned to work.

Seals testified to several conversations with Sue wise as follows:

Q. Have you ever had any conversations with Sue Wise?

A. Yes, sir

Q. How many did you have?

A. Three that I can recall.

Q. Can you tell us about them, starting with the first one, and where was it?

A. The first conversation, I went to her department. Upon entering, I heard an outburst. I heard cussing. I saw arms up in the air. It was coming from her machine.

Q. Who?

A. Her machine, Sue wise and Bonita Winstead. I at that time, told the supervisor, Clara, to bring them to my office.

Q. What did you say?

A. I told Sue and Bonita both, that cussing, abusive language at the work stations would not be tolerated. They both agreed and they left, went back to work.

Q. Was there any mention of the union during that one?

A. No.

Q. What about the second discussion you had?

A. The second discussion was brought about by a complaint from Clara to me that Sue and Roy Smith, one of the bundle boys, had had an argument and created an outburst and obstruction in the work place.

At that time, I told Clara to bring them to my office. The problem at hand was that Roy supposedly told Sue to put her pictures on the buggy.

Sue told him that that was his job and she didn't have to do that. In an effort to clarify things, I told both of them what their jobs were and that creating an outburst in the work place would not be tolerated. Shortly after that, about 20 minutes went by and Sue asked to speak with me in private, so I said, "Okay, fine." She came to my office. She said that she was afraid that her job was in jeopardy because of the union.

She said that she was being harassed by employees. She was getting phone calls from the union representative and she had a lot of people against her, and she did not want to lose her job over that.

Q. Did she say what the phone calls were about?

A. She said that there was a union representative that called her numerous times at home, wanted to take her out and buy her a drink, and wanted her to buy him drugs and that he called her while she was not at home and talked to her mother and bothered her mother, and that her and her mother both, were going to seek counseling from an attorney. They were tired and they didn't want to be bothered any more.

Q. Did you say anything to that?

A. I suggested to Sue that we sit down and talk to Thurman Johnson. She agreed. At that time, Thurman was out of town. I told her that I would speak to Thurman the next morning and we all three would sit down and talk about the problem, and of course, we did that.

Q. You had a meeting the following morning.

A. Yes, there was.

Q. Who was there?

A. Thurman, Sue Wise and myself.

Q. To the best of your recollection, tell us what happened in the meeting.

A. I tried to leave the talking up to Sue, but she was speechless. I told Thurman that Sue had come to me the previous day and that she was concerned about losing her job. I told him exactly what she had told me.

Q. What did you tell him?

A. I told him that she had a union representative following her, wanting her to buy drugs, wanting to take her out and buy her a drink, trying to get her to testify on Carolyn's behalf. I also told him that she had been counseled twice for discipline problems, that she was very simply scared of losing her job. Thurman, then, asked her if this was correct and she said yes. She reiterated basically, what I had said about a union representative calling her numerous times at home.

She ventured on to say that she had been harassed by employees in the plant and Thurman told her that that would not be tolerated. She was looking for some type of relief, either from me or Thurman or someone.

Q. (by Mr. Pearlman) Was there any mention in this conversation of a complaint? Or about some papers in her car?

A. She told Thurman that she had some papers in her car.

Q. What did Thurman say?

A. He asked her to go get them.

Q. Did she?

A. She did.

Q. Did she bring them back in?

A. She brought them back and I made a copy of them and gave them to Thurman.

Q. Did she give it to Thurman?

A. No.

Q. Can you think of anything else in that conversation?

A. Thurman left it with Sue that he would not tolerate anyone being harassed in the plant.

Seals keeps his own personal record of employee discipline that he attaches to absentee records in his office. He records the circumstances and the date of the incident for future reference. Seals has seen one of the Company's disciplinary action forms before, but he does not use them.

Q. Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel has alleged several independent counts of violations of Section 8(a)(1) including interrogation of employees, threats to close the plant, surveillance of employees' union activity, changing of work rules, and suspension of employees' abilities to carry on their union activity. Generally, an employer's conduct alleged to be violative of the Act is subjected to the test of reasonableness (i.e., does the employer's conduct tend to interfere with the free exercise of employee rights under the Act). If so, the conduct constitutes interference, restraint, or coercion of employees' rights. Several Board cases deal with specific conduct and when applicable the law of the case will determine the proper test to determine whether a violation has occurred or not.

The General Counsel has alleged coercive interrogation by two supervisors on three occasions. All the interrogations arise from a single episode with employee Wise. The employee initiated the conversations, first with her immediate supervisor, Hinson; second with her department head, Seals; and third with the vice president of manufacturing, Johnson. Wise broached the subject of union activity freely speaking of her involvement and complaining of harassment from other employees linked to her union sympathy. Wise also expressed a fear of retaliation from employees and sought some relief from supervision before the incidents became protracted requiring discipline in some form.

A companion allegation of "promise of benefits" to Wise for disclosure of employees' union activity in the plant arises from the same conversations. Wise was less than specific and on several occasions she had no recall but it was clear from her testimony that she was attempting to extract herself from what she perceived as a bad situation on the work floor. Applying the "under all of the circumstances test," of Rossmore House to the conversations under scrutiny leads me to conclude that no violations occurred. The factors to consider are background, nature of information sought, identity of questioner, and place and manner of interrogation. Wise's testimony shows that the background is a figment of her imagination (whether real or not is irrelevant). Wise sought out Hinson and Seals disclosing to them what she thought was a problem. Wise actually provoked the interrogation with her rendition of the various disturbances on the work floor, coupled with her expressed fear of retaliation from coworkers. Thus, the nature of the information sought by management was directly related to discipline of the work area. Had Wise's problems been unrelated to union activity, the inquiry by management would have been the same. The identity of the questioner and the place of interrogation further supports the conclusion that no violations occurred, in that the uncontroverted testimony shows that Wise asked for each audience with the three supervisors and specified that she did not want to discuss her problem on the work floor.

There is no evidence to show that Johnson, Seals, or Hinson sought any information outside of what Wise freely disclosed nor is there affirmative evidence that Johnson promised any benefit to Wise for further disclosures. Wise was seeking some relief and what Johnson offered to Wise was freedom from further harassment based on Wise's perceptions assayed with the usual tolerances allowed on the work floor between workers during working time. I therefore conclude and find that Respondent did not coercively interrogate employee Wise nor did Respondent unlawfully promise a benefit to Wise. Accordingly, I shall dismiss paragraphs 8(a), (i), and (j) of the complaint.[3]

The General Counsel offered several witnesses to sustain her allegation that Respondent promulgated, maintained, and enforced a no-talking rule among employees to stiffle employees' union activity. The evidence shows that when Garner asked Gerald Lambert to leave her department he was talking with an operator supervised by Garner and Lambert was not in his working area. Garner's department is not on Lambert's delivery schedule. Therefore, Garner was simply clearing her department of nonworking personnel. Had Lambert been assigned to Garner's department, it may have been a different matter. The other witnesses, Howe and Gladys Lambert, recalled an incident in which Howe was inspecting an operator's work in the proximity of Gladys Lambert's machine. Garner, after observing Howe, told her to do a little more work and a little less talking. Howe did not question the admonition by Garner but Lambert did. Garner told Lambert that Howe was talking too much to all the operators. Not only does the evidence fall short of showing the establishment of a "no-talking" rule but there is no evidence to show an unlawful purpose for Garner's remark.

Rather, the evidence shows that Garner observed Howe for more than a day spending too much time inspecting at each operator's station. Howe and Lambert were engaged in idle conversation at the time that was the thrust of Garner's statement to Howe. Obviously, Garner was not attempting to proscribe talking among employees because she did not say anything to Lambert about her talking. In addition, the record evidence shows that a year before management attempted, but failed, to invoke a "no talking" while working rule among employees. As a result, employees were allowed to talk among themselves while working and within reason. I conclude and find that the General Counsel's allegation is not supported by the record evidence and shall therefore dismiss paragraph 8(b) of her complaint.

On 27 September Thurman Johnson authored and posted a no-distribution rule because of a rumor that prounion employees were about to begin handbilling employees inside the plant. Such a rule had not been posted in the plant before notwithstanding the printed rule's reference to a longstanding policy. Additionally, Johnson had the rule specifically brought to the attention of several employees known to have distributed union literature in the past. One such employee was Helen May who, when confronted by her supervisor, Keiser, pursuant to Johnson's specific instructions, denied any prior involvement with the union literature.

The General Counsel contends that Keiser's confrontation with May constitutes surveillance of employees union activity and that the rule was unlawfully promulgated. The accuracy of Johnson's information concerning May is irrelevant to the surveillance allegation. Several employees had been observed in the plant parking lot distributing union handouts to employees after the shift. The distribution was openly engaged in for all to see. Management's use of what it observed in its parking lot under these circumstances can hardly constitute unlawful surveillance of employees. The employees did not attempt to conceal the distribution nor should they. The employees have the statutory right to make such distributions to show their allegiance for the Union and the Company made no effort to stop employees from doing so in the parking lot. The subsequent printed rule was an attempt to stop distribution of union literature in the plant. Contrary to the express wording of the posted rule against distributions in the plant, there is no company policy proscribing the continued sales campaigns of employees including the use of catalogs of wares or price lists for Avon, Tupperware, peanuts, popcorn, PTA functions, or tickets for musical bands. As Johnson stated, he has engaged in such retail sales himself and does not consider such nonunion solicitations as interference with production or employees' worktime. Thus, Johnson's promulgation of the 27 September rule prohibiting distribution of written materials or handouts of any type was aimed specifically at the prounion employees and their efforts to publicize the organizational efforts of their Union. Such a purpose, particularly in view of the fact that all other distributions of a nonunion nature were unaffected, is unlawful, and constitutes a violation of employees' protected Section 7 rights.

Accordingly, I conclude and find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by instituting the no-distribution rule on 27 September as alleged in paragraph 8(e) of the complaint. I further conclude and find that Respondent did not create the impression of surveillance by specifically calling certain prounion employees' attention to the unlawful distribution rule in addition to its being posted in the plant, albeit, the Respondent thereby unequivocally evinced a design to attack only union literature. I shall therefore dismiss the complaint allegation of paragraph 8(f).

During the union organizational campaign, several statements were made by supervisors. The General Counsel contends that on at least two occasions the statements amount to unlawful threats. May credibly testified that she overheard Supervisor Keiser tell a coworker, Linda, that if the Union got in the plant, it would close and employees would have to look for another job. Keiser did not deny that she made such a statement to Linda Cisson, but she did deny that May could have heard any such conversation because of her radio earplugs. Keiser later learned from May that Reed (May's kinswoman) had applied for employment at the new Colosseum in town and asked Reed if she had found another job because if the Union gets in they will close the doors. Keiser admitted a conversation with Reed about the Colosseum employment, but denied any statement to Reed concerning the Union. I do not credit Keiser's terse denial of union statements to Reed, nor her ability to ascertain May's capability of overhearing proximal conversations. I do credit the testimony of May and Reed who both appeared single of heart and intent on recalling the facts as they occurred. I conclude and find that Keiser threatened employees that the plant would close if the Union came in and that employees would lose their jobs if the Union was selected to represent them.

An additional statement made by Seals was overheard by witness Wise. Wise's testimony of this incident was specific and included her confirmation of Seals' statement by her inquiry of the bundle boys that Seals spoke to. I credit Wise's uncontroverted version of the conversation she overheard and conclude and find that Seals threatened employees with closure of the plant if the Union came in.

The General Counsel has thus supported, by credible record evidence, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by unlawful threats to employees as alleged in paragraph 8(g) and (h) of her complaint.

The General Counsel contends that the suspensions of Ruth Ayers, Carolyn Johnson, and Gladys Lambert are discriminatorily motivated and therefore violate the Act.

Respondent argues that the suspensions arise from infractions of the posted "Statement on Unionism" that Thurman Johnson proclaimed to be Bates' policy on union solicitations originally prompted by one employee's assessment that Bates needed a union. As Thurman Johnson explained, the Company will not allow some things, however, other solicitations do not interfere with employees' worktime. Not only is the "Statement on Unionism" directed specifically to union solicitations, but Johnson's enforcement of the statement was limited to union solicitations and enforcement proceedings occurring after the Union began its organizational efforts. The operative portion of this statement,

> Also if anybody should at any time cause any of our employees any trouble at their work or put then under any sort of pressure to join a Union, our employees should let the company know about it and we will see that this is stopped. Everyone should also know that no person will be allowed to carry on Union organizing activities on the job and that anybody who does so andthereby neglects his or her own work or interferes with the work of others will be subject to serious disciplinary action.

makes it abundantly clear that Bates' objectives were to stiffle lawful union activity of its employees and to learn the identity of those employees engaged in union activity. The recent efforts to increase publication of the statement coinciding with the organizational efforts of the union establish a discriminatory timing and purpose for the promulgation of the rule. Thurman Johnson's enforcement of the rule against prounion employees for their union solicitations or union activity in the plant, as reported by antiunion employees pursuant to the statement, shows discrimination in the enforcement of the rule. Moreover, the failure to discipline employees or even consider discipline of employees for other solicitations is further evidence of discriminatory motivation in enforcement.

Additionally, the record evidence shows that the first and only disciplines under the rule were meted out to Ruth Ayers and Carolyn Johnson resulting in a 3-day suspension for each. It follows that any disciplines under a work rule that are discriminatorily promulgated and for a discriminatory purpose are themselves discriminatory and cannot be allowed to stand. Thurman Johnson's testimony clearly shows that the only motivation for the suspensions was the infractions of the "Statement" rule. His testimony further shows that he was more concerned with identifying a prounion employee for discipline rather than protecting the work place from interferance with production. Indeed, in the case of Ayers, he relied on the unsubstantiated report of three employees that she was bothering them at their work stations concerning the Union. In Carolyn Johnson's circumstance, Thurman Johnson could not recall the name of any employee who reported her union activities to him. Thurman Johnson's recall was somewhat hampered by the fact that he purposely did not record the events to protect the confidentiality of the reporting employees. I presume he extended this confidentiality by failing to investigate the reports or allow either Ayers or Carolyn Johnson to tell her side of the story.

Even without the discriminatory statement as the basis for the discipline, Thurman Johnson's failure to investigate the events before disciplining the employees would support a discriminatory motivation for the discipline. More particularly in view of the fact that neither the first line supervisor or the departmental supervisor had knowledge that Johnson was engaging in union activity while working. Thus, I conclude and find that Respondent discriminatorily promulgated its "Statement on Unionism" that encouraged its employees to report to Respondent the identity of employees engaged in union activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in paragraph 8(d) of the complaint. Further, I conclude and find that the suspensions of Ruth Ayers and Carolyn Johnson were discriminatorily motivated and in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged in paragraph 9 of the complaint.

The General Counsel's contention that Carolyn Johnson was watched more closely because she was engaged in union activity is not supported by affirmative evidence in this record. The record evidence does show that Johnson was more aware of supervision's surveillance of the production lines for a 2-week period following her return from the suspension but there is no evidence to link the surveillance of the supervisors to Johnson's or any other employee's union activity. Accordingly, I shall dismiss the General Counsel's allegations in paragraph 8(c) of her complaint.

Gladys Lambert, an employee known to be engaged in union activity and the wife of the leading union adherent, was suspended by her departmental supervisor, McCray, for insubordination. The factual events on which the suspension is based are uncontroverted. Lambert simply questioned her supervisor, Garner, about why inspector Howe had to limit her talking. Garner responded that Howe talked too much to all the operators. Albeit, Garner took no umbrage when Lambert asked the question she did testify that she was unnerved that an employee would question her instructions to another employee. She bolstered her testimony of the otherwise peaceful incident by characterizing Lambert's tone as "harsh and loud" and her walk as "angry." However, Garner did not report "insubordination" to McCray. Rather, Garner reported only that Lambert had asked a question relating to Howe. Garner, in fact, did not know Lambert was to be disciplined for the incident until she was suspended and even then was surprised that the incident constituted "insubordination."

In the past Garner had been cursed by an employee, but all McCray did was orally counsel the employee not to repeat the conduct. Thurman Johnson and McCray, without Garner's input, made the determination that Lambert's question of Garner was insubordinate. Their determination did not include giving Lambert an opportunity to offer any defense. But, as Johnson stated, "With insubordination there is no discussion." Such a procedure predetermines the result every time and because the predicate is lacking the legitimacy of the underlying factual determination is not established. Moreover, McCray in recalling a similar incident in which another employee questioned a supervisor's instructions defined the incident as "not insubordinate" because the employee only put her remarks in the form of a question. This prior incident is not unlike that between Lambert and Garner. In my view, Johnson and McCray were searching for a reason to discipline a prounion employee, Lambert, and seized on the event reported by Garner. In addition, Lambert's suspension was the first emanating from a verbal altercation with a line supervisor such as Garner.

I therefore conclude and find that the General Counsel has presented a prima facie case of discrimination in Lambert's suspension and that Respondent has failed to present evidence to show that the suspension would have been ordered in the absence of Respondent's knowledge that Lambert was an employee engaged in union activity.[4] Thus, Respondent by suspending Lambert for 3 days over the incident with Garner has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, by making threats to close the plant if the Union comes in, has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. Respondent, by threatening employees with loss of employment if the Union comes in, has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. Respondent, by posting and enforcing its "Statement on Unionism" at a time coincident with the Union's organizational drive among the employees, has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. Respondent, by posting its rule against distribution of literature in the plant at a time coincident with the Union's organizational drive, has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. Respondent, by suspending its employees Ruth Ayers, Carolyn Johnson, and Gladys Lambert for discriminatory reasons, has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

6. The General Counsel has not sustained her burden of proof for any other allegations in her complaint.

7. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having discriminatorily suspended employees Ruth Ayers, Carolyn Johnson, and Gladys Lambert must pay them backpay for the days of suspension with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977),[5] from the date of suspension to the date the employee returned to work.

The General Counsel in her brief moved for a visitatorial provision as part of the remedy but, based on this record, I shall deny her motion.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The Respondent, Bates Nitewear Company, Greensboro, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with plant closure or loss of jobs if the Union comes in.

(b) Implementing its "Statement on Unionism" and disciplining employees for infractions related to their union activity.

(c) Implementing its rule prohibiting distribution of literature in the working areas of the plant.

(d) Suspending employees for engaging in union activity or for questioning instructions of supervisors.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Ruth Ayers, Carolyn Johnson, and Gladys Lambert whole for any earnings they lost, plus interest, as outlined in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Expunge from its files any references to the suspensions of Ruth Ayers, Carolyn Johnson, and Gladys Lambert and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful suspension will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Greensboro, North Carolina facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[7] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO (Pacific Bell) and Joseph M. Donahue. Case 21–CB–9703

27 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 11 February 1987 Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO, San Diego, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We have treated the Respondent's document entitled "Request for Review" as exceptions to the judge's decision. We deny, as lacking in merit, the General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act, we agree with his finding that International Union Representative Pearce was acting as an agent of the Respondent when he requested that the Employer terminate employee Donahue for nonpayment of dues. See Carpenters Local 1016 (Bertram Construction), 272 NLRB 539, 542 (1984); General Motors Corp., 237 NLRB 1509, 1518 (1978); Carpenters Local 64 (Western Dry Wall), 204 NLRB 590 (1973). We note that Pearce's action was taken in response to the Respondent's 1 May 1986 memorandum to Pearce titled "Local Request to District for Termination of Employment" and that Pearce attached a copy of the 1 May memorandum to his request that the Employer discharge Donahue.

Theodore R. Scott, for the General Counsel.
Donald A. Hon, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JERROLD H. SHAPIRO, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding in which a hearing was held on December 5, 1986, is based on an unfair labor practice charge filed August 28, 1986, by Joseph M. Donahue (Donahue) against Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO (Respondent), and on a complaint issued September 16, 1986, by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), alleging that on May 1, 1986, the Respondent requested Pacific Bell to terminate its employee Donahue for failure to pay his dues to Respondent in compliance with a contractual union-security clause, and further alleges that by engaging in this conduct Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), because prior to requesting Donahue's discharge Respondent failed to advise him of the amount of dues owed, or the method used to compute the amount of dues owed, or that discharge would result from his failure to pay the delinquent dues, nor did Respondent afford Donahue time in which to pay the dues he owed. Respondent filed a timely answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

On the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the parties' oral arguments, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER INVOLVED

Pacific Bell, the employer involved in this case, is a California corporation that operates a telephone and telegraph system in the State of California. During the 12-month period immediately preceding the issuance of the complaint in this case, Pacific Bell received gross revenues in excess of $1 million and purchased and received goods and supplies valued over $5000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. Respondent admits, and I find, that Pacific Bell is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. I further find it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

During all times material, Pacific Bell and Respondent have been parties to a collective-bargaining contract that contains, inter alia, a valid union-security clause. The Charging Party, Donahue, has been employed since 1981 by Pacific Bell in the bargaining unit covered by the contract. He is not a member of Respondent, but under the contractual union-security clause is obligated to pay Respondent the equivalent of monthly dues as a condition of employment.

Although Donahue's monthly dues payment is due by the 26th of the month, he usually does not make his monthly payment until the month following the one in which payment was due. Respondent does not treat him as being delinquent in his payments so long as he makes his monthly payment no later than the 25th of the following month. Donahue paid his dues for January 1986[1] on February 12 and for February on March 21. He did not, however, tender his payment for March until May 2 at which time he paid his March and April dues.

On May 1 Respondent's president, Douglass Woodbury, transmitted a memorandum, signed by Woodbury, to Reid Pearce, a staff representative of Respondent's International Union, which in substance "certified" that Donahue had failed to pay or tender his equivalent of membership dues for the months of March and April and as a result owed $61.10—$30.55 per month—and requested the termination of Donahue's employment with Pacific Bell in accordance with the union-security provisions of the current collective-bargaining contract between Respondent and Pacific Bell. The memorandum also noted that "a copy of this certification has been mailed to [Donahue]." No evidence was presented that in fact a copy of the memorandum was mailed or otherwise transmitted to Donahue by Respondent. Donahue credibly testified he did not receive a copy of this memorandum from Respondent.

On May 2 Respondent's International union staff representative, Pearce, transmitted to Pacific Bell's labor relations department a copy of Respondent President Woodbury's above-described May 1 memorandum and with it Pearce also transmitted a covering memorandum that requested that Pacific Bell terminate Donahue for nonpayment of dues in accordance with Woodbury's May 1 memorandum.

On a date not specified in the record, Respondent's International Staff Representative Pearce received a memorandum from Respondent President Woodbury advising Pearce that on May 2 Donahue had satisfied his dues delinquency. Although Pacific Bell did not discharge Donahue, as requested by Pearce's May 2 memorandum, there is no evidence Respondent Union ever notified Pacific Bell or Donahue that the May 2 request that Pacific Bell discharge Donahue for dues delinquency was rescinded. In fact there is no evidence that the request was rescinded.

About May 6 Donahue's supervisor notified him Pacific Bell's labor relations department had received a written request for his termination from Respondent because he was delinquent in his dues payments. Donahue replied that the request was "out of line" because he had paid his dues and asked for a copy of the request. A few days later Donahue's supervisor gave him a copy of Respondent President Woodbury's above-described May 1 memorandum to Staff Representative Pearce.

Donahue credibly testified, without contradiction, that prior to requesting that Pacific Bell terminate him for nonpayment of dues, Respondent had not given him an opportunity to satisfy his financial obligation by informing him of his obligation, or the months that the obligation was owed, or explained the method used in computing the amount owed, and had not given him notice he would be terminated unless he paid the amount owed.

B. Discussion

A labor organization seeking to enforce a union-security provision against an employee has a "fiduciary" duty to "deal fairly" with the employee affected. "At a minimum, this duty requires that the union inform the employee of his obligations in order that the employee may take whatever action is necessary to protect his job tenure." NLRB v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 568 (Philadelphia Sheraton), 320 F.2d 254, 258 (3d Cir. 1963); Accord: H. C. Macaulay Foundry v. NLRB, 533 F.2d 1198, 1201 (9th Cir. 1977). In Teamsters Local 122 (Busch & Co.), 203 NLRB 1041, 1042 (1973), the Board specifically defined the union's duty as including "a statement of the precise amount and months for which dues were owed, as well as an explanation of the method used in computing such amount," plus "an adequate opportunity to make payment." In addition, the union must specify when such payments are to be made and make it clear to the employee that discharge will result from failure to pay. Western Publishing Co., 263 NLRB 1110, 1112 (1982).

In the instant case when Respondent through its agent Pearce on May 2 requested Pacific Bell to comply with the contractual union-security provision and terminate Donahue for nonpayment of dues, Respondent, as I have found supra, had not given Donahue a statement of the precise amount and months for which dues were owed, or an explanation of the method used in computing his liability, nor had Respondent made it clear to Donahue that discharge would result from a failure to pay his dues. In other words, when Respondent on May 2 requested Pacific Bell to comply with the contractual union-security clause and terminate Donahue for nonpayment of dues, it had not contacted Donahue and furnished him with any of the information the Board has found necessary to a union's fiduciary duty to deal fairly with an employee in enforcing a contractual union-security clause. In view of this, I find Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act, when on May 2 it requested Pacific Bell to terminate Donahue.

In concluding that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by attempting to cause Pacific Bell to discharge Donahue for failure to tender periodic dues without adequately advising him of his obligations, I have considered and rejected Respondent's contention that the matter is moot and for this reason the complaint should be dismissed or no remedy imposed. In this regard, I note there is no evidence Respondent rescinded its May 2 request that Pacific Bell terminate Donahue's employment for nonpayment of dues, nor that it ever informed Donahue that the request was rescinded. Moreover, Respondent's failure to meet its "minimum" obligation in enforcing the union-security agreement, does not appear to be an isolated occurrence. Thus, in 1984 Respondent requested Donahue's discharge for dues delinquency. Thereafter, in response to Donahue's unfair labor practice charge, Respondent rescinded this request and entered into a Board settlement that provided that Respondent would notify Donahue in a timely manner of his union-security obligations before requesting his termination (Tr. 16–17, 19–20). In view of all these circumstances and considering the seriousness of Respondent's misconduct, I have rejected Respondent's argument that Respondent's misconduct has become moot.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Pacific Bell, the Employer, is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By attempting to cause Pacific Bell to discharge Joseph M. Donahue for failure to tender periodic dues without adequately advising him of his obligations, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, Communications Workers of America, Local 11509, AFL–CIO, San Diego, California, its officers, representatives, and agents, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Attempting to cause Pacific Bell to discharge or to otherwise discriminate against Joseph M. Donahue, or any other employee, for failure to tender periodic dues without adequately advising him of his obligations, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Notify Pacific Bell, in writing, and advise Joseph M. Donahue, in writing, that it rescinds its May 2, 1986 request that the employee be discharged or not allowed to work and that it has no objection to his continued employment with unimpaired rights and privileges.

(b) Post at its business office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Forward a sufficient number of signed copies of the notice to the Regional Director for Region 21 for posting by the Employer at its place of business in San Diego, California, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted, if the Employer is willing to do so.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[3] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT attempt to cause Pacific Bell to discharge or to otherwise discriminate against Joseph M. Donahue, or any other employee, for failure to tender periodic dues without adequately advising him or her of their obligations, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL notify, in writing, Pacific Bell and Joseph M. Donahue that we rescind our May 2, 1986 request that he be discharged or not allowed to work and that we have no objection to his continued employment with unimpaired rights and privileges.

Hudson Valley Hotels, Ltd. d/b/a Quality Inn Albany and Bonita Powers. Case 3–CA–12955

27 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 2 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Eleanor MacDonald issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Hudson Valley Hotels, Ltd. d/b/a Quality Inn Albany, Albany, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Alfred M. Norek, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Mary Helen Moses, Esq. (O'Connell & Aronowitz), of Albany, New York, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ELEANOR MACDONALD, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Albany, New York, on 5 and 6 February 1986. The complaint alleges that Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4), issued a warning notice to its employee Bonita Powers and discharged Powers because she engaged in concerted activities and because she gave an affidavit in Cases 3–CA–12773–1, 3–CA–12773–2, and 3–CA–12872, and was subpoenaed to testify in the hearing in Case 3–CA–12773–2. Respondent admits that it issued the warning notice and terminated Powers, but alleges that its actions were for lawful business purposes.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following[1]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New York corporation with a place of business in Albany, New York, operates a hotel providing food and lodging for guests. The parties agree, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Hotel, Motel and Bartenders Union, Local 471, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Even assuming arguendo that the Respondent established that it discharged Powers because of its good-faith belief that while engaged in protected concerted activities she engaged in misconduct (harassment of employees), we find an 8(a)(1) violation because the General Counsel proved that Powers did not, in fact, engage in such misconduct. NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21 (1964); Rubin Bros. Footwear, 99 NLRB 610 (1952). Thus, although Allison told Franks that Powers was harassing other employees, this testimony does not establish that Powers' conduct constituted harassment, and the record contains no evidence that Powers actually harassed any of these employees. With respect to Powers' conduct toward Allison, we see nothing which would warrant a finding that Powers acted in such a way that her conduct lost the protection normally afforded under the Act.

We find it unnecessary to address the hearsay nature of Powers' testimony that Allison told her that a number of employees were upset over the Respondent's treatment of Powers and wished to disassociate themselves from Powers' efforts to enforce her rights. Whether Powers' coworkers were upset over the Respondent's treatment of Powers is irrelevant to the judge's conclusion that the nature of Powers' activities was concerted and protected.

We find that under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), the General Counsel sustained her burden of proving that Powers' protected concerted activities were a motivating factor in Powers' discharge. Powers' actions in requesting coworkers to write statements regarding whether they reported their tips and were granted vacation leave precipitated her discharge. Powers testified that these statements would be used in preparation for the filing of NLRB charges and a contract grievance and Franks admitted that he knew the purpose for these statements.

Further, the General Counsel established by a preponderance of the evidence that the reasons given by the Respondent for firing Powers were pretextual. In so doing, we agree with the judge's finding that the evaluations and counseling slips issued to Powers were pretextual. All the counseling slips issued to Powers except the slip for the failure to report tips were for relatively minor infractions compared to the counseling slips issued to other employees. Thus, other employees were issued counseling slips for tardiness (anywhere from 50 minutes to 1-1/2 hours late); reporting a $25.60 shortage in deposit; failing to report absence from work; failing to give signature sheets to the accounting department, resulting in a possible loss to the hotel of $80 worth of meals; and failing to fill out a van report and to sign out the van. In addition, Powers was the first employee issued a counseling slip for failure to report tips on her timecard. Although three other employees were issued counseling slips, these slips were not issued until 17, 18, and 19 September 1985, 1 week after Powers received hers and began questioning employees about disparate treatment. Even assuming arguendo that the counseling slips and evaluations issued to Powers were not pretextual, and that the Respondent's firing of Powers was in part based on her attitude towards her job and management, the Respondent did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that absent Powers' protected concerted activities, it would have fired Powers. Accordingly, we find that Powers was unlawfully terminated for engaging in protected concerted activities in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

[1] Due to an error by the official stenographer portions of the record for 5 February were lost. The parties stipulated to certain matters to cover the untranscribed portion of the proceedings. The stipulation is received into evidence as Jt. Exh. 1.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

This proceeding concerns certain events at the Quality Inn in Albany, New York. Respondent purchased this hotel on 23 May 1985 and continued its operations in substantially the same manner as it had been operated previously from that date. Respondent's managers include:

Gordon Weiss	President
David Franks	General Manager
Barbara Crafton	Food and Beverage Manager
Chris Riani	Assistant Food and Beverage Manager (for the earlier part of the relevant period)
Kevin King	Assistant Food and Beverage Manager (for the latter part of the relevant period)

The Union represented the employees when Respondent purchased the hotel. Respondent recognized the Union and the parties eventually entered into a collective-bargaining agreement effective retroactive to 24 May 1985.

The contract provides that "permanent employees will be evaluated on a quarterly basis," an unsatisfactory evaluation may be followed by an evaluation within 6 weeks, and "two consecutive unsatisfactory evaluations will constitute grounds for dismissal." The contract provides for employee vacations and it contains a grievance and arbitration mechanism.

Bonita Powers was the senior waitress on the night crew of Respondent.[2] The night crew worked from 4:30 p.m. to closing. Generally, there were three waitresses and one bartender working at night; however, occasionally Powers was called on to fill in as a bartender.[3] On some occasions, if business was slow, a waitress might be sent home early; usually this was the waitress who had reported earliest that day.

Barbara Crafton, the food and beverage manager of Respondent, reports to General Manager David Franks.[4] Crafton's hours are 7:45 a.m. to 5:45 p.m. weekdays; on Saturdays, Crafton and Powers worked essentially identical hours. An assistant food and beverage manager works during the afternoon and evening shifts. Crafton's duties include preparation of work schedules for waitresses and completion of their evaluation forms.

Powers was evaluated three times after Respondent purchased the hotel. A summary of her evaluations is set forth for reference. The evaluation forms permit a choice of five ratings: excellent, good, average, needs improvement (NI), and not acceptable (NA).

Category	7/30	9/4	11/4
1. Job attitude	NI/NA	NI	NA
2. Attendance	good	good	average
3. Ability to learn	good	good	average
4. Appearance and dress code	NA	average	average
5. Quality of work	NI	average	NI
6. Quantity of work	good	good	good
7. Initiative	NI	NI	average
8. Cleanliness of work area	average	average	average
9. Ability to get along with fellow workers	NI	NI	NA
10. Total average score	NI	average	NI

A. Powers' First Termination and Reinstatement

Powers testified that before Respondent purchased the hotel she had acted as a spokesperson for the employees. After Respondent's purchase, some of her coworkers asked her if Respondent was going to continue the same insurance plan as the previous owners of the hotel had offered to the employees. On 10 June 1985 Powers told General Manager Franks that the employees wanted to maintain the same insurance policy. Franks asked Powers to give him a list of employees who wanted the insurance by 10:30 a.m. the next day. Powers did this, and about 5 p.m. on 11 June Powers met with Franks and Weiss. Weiss told Powers that the Union was insisting that the employees be covered by a union insurance plan. Powers said, "All right." Then Weiss suggested that if the employees signed a petition "that they did not wish to be union anymore" he would "take it under advisement." Weiss continued that the employees would get a better deal if they were nonunion. He said, "The union had given him a list of people that they wanted fired and he said [Powers was] second on the list." Weiss said he had already fired Rich-Miller and that he would have to fire Powers.[5] Powers replied that she had a young son to support and she asked for a few days to think about the subject.

On 13 June 1985 Powers approached Weiss in the lobby and asked if she could discuss the matter further. Powers, Weiss, and Franks then went into the office; after some discussion Powers asked for more time to think and Weiss agreed.

On 18 June 1985 Powers had a conversation wtih Weiss and Franks. The parties stipulated that Powers tape recorded the conversation and that on 18 June Weiss repeated his remarks of 11 and 13 June to Powers. After this conversation Powers filed a charge with the Board in Case 3–CA–12773–1 on 20 June; Miller also filed a charge the same day in Case 3–CA–12773–2.[6]

[2] Powers had been employed by Respondent's predecessor.

[3] The other waitresses were Julie Vecere and Eleanor Gahran. The bartender was Barbara (or Betty Ann) Bennett.

[4] Crafton had served in the same position with the former owner of the hotel. Franks was a member of the new management team.

[5] Miller had been the banquet captain of the hotel. Miller and Powers had campaigned vigorously but unsuccessfully against the union business agent in February 1985. Miller was not hired when Respondent purchased the hotel in May 1985.

[6] The parties also stipulated that before Respondent terminated Powers in November 1985 it was aware that Powers had provided the tape to the Board and was prepared to testify in Case 3–CA–12773–2, and further that Respondent was aware that the tape was damaging to its case.

Powers' charge was withdrawn, as will be seen below. Miller's case was settled with the posting of a notice by Respondent stating, inter alia, that it would not threaten employees with termination or refuse to hire them because of their protected activities and that it would not encourage employees to decertify the Union. On 19 August when Miller's case was to be heard, Powers was present to testify pursuant to a subpoena.

Powers testified that on 24 June 1985 Franks called her into his office. Weiss was there and he told Powers, "You got me." Powers told Weiss that she did not feel it to be that way and that she had not filed the charges to harm him. Powers said she had wanted to expose what the business agent was up to. Weiss said, "Nevertheless, we are gong to have to terminate you." When Powers asked what grounds he had, Weiss replied, "Poor attitude towards management." Powers was discharged and given a final paycheck. She filed amended charges with the Board in Case 3–CA–12773–1 on 25 June 1985. On 28 June 1985 Powers met with Franks, Weiss, and Union Business Agent Hammer to negotiate her return to work. Weiss was willing to reinstate Powers if she withdrew the charge. Weiss asked Powers what she wanted, and Powers replied, "I just want to be happy in my job and be left alone and be able to do it." Powers then asked for $200 backpay. Eventually, this sum was agreed to by the parties; Powers was reinstated and she withdrew the charges in Case 3–CA–12773–1. Powers testified that between 19 August and 7 September she encountered Weiss at the hotel and said, "Good evening." Weiss replied through clenched teeth "Don't talk to me." Weiss did not testify in this proceeding.

B. The Evaluation of 30 July 1985

David Franks has been general manager of the hotel since its purchase by Respondent. He resided in the facility from 23 May until 6 September 1985. During those months there was no night manager and Franks actively supervised both the day and night operations. Even after he ceased residing in the hotel, Franks continued to spend time at the hotel at night after eating his dinner at home.

Franks testified that Respondent gives its employees forms entitled "warning notice"; however, these are really counseling forms. According to Franks, these forms are not part of a progressive disciplinary system. The purpose of the counseling forms is to provide the basis for a discussion between the employees and management. The counseling forms are part of an employee's personnel record and are retained because, "it begins to show patterns after a year or two."

Franks performed Powers' first evaluation, although he did not evaluate the other night waitresses. He marked Powers between "needs improvement" and "not acceptable" in "job attitude" because she had asked to leave early three or four times. Franks acknowledged that night waitresses would be sent home early on occasions when management anticipated that they would not be needed. Franks testified that waitresses may tell him or another managerial employee that if they were not needed they would like to leave early. However, he blamed Powers for asking too often and said this was "indicative of an attitude." Franks rated Powers "good" in attendance because she was punctual. He testified that he had no particular incident in mind for this rating and that it was a "subjective judgment." He could give no reason for not rating her "excellent." He rated her "good" in "ability to learn." He rated her "not acceptable" in "appearance and dress code" because she wore an inappropriate outfit to tend bar. Franks rated Powers "needs improvement" in "quality of work" because she worked too fast and did not spend enough time with customers. Powers was rated "good" in "quantity of work" because she was able to keep up with rush periods in the dining room. Franks rated her as "needing improvement" in "initiative" because she did not use slow periods to catch up on cleaning. Under "cleanliness of work area," Powers was rated "average." Franks rated Powers as "needing improvement" in "ability to get along with co-workers" because she spent too much time socializing with fellow employees. He gave her an overall rating of "needs improvement." He believed that Powers resisted his decisions to change procedures when Respondent took over the hotel and that she argued with him and questioned his judgment. In her testimony about this evaluation, Powers stated that Franks told her that she needed a "new attitude of cooperation" and that her strong point was her "ability to keep up with [a] large volume of business."

C. The Evaluation of 4 September 1985

Crafton testified that she evaluated Powers on 4 September 1985 at Franks' request. She filled in a blank evaluation form and then discussed it with Franks item by item. She completed the nine specific areas of evaluation and decided that Powers deserved an "average" overall rating. However, she did not compute the results of the nine specific areas in order to reach the overall "average" result; she merely used her subjective judgment.

Crafton testified that she rated Powers "needs improvement" in "job attitude" because she needed to stop "going against company policy." Crafton rated Powers "good" in "attendance." She did not check Powers' attendance records and she had no recollection that Powers failed to report to work during the evaluation period. Crafton rated Powers as "good" in "ability to learn." Powers was rated "average" in "appearance and dress code"; at first Crafton said this was because Powers had been in an improper uiform when she filled in as a bartender or banquet waitress, but then she acknowledged that she did not recall if this incident occurred during the evaluation period. Finally, Crafton testified that whenever the incident occurred Powers was warned about her uniform and did not repeat the infraction. Crafton rated Powers "good" under "quantity of work" because Powers was able to handle "a great many people." Crafton could not recall what she had rated Powers under "initiative," but she recalled that she and Franks eventually agreed to rate Powers "needs improvement" because she had failed to put away the dessert tray on one occasion. Crafton initially rated Powers "average" in "ability to get along with fellow workers," but Franks told her to change this to "needs improvement" because Powers spent too much time in the lounge. Crafton did not testify that she had ever observed this behavior.

After Crafton changed the evaluation to comport with Franks' instructions, she discussed the items with Powers in her office. Crafton told Powers that a major area for improvement for Powers was "to realize that company policy is aimed at everyone working toward the same goal."

Powers' account of this evaluation was consistent with Crafton's testimony. Powers testified that Crafton said she was happy with Powers' performance because it had improved since the last evaluation. Powers' "total average score" was now up to "average."

Crafton testified that so long as Powers continued to work for Respondent after the September evaluation she believed that Powers remained an average employee. Powers had excellent attendance, she had the ability to sell products, and she got along well with fellow employees.[7] However, Powers did not "have much use for company policy." She disobeyed rules if she thought they were "dumb." Other waitresses did not do this. Crafton told Powers to abide by Respondent's employee meals policy, but she never issued a written warning to Powers for eating improper food. Other employees were also warned orally by Crafton; none were discharged for infractions of the food policy.

Crafton evaluated 10 other employees at the same time she evaluated Powers. They were all rated "Good," with the exception of Fran Di Trapano. On 21 August 1985 Di Trapano was rated overall as "Needs Improvement" and on 5 September 1985 she was rated "Not Acceptable." At that time she was discharged at Crafton's suggestion and with the concurrence of Franks. Di Trapano's evaluations show that when Crafton rated her overall evaluation as "needs improvement" she wrote on the evaluation that "Fran has to improve on the following items within 30 days—attendance, appearance of guest checks, attitude toward co-workers, tardiness, observe 4 hour calling time for illness." On 5 September Crafton rated Di Trapano "not acceptable" and specific comments from Crafton on the evaluation sheet show that the employee continued to make the same errors that she had been warned about before.

D. The Warning Slips

On 10 August 1985 Christopher Riani, the assistant food and beverage manager, gave Powers a warning slip for failing to replace the dessert tray in the refrigerator. In June or July 1985 a new dessert tray procedure had been instituted by Respondent. According to Franks, many employees were counseled about the policy orally, but only Powers was issued a written counseling form.

On 25 August 1985 Riani gave Powers a warning slip for eating food that was not on the approved employee meal plan for the day. Powers explained that she was unwilling to eat pasta 3 days in a row as specified on the meal plan; instead she took a piece of broccoli and ate that.

On 26 August 1985 Franks wrote a warning slip to Powers for "parking car in non-employee parking area." Although the slip bears Franks' notation that it was "discussed with employee and refused to sign," Powers testified that Franks had never discussed the warning with her nor attempted to give her the slip. Powers recalled an incident when she and Franks drove into the parking lot at the same time. Powers parked in her usual place and Franks asked her to move saying there was a memorandum describing permitted employee parking areas. Powers and Franks discussed their differing interpretation of the memo for a moment and Powers moved her car to the area indicated by Franks.

On 11 September 1985 Franks gave Powers a warning slip for "not accurately reporting tips according to law."[8] Franks told Powers she had not reported tips on eight separate timecards. Powers asked Franks if any other staff members had failed to report their tips and he said none of them had. The record shows that at least three other employees were issued counseling slips for failing to report their tips. They are still employed by Respondent.

On 18 September 1985, Weiss gave Powers a warning slip for "parking inguest area second warning for same offense." Powers had attended an employee fire education program at the hotel during the day. Because she was not on her regular working time she had parked in an impermissible zone.

E. Powers' Third Evaluation and Second Discharge

On 11 September Powers asked some of her coworkers if they had failed to report tips on occasion. Some employees said they had not reported tips and had not received a counseling slip for the omission.

That evening, a bit after 9 p.m., Powers telephoned day waitress Pat Allison at home. According to Powers, Allison was the spokesperson for the day waitresses and bartenders. In the past, Powers and Allison had discussed problems relating to management and the Union that were of concern to both shifts. Powers had called Allison at home two or three times and Allison had also called Powers at home on occasion. In response to Powers' questions on 11 September, Allison said she had not been warned for failing to report tips. Allison asked Powers what she could do to help; Powers asked her to put in writing "the fact that you were told that some of your tips were missing and that you were not asked to make them up and that you have not received a counsel form." Allison agreed to do this.

On 12 September 1985 Powers filed a charge in Case 3–CA–12872 alleging that Respondent warned and harassed her because of her concerted activities and because she filed charges under the Act. On 2 October 1985 the [7] Indeed, in mid-October 1985, Crafton furnished Powers with a letter of recommendation that stated "whether it is as a banquet waitress, hostess, bartending or clerical position, Bonnie is a professional with a natural ability to sell. She has an excellent attendance record and works well with her fellow employees."

[8] For tax purposes, waitresses were required to report their tips to Respondent once a week by entering the total on the back of their timecard.

Regional Director dismissed the charge; the General Counsel denied the appeal on 30 October 1985.

On 11 October 1985 Union Agent Pete Jenson told Powers that they were going to meet with Franks in the latter's office.[9] At this meeting, Franks said he was counseling Powers for "harassing the employees." When Powers denied that she harassed employees, Franks said, "I have a waitress that says you are harassing her." Franks refused to tell Powers who the waitress was despite Powers' repeated requests that he reveal her name. He repeated, "I have a witness that will come in and testify to the fact that she told me this." When Jenson said that Powers had a right to the information, Franks revealed that the waitress was Allison. Franks added that Powers had "gotten a bunch of statments from employees . . . to take this to the NLRB." Powers denied that she had done that.

Patricia Allison testified that she has been employed as a waitress by Respondent since 1979. She works from 5:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. In her testimony, Allison said, "I speak to everyone. . . . Everyone comes to me if they have a problem. I'm not afraid to open my mouth and speak up." She stated that she "kept up with what's going on" in union affairs. The other employees view her as a spokesperson and as a person who keeps them informed about what is going on between the Union and the Employer. In September 1985, at Powers' request, Allison helped pass around a petition to protest the Union's change in the method of choosing the shop steward. Allison thought the change was not fair. Allison testified that she has called Powers at home about "union business" and the sale of the hotel.

Allison testified that one night she received a phone call from Powers after she had gotten into bed. Allison told Powers she would see what she could do about giving Powers a statement concerning counseling slips. Powers did not call Allison at home again but she called her once at work and spoke to her once at a meeting at the hotel; on that occasion Allison said she had no time to prepare a statement. Powers also asked a group of waitresses for a statement about vacations.[10] When Powers asked Allison if the other waitresses would give her statements, Allison said, she "had no idea. You know, that's none of my business." Allison told Franks 3 days later that, "if I weren't left alone I was going to quit. I don't want to be bothered with problems that do not pertain to my shift or anything that doesn't pertain to me." She told Franks that Powers wanted a letter about employee vacations. By this time, according to Allison, she had heard other people tell Powers they did not want to be involved and she felt "let everybody start speaking for themselves." Allison testified that the first time she told Powers she did not want to be bothered with her problems was at a grievance meeting attended by Powers, Jenson, Franks, and employee Barbara Thornton. This meeting took place on 15 October 1985. Before the meeting began, Allison told Powers, "I have been approached by several employees that because they see the way that you are being treated they do not want to be involved with the matter."

At the 15 October grievance meeting Allison said Powers had called her at home. Powers asked Allison, "Do you feel that I am personally harassing you?" Allison replied, "No, but I am tired of other people coming to me because of your problems." In reply to Powers' question concerning what constituted harassment, Franks said, "Asking someone to do something more than once." Powers then stated that she had not asked any employees to do something more than once. She had asked several employees if they would provide her with statements about disparate treatment relating to nonreported tips and the refusal to grant her vacation after she was reinstated. Powers wanted the letters so she could file a grievance under the contract. Franks mentioned that Powers had gotten some letters to take to the NLRB. At the close of the meeting Jenson asked that the counseling be withdrawn and when Franks refused, Jenson told him the Union would file a grievance.

On 5 November 1985 Powers and Union Representative Wolfgang Hammer met with Franks in the latter's office. Franks destroyed the counseling form he had previously prepared concerning Powers' alleged harassment of other employees. He showed Powers and Hammer a new warning notice. The notice read:

> Bonnie is requested not to bother other employee [sic] by calling them late at night, after other employees haved [sic] asked not to be bothered.

Powers said she did not agree with it and wanted to file a grievance but Hammer said the Union would drop the grievance.

Franks then handed Hammer Powers' third evaluation and said that Powers was terminated. Franks said, "We tried to be fair. The contract with the Union calls for two bad evaluations as grounds for dismissal."

Franks testified that about 27 September 1985 Allison came to see him in his office. She told him that she was being harassed or bothered and she was upset about a call she had received about 10 p.m. one night. Allison said Powers wanted to get "things together against management." Allison told Franks that if he did not fix this problem she would quit. Franks acknowledge that Allison mentioned that Powers was collecting letters for the NLRB. He wrote a counseling form about Powers' conduct in "harassing other employees." After the meeting with Powers and Jenson on 15 October, he destroyed that form and issued a new one that referred to a late-night phone call. Before he gave this counseling form to Powers, he prepared her third evaluation dated 4 November and he decided to discharge her.

Franks testified that there was only a limited discussion with Powers of her final evaluation on 5 November 1985. Franks told Powers and Hammer that Powers' "biggest single problem was the attitude and the fact that she just consistently . . . broke rules when she's a very bright girl and she knows better and I felt we were being flaunted [sic] and there was just no way . . . we could work it out." Franks marked Powers "not acceptable"

[9] At some point, Powers had asked that a union representative be present whenever she was counseled by management.

[10] Powers believed that Franks has discriminatorily refused to grant her vacation time after she was reinstated in June 1985.

under "attitude" partly because of the number of counseling slips she had received. Powers received six slips during her employment. He marked "attendance" "average," but he did not review her timecards and he did not know if her attendance had changed from the time of the last evaluation. He marked her "average" on "ability to learn" based on his intuition. He marked "average" for "appearance and dress code"; this was a "subjective score" and not based on any occasion when she was in improper attire. On "initiative," Franks graded Powers "average" based on his "subjective observations." He stated that her initiative had not changed from other evaluations.[11] Franks graded her "average" on "cleanliness of work area." He stated that Powers needed to be reminded to clean her work station more than the other waitresses. He rated Powers "not acceptable" in "ability to get along with fellow workers." Overall, Franks rated Powers as "needs improvement." Franks based his decision to discharge Powers on her three evaluations. He stated that he was required to show a "series of at least two evaluations that we're having a problem before we can terminate."[12] Franks testified that a major problem was reflected in the "not acceptable" rating under "ability to get along with fellow workers." This was due to Powers' penchant for chatting with other employees off her work station.

Franks did not consult Food and Beverage Director Crafton in deciding to discharge Powers, nor did Franks consult Crafton about the two evaluations he performed of Powers' work. Crafton testified that she could not recall any other instances when she was not consulted about the discipline or discharge of an employee under her jurisdiction. The parties stipulated that in response to a subpoena duces tecum issued by the General Counsel for all evaluations performed by Franks from 23 May to 5 November 1985, Respondent produced records that showed that Crafton evaluated all the food and beverage employees. The only exceptions were Franks' two evaluations of Powers dated 30 July and 4 November 1985.

Kevin King became assistant director of food and beverage on 30 September 1985. His duties are performed primarily on the night shift. Crafton is his superior. King testified that he came on duty at 1 p.m., 6 days per week. King "pretty much ran things" at night and when none of his superiors was on the premises. He stated that Franks usually went home for dinner between 6 and 7 p.m. and then returned briefly to observe the operation and see that everything was running smoothly. Franks and King touched base during that time. About 1 week after he began working for Respondent, King talked to Franks about the employees on the night shift. He asked Franks if there was a problem with Powers, and Franks replied that Respondent had issued several counseling forms to her. King said that Powers did not seem happy but he testified that he could not relate any specific incidents. "There was never a problem with any disrespect to a guest or anything like that, but it was just very workman like, not smiling." He believed that Powers felt disdain for management.

King never evaluated Powers nor did he issue her any counseling slips although he issued counseling slips to other employees before Powers was discharged. King acknowledged that if something was done wrong it was his practice to talk to the employee and issue a counseling slip. King testified that Powers "was a very competent waitress."

King testified that he saw Franks' final evaluation of Powers before it was given to Powers and that he agreed with it "completely." He thought the decision to discharge Powers was a "good one," but stated that his reason "was kind of hard to explain." All he could say was that Powers "brought down the attitude of the staff." On cross-examination, when King was asked to give an example of how Powers affected the attitude of other employees, King said that while Powers was there the night-shift waitress who had worked the longest shift would go home earlier than the others. King said this was not against company policy. He repeated that he could not give any examples of Powers' attitude because there were "really no specific instances," but he thought that Powers was not happy working for Respondent.

F. Discussion and Conclusions

I find that, with one exception, the witnesses testified truthfully. Certain minor inconsistencies are present in the testimony, doubtless due to the passage of time. I credit the testimony of Powers, Crafton, King, and Allison. I find that Franks was not a candid or forthright witnesses. I shall not credit Franks where his testimony is inconsistent with that of other witnesses.

By the time of Franks' first evaluation of Powers, Weiss had suggested to Powers that the employees would be better off without a union; Weiss had told Powers he would fire her at the Union's behest, Weiss had found out that Powers had taped his remarks and provided them to the Board; and Weiss fired Powers and then reinstated her in exchange for the withdrawal of the charges she had filed. Clearly, Respondent had identified Powers as a spokesperson for employees and one who asserted her rights under the Act by filing charges.

Franks performed Powers' first evaluation even though he evaluated none of the other night waitresses; these were evaluated by Crafton, their immediate supervisor. Franks' rating of Powers was not good; he concluded she "needs improvement."

Crafton's evaluation of Powers on 4 September was unstructured and not based on any set of criteria. As Powers' immediate supervisor, she rated Powers "average" and she thought the evaluation was an improvement over the previous one carried out by Franks. Before this evaluation was given to Powers, Franks told Crafton to downgrade Powers for talking with other employees even though Crafton had never observed Powers doing this. Respondent urges that Crafton's evaluation of Powers on 4 September 1985 was unsatisfactory. However, I do not find that this is the fact. Crafton told Powers that she was pleased with the evaluation because it was an improvement over the last one. Powers' total rating [11] In fact, Franks had seen to it that Powers was graded "needs improvement" for "initiative" on the two prior evaluations.

[12] In fact, the contract provides that "two consecutive unsatisfactory evaluations will constitute grounds for dismissal."

was "average" and there is no evidence in the record before me to support the proposition that the word "average" bears any other than its common meaning. I do not find that the evaluation of 4 September was unsatisfactory.

Franks' testimony about Powers' evaluation dated 4 November shows that this evaluation was performed with a lack of standards and structure. Franks downgraded Powers' rating for "attendance" from "good" to "average" without consulting Powers' attendance records; he admitted that he did not know if her attendance had declined from the time of the last evaluation. He marked Powers in several categories based on "intuition" and "subjective judgment." There was no attempt on his part to compare Powers to other employees or even to her own past performance. Franks admitted that he marked Powers "not acceptable" under "attitude" because of the number of counseling slips she had received. This included the counseling slip issued on 5 November to replace the slip he had attempted to give her in October for asking her fellow employees to give her written statements.

The facts surrounding the last warning slip are highly significant. It is clear that Allison told Franks that Powers had been asking employees for statements concerning disparate issuance of counseling slips for unreported tips and for statements about the disparate granting of vacations. Franks understood the statements were going to be given to the NLRB. The evidence shows that until Franks called a meeting with Powers and asked Allison to attend no employee had told Powers to stop asking for written statements. Further, from Allison's comment to Powers before the meeting of 15 October began, the record is clear that a number of employees were upset over Respondent's treatment of Powers and they wished to disassociate themselves from Powers' efforts to enforce her rights under the collective-bargaining agreement and under the Act. But instead of informing Powers of this, they informed Franks. Then Franks used this information as a pretext to charge Powers with harassing employees after they had asked her not to. Franks had no proof that Powers had done anything improper. Certainly, after the meeting of 15 October, he knew that Allison had never before asked Powers not to call her, yet he issued a warning slip for this on 5 November when he discharged Powers. Franks also knew that Allison was a spokesperson for the staff and that she had been active in employee affairs. Under these circumstances, he had no basis for reprimanding Powers forcalling to discuss working conditions with Allison. The warning slip of 5 November was issued because Franks found out that Powers was collecting statements to enforce her rights under the contract and the Act and "getting things together against management." It was, therefore, unlawful.[13]

With respect to the warning or counseling slips issued to Powers, I find that Powers was singled out for harsh treatment. Beginning with Powers' exercise of her rights in June 1985, Respondent was trying to build a case against her and it issued counseling slips to her in circumstances in which other employees would not have received them. Crafton testified that she had warned employees orally about eating food not authorized for employee meals but that she had never issued a written warning for this conduct. Powers testified credibly that Franks had never given her the warning slip dated 26 August 1985 for improper parking. Finally, the last warning slip for calling employees at home after they have asked not to be called was undeserved. The record shows that Allison did not ask Powers not to call her at home until Franks told Allison to attend the grievance meeting.

Significantly, Franks did not consult Crafton, Powers' immediate supervisor, about the decision to fire Powers. He did consult King, Crafton's newly hired assistant. Both Crafton and King testified that Powers was a very competent waitress and neither could give an example of behavior engaged in by Powers for which Powers should have been discharged. Neither Crafton nor King testified that they saw Powers engage in the acts cited by Franks in his evaluations of Powers: Neither of them saw her spending too much time talking to other employees, nor failing to use free time to clean the workplace, nor failing to spend enough time with patrons. Franks testified that Powers did not show "initiative" in cleaning her work area, yet Powers' supervisors did not find that this was the case. Indeed, Powers was consistently rated "average" by Franks on "cleanliness of work area."

In view of the fact that Franks singled out Powers for evaluation although he evaluated none of the other food and beverage employees, and in view of the fact that Powers' direct supervisors did not see any of the failings Franks cited, I do not believe that Franks in fact observed Powers engage in the acts for which Franks gave her a bad evaluation on 5 November 1985. It is clear that Franks singled out Powers for harsher evaluation than the other employees in order to develop a pretext for discharging her. After Franks' unfavorable evaluation of Powers on 30 July, Crafton had given Powers an improved evaluation; subsequently, Franks again took over the task of evaluating Powers so that Respondent would have a pretext for discharging her.[14]

Although both Crafton and King testified that they agreed with Franks' decision to discharge Powers, it is obvious that they tailored their testimony with respect to their opinions as a courtesy to Franks; they could give no specific reasons to support the discharge and both of them expressed the conviction that Powers was a good employee who did her job well.

Respondent urges that Powers' discharge is comparable to that of Di Trapano, but the facts belie this assertion. Di Trapano received two evaluations from Crafton:

[13] NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984); Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882 (1986).

[14] Respondent's actions were based on pretexts. I do not find any evidence to support a dual motivation such as was discussed in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). Even if a dual-motive analysis were performed, however, discharge would be unlawful. Respondent has not shown that any other employees were discharged, nor that Powers would have been discharged, for failing to report tips, parking in the wrong space, eating one piece of broccoli, or failing to replace the dessert tray.

"needs improvement" and "not acceptable." The first evaluation clearly informed Di Trapano that she had 30 days to improve specific areas.[15] Powers did not have two consecutive unsatisfactory evaluations. Thus, Respondent's reliance on the collective-bargaining agreement is a pretext.

I note further that Franks testified inconsistently about the purpose of the counseling slips. He stated that they were not warnings and were meant only to provide a basis for discussion between management and the employee. He stated that the slips were not part of a system of progressive discipline. But he also stated that Powers' bad evaluation was based in part on the number of counseling slips she had received.

I find that Respondent pursued a course of conduct with respect to Powers so that it could discharge her in retaliation for her actions in providing evidence to the Board and seeking to enforce her rights under the collective-bargaining agreement and under the Act. In furtherance of Respondent's aims, I find that Respondent disparately issued counseling slips to Powers and disparately evaluated her. It is clear that a major factor in Respondent's final discharge of Powers was the warning notice issued to Powers on 5 November 1985. That notice was based on Powers' actions in seeking to collect statements from other employees to enforce her rights under the Act and under the contract. The warning notice was pretextual in that Powers had not engaged in the conduct cited therein, namely, calling employees late at night after they had asked not to be called. Although Respondent urges that Powers was fired because of bad evaluations, I find that those evaluations were also unfair in that they were based on pretextual misdeeds and on disparate and arbitrary standards. Respondent has thus violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act. NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, supra; NLRB v. Scrivener, 405 U.S. 117 (1972).

CONCLUSION OF LAW

By warning and discharging its employee Bonita Powers because she engaged in concerted activities and because she gave an affidavit and other evidence to the Board, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent, having discriminatorily discharged Bonita Powers, must offer her reinstatement and make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of discharge to date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[16]

Respondent must remove from its records any mention of Powers' discharge on 5 November 1985. In addition, Respondent must remove from its files the evaluation of 4 November 1985 on which the discharge was based and the warning notice of 5 November 1985 that was unlawfully issued to Powers.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[17]

ORDER

The Respondent, Hudson Valley Hotels, Ltd. d/b/a Quality Inn Albany, Albany, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Warning and discharging its employees because they engage in concerted activities and provide affidavits and evidence to the Board.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Bonita Powers immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against her, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of 5 November 1985, the evaluation of 4 November 1985, and the warning notice of 5 November 1985, and notify Bonita Powers in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Albany facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[18] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in [15] Di Trapano had problems with attendance, tardiness, appearance of guest checks, and conflicts with coworkers. She was warned about this. She was fired because she continued to come in late, she continued to write illegible guest checks, and she continued conflicts with her fellow workers.

[16] The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial order is denied.

[17] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[18] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Cedar Rapids Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL–CIO, and Five Rivers District Council of Carpenters and Siebke-Hoyt and Company. Case 18–CC–1116

27 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 13 August 1986 Administrative Law Judge Martin J. Linsky issued the attached decision. The Respondent Unions filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Cedar Rapids Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL–CIO, and Five Rivers District Council of Carpenters, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Picketing or picketing and handbilling at or near the Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store where an object thereof is to force or require Siebke-Hoyt and Company or any other person to cease doing business with Technical Specialty Systems Corporation or RTP Corporation."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] In agreeing with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent Unions engaged in conduct violative of Sec. 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act, we find it unnecessary to pass on the legality of the handbilling alone. See Nashville Building Trades Council (Casner-Knott), 188 NLRB 470, 473 (1971); Building Trades Council of Fond du Lac (Peters Construction), 168 NLRB 606 fn. 1 (1967).

[2] The judge included in his recommended Order a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondents under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Board's Order. In the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT picket or picket and handbill at or near the Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store where an object thereof is to force or require Siebke-Hoyt and Company or any other person to cease doing business with Technical Specialty Systems Corporation or RTP Corporation.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce Siebke-Hoyt and Company or any other person engaged in commerce with an object of forcing them to cease doing business with Technical Specialty Systems Corporation or RTP Corporation.

CEDAR RAPIDS BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES COUNCIL, AFL–CIO, AND FIVE RIVERS DISTRICT COUNCIL OF CARPENTERS

Robert V. Johnson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Robert F. Wilson, Esq., of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, for the Respondent.
Kevin Visser, Esq., of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARTIN J. LINSKY, Administrative Law Judge. On 8 and 14 April 1986 Siebke-Hoyt and Company filed a charge and first amended charge, respectively, against Cedar Rapids Building and Construction Trades Council AFL–CIO (Respondent Trades Council), and Five Rivers District Council of Carpenters (Respondent Carpenters). Following an investigation the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 18, issued a complaint and notice of hearing in Case 18–CC–1116 alleging that Respondent Trades Council and Respondent Carpenters violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) when it picketed and handbilled in front of the Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store, which is located in a building in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in another part of which building Hoyt Real Estate and contracted with two nonunion contractors, i.e., Technical Specialty Systems Corporation (Technical Specialty) and RTP Corporation (RTP) to do construction work. Respondent filed an answer in which they denied that they violated the Act in any way.

A hearing was held in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, on 29 May 1986.

On the entire record in this case to include posthearing briefs submitted by the General Counsel and Respondent, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Siebke-Hoyt and Company is an Iowa corporation, with an office and place of business in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where it is engaged in the wholesale and retail sale and distribution of jewerly.

Technical Specialty Systems Corporation is an Iowa corporation with an office and place of business in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where it is engaged in the reconstruction, repair, and renovation of building exteriors.

RTP Corporation is an Iowa corporation with an office and place of business in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where it is engaged in the renovation and remodeling of interiors of commercial and residential buildings.

Respondents admit, and I find, that Siebke-Hoyt and Company, Technical Specialty, and RTP are now, and have been at all times material, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

Respondent Trades Council and Respondent Carpenters admit, and I find, that they are now, and have been at all times material, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The statute Respondents are alleged to have violated is Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act, which provides as follows:

> [8(b)] It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—
> (4)(i) to engage in, or to induce or encourage any individual employed by an person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in, a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services; or (ii) to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where in either case an object thereof if—
> (B) forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person, or forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9: Provided, That nothing contained in this clause (B) shall be construed to make unlawful, where not otherwise unlawful, any primary strike or primary picketing.

Siebke-Hoyt and Company owns a building in downtown Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Part of the building is occupied by a jewelry store, which is owned by Siekbe-Hoyt and Company and is known as the Siebke-Hoyt Jewelry Store. The owners of Siebke-Hoyt and Company are two brothers each of whom has 50-percent interest in Siebke-Hoyt and Company. The two brothers, one of whom, Joseph J. Hoyt, testified at the hearing, also are equal owners of JMH Properties, Inc., which does business as Hoyt Real Estate. Hoyt Real Estate manages some properties, to include the building owned by Siebke-Hoyt and Company. In addition to the Siebke-Hoyt Jewelry Store, the building contains a health food store and a travel agency. The travel agency wanted to expand its operation and this required renovation of the interior and exterior of that part of the building in which the travel agency was located. No work was required to be done in that part of the building—inside or outside—where the Siebke-Hoyt Jewelry Store was located.

Joseph J. Hoyt, on behalf of Hoyt Real Estate, contracted with Technical Specialty to do some exterior work on the building and he contracted with RTP to do some interior work on the building. Both Technical Specialty and RTP are nonunion contractors whose employees make less in wages and fringe benefits than their union counterparts who are represented by Respondent Trades Council and Respondent Carpenters.

On several days between 31 March and 9 April 1986, picketing and handbilling occurred, on occasion at the same time, at the building in which the work was being done by the nonunion contractors. Sometimes the picketing and handbilling took place in front of the Siebke-Hoyt Jewelry Store and sometimes it took place down the block from the jewelry store where there was an entrance into the construction area large enough for vehicles to go.

The picketing consisted of the carrying of two signs. On one of the signs was some writing, but no witness at the hearing was able to testify about what it said. The other sign was identified in the record as a "rat busters" sign, i.e., a sign with a picture of a rat with a red circle around it with a red line draw through it. No writing appeared on the "rat buster" sign.

The handbilling consisted of persons, including James Christiansen, business agent for Respondent Carpenters, handing out two different handbills.[1]

[1] Over vigorous objection from Respondents' counsel, I permitted the General Counsel to reopen his case after the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and Respondents (neither the Charging Party nor Respondents had put on any evidence) had all rested. I did so after I brought to the General Counsel's attention that he had introduced no evidence that Respondent Carpenters was involved in any way with the picketing and handbilling. The General Counsel promptly moved to reopen his case, called Respondent Carpenters Business Agent Christiansen to the stand, and established Respondent Carpenters participation. Respondents object

One of the handbills was as follows:

> Cedar Rapids Building and Construction Trades Council Wants you to know:
> That SIEBKE & HOYT has contracted some of the reconstruction and renovation of their building at the corner of Third Street and Second Avenue S.E. to TECHNICAL SPECIALTY SYSTEMS, INC. They are not signatory to any local bargaining agreements and are jeopardizing wages and standards in this area that have been established by Collective Bargaining."

The other handbill was as follows:

> Cedar Rapids Building and Construction Trades Council Wants you to know:
> That SIEBKE & HOYT has contracted some of the reconstruction and renovation of their building at the corner of Third Street and Second Avenue S.E. to TECHNICAL SPECIALTY SYSTEMS, INC. AND RTP CORPORATION. They are not signatory to any local bargaining agreements and are jeopardizing wages and standards in this area that have been established by Collective Bargaining."

A number of employees and customers of Siebke-Hoyt Jewelry Store brought copies of the handbills into the jewelry store and gave them to Joseph J. Hoyt. There is no evidence that work in the jewelry store was interrupted and no evidence that the jewelry store lost any business. The picketing and handbilling ceased after 9 April 1986 (although Joseph J. Hoyt had requested that it cease earlier than this in requests to Clair Scott, president of Respondent Trades Council). No injunctive relief was ever sought by the General Counsel.

It is the contention of the General Counsel that Respondents had a primary labor dispute with the two nonunion contractors and not with Siebke-Hoyt Jewelry Store or Hoyt Real Estate. Therefore, Respondents' picketing and handbilling of Siebke-Hoyt Jewelry Store violated the statute laid out above that prohibits this type of secondary activity, i.e., activity aimed not at the party or parties Respondents have their primary dispute with but at a secondary or neutral target—in this case the jewelry store.

Respondents contend that the law was not violated because what they did constituted lawful truthful informational picketing and was protected by the first amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The information on the handbills was not entirely accurate, however, because it was Hoyt Real Estate and not Siebke-Hoyt and Company that contracted with Technical Specialty and RTP.[2]

Common sense and the drawing of obvious inferences from the handbills and that "rat busters" sign establish that the handbilling and picketing had a "cease-doing-business with" objective, namely, to get jewelry store customers to pressure Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store to cease doing business with Technical Specialty and RTP.

The primary labor dispute was between Respondents, Technical Specialty, and RTP and not between Respondents and Siebke-Hoyt and Company or Hoyt Real Estate. The cases cited by the General Counsel establish that quite clearly [3]

Although an argument based on logic could be made that Respondents' real or primary dispute was with Hoyt Real Estate because they contracted with nonunion contractors to do the work, it is clear beyond all doubt that Respondents primary dispute was not with Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store as a entity. If Respondents' argument had been that "we don't care if Technical Specialty and RTP are non-union we just don't want Hoyt Real Estate to contract with non-union contractors" that argument will fall on deaf ears. A reading of the cases, principally the Supreme Court decision in Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. NLRB, 463 U.S. 147 (1983), and the Board decision following remand in Florida Building Trades Council (DeBartolo Corp.), 273 NLRB 1431 (1985), establish that the primary dispute as a matter of law was not with Siebke-Hoyt and Company or Hoyt Real Estate, but with Technical Specialty and RTP. In that case the Supreme Court and the Board concluded that the Florida Building Trades Council had a primary dispute with H. J. High Construction Company that had contracted a store at a shopping mall for H. J. Wilson Company and had no labor dispute with H. J. Wilson Company.

Accordingly, Respondents violated the Act, specifically Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), in picketing and handbilling Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store with the purpose of getting Siebke-Hoyt and Company to cease doing business with Technical Specialty and RTP.

With respect to Respondents' argument that the picketing and handbilling in this case are protected by the first admendment, I can only state and do state that in the absence of authoritative case law making Section (8)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act unconstitutional, I will presume, as the Board recently did as regards the same part of the Act, that it is constitutional. Florida Building Trades Council (DeBartolo Corp.), supra.

I have not considered against Respondents a letter, dated 27 March 1986, which the executive secretary of the Hawkeye Labor Council sent to Joseph J. Hoyt complaining about Hoyt's use of nonunion contractors and threating a consumer boycott against the jewelry store. The Hawkeye Labor Council is not a respondent in this case and, although Respondent Carpenters in a member of the Hawkeye Labor Council, there is no evidence that Respondent Carpenters participated in the preparation of this letter or caused it to be prepared and sent. There was hearsay evidence that the letter was sent at the request of the president of Respondent Trades Council, but in their brief to this exercise of discretion on my part but I am confident that in doing what I did to correct an obvious oversight by the General Counsel I did not deprive Respondents of their right to a fair hearing.

[2] There is no evidence that either Siebke-Hoyt and Company or Hoyt Real Estate were general contractors.

[3] Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. NLRB, 463 U.S. 147 (1983); Hospital & Service Employees Local 399 v. NLRB, 743 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1984); NLRB v. Denver Building Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675 (1951); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 501 v. NLRB, 341 U.S. 694 (1951).

I need not and do not rely on the letter to reach the conclusion that the Act was violated.

REMEDY

The remedy in this case should be a cease-and-desist order directing Respondents not to engage in this or similar violations of the law and Respondents should each be directed to post an appropriate notice.[4]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Siebke-Hoyt and Company, Technical Specialty, and RTP are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

3. By picketing and handbilling in front of Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store and attempting to coerce and restrain customers of Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store to cease doing business with the jewelry store in order to force Siebke-Hoyt and Company, who owns the jewelry store, to cease doing business with Technical Specialty and RTP, Respondents engaged in an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondents, Cedar Rapids Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL–CIO, and Five Rivers District Council of Carpenters, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Picketing or handbilling at or near the Siebke-Hoyt and Company Jewelry Store when an object thereof is to force or require Siebke-Hoyt and Company or any other persons to cease doing business with Technical Specialty Systems Corporation or RTP Corporation.

(b) Threatening, coercing, or restraining Siebke-Hoyt and Company or any other person engaged in commerce where an object thereof is to force or require Siebke-Hoyt and Company or any other person to cease doing business with Technical Specialty Systems Corporation or RTP Corporation.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members and employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply therewith. For the purpose of determining or securing compliance with this Order, the Board, or any of its duly authorized representatives, may obtain discovery from the Respondent, its officers, agents, or representatives, or any other person having knowledge concerning any compliance matter, in the manner provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Such discovery shall be conducted under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order and may be had upon any matter reasonably related to compliance with this Order, as enforced by the court.

[4] I do not find a violation of Sec. 8(b)(4)(i) because I do not find that Respondents in doing what they did had as an object to encourage any person to strike or refuse in their employment to handle goods of Siebke-Hoyt and Company.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to an election held 12 January 1987 and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows one vote for and no votes against the Petitioner, with no challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent with this decision, and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

Of the two eligible voters for the 12 January election, only one voted. The Employer filed timely objections to the election, arguing not only that the Petitioner could not be certified on the basis of the single vote cast but also that a certification of election results finding that no bargaining representative was selected should be issued, thus barring another election for a year. The Regional Director found merit in the Employer's objection only to the extent that then-current Board precedent held that the single vote cast could not be considered "representative" of unit employee desires,[1] and recommended that a second election be directed.

[1] E.g., Kit Mfg. Co., 198 NLRB 1 (1971); Gold & Baker, 54 NLRB 869 (1944).

Subsequent to the Regional Director's report the Board issued its decision in Lemco Construction, 283 NLRB No. 68 (Mar. 31, 1987), in which it stated (slip op. at 5–6):

> [W]e have decided to abandon any analysis dependent on a numerical test to determine the validity of a representation election. Rather, we will issue certifications where there is adequate notice and opportunity to vote and employees are not prevented from voting by the conduct of a party or by unfairness in the scheduling or mechanics of the election. Precedent such as Kit Mfg. and Gold & Baker are inconsistent with this approach and are, accordingly, overruled.

In the present case, only one of two eligible employees voted. The Employer alleges that both were present at the polling place immediately prior to the election. Pursuant to Lemco, in the absence of any claim or evidence that the nonvoting employee lacked adequate notice and opportunity to vote and was not prevented from voting by the conduct of a party or by unfairness in the scheduling or mechanics of the election, the results of the election will stand. Accordingly, we will certify the Petitioner.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Local 32B–32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All regular full-time and part-time building service employees employed by the Employer at 147–25 Northern Boulevard, Flushing, New York, but excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 9 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 162, AFL–CIO–CLC, Dayton, Ohio, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

David L. Ness, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Gary A. Snyder, Esq., of Dayton, Ohio, for Local 162.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARION C. LADWIG, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Dayton, Ohio, on 15 September 1986.[1] The charge was filed 16 April and the complaint was issued 30 May.

On 12 and 14 February the Fort Wayne Local 166 requested the Union (Local 162) to refer seven of its Dayton Journeymen, five of whom the Union had named on 20 January at Local 166's request. The Union referred them under its established procedure of referring persons requested by name for work outside its jurisdictional area.

The primary issues are whether the Union, the Respondent (a) "arbitrarily failed to follow its established system for referrals" when it referred the requested journeymen instead of seven other members who were higher on the out-of-work list, which is used for referrals inside its jurisdictional area, and (b) unlawfully used the word "member" instead of "person" in its hiring hall rules, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On the entire record, including my obervation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after considering the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Union, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Tibbetts Mechanical Corporation, a Division of Natkin & Company is an Indiana corporation that engages as a mechanical contractor in the building and construction industry at Anderson, Indiana, and annually performs services valued over $50,000 outside the State. The Union admits that Tibbetts is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Out-of-Town referrals

1. "Exclusive" hiring halls

The Union and Local 166 are stipulated to be "the sole and exclusive source of referrals of employees . . . within their respective geographical jurisdictions" (Tr. 7, par. 7(a) of the complaint) (emphasis added).

The Union has a collective-bargaining agreement with the employer association in the Dayton area (G.C. Exh. 2). Its hiring hall rules (G.C. Exh. 5) require it to follow its out-of-work list when making referrals within that geographic area, with certain exceptions (recalls, supervisors, and persons with special skills) (Tr. 15–16, 95, 122–123).

Local 166's referral procedure is set out in its working agreement with the employer association in the Fort Wayne area (G.C. Exh. 4, art. X). The agreement requires (sec. 10.15) that all applicants be registered on Local 166's out-of-work list. It further provides (sec. 10.16) that "If the registration list is exhausted" and if Local 166 "is unable to refer" a sufficient number of applicants within 48 hours, "the Employer is free to secure applicants without using the Referral Procedure." It does not set out what obligation if any Local 166 has to furnish workers—through the hiring hall or from other sources—after its right-of-work list is exhausted. The only applicable provisions are those (sec. 10.14) prohibiting discriminatory referrals based on union membership, race, etc. The agreement does not restrict Local 166's referring nonmembers, or members with or without travel cards. It does not restrict Local 166's requesting persons by name when seeking referrals from other locals, and does not restrict the manner in which other locals select persons to be referred, whether from an out-of-work list, on the basis of financial hardship, or otherwise.

The National Construction Agreement (G.C. Exh. 3, art. V, par. 25) contains a procedure for the International to obtain additional journeymen from other locals:

> In the event the local union is unable to supply sufficient qualified and competent journeymen, the Employer may request the United Association to furnish such additional employees it requires and the United Association agrees to notify its local unions of the availability of work and request the local unions to refer journeymen to the Employer.

The national agreement, to which both Local 166 and Tibbetts are bound, therefore provides an alternative procedure for supplying workmen—through the International and other locals—if Local 166 is unable to furnish a sufficient number of journeymen.

Thus, the "exclusive" hiring halls are limited. The Union's hiring hall rules require referrals from its out-of-work list only for work inside its jurisdictional area. Local 166's referral procedure requires referrals from its out-of-work list until the list is exhausted.

2. Procedure for out-of-town referrals

It is undisputed that when making "out-of-town" referrals (for work outside its jurisdictional area) to Local 166 and other locals, the Union has an established procedure of referring journeymen requested by name, without regard to their position on the Union's out-of-work list (Tr. 90–91, 95–96, 104–108, 116–117, 139). The only time the Union follows the out-of-work list in making out-of-town referrals is when another local requests it to supply a number of persons without naming them (Tr. 95, 116, 139). I note that this exception does not exist at Local 776 in Lima, Ohio. Local 776 Business Manager Ronald Bowen credibly testified (Tr. 105–106) that he never follows the out-of-work list when making referrals "out of our jurisdiction." He refers persons who "inform me that they would travel."

The Union's policy is to permit its members to solicit their own work in other jurisdictions. All the member "has to do is pick up a travel card, and he can travel to any of our local unions within the United States or Canada, and secure employment on his own" (Tr. 116, 121). (As found below, Local 166 did not require a travel card.) The Union permits other locals to call its members directly to perform out-of-town work (Tr. 93). If an unemployed journeymen hears about available work in another local's jurisdiction, the Union calls the local and, if requested, refers the journeyman for the available work, without his being at the top of the out-of-work list (Tr. 92, 115). As Union Business Manager Enix testified, the unemployment was high (Tr. 37) and "we check out even rumors, to try to secure job opportunities for our people" (Tr. 123). When Enix learns that out-of-town work is available but he has no request for referrals, he often tells unemployed journeymen that if they go there and "happen to be" in the hiring hall when a call comes in, the local "might put you to work" (Tr. 125).

Registrants retain their position on the out-of-work list when working out of town. As explained by Business Manager Enix, "We do not remove them from the list" because "they are still considered unemployed as far as Local 162 is concerned. . . . We try to work them within our geographical jurisdiction" (Tr. 117–118). If a registrant is working out of town, that information is noted (with his temporary telephone number) beside his name on the list, and "If I would get a call from a local contractor, that man would be called to his home area to work." If the individual refuses to return and wants to stay on the out-of-town job, "he retains his place on top of the list." (Tr. 32, G.C. Exh. 5, rule 1.)

3. Local 166's request for names

The Union was making continuing efforts to find employment in Local 166's area and in other jurisdictions (Tr. 18,37). One of the Union's business representatives telephoned and asked Local 166 Business Manager William Darnell twice about any available work, but Darnell gave him negative responses (Tr. 139–140). On 20 January Business Manager Enix telephoned Darnell again. This time Darnell stated that he may be able to help some of Enix's unemployed members in "six weeks to two months" (without stating where). He said that two of Enix's members, Dean Brill and Howard Mercer, had already been over there seeking employment and told Enix to call back with five other names. (Tr. 19–20.)

As Business Manager Enix credibly testified, "I've been in office 17 years, and I have never had a call like this" before. Darnell was not asking for referrals, but was asking for names of unemployed members for possible work in 6 weeks to 2 months. "It kind of threw me off base." He suspected that it was a ploy to get him off the phone, or a brush-off, but he did not know. (Tr. 119–120.) He obviously had no choice. He must submit the names as Darnell requested or run the risk, during the high unemployment, of losing the possible job opportunities.

Enix had made no preparations for such and unexpected call. He looked at the out-of-work list, but decided that he could not follow it. In all probability "the top names on that list would have been already working locally" by the time Local 166 needed the extra journeymen. If Local 166 did call for them by name and they were not available, the job opportunities could be lost for the Union. (Tr. 23–24, 119.)

Enix recalled individuals who had contacted him personally, telling him "Jim, I'm in dire straits. I need to go to work . . . . they needed to go to work someplace. . . . one of the gentlemen on there, his wife had called me. She said, 'My husband doesn't even know I'm calling you. . . . Jim, we're losing our home, and they're getting ready to take our car.'" He selected five of them and "sneaked in an additional one" from among those who were low enough on the long out-of-work list that they probably would not be working locally if Local 166 did call for men. He then called one of Darnell's agents and gave him the six names, in addition to the names of the two members whom Darnell had already chosen. (Tr. 22, 24–25, 131.)

4. The February out-of-town referrals

The Local 166 jobs became available earlier than expected. After about 3 weeks, on 12 and 14 February, Local 166 called the Union for the referral of the eight journeymen to work in the Fort Wayne area (for an undisclosed employer). Local 166 requested them by name and stated that travel cards and referrals were not required and would not be accepted. Following the Union's established procedure of referring persons requested by name to work outside its jurisdiction, the Union's business representatives routinely relayed the requests to the eight individuals: Brill and Mercer (the two chosen 20 January by Local 166) and David Drake, Duane Greene, Donald Hines, Herbert Starry, Martin Stieger, and John Weaver (the six suggested then by Enix). All of them except Drake reported to Local 166, which referred them to Tibbetts Mechanical Contractors on 17 February. Local 166 did not request anyone to replace Drake. (Tr. 120–121, 135–138, 141–144.)

Journeyman Daniel O'Hearn, the Charging Party, spoke to Business Manager Enix on 17 February about these referrals (that were properly noted on the out-of-work list). O'Hearn asked how these people got requested and Enix said he had previously given their names to the business agent in Fort Wayne because (in O'Hearn's words) "they was out of unemployment or was running out of unemployment. . . . Mr. Enix told me that he was just trying to be fair, and asked me how he could be fair about it. And I asked him if he would get myself and my brother, Michael O'Hearn, over there because we was both out of work and needed a job at the time." (Tr. 35, 77, 80–82.) Enix credibly testified that he responded that if O'Hearn and his brother "would happen to be in [Local 166's] office, and they have a call for help they might put you to work." (Tr. 125.)

I note that although O'Hearn and his brother were not at the top of the out-of-work-list the Union had earlier referred O'Hearn to Local 776 in Lima, Ohio, when Local 776 requested him by name. (Tr. 90, R. Exh. 4.) His brother, Michael, had worked out of town in the Lima area without a referral from the Union when he was contracted directly by Local 776. (Tr. 93.)

I also note that although O'Hearn and the other six members listed in the complaint were higher on the the out-of-work list than those referred, Business Manager Enix would not have given their names to Local 166 on 20 January. Local 166 had asked for only five names (besides Brill and Mercer). Two of those listed in the complaint (John Skaggs and Willis Williamson) were then working (Tr. 26, 130); two of them (Daniel Spicer and Ted Woodburry) had been on sick leave (Tr. 26, 132, R. Exh. 1); and one (Kevin Shiveley) had advised Enix that he wanted only in-town work. (Tr. 110.) (Shiveley credibly testified (Tr. 111–112) that he would not have accepted a referral to Local 166 and that he had "no idea" why his name was included in the list of persons discriminated against.) The other two members listed in the complaint (Warren Giles and O'Hearn) had been working out of town. (Tr. 87–88, 130.)

5. The General Counsel's contentions

The complaint alleges that in mid-February the Union "arbitrarily failed to follow its established system for referrals" when, as requested by Local 166, it referred employees to work for Tibbetts within Local 166's jurisdiction and failed to refer seven employees, violating Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2). Thus the litigated issue is whether the Union violated the Act in mid-February by arbitrarily failing to follow "its established system for referrals" and failing to refer seven members who were higher on the Union's out-of-work list than the seven journeymen referred.

Recognizing this to be the issue, the General Counsel contends in her brief that the Union "violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act in mid-February when it arbitrarily failed to follow its established system for referral." She does not, however, dispute the fact that (a) the Union had an established procedure of referring journeymen requested by other locals by name, regardless of their position on the out-of-town list and (b) in mid-February (on 12 and 14 February) when Local 166 requested the journeymen by name, the Union followed this established procedure. She admits that the Union "honored other locals' requests for specific individuals," and she does not dispute that the Union acted in good faith.

In the absence of proof of the allegation that the Union violated the Act in mid-February by not following "its established system for referrals," the General Counsel relies on two principal theories for contending that the Union acted unlawfully. One is that the Union, in effect, violated the Act on 20 January when Business Manager Enix gave Local 166 the names of available unemployed members. She contends (a) that Enix deviated from the out-of-work list in selecting referrals for the Tibbetts job, (b) that his method of selecting referrals was "haphazard," (c) that reliance on the financial plight of members in making referrals is wholly subjective and indicative of the unlawful operation of an exclusive hiring hall system, and (d) that he lacked any justifiable reason for deviating from the Union's referral procedure. There were no referrals on 20 January and the complaint does not allege any unlawful conduct in January.

The General Counsel's other theory is based on the Board's agency rationale in Plumbers Local 513 (Master Plumbers), 264 NLRB 415, 416–417 (1982). In that case the Board found that the respondent local, when requested by two other locals to refer unnamed applicants, was acting as an agent of those locals under their hiring halls when it failed to follow its "well-established procedure for referrals." Here, in contrast, when the Union was asked on 12 and 14 February to refer named employees, it followed its established referral procedure.

In expounding this theory, the General Counsel contends that Business Manager Enix "referred members of the Tibbetts job within Local 166's geographic jurisdiction" (even though Enix was not aware of the identity of the employer). Local 116 "had an exclusive hiring hall arrangement with Tibbetts and "was contractually obligated to furnish workers for Tibbetts from the hiring hall" (by making referrals from the Local 166 out-of-work list). "When Enix inquired with Local 166 [on 20

January about] the availability of jobs within its area, Local 166 authorized Enix to secure the needed employees." (To the contrary, Enix was authorized merely to suggest five of seven applicants that might be needed in 6 weeks to 2 months.)

The General Counsel theorizes that when the Union made the referrals (on 12 and 14 February), "Enix was authorized by Local 166 to fulfill its contractual obligation to furnish workers to Tibbetts from the [Local 166] hiring hall," and therefore the Union was acting pursuant to an exclusive hiring hall. I do not agree.

First, Enix was never authorized to furnish workers for the Local 166 hiring hall. The Union's unemployed members were registered on the Union's Dayton out-of-work list, not on Local 166's Fort Wayne out-of-work list. There was no way the Union could refer its members from the Local 166 hiring hall's out-of-work list.

Second, the Union was not acting pursuant to its own exclusive hiring hall when it made the 12 and 14 February referrals outside its jurisdictional area. As stipulated, the Union was "the sole and exclusive source of referrals" within its geographic jurisdiction. As interpreted by its executive board (Tr. 95), the hiring hall rules governing referrals from the Dayton out-of-work list cover only the Dayton jurisdictional area. The Union was not obligated to follow its out-of-work list when referring the requested journeymen to work outside its jurisdiction.

I therefore find, contrary to the General Counsel's argument, that the mid-February referrals were not made pursuant to either Local 166's exclusive hiring hall or the Union's exclusive hiring hall. They were made pursuant to the Union's established procedure of referring journeymen requested by other locals by name, for employment outside the geographic area.

6. The Union's contentions

The Union contends that it acted lawfully. It argues that "there was no allegation or proof of breach of a contractual obligation by officers" of the Union because "the situs of work was outside the contractual jurisdiction" of the Union.

The Union contends that when Business Manager Enix placed a call to the Fort Wayne Local about 20 January to see if any work was available, there was no request for the Union to furnish manpower because of an immediate need. "There was only a potential for work opportunities in the future with a request made to provide names of those who might be unemployed at some future, unspecified time." Enix "could not have been an agent fulfilling Local 166's contractual requirements" when he supplied the names of unemployed persons "because in fact there were no employees required by Fort Wayne." Enix could not follow the Union's out-of-work list at that time because "had Enix named only those at the top of the list" and "if they were working when" Local 166 called for them, "Local 162 would lose out in its attempt to get work for its personnel."

Then when Local 166 did call (on 12 and 14 February) and asked for the individuals by name, the Union "followed its established policy of filling the request in that manner." There was "no proof whatsoever of unlawful motive," and "No evidence was offered to show hostility toward anyone."

The Union cites many reasons for distinguishing Plumbers Local 513, which it criticizes as the "lone case" extending liability to a local union as an agent.

> To extend even further the liability of a local union seeking to secure work for unemployed members, beyond the once-believed limitations confined to the local's own contractual hiring hall and beyond the aberration created in Plumbers Local 513, would be a serious if not devastating blow to those local unions seeking to attain full employment in these difficult times faced by building trades unions. To further shackle business managers who in good faith make such efforts, would be intolerable. Such a quantum leap in the law of agency would be unsupported and unjustified.

Although conceding that "there are obviously some slight differences between this case" and Plumbers Local 513 (Tr. 101), the General Counsel argues in her brief that the Board's decision in Plumbers Local 513 is controlling. I disagree and find that it is clearly distinguishable. I therefore do not rule on the Union's opposition to extending that decision.

7. Concluding findings

On 20 January, when Business Manager Enix sought information about available jobs in Local 166's Fort Wayne area, Local 166 Business Manager Darnell confronted him with a unique situation. Contrary to the facts in Plumbers Local 513, 264 NLRB at 416, Darnell did not authorize Enix to act as an agent to secure emplyees. Darnell merely stated that he may be able to help some of Enix's unemployed members in 6 weeks to 2 months. Darnell said that two of Enix's Dayton members had already been there seeking employment and told Enix to call back with five other names. Instead of being authorized to make referrals for employment, Enix was authorized only to suggest names of unemployed persons that Darnell might or might not call for in the future, depending on whether Darnell decided he needed them. As found, Enix obviously had no choice but to suggest names as Darnell requested. Otherwise he would run the risk of losing the possible job opportunities.

Faced with such a request (the first time in his 17 years in office), Enix decided that he could not use the Union's out-of-work list. Persons at the top of the list would probably be working locally in 6 weeks to 2 months. If he gave Local 166 their names and they were not available for out-of-town work when (and if) Local 166 called, the job opportunities because of the high unemployment could be lost to the Dayton local.

Not having anticipated the request for names of possible future employment, Enix had no list of unemployed journeymen facing particularly great financial hardship. He recalled some who had contacted him personally about their dire financial straits and gave their names to Local 166.

Contrary to the General Counsel's contentions, Local 166 did not on 20 January "authorize Enix to secure the needed employees" and did not authorize him to furnish workers from the Local 166 hiring hall. Enix was therefore not an agent of Local 166 when suggesting names for possible future employment.

There was also no violation of the Act on 12 and 14 February when the Union routinely followed its established procedure and referred the journeymen whom Local 166 requested by name. The Union made the referrals in good faith. It had no motive to circumvent the out-of-work list by suggesting five of the names over 3 weeks earlier for possible jobs in 6 weeks to 2 months, as a way of protecting possible job opportunities. Moreover, the Union's hiring hall rules are limited to referrals within its jurisdictional area. The Union had no obligation to follow its out-of-work list when referring the requested journeymen outside its geographic area.

I therefore find that the Union did not in mid-February arbitrarily fail to follow its established system for referrals and did not unlawfully fail to refer seven employees as alleged in the complaint. Accordingly, I find that these 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) allegations must be dismissed.

B. Hiring Hall Rules

The complaint alleges that the Union adopted hiring hall rules providing for the referral of only members to position of employment. These rules (G.C. Exh. 5) do use the word "member" throughout to refer to persons signing the out-of-work list.

At the trial the Union took the position that the word is of historical use and not a word of art. "We can and will change that provision. . . . We think the word 'person' would be appropriate to insert in all those places where the word 'member' is now listed." (Tr. 11–12.)

I find a technical violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By using the word "member" in its hiring hall rules to refer to persons signing the out-of-work list, the Union engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union did not arbitrarily fail to follow its established system for referrals or unlawfully fail to refer employees.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 162, AFL–CIO–CLC, Dayton, Ohio, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Using the word "member" in its hiring hall rules to refer to persons signing the out-of-work list.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its office and hiring hall copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[3] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT use the word "member" in our hiring hall rules to refer to persons signing the out-of-work list.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

27 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 17 June 1986 the Regional Director for Region 30 of the National Labor Relations Board issued an order withdrawing notice of representation hearing and dismissing petition in the above-titled proceeding. The Regional Director found that Wisconsin Bell, the Employer, and Communications Workers of America, Local 4603, the Union, had entered into an agreement on 24 September 1984 to amend their then current collective-bargaining agreement to merge the newly certified unit of Public Service Center employees at the Kossow Road location into a larger unit of employees,[1] and that therefore the unit petitioned for in this proceeding was not appropriate for purposes of a decertification election. Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Petitioner filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's dismissal. By order dated 17 December 1986, the Board granted the request for review, as it raised substantial issues with respect to whether there had been a merger of the originally certified unit sought here into a larger unit that could best be resolved on the basis of record evidence. On 20 January 1987 a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Gary Prochnow. Thereafter, on 21 January 1987, the case was transferred to the Board for decision in accordance with its 17 December 1986 order.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the entire record in this proceeding, including the briefs of the parties, and has decided to affirm the Regional Director's dismissal.

The Employer and the Union have had an ongoing collective-bargaining relationship for many years. The first contract covering a unit of commercial employees was effective either in 1974 or 1977.[2] Since that time, there have been a series of successive 3-year contracts, the most current of which is effective 10 August 1986 through 12 August 1989. Each of the contracts has consisted of a main body with common clauses and four separate appendices. Historically, appendix D has covered commercial employees. Prior to the 1983 agreement, each of the commercial units was listed separately in the appendix by geographic area and was considered a separate bargaining unit. During bargaining for the 1983 agreement, however, the Union and the Employer agreed that all existing units in appendix D would be combined into one overall unit represented by the Union. The parties further agreed that any newly certified groups of commercial employees in the future would be included in the overall commercial unit described in appendix D. These changes were reflected in the 1983 agreement by the deletion of the phrase "separate bargaining units," which appeared in the 1980 contract.

On 13 September 1984 the Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative for a group of eight commercial employees who worked at the Employer's Public Service Center on Kossow Road in Waukesha, Wisconsin. The 1983 contract was then amended by letter dated 24 September 1984 to include the Kossow Road employees in the overall commercial workers unit set forth in appendix D. This change was later incorporated into the 1986 collective-bargaining agreement between the parties. It is undisputed that the Kossow Road employees have been paid in accordance with wage rates listed in appendix D and that other contractual benefits and provisions have been applied to them. The instant petition was filed on 22 May 1986, requesting a decertification election in a unit limited to all Public Service Center employees at the Kossow Road location.

The Board has long recognized the "merger doctrine" under which an employer and union can agree to merge separately certified or recognized units into one overall unit.[3] This doctrine was recently affirmed in our decision in Gibbs & Cox, 280 NLRB 953 (1986). Where such an agreement has been reached, the larger, merged unit is the only unit appropriate for purposes of a representation election. Here, the Employer and the Union reached an agreement that merged the Kossow Road employees into the larger unit set forth in appendix D of the 1983 and 1986 collective-bargain-

[1] The Union maintains that the agreement between the parties merged the Public Service Center employees at the Kossow Road location into an overall unit of employees, comprising all 4000 Wisconsin Bell employees represented by the Union. In the alternative, the Union claims that the Kossow Road unit merged into a single unit of all commercial employees set forth in appendix D of the collective-bargaining agreement. We find that the evidence establishes at least that the Kossow Road employees were merged into a unit with the employees in appendix D of the collective-bargaining agreement, and find it unnecessary to pass on whether the unit in appendix D was merged into a larger unit of all Wisconsin Bell employees.

[2] Commercial work generally encompasses such duties as sales, service, marketing, and bill collecting.

[3] See, e.g., White-Westinghouse Corp., 229 NLRB 667 (1977); General Electric Co., 180 NLRB 1094 (1970).

ing agreements. Accordingly, as the petitioned-for unit is not coextensive with the currently recognized and established bargaining unit, the petition shall be dismissed.[4]

ORDER

The petition is dismissed.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would reverse the Regional Director's dismissal of the petition, and would instead reinstate the petition and remand the case to the Region for further appropriate action, including the scheduling of an election in the petitioned-for unit. The Board determined that the employees in the Public Service Center at the Kossow Road location constituted a separate appropriate unit for bargaining when it directed a representation election and thereafter certified the Union as the collective-bargaining representative on 13 September 1986 in that unit. The Regional Director found, and the majority agrees, that this unit is now inappropriate for purposes of a decertification election because of the Employer and the Union's agreement to merge this eight-person unit into the much larger unit set forth in appendix D to the 1986 collective-bargaining agreement. I disagree.

The employees in the Kossow Road unit expressed an interest in union representation in mid-1984. At no time was there any mention of the fact that their small unit of approximately eight employees would be merged into a larger unit of Wisconsin Bell employees. At an organizational meeting prior to the election in September 1984, the employees specifically asked if they would be able to decertify the Union "if it ever came to that point." The response was that they would be able to have a decertification election at any time through proper procedures and filing a petition. The Kossow Road employees were not given a copy of the then-current collective-bargaining agreement prior to the election. Neither were they informed at any time of the 24 September 1984 letter of agreement between the Employer and the Union that purported to merge them into the larger overall unit.

As set forth in former Member Dennis' and my dissent in Gibbs & Cox, I cannot adhere to a policy that so callously ignores the specific right of employees to reject or change their bargaining representative. The situation here clearly illustrates the inherent unfairness of placing the employees' collective-bargaining fate in the hands of the Employer and the Union. These employees, who have not been represented by counsel, cautiously inquired as to their rights. They received a Delphic response. I cannot state strongly enough my view that the only proper accommodation of employees' Section 7 rights with the policy of stability in labor relations requires that "any unit that was appropriate for the purpose of selecting a bargaining representative remains appropriate for the purpose of rejecting that representative or obtaining a new one."[1] Accordingly, I dissent.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 24 July 1981 Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to rule on the General Counsel's motion to correct the record, dated 30 March 1981. The Respondent, in its answering brief, stipulates to the granting of this motion. Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's motion to correct the record.

[2] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] In agreeing with the judge that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Respondent ever indicated a clear and unequivocal intent to join the multiemployer bargaining unit, we do not rely on two factual findings made by him that are not supported by the record. The judge found that there was no evidence that the Respondent was given copies of the multiemployer association bylaws. The multiemployer association's executive secretary for the Tucson chapter, however, testified that among the materials he gave the Respondent on the date its membership application was submitted were copies of the bylaws of the statewide multiemployer association, as well as those of the Tucson chapter. This evidence was not specifically contradicted. Nevertheless, we agree with the judge's analysis that, even taking into consideration these bylaws, the nature of the Respondent's knowledge of the purpose of the multiemployer association and its Tucson chapter remains murky. We further find that the evidence is insufficient to support the judge's statement that it is likely that the 13 multiemployer members in the Tucson chapter were larger than the 43 contractors who had executed only the memorandum agreement to be bound by the terms of the Union's contract with the multiemployer association. The record is silent on the relative size of these contractors.

Michael J. Karlson, for the General Counsel.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES M. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me at Tucson, Arizona, on February 31, 1981, pursuant to a complaint issued by the Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board for Region 28 on August 1, 1980, and which is based on a charge filed by the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local Union No. 741, AFL–CIO (the Union) on February 6, 1980. The complaint alleges that Best Plumbing & Supply Co. (the Respondent) has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

Issues

Whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withdrawing recognition of the Union during the term of a collective-bargaining contract. The General Counsel alleges that the Respondent was part of a multiemployer bargaining unit and not privileged to do so. The Respondent defends contending it never joined the multiemployer unit and that the General Counsel has neither proven it to be an employer that meets the Board's jurisdictional standards, nor proven that the Union ever represented a majority of its employees.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Respondent.

On the entire record of the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Background and Contentions

The Respondent is a plumbing contractor, principally engaged in home repair work and solar accessory installation in Tucson, Arizona. It is the sole proprietorship of James R. Jaster. Jaster formed his Company in October 1978 when he obtained his contractor's license and began working as an independent contractor for Sears, Roebuck & Co. Originally he operated the business from his home though he later opened an office elsewhere in the city. The General Counsel has made no effort to show that the Respondent, by virtue of its own volume of business, meets any interstate commerce standard for the assertion of jurisdiction by the Board. Instead, she relies on the Respondent's purported membership in a multiemployer collective-bargaining association known as Plumbing and Air Conditioning Contractors Association of Arizona (PAC-State). PAC-State has two divisions: PAC-Phoenix, which negotiates with Local Union 469 for the northern Arizona counties, and PAC-Tucson, which negotiates with the Union herein, Local 741, for the southern Arizona counties and a portion of New Mexico. Respondent admits that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. It further admits that the Board has jurisdiction over PAC-State and its multiemployer members, but denies that the Respondent is or ever has been a member of the multiemployer bargaining unit.

B. Facts Relating to Recognition

According to the Union's business manager, Kenneth Phillips, sometime in August 1978, Jaster came to the Union's office saying that because he had been a "union man," always working union, he was interested in becoming signatory to the Union's contract.[1] Phillips remembers Jaster's stating he intended to work as a "one man operation," but hoped to expand as soon as possible into housing, apartment, and light commercial work. He gave Jaster a blank copy of the memorandum agreement, a 4-by-6 inch card (G.C. Exh. 7) that binds the signer to the master PAC-State agreement. Phillips says he also gave Jaster printed copies of the recently expired master contract together with some supplements. He explained that a new master agreement had recently been negotiated but had not yet been printed for distribution, so he gave Jaster what he had. He says he also told Jaster that in the event Jaster chose to sign the memorandum agreement and hired employees, he would have to obtain an employee bond guaranteeing payments to the collective-bargaining contract's fringe benefit funds. He remembers Jaster asked how he could become a member of PAC. Phillips told him he would have to see PAC-Tucson executive secretary Manly Traylor. Jaster does not recall having gone to the Union in August, but admits his memory is poor.

Even so, in mid-October, Jaster did visit the union office. There is some confusion about the date. Jaster is convinced that he first went to the union office and later the same day went to the PAC-Tucson office. The dates shown on the documents he signed are not consistent with his recollection. He signed an application for membership in PAC-Tucson on October 18, 1978. There appears to be little doubt about the accuracy of that date because he both signed and dated that document. However, he also signed the Union's memorandum agreement, the postcard-size compliance contract. One side contains blanks for the employer's name, signature, address, phone number, and license type, while the other side contains a date blank and the contract terms, literally in "fine print." Phillips printed everything on the first side of the card although Jaster signed it. The date on the other side, October 20, 1978, appears to have been printed by Phillips. In view of the fact that the date is on the side opposite the signature, it is quite possible that the date would be omitted and not filled in until the omission was noticed. None of this is particularly significant to the issues except to credit Jaster's testimony that he first went to the union hall and then to PAC-Tucson. Indeed, PAC-Tucson's Traylor recalled Jaster saying that he had come from the union hall. Traylor also says that as a condition for the Respondent's joining PAC-Tucson, it had to have been signatory to a union contract. Thus, I conclude that Jaster actually signed both documents on October 18, 1978. I also credit his testimony that the Union never gave him a copy of the memorandum agreement.[2]

It appears from Phillips' testimony that the Union has on file memorandum agreements signed by 43 contractors in southern Arizona. Traylor testified that there are 13 members of PAC-Tucson. Although the record is not clear on the point, it is likely that the 13 PAC-Tucson members are larger contractors, while the 43 memorandum contractors are significantly smaller.

The memorandum agreement itself recites "[t]he employer recognizes the unions [the Phoenix and Tucson Locals] as the collective-bargaining representatives of the employer's employees performing work within the recognized work jurisdiction of the undersigned union." It also states that the purpose of the agreement is to eliminate multiplicity of collective bargaining in the industry. Furthermore, a contractor signing the memorandum agreement "agree[s] to comply with and be bound by all the terms of that certain collective-bargaining agreement between [PAC-State] and Local Unions 469 and 741 . . . including all trust agreements referred to and incorporated therein and including all amendments, extensions and renewals." It also acknowledges receipt of a copy of the Association master agreement. Finally, although it states that the duration of the agreement shall be "for so long as the Employer remains in business in Arizona but not to exceed 50 years from the date hereof," it provides for a 30-day written notice to the Union for termination.[3] And, it provides for "economic action" to be taken against the signatory in the event that the Association agreement has expired or terminated or if a separate termination notice has been sent.

Regarding the Respondent's joining PAC-Tucson, curiously there is no evidence in the record that Traylor ever gave Jaster copies of either the PAC-Tucson or PAC-State bylaws at the time Jaster applied for membership, when his membership was approved, or when he began participating in PAC-Tucson affairs.[4] Further, Traylor testified, "PAC-Tucson is an association of plumbing and air conditioning contractors who are signatory with the Local Unions 741 and 469, and as the contractor association members, they assign their bargaining rights . . . to PAC-Tucson." Yet, Traylor readily admit-

[1] Jaster had previously been involved in the plumbing and pipe fitting apprenticeship program in Phoenix where he had worked for various Local 469 contractors. He suffered some personal reverses, including a house fire, and subsequently moved to Tucson. There he worked as an employee for Sears, later deciding it would be more lucrative to form his own business and become an independent contractor for Sears, doing its plumbing repair work. He did not, however, intend to limit himself to work obtained through Sears.

[2] He did, however, receive copies of the master contract and southern Arizona supplements.

[3] "Termination" here means "reopen."

[4] Jaster attended four or five luncheons. He was also appointed to a solar energy subcommittee. There is no evidence that the subcommittee had a collective-bargaining purpose or that collective bargaining was a luncheon topic.

ted there was no document that Jaster or any other contractor actually signed giving PAC-Tucson those bargaining rights. In addition, Traylor said his job included "administer[ing] the functions of the Association . . . I handle their bookwork. We also handle promotional work for them. We gather educational manuals and we sponsor seminars. We deal with the registrar of contractors on contractor complaints and public complaints. There is a myriad of duties I perform."

As I have found above, there is no evidence that Traylor even gave Jaster copies of the bylwas of either PAC-Tucson or PAC-State, so Jaster's knowledge about the purpose of those two groups is unclear. But had Traylor done so, the nature of Jaster's knowledge would still remain murky.

The PAC-Tucson and PAC-State bylaws contain very few references to collective bargaining. Indeed the PAC-Tucson bylaws contain no specific references whatsoever. There is a tangential reference in article II, section 5. It states associate members shall be contractors "signed to National Labor agreements with the United Association [of Journeymen, Apprentices, etc.]. Such associate members shall have all the rights and duties of active members, except that they shall not participate in labor negotiations nor arbitration proceedings nor vote on labor agreements insofar as any of those matters are covered by their national contracts." It can hardly be said that such language would clearly inform an applicant that one of PAC-Tucson's functions was to engage in collective bargaining for its active members.

Article XI, section 1 of the PAC-State bylaws contains other unclear references to collective bargaining. There it states "the Association traditionally has engaged in collective bargaining on behalf of all plumbing contractors in the State of Arizona contracting with United Association, Locals 469 and 741." Unfortunately that statement is not 100 percent true. It may be that PAC-State "traditionally engages" in collective bargaining, but it is no doubt demonstrable that it does not do so on behalf of "all plumbing contractors" in Arizona. First, there are the nonunion contractors for which the Association can lay no claim and, second, there are those memorandum agreement signers who have reached agreement without the Association's assistance. One cannot rely on this clause for the conclusion that the Respondent had notice it would become bound to the multiemployer unit.

That same section also discusses possible needs that may arise from time to time to adopt policies regarding negotiating committee actions including responses to strikes, such as lockouts. Section 2 of that same article refers to "nonmembers for whom the Association bargains," saying that as a condition of being represented by the Association, the Association expects such nonmembers to abide by Association decisions during negotiations. Section 3 allows for the discipline of both members and "represented nonmembers" in the event that they choose not to follow Association policy.

Jaster denies either the Union or PAC-Tucson ever gave him copies of the expired or current collective-bargaining contracts and supplements at the time he signed the memorandum agreement or at the time that he signed the application for PAC-Tucson membership. He says when he joined PAC he thought he was joining a service organization "like the Lions Club." He remembers leaving the PAC-Tucson office with an armload of publicity materials, PIPE logos,[5] educational materials, and such.[6]

I recognize that Jaster testified that as an apprentice in Phoenix he had worked under predecessor contracts and undoubtedly had some idea of PAC-State's role in collective bargaining. Nonetheless, his testimony that he thought the PAC organizations to be voluntary industry promotion groups is not without believability. Clearly the PAC organizations do carry out that function; they provide much promotional material including logos for hardhats and trucks. It seems probable to me that Jaster believed the logs would enhance his image as a new contractor and would assist him in developing his own business. Considering that there is no evidence that he was actually given copies of the PAC bylaws, the fact that the PAC-Tucson bylaws contain no forceful reference to collective bargaining, and that the PAC-State bylaw references to collective bargaining are vague and to some extent misleading, I credit his testimony that he did not understand that one of PAC-Tucson's functions was collective bargaining. Even if he did understand PAC's bargaining purpose, due to his past experience in Phoenix, there is still a serious question about what sort of collective bargaining service PAC-Tucson was to perform for him. Was it offering him multiemployer bargaining unit membership or some form of "me-tooism"?

An analysis of the PAC-Tucson and PAC-State bylaws shows that there are different categories of membership. PAC-Tucson's bylaws set forth three classes of members: active, associate, and honorary.[7] It defines an active member as "any individual who is a duly licensed contractor . . . credibly conducting business in the mechanical field using pipe or tubing" in certain southern Arizona counties. It then describes the manner or membership application for that class, which is consistent with the action Jaster took except that the $25 initiation fee was never required of him. It also requires an active member to take an oath of membership, but that oath does not mention collective bargaining;[8] neither does the membership certificate.

Associate membership may be granted under article II, section 5A "to any person associated with or employed by a duly licensed contractor" upon a vote of two-thirds of the members present in any regular meeting. Associate members are entitled to attend meetings but not to hold office or to have any voice or vote unless given a proxy by an active member.

[5] PIPE is an acronym for "Piping Industry Progress and Education" programs, an industry promotion gorup. It is funded through collective bargaining, but that fact would not be immediately apparent to someone outside the industry or unfamiliar with the contract.

[6] I do not credit Jaster's denial insofar as the Union is concerned. See fn. 2, supra. It is possible that Traylor included contracts in the package given Jaster, but that they were buried or not seen. It is unnecessary to decide the question, however.

[7] Honorary membership is not pertinent here and shall not be discussed.

[8] Despite the bylaw, it appears that the oath itself has not been required for the past 10–12 years.

The PAC-State bylaws with respect to active members are quite similar to those of PAC-Tucson, except that a condition precedent to PAC-State membership is either PAC-Tucson or PAC-Phoenix membership, or a waiver from the local PAC. Being an active member of a local PAC "automatically entitles such member to membership" in PAC-State. The use of the verb "entitle" is curious for it implies that one may become a member of the local PAC and not become a member of PAC-State unless one chooses to. That appears to have significance as there is a third category of contractors somehow involved with the PAC organizations, but for whom there is no definition in the bylaws. These are plumbing and air-conditioning contractors who are not members of PAC, but who allow PAC to bargain for them. Whether those individuals join the local PAC but not the state PAC or whether they allow PAC-State to bargain for them through some other means is not clear on this record.

In this context, then, what is it that the Respondent actually did when it signed the application for membership in PAC-Tucson on October 18? Its application somewhat deviates from the PAC-State entitlement language by saying "I understand that this membership will also include membership in [PAC-State]." Second, what is it that Union Business Manager Phillips thought Respondent was doing when Jaster executed the memorandum agreement after he said he was going to be a one-man operation until he got on his feet while simultaneously asking about joining PAC? Phillips remembers thinking Jaster's desire to join PAC was "unusual" in view of the fact that Jaster's operation did not seem appropriate for PAC.

C. Later Events; the Withdrawal of Recognition

Jaster testified that he wrote a letter dated February 21, 1979 (G.C. Exh. 18 and R. Exh. 1) canceling the memorandum agreement. The Union denies the letter was ever received. Whatever the truth is here, it is undisputed that the Respondent did not hire any employees until June 21, 1979, 5 months later; it did not then follow the terms of the master agreement. The Respondent did not hire through the Union's hiring hall, pay contract wages or fringe benefits, or post a fringe benefit bond as required by that agreement.

In September 1979, Etheredge, one of the Respondent's employees, told Union Business Agent Shaw that he had been working for the Respondent. That triggered an inquiry into the Respondent's circumstances. The inquiry drew a September 24 letter from Jaster claiming he had canceled the memorandum agreement on February 21 and had no further obligations to the Union. On October 5, the Union wrote Jaster by certified mail accusing Respondent of violating the collective-bargaining agreement in certain respects and asking him to resolve those matters. By mailgram received by the Union on October 12, Jaster denied any contract violations claiming, inter alia, that he had no agreement. On October 15 Shaw filed a grievance with the labor management committee established by the collective-bargaining contract to deal with such matters. On October 22 the committee held a hearing and on November 19 found Respondent to have violated the contract as the Union alleged. The decision also stated that legal collection proceedings would be instituted if within 10 days corrective action was not begun.

Instead of enforcing that decision, the Union, on February 6, 1980, filed the instant charge. The record is not clear regarding the number of employees Respondent has had since June 21, 1979, showing only that Etheredge was employed from August 9 to September 24, 1979, although apparently at least one other employee had worked prior to that.

Analysis and Conclusions

It seems to me that the threshold question here is whether the Respondent at any time ever joined the PAC-State multiemployer bargaining unit. If it did, then the General Counsel can responsibly rely on PAC-State's commerce data for the assertion of jurisdiction over the Respondent and may also rely on the unrebuttable presumption of majority that normally flows from a current collective-bargaining contract. See Tragniew, Inc., 185 NLRB 962 (1970), enf. denied on other grounds 470 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1972).[9] If not, the General Counsel's case must fail for she has adduced no evidence whatsoever with respect to the volume of business actually performed by the Respondent during that portion of the business year that preceded the admitted withdrawal of recognition on June 21, 1979.

Both parties agree that the test of whether the Respondent joined a multiemployer bargaining unit depends on whether "the employer unequivocally intended to be bound in collective bargaining by group, rather than individual, action. The Respondent cites York Transfer & Storage Co., 107 NLRB 139, 142 (1953), and the General Counsel cites Ruan Transport Corp., 234 NLRB 241, 242 (1978), for that proposition. This rule was also relied on by the Board in Bagel Bakers Council of Greater New York, 174 NLRB 622, 628 (1969). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals in enforcing Bagel Bakers observed, however, that the Board has also followed another, somewhat different test: "whether the union 'has been notified of the formation of the group and the delegation of bargaining authority to it, and has assented and entered upon negotiations with the group representative.'" 434 F.2d 884, 886 (2d Cir. 1970).[10] The court implicitly accepted the proposition that the validity of a multiemployer bargaining unit depends not only on the intent of the employers but the acceptance of a group unit by the union. This is no doubt due to the consensual nature of multiemployer bargaining. Retail Associates, 120 NLRB 388 (1958). The two tests are to some extent inconsistent, although as a practical matter they usually reach the same result. Here, too, I think that under either test the result is the same.

[9] Sec. 8(f) of the Act may impact this presumption in the construction industry but it is unnecessary to consider that question here. See R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), and NLRB v. Iron Workers Local 103 (Higdon Contracting), 434 U.S. 335 (1978).

[10] The court cited Weyerhaeuser Co., 166 NLRB 299 (1967), which in turn cited Kroger Co., 148 NLRB 569 (1964), and Van Eerden Co., 154 NLRB 496 (1965).

I do not think that the proof here reaches the "clear and unequivocal" level with regard to what the Respondent's intent was when it joined PAC-Tucson. First, there is Jaster's somewhat tenuous testimony that he thought he was joining an industry-promotion group and that he could avail himself of its beneficial advertising (i.e., the PIPE logos). I have no doubt that the latter was a consideration, but in view of his work experience in Phoenix, I am not certain that he can be believed without reservation regarding his claim that he had no idea that PAC-State was a multiemployer collective-bargaining unit. Even so, he did not specifically join PAC-State, although that was the apparent result of joining PAC-Tucson. However, PAC-Tucson's bylaws do not in any way reflect that its own purpose is to engage in collective bargaining. Indeed, it does not.[11] The multiemployer collective bargaining is conducted by PAC-State, although PAC-Tucson officials and committee members participate in that parent body. Instead, as PAC-Tucson's executive secretary Traylor said, "PAC-Tucson engages in promotional work for its membership, gathers educational manuals, sponsors seminars, and deals with the registrar of contractors on contractor and public complaints." Thus, despite the facially tenuous nature of Jaster's testimony, the weight of the evidence favors crediting it.

Furthermore, one may legitimately ask why Jaster would seek to have a collective-bargaining representative if he had already signed the memorandum agreement and was satisfied with it. If it was to engage in collective bargaining with the Union, he certainly did not need to join PAC, for he had already signed the memorandum agreement and had become bound to the master by it. Is the answer that he simply wished "to join the Lions Club"? Traylor's testimony that a contractor could not become a member of PAC-Tucson until he signed a contract with the Union sets forth a curious requirement not found in the bylaws. When a contractor joins a multiemployer bargaining unit, his act of joining is sufficient to bind him to the master collective-bargaining contract. Why then does PAC-Tucson require an applicant to sign a separate agreement with the Union? Is it actually a requirement or is it testimony designed to keep the Union happy with PAC during this litigation? If the separate contract requirement exists, it is totally unnecessary and, rather than persuading me that a PAC-Tucson applicant is joining a multiemployer bargaining unit, leads me to believe that he is doing nothing of the kind.

Moreover, while I am well aware that forming or joining a multiemployer collective-bargaining unit does not require an express agreement, Bagel Bakers, supra, nonetheless the lack of an express agreement is a factor to be considered. Here, the Respondent was not asked to and never did specifically give PAC-State or PAC-Tucson any document giving them its bargaining rights. It may be true that none of the 13 PAC-Tucson members did either, but by the same token, I must assume that neither did the 43 contractors who signed compliance agreements. Yet, some of those must be the "represented nonmember" contractors referred to in the PAC-State bylaws. There is no evidence that those contractors belong to the multiemployer bargaining unit, only that they appear to be contractors who have separately adopted the master agreement, just as the Respondent did.

But, the General Counsel observes that the Respondent specifically applied to be an active member of PAC-Tucson and that the application form stated he understood his PAC-Tucson memberhip would "also include membership" in PAC-State. First, while PAC-State's bylaws permit an individual contractor to elect whether or not he wishes to join, there is no evidence that Jaster had the opportunity actually to choose. The application language is not "clear and unequivocal." Second, I note that even though Jaster applied for active membership in PAC-Tucson, it did not charge him an initiation fee and he never paid any periodic dues.[12]

Frankly, I do not believe that Jaster's conduct here amounts to a "clear and unequivocal intent" to join a multiemployer collective-bargaining unit. At best he appears instead, consistent with his testimony, to have intended to join an industry-promotion group.

If the foregoing observations are not sufficient to warrant the conclusion that he did not join the multiemployer bargaining unit, the second test may still be applied. Was the Union ever notified that Respondent had joined the multiemployer collective-bargaining unit? Did it ever consent? There is absolutely no evidence Traylor ever notified the Union that Respondent had been accepted into the multiemployer bargaining unit. In fact, Business Manager Phillips thought it was odd that Jaster wanted to join PAC-Tucson at all. He knew Jaster was a minnow in the sea and thought it queer that he would wish to join with the larger contractors. Furthermore, Respondent signed the memorandum agreement, which by its own terms speaks to separate bargaining.

That compliance agreement recites a number of options available to the signing contractor indicative of a separate bargaining unit. Although it obligates him to comply with "all" the master agreement's terms, it is of much longer duration, permitting the master to be modified without consulting the memorandum signer. Yet, it gives the memorandum signer the right to avoid that occurrence by allowing a separate contract opening[13] and the right to engage in separate economic action on such an opening. In that circumstance I think the Union intended memorandum signers, such as the Respondent, to be separate bargaining units. Thus, the circumstances here are very similar to those in Ted Hicks & Associates, 232 NLRB 712, 713 fn. 3 (1977), in which the Board found that a contractor who signed a similar memorandum agreement did not become a member of the Associated General Contractors multiemployer unit. The Board "deem[ed] the memorandum agreement to be a separate [11] Local supplements are signed by the appropriate Local Union and PAC-State, not PAC-Tucson.

[12] PAC-Tucson claims to have waived the initiation fee and to have remitted a certain portion of his expected dues to PAC-State, giving him a credit while awaiting payment.

[13] Indeed, Jaster testified, without contradiction, that Phillips told him he could cancel the agreement by simply writing the Union a letter to that effect.

contract between Respondent and the Union." Likewise, I do not believe that the Union here had any realistic expectation that the Respondent was doing anything other than what its other 43 memorandum signatories had done (i.e., agreed to be bound in separate bargaining units to the terms set forth in the master agreement between the two local unions and PAC-State).

Accordingly, I conclude that the Respondent's conduct did not constitute a clear and unequivocal intent to join the multiemployer bargaining unit. Neither did the Union ever consent to its joining or even expect or think that it had. The fact that the Union later resorted to the master agreement's disputes resolution clause does not lead me to think otherwise.[14] The memorandum agreement did not specifically exclude dispute coverage and in any event those individuals signing the memorandum agreement apparently desired to be treated similarly to those actually belonging to the multiemployer unit.

Thus, I conclude that the General Counsel has failed to prove that the Respondent ever joined the multiemployer collective-bargaining unit. In that circumstance, it cannot be deemed to be engaged in interstate commerce as there is no proof of that fact. I therefore shall recommend that the complaint be dismissed.

On the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The General Counsel has not proven that the Respondent, Best Plumbing & Supply Co., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[15]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[14] The Union may yet seek enforcement of the labor management committee's award in an appropriate forum.

[15] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 14 January 1987 the Board issued its decision in this case.[1] On 25 February 1987 the General Counsel filed a "Motion for Clarification."

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the motion and its earlier decision in light of the Tax Reform Act of 1986[2] and has decided to grant the General Counsel's motion. The General Counsel asserts that clarification of the method used by the Board to compute interest on backpay is required because of the recent change in the method used by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) to compute interest charged or paid on the underpayment or overpayment of Federal taxes. We agree that the current method of computing interest on backpay is no longer appropriate and for the reasons set out below we adopt the method currently used by the IRS to compute interest charged on the underpayment of Federal taxes.

In order to keep in line with current economic conditions, the Board in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), abandoned the 6-percent interest rate it had established in Isis Plumbing Co.[3] and adopted the sliding interest scale charged or paid by the IRS on the underpayment or overpayment of Federal taxes. This sliding rate was embodied in § 6621 of the Internal Revenue Code.[4] The rate was fixed at the adjusted prime rate[5] recalculated periodically by the Secretary of the Treasury to reflect changes in the money market. The Board chose a rate keyed to the private sector money market in order to encourage timely compliance with Board orders, discourage the commission of unfair labor practices, and more fully compensate discriminatees for their economic losses.

A number of factors led to the selection of the IRS "adjusted prime rate" as the Board's interest rate. First, it was directly tied to interest rates in the private money market. It also was subject to periodic semiautomatic adjustment and, finally, it was easy to administer.[6]

The Tax Reform Act of 1986 changes the method by which the interest rate is calculated under § 6621.[7] As of 1 January 1987, the IRS no longer calculates interest on tax underpayments and overpayments based on the adjusted prime rate, but rather uses the "short-term Federal rate."[8] The Secretary of the Treasury determines the short-term Federal rate on a monthly basis; however, the IRS applies the rate quarterly.[9] Thus, the short-term Federal rate for any quarter is the rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury for the first month of the previous calendar quarter. Any such rate so determined by the Secretary must be rounded to the nearest full percent.[10] The Tax Reform Act also imposes different rates for the underpayment and overpayment of Federal taxes. The overpayment rate (paid by the IRS on refunds) is the short-term Federal rate plus 2 percent, while the underpayment rate (paid by the taxpayer on additional taxes) is the short-term Federal rate plus 3 percent.[11]

The General Counsel urges that we adopt the method for computing interest set out in the amendments to § 6621 and that we select the underpayment rate for calculating interest on backpay awards. We agree with the General Counsel. The short-term Federal rate has many of the characteristics that prompted the Board in Florida Steel to adopt the adjusted prime rate as used by the IRS pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Thus, while it is not directly linked to interest rates in the private money market, the short-term Federal rate is based on average market yields on marketable Federal obligations and is influenced by private economic market forces. Further, it is subject to periodic adjustment and is relatively easy to administer. Under the method used in Florida Steel, the adjusted prime rate was determined semiannually, for the 6-month periods ending on September 30 and March 31, with the rate for September 30 determinations taking effect on the following January 1, and for

March 31 determinations the following July 1. By contrast, the short-term Federal rate is determined quarterly, with the rate for any calendar quarter being the rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury on the first month of the previous calendar quarter (e.g., the rate determined in January would be effective for the following April through June). While the interest rate may change four times a year rather than twice a year, this does not pose any greater administrative burden for the Board because backpay is usually computed quarterly.[12] As in Florida Steel, any adjustment in the rate will be known well ahead of the effective date (in the short-term Federal rate case, 2 months, rather than 3 months in Florida Steel); and the rate is rounded to the nearest whole percent. As noted, we find that the underpayment rate is the appropriate one to use in computing interest on backpay awards.[13]

Therefore, on the backpay due in this case, we shall require that the Respondent pay interest to accrue commencing with the last day of each calendar quarter of the backpay period for the amount due and owing for each quarterly period and continuing until compliance with the Order is achieved, such interest to be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.[14]

[12] F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950). In Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682, 683 (1970), however, the Board held that backpay owing from the repudiation and failure to apply the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement will not be computed using the Woolworth formula because cessation of the employment status and interim earnings are not involved. We shall, nevertheless, use the quarterly method for computing interest on backpay due in all backpay situations, because the determination of the rate of interest to be applied in any given backpay period is not affected by the methods used to compute backpay.

[13] We note that at the present time, adoption of the underpayment rate will result in no change from the interest computed under the Florida Steel formula, which was 9 percent through March 1987. The underpayment rate for the first quarter of 1987 was 9 percent and it has remained so through the current quarter. See Rev. Rul. 86-146, 1986-50 Internal Revenue Bulletin 5 (Dec. 15, 1986) (first quarter rate); and Rev. Rul. 87-23, 1987-13 Internal Revenue Bulletin 46 (Mar. 30, 1987) (second quarter rate).

[14] Interest on amounts accrued prior to 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621) shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Local No. 128, International Union of United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (Hobart Corporation) and David W. Ferguson. Case 8–CB–5197

29 May 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed on 20 April 1984 by David W. Ferguson, an individual, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on 4 June 1984. The complaint alleges that about 13 December 1983, Local No. 128, International Union of United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, the Respondent, has unlawfully refused to accept the resignation of David W. Ferguson, the Charging Party; has continued to demand that Hobart Corporation, Ferguson's employer, continue to deduct dues from Ferguson's pay; and has continued to receive such dues. The complaint further alleges that by the acts and conduct described above, and by each of these acts, the Respondent has restrained and coerced, and is restraining and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, and that the Respondent has been engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

On 2 September 1986 the Respondent, the Charging Party, and the General Counsel filed a motion to transfer the proceeding to the Board and a stipulation of facts, with exhibits attached. The parties agreed that the charge, the complaint and notice of hearing, the answer, and the stipulation of facts with attached exhibits constitute the entire record in the case, and that no oral testimony is necessary or desired by any of the parties. The parties waived a hearing before an administrative law judge, the making of findings of facts and conclusions of law by an administrative law judge, and the issuance of an administrative law judge's decision. The parties submitted this case for findings of facts, conclusions of law, and order directly by the Board.

On 12 November 1986 the Board issued an order granting the parties' motion, approving the stipulation, and transferring the proceeding to the Board. Thereafter the General Counsel and the Respondent filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record and the briefs, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material herein, Hobart Corporation, an Ohio corporation with an office and place of business in Troy, Ohio, has been engaged in the manufacture of home appliances. Annually, Hobart Corporation, in the course and conduct of its business operations, sells and ships from its Troy, Ohio facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Ohio. We find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

We find that the Respondent Union is and has been at all times material herein a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Stipulated Facts

The Respondent and the Hobart Corporation had a collective-bargaining agreement in effect on 13 December 1983, which was effective by its terms from 5 February 1981—31 December 1983. This collective-bargaining agreement (the Hobart Agreement) provides, inter alia, that:

ARTICLE II

Maintenance of Union Membership

> 1. All employees who on the date of the signing of this Agreement are members of the Union in good standing in accordance with its Constitution and By-Laws, and those employees who may thereafter become members shall, during the life of this Agreement as a condition of employment, remain members of the Union in good standing; provided, however, that during the period stated in the Memorandum of Understanding attached hereto as Appendix E any employee may resign from the Union should he so desire. Any such resignation must be in writing and be mailed during the period stated in the said Memorandum of Understanding by registered mail to the Union, addressed to Local No. 128, International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace & Agricultural Implement Workers of America, Troy,Ohio, attention to the Finance Secretary [emphasis added].

Article III, section 10, of the constitution and bylaws of the Hobart unit of the Respondent provides that "No member shall terminate his membership except at such time as set forth in the current contract between the Hobart Corp. and this unit of Local No. 128, and according to the procedure set forth therein."

David W. Ferguson has been an employee of the Hobart Corporation at least since 1 January 1980. He currently holds the position of millwright. On 13 December 1983 the Respondent received from Ferguson a letter of resignation from membership in the Respondent. This letter was mailed by certified mail. The letter is addressed to the Respondent, attention of the finance secretary, and states that "I David W. Ferguson do hereby submit notice of resignation" from the Respondent. Since 13 December 1983 the Respondent has refused to accept Ferguson's resignation from union membership. Further, since 13 December 1983 the Respondent has continued to demand that Hobart Corporation continue to deduct dues from Ferguson's pay, and has continued to receive such dues.

Ferguson's applicable authorization for dues checkoff, dated 24 November 1981, provides for the withholding from Ferguson's pay of "such sums as the Financial Officer of said Local No. 128 may certify as due and owing from me as membership dues, including an initiation or reinstatement fee and monthly dues in such sum as may be established from time to time as union dues in accordance with the Constitution of the International Union, UAW." The authorization is irrevocable for 1 year from the date of delivery or until the termination of the Hobart Agreement, whichever occurs sooner, unless the employee gives written notice to the Hobart Corporation and the Union not more than 20 or less than 10 days before either the 1-year period or the Hobart Agreement expires, whichever occurs sooner. There is no indication in the record that Ferguson has given such notice.

B. Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by refusing to accept Ferguson's resignation. She argues that in Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984), the Board held that a union's imposition of restriction on a member's right to resign, as well as any other restrictions a union may impose on resignations from membership, violated the Act. She argues that although Neufeld directly concerned restrictions on resignation during a strike or lockout, under Neufeld's language, any restrictions on resignation are invalid. The General Counsel cites several cases dealing specifically with restrictions on the times during which union members may resign, and argues that the Board's language in these cases militates against any restrictions on the manner of withdrawal, so long as the resignation is clear and unequivocal. See Electrical Workers IUE Local 441 (Phelps Dodge), 281 NLRB 1006 (1986); Sheet Metal Workers Local 73 (Safe Air), 274 NLRB 374 (1985); Newspaper Guild Local 3 (New York News), 271 NLRB 1251 (1984); and Bricklayers Local 17 (California Tile), 271 NLRB 1571.

She further argues that Ferguson's resignation letter manifests a clear intention to resign and, moreover, the Respondent admits to having received Ferguson's resignation. She contends that in Telephone Traffic Union Local 212 (New York Telephone), 278 NLRB 988 (1986), the Board found that a union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by refusing to accept a member's resignation that had been mailed by regular rather than registered mail, as the union required, when the union did not dispute receipt of the resignation. Finally, the General Counsel argues that even if the restrictions in the Hobart Agreement are lawful, the Respondent failed to fulfill its fiduciary obligations to Ferguson, because the record contains no evidence that the Respondent notified him that he was required to remit his resignation by registered, rather than certified, mail. See Phelps Dodge, supra.

The Respondent argues that the Board should give full effect to the intent of the parties regarding the procedure for resigning from the Union as manifested in the collective-bargaining agreement, in keeping with the Board's policy of giving full effect to contract language that does not violate the Act. The Respondent argues that the parties agreed that union members must send their resignation to the Union by registered mail and that because Ferguson failed to do so, his resignation was ineffective. Moreover, it argues, the procedure for resignation upon which the parties have agreed is not illegal.[1]

C. Discussion

We find that the Respondent has violated the Act by refusing to accept Ferguson's resignation and by persisting in demanding that his Employer continue to deduct and remit dues after the resignation. In Neufeld Porsche-Audi the Board held that "a union may not lawfully restrict the rights of its members to resign from membership." 270 NLRB at 1336. In Phelps Dodge, supra, the Board applied the rule enunciated in Neufeld to restrictions contained in a collective-bargaining agreement. In

[1] The question of the lawfulness of the temporal restriction on resignations was not put in issue by either party and is thus not before us for resolution in this case. See Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330, 1333 (1984).

Phelps Dodge, the Board specifically declined to make an exception to the Neufeld rule in such cases, and we again decline to do so. Under the facts of this case, however, it is unnecessary to pass on the legality of the requirement that resignations be sent by registered mail. Thus, even assuming arguendo that the collective-bargaining agreement's restrictions on the manner of resignation are lawful under Neufeld, Ferguson's resignation was effective notwithstanding his failure to comply with the procedural requirement. In New York Telephone, supra, the Board gave effect to a resignation sent to the union by regular mail in contravention of the union's requirement that resignations be sent by registered mail. In New York Telephone, as here, the union did not dispute that it had received the resignation letter. Therefore, in view of the Respondent's admitted receipt of his letter, Ferguson's resignation by certified mail from the Respondent was valid, and the Respondent's refusal to accept his resignation violates Section 8(b)(1)(A). Typographical Union (Register Publishing), 270 NLRB 1386 (1984); Operating Engineers Local 12 (Associated Engineers), 282 NLRB 1337 (1987).[2]

Further, we find that the Respondent has violated the Act by continuing to demand that dues be withheld from Ferguson's paycheck and by continuing to accept those dues. In Eagle Signal, supra, the Board reiterated its well-settled rule concerning the effect of resignations from union membership on dues-checkoff authorizations:

> It is established Board law that a dues-checkoff authorization . . . is a contract between an employee and his employer and that a resignation of union membership ordinarily does not revoke a checkoff authorization. However, a resignation will, by operation of law, revoke a checkoff authorization, even absent a revocation request, where the authorization itself makes payment of dues a quid pro quo for union membership. This is so whether or not the resignation is made during the period for revocation set forth in the authorization itself.

268 NLRB at 637 (footnotes omitted). Accordingly, the issue here is whether the terms of Ferguson's written assignment make payment of dues a quid pro quo for union membership. If they do, then Ferguson's valid resignation will operate to revoke his dues-checkoff authorization, "whether or not the resignation is made during the period for revocation set forth in the authorization itself." Eagle Signal, supra at 637.

As noted above, the assignment executed by Ferguson specifically assigns to the Respondent "such sums . . . as are due and owing from me as membership dues, including an initiation or reinstatement fee in such sum as may be established from time to time as union dues." The terms of this assignment are virtually indistinguishable in pertinent respects fom the assignment in Eagle Signal, which authorized the deduction of "regular monthly Union dues . . . in accordance with regular membership dues," 268 NLRB at 638, and from that in Postal Service, 279 NLRB 40 (1986), which directed the deduction of "such regular and periodic membership dues as the Union may certify as due and owing from me." In both Eagle Signal and Postal Service, the Board concluded that the authorizations clearly conveyed that the employees paid dues as a quid pro quo for union membership and not to cover other financial obligations, such as "financial core" payments in lieu of membership. In light of the similarity of Ferguson's authorization to those in Eagle Signal and Postal Service, we find that Ferguson's authorization also clearly provides for the payment of dues as quid pro quo for union membership. Therefore, when Ferguson effectively resigned his union membership, the financial obligation he undertook when he assigned membership dues to the Respondent ceased, for purposes of dues checkoff.[3]

Accordingly, we conclude that the Respondent, by continuing to demand that Hobart Corporation continue to deduct dues from Ferguson's pay, and by continuing to receive his dues, further violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Hobart Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[2] We find inapposite KCB Furniture Co., 247 NLRB 541 (1980), enfd. 634 F.2d 436 (9th Cir. 1980), which the Respondent cites for the principle that where the parties have agreed to unambiguous contractual language that does not violate the Act the Board should respect the agreement. That case concerned the operation of an automatic renewal clause in a collective-bargaining agreement and not the right of members to resign union membership, or any other comparable issue involving the exercise of Sec. 7 rights. The Respondent also cites Machinists Local 2045 (Eagle Signal), 268 NLRB 635 at 637 (1984), solely for the proposition that where the parties have agreed on a procedure for resignation from a union, that procedure will be given full effect. Without passing on the accuracy of the Respondent's interpretation of that portion of Eagle Signal, we point out that, as noted above, the Board subsequently in Phelps Dodge, supra at fn. 1, did not give full effect to a restriction on resignation from union membership contained in a collective-bargaining agreement. Further, as noted above, in New York Telephone, supra, the Board found that even assuming that the union's procedural requirements concerning the manner in which resignations were to be submitted were lawful, the failure of the member seeking resignation to follow such requirements was not a valid defense to an 8(b)(1)(A) violation where the union in fact received his resignation letter.

[3] Member Johansen notes that the same result is reached if we construe the authorization to continue but that, as the amount of dues owed is zero, zero is the amount to be deducted and remitted.

2. The Respondent, Local No. 128, International Union of United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing to accept the resignation from membership of David W. Ferguson, the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By continuing to demand that Hobart Corporation continue to deduct dues from David W. Ferguson's pay, and by continuing to receive such dues after Ferguson's effective resignation, the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. In addition, we shall order that the Respondent make David W. Ferguson whole for any monetary loss he may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's unlawful conduct by refunding to him all dues withheld from his pay after he had effectively resigned from membership in the Respondent, with interest to be computed in the manner as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Local No. 128, International Union of United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, Troy, Ohio, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to accept David W. Ferguson's resignation from membership.

(b) Continuing to demand that Hobart Corporation continue to deduct dues from Ferguson's pay and continuing to receive such dues.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Accept David W. Ferguson's resignation from membership, and inform both him and his Employer, Hobart Corporation, in writing of that acceptance.

(b) Refund to David W. Ferguson the dues unlawfully deducted from his paycheck following his valid resignation, as set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(c) Post at its business office and other places where notices to its members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[4] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest will be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."
